The Bolsheviki, autocrats though they are, have at least done better than we here in Boston in providing equal opportunity for every one to hear good music well performed at a nominal price. In Moscow and Petrograd there have been overflowing popular audiences for classical concerts in the past few years, since "the people have ruled."

Fortunately a revolution has not been necessary to bring the beginning of democracy, which means equal opportunity, at Symphony Hall. Those of little faith in the desire for good music among the plain people hereabouts will be hard put to it to explain the instant and overwhelming response to the new opportunity offered by these young people's concerts. The trustees of the orchestra are to be thanked for this innovation, which will probably not tend to reduce the annual deficit. It is to be hoped that another year the season will be lengthened or the concerts in other cities cut down so that not only the young people, but everyone in the city may have a chance to hear the orchestra, and come to realize that it is the "Boston Symphony," and not the "Back Bay Symphony." Maj Higginson meant it to be ours, but never fully realized his first intentions.

Herald Jan 25

SYMPHONY CONCERTS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

For the "young people's concert" to be given in Symphony Hall next Thursday afternoon at 4 o'clock by the Boston Symphony orchestra, at which Mr. Monteux will conduct Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," Schuberts "Unfinished" symphony and Delibes's ballet, "Sylvia," all tickets have been distributed through the schools and settlements of Greater Boston. So great has been the demand for tickets that applications already received will fill all the available seats, not only for the first concert but for another to be given on Thursday afternoon, Feb. 26, at 4 o'clock. On account of the full schedule of regular Symphony concerts, no more than these two young people's concerts can be undertaken this year.

BOSTON'S CONDUCTOR

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced that the present conductor, Pierre Monteux, will remain for two more years after the present season is ended. This sets at rest rumors as to the position which have variously named Toscanini, Sir Henry Wood, Mengelberg, and Albert Coates as possibilities. Following Henri Rabaud, Mr. Monteux had naturally a difficult place to fill and the trustees of the orchestra by his new contract have signified their approval of his efforts.

Globe Jan 25

MONTEUX TO CONTINUE AS CONDUCTOR OF SYMPHONY

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux, its eminent conductor, whereby he will continue in his post during the seasons of 1920-1921 and 1921-1922. Under his leadership the present season, now half over, has had a success almost without precedent. In Boston, the audiences invariably fill Symphony Hall and manifestly enjoy the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, and the special concerts as well.

PIERRE MONTEUX
To Remain as Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts in the Autumn of 1918 for the brief period in which he could obtain his release from an existing engagement as conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House. In the following Spring he was engaged at the first opportunity as the regular conductor of the orchestra. He began his career by conducting opera and ballet in the larger cities of Europe, and made his particular mark presiding over the Colonne Concerts and the "Concerts Monteux" in Paris. He first came to the United States in 1916 at the head of the Russian Ballet Orchestra.

Traveler Jan 25

PIERRE MONTEUX RENEWS CONTRACT

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today announced that they had secured the services of Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, for two more seasons, those of 1920-1921 and 1921-1922. Mr. Monteux, in his first season with the orchestra, has achieved success beyond the fondest hopes of all interested in the welfare of the great Boston institution. His re-engagement, therefore, is cause for congratulation. Wherever the orchestra has played this season it has been usually a case of capacity audiences and its playing has met with widespread praise.

American Jan 25

MONTEUX TO REMAIN AS SYMPHONY HEAD 3 YEARS

Pierre Monteux has contracted to remain as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the 1920-1921 and 1921-1922 seasons, it was announced today. Mr. Monteux has been in the United States since 1916, coming as head of the Russian Ballet Orchestra. He made his reputation as conductor of the Colonne Concerts and the "Concerts Monteux" in Paris.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SYMPHONY

At the "Young People's Concert" to be given in Symphony Hall next Thursday afternoon at 4 o'clock by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux will conduct Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, and Delibes' ballet, "Sylvia." All tickets have been distributed through the schools and settlements. Applications already received will fill all the available seats not only for the first concert but for a second, to be given Thursday, February 26.

From Tribune
New York City
JAN 24 19

Monteux Signs for Three Years

BOSTON, Jan. 23.—Pierre Monteux, former conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, has signed articles of agreement with the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to continue as conductor here for the next three seasons, it was announced to-night.

ESTABLISHED 1861
JAN 24 1920 E

From North American
Philadelphia, Pa

Boston Orchestra Keeps Monteux

BOSTON, Jan. 23.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux whereby he is continued as conductor during the seasons of 1920-1921 and 1921-1922. Under his leadership the present season, now half over, has had a success almost without precedent.

From News
JAN 24 1920
Baltimore, Md.

Monteux To Stay With Boston.

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux, its eminent conductor, whereby he is to continue in his post during the seasons of 1920-1921 and 1921-1922. Under his inspired leadership the present season, now half over, has had a success almost without precedent. Crowded audiences in this and all cities where the orchestra has visited have manifested high enthusiasm, both as regards the quality of the performances and the interest of the programs.

From Inquirer
JAN 24 19 E
Philadelphia, Pa.

HEADS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Pierre Monteur Engaged as Conductor Until 1922

BOSTON, Jan. 23.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux, its eminent conductor, whereby he is to continue in his post during the seasons of 1920-1921 and 1921-1922.

Under his leadership the present season, now half over, has had a success almost without precedent. Crowded audiences in this and all cities where the orchestra has visited have manifested high enthusiasm, both as regards the quality of the performances, and the interest of the programmes.

It will be remembered that Mr. Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts in the autumn of 1918 for the brief period in which he could obtain his release from an existing engagement as conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House. In the following spring, he was engaged at the first opportunity as the regular conductor of the orchestra.

From Press,
Philadelphia, Pa.

RECORD
ess Philadelphia, Pa.
JAN 24 1920 E

BOSTON KEEPS MONTEUX

He Will Continue to Conduct Symphony Orchestra Three Years.

Special to "The Record."

Boston, Jan. 23.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux, its eminent conductor, whereby he is to continue his post during the seasons of 1920, 1921 and 1922. Under his leadership the present season, now half over, has been a success almost without precedent.

It will be remembered that Mr. Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts in the autumn of 1918 for the brief period in which he could obtain his release from an existing engagement as conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House. In the following spring he was engaged at the first opportunity as the regular conductor of the orchestra.

ESTABLISHED 1861
From
EVENING POST,
New York City

Pierre Monteux has been made permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From
JAN 24 1920 E
Evening Star
Baltimore, Md.

MONTEUX ENGAGED FOR TWO SEASONS

Trustees of Boston Symphony Orchestra Prolong His Conductorship.

"The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux, its eminent conductor, whereby he is to continue in his post during the season of 1920-1921 and 1921-1922," the orchestra announces in a dispatch to The Star, dated January 23.

"Under his inspired leadership," the dispatch continues, "the present season, now half over, has had a success almost without precedent. Crowded audiences in this and all cities where the orchestra has visited have manifested high enthusiasm both as regards the quality of the performances and the interest of the programs."

From Morning Telegraph
New York City

For Boston Children.

The Boston Symphony has announced two concerts for young people on January 29 and February 26 after school hours. Concerts of about an hour's duration will be given by the full orchestra conducted by Mr. Monteux. The prices will be within the reach of children who will have an opportunity to secure tickets in advance of the sale to the general public.

...E SPRINGF

BOSTON SYMPHONY PACKS AUDITORIUM

Hundreds Turned Away, and Twice 4000 Seats Would Have Been in Demand

PIERRE MONTEUX AN ABLE CONDUCTOR

New Director Promptly Wins Favor of Audience — Program Proves Well Adapted to Springfield's Tastes

The Boston symphony orchestra gave its 26th concert in Springfield at the Auditorium yesterday afternoon with Pierre Monteux as conductor. It was of course the star attraction of the excellent series of Sunday afternoon entertainments given under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian association, and if the 4000 seats had been twice as many they would all have been in demand. When the doors closed the street was full of disappointed persons who had hoped that at the last there might be a chance to get in. The concert by the orchestra in the same series last year was an audacious venture, but the result was such as to encourage the management in repeating it, in the hope that a concert by the Boston orchestra might become an annual feature. In putting the case to the audience yesterday Kenneth Robbie explained that the concert was costing between $2200 and $2300, and that if everybody gave from 50 cents to $20 all would be well. The collection was taken during the intermission, and before the concert Rev James Gordon Gilkey, pastor of the South church, read from the scriptures and offered prayer. Other exercises were omitted to leave room for the musical program.

Monteux Pleases Audience

This was the first time that the orchestra had played here under its new conductor, Pierre Monteux, who promptly won the favor of the audience. This distinguished French musician is of a rather different type from any of the notable men who have preceded him during the 39 years of the orchestra's existence and who have differed notably from each other. Physically he is of a type commonest in the south of France and in Italy—compact, robust, swarthy, strong-nerked, curly-haired, apple-cheeked, quick, quiet and energetic. He is notably free from mannerisms, and his conducting while strong and competent, never attracts attention which should go to the music. Nor does he give in the least the effect, to be noted in some of his eminent predecessors, of being bored at having to give a concert outside of Boston and New York. He gave of his best and with all the effect of taking pleasure in it, and the audience responded in the same spirit. That in itself goes far to make a concert a success.

The program, too, was quite what it should be—good in itself, and suited, as not all good programs are, to a city which the orchestra on the average visits but once in 15 months. In such an audience there will be many music-lovers who hear much good music, but not nearly so much orchestral music as they would like. Naturally, when they have a chance to hear America's most famous orchestra they want not merely good music but a full display of the resources of a great modern orchestra; what they hear will have to last some of them a long time. Their needs were amply met in the program given yesterday:—

Symphony No 6 ("Pathetic"), B minor, Tschaikowsky
"Stenka Razini," symphonic poem, Opus 13 ..... Glazounoff
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun".Debussy
Mephisto Waltz ..... Liszt

Nothing Tedious in Program

It contained nothing tedious, long-winded, colorless or dull, no outworn modes, no untried novelties; each item, moreover, had orchestral as well as musical interest, and could be listened to with pleasure, bar by bar, for the sheer beauty or the piquant expressions of what the instruments were saying.

The symphony, along with the fifth by the same composer, is one of the very few modern works in this form which have won with the general public a place with the few accepted favorites like Betthoven's fifth and Schubert's "Unfinished." Theodore Thomas, who had his ear as close to the ground as any conductor, used to say that the public readily warmed to Beethoven and Wagner, but that he found no third to put with them till the rise of Tschaikowsky. In listening to the famous symphony which was played yesterday it is not difficult to see why Tschaikowsky's music makes this strong and immediate appeal. Not only is it intensely emotional, but it wholly lacks the reticence of many masterpieces the emotional richness of which is more slowly appreciated. It may rise to a great climax, but it never holds back for a climax—there are weak, thin, scrambled spots in most of Tschaikowsky's scores, but at least he never gives up, as Brahms, for example, often does, for the next page; from first bars his music is full of [illegible] intensity—his hearers never [illegible] while waiting for

The orchestra under Mr Monteux gave the symphony superbly, with no exaggeration of a pathos which can easily be made too morbid for good art, yet with power and intensity of expression and with full regard for the extremes of contrast which are an essential part of Tschaikowsky's richly colored music. The capricious second movement in the bizarre dance rhythm was exquisitely played, the least bit more quickly than is usual and with a smoother flow than is sometimes the case. The trigic finale of the symphony was made deeply impressive.

Each of the shorter works which made up the second part of the program offered something of interest, and while differing as widely as could well be in other respects, all were orchestrally effective. Glazounoff's music is well known to Springfield's music lovers, but this particular work had not been given here before. It is a fine specimen of the modern Russian school, drawing upon the wealth of Rusian folk music for the song of the Volga boatmen, and abounding in picturesque and colorful passages. What a marvellous range of orchestral "color" modern music posseses was shown by the transition from their vivid hues to the subtle palette of Claude Debussy, whose "Afternoon of a Faun" is the most exquisite of idyls and full of tonal effects that are as marvellous in their symbolic verisimilitude as they are beautiful in themselves; in its visual suggestive- [illegible] even to the suggestion of atmosphere, this music is well nigh miraculous.

Of all the numbers on the program the Liszt Mephisto waltz perhaps made the slightest impression, and in general Lisszt's music is perhaps not so obvious at a first hearing as that of some composers, though it is well liked by the general public when made familiar as "Les Posludes" has been. But the performance yesterday was so spirited and the numerous solo bits were so exquisitely played that all were charmed, and nobody shared the opinion of Boston's famous critic, J. S. Dwight, who 50 years ago called it "positively devilish." A few delicious notes from the violin of the concert master, Frederick Franklin, suggested the hope that he may yet be heard here in a concerto. The orchestra also has a new principal violoncellist, J. Bedetti, whose brief solo passages indicated talent. While there have been many changes in the orchestra in recent years, many of the old faces still appear, and it is now playing better than at any time since things were upset by the general turmoil of the world.

From JOURNAL
Address: Minneapolis, Minn.
Date DEC 16

On the occasion of the next concert in New York, given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, an orchestral work by the Spanish composer, Albeniz, will be introduced. The work, which is a symphonic poem, is entitled "Catalonia."

well.

Springfield Union Jan 13

SYMPHONY GIVES BRILLIANT PROGRAM

Auditorium Concert of Famous Band Under Pierre Monteux.

The largest audience this season, close to 5000, listened yesterday afternoon with many manifestations of genuine delight to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's superb program in the Auditorium. Although the bare announcement of such a quartet of compositions—by two Russians, a Hungarian and a Frenchman—unrelieved by any solo-variant, is not in itself very alluring to a miscellaneous audience, the fame of this orchestra, now in its 39th season, and the reputation of its new French conductor, Monteux, master of baton-magic, were potent factors in bringing about this greater success in the present season's series of Y. M. C. A. entertainments.

M. Monteux is of the extremely animated modern French school rather than of that represented by the Chevalier Andre Messager, whose sedate suavity we had an example during the war. Rather he is a happy combination of Modes Altschuler and of the late Cleofonte Campanini, with the unrelaxing grasp of the Russian conductor, and the electric, fervent emotionalism of the Italian; the always attractive quality of fires controled but leaping to unexpected hights. The art of the smiling, black-haired, enorgetic leader of men is every minute invested with a sort of halo of intensity, instantly communicating itself not only to the members of the orchestra but to hearers as well. The older stalwarts of the organization will tell you that the assertive, unerring language of M. Monteux's very emphatic baton more nearly resembles the almost hypnotic sway of that of Arthur Nikisch than any of the predecessors in his present office.

Russian Imaginative Music.

The concert was full of color and variety. The movements of the first number, Tschaikowsky's "Symphonie Pathetique" really provided four pieces instead of one. This impressive outpouring of the patriot's natural feeling for his star-crossed country which he felt, even in 1893, to be on the brink of the ruin since engulfing it (and there is no use trying to read anything more morbid than that into its fervent, nationally-characterful lines) was given in beautifully finished fashion. In the march measures of the "vivace," the not altogether thornless flower of the imaginative music of this greatest of all Russian composers is reached; like nothing so much as the measured tread of an unseen host, making the ground tremble as it passes in the middle distance. The eloquent pathos of it always astonishes; and breathless attention invariably proves the universal appeal in a Tschaikowsky composition.

Then was heard Glazounoff of Petrograd, with his realistic little symphony about the Cossack river-pirate, "Stenka Razine," with a facility for capturing fair ladies appealing to his bandit fancy, and for presenting them as "gifts" to the Volga. The swinging, surging song of the boatmen, with its lovely scoring for harp, is one of several outstanding charms of this second specimen of Slavic music.

Debussy and Liszt But No Encores.

More impressionistic was the Debussy "L'Apres-Midi d'un Faun." In this the finest passages of the theme are given to the flute and oboe obligato airs, respectively played by Messrs. Laurent and Longy, against a rich background of florid orchestration. Then the tuneful, lilting melody of Liszt who invests any subject with enchantment, particularly such a romantic one as the story of Faust; and who in this brings out into delightful relief the measures of a melting, even if "devilish" waltz. There was a sublety of inescapable suggestion in the choice of the last two selections for this Sunday concert. By the same sign that every dog has his day, it remained for Debussy to declare, musically, that fauns had their afternoons. One could see, even without opera glasses, that some of them had their Sunday afternoons. Again, the vivid tantalization of Liszt's "Dance at the Village Tavern" could not fail to remind some that it isn't many days now 'till there won't be any tavern, no, not even in all the village of Greenwich.

The whole orchestra plays with a resonant symmetry of tone characteristic of the world's greatest group of instrumentalists; full-bodied, sensitive, pronounced in its unity yet by no means lacking in individuality. The familiar, but somewhat more whitened head of Alwyn Schroeder, long cellist of the famous Kneisels, as well as one whom the Boston Symphony could not spare; Longy, oboist par excellence; Kloepfel, of the "trumpet that sounds of fame" in innumerable performances of Hendel's "Messiah"; Holy, whose harp-notes fairly sing, and others with well-night international musical reputation were in the studious-looking group of nearly a hundred men. There may be other ochestras side by side with the Boston Symphony; but in the regime of Monteux it seems impossible that any could be superior.

ERNEST NEWTON BAGG.

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

BOSTON GETS MONTEUX

Is Made Permanent Director of Symphony Orchestra.

(Special to The Eagle.)

Boston, Mass., Jan. 24—Pierre Monteux has been made permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the trustees of the orchestra having come to an agreement with him whereby he is to continue his post during the season of 1920, 1921 and 1922. Under his leadership during the present season, now half over, he has had a success almost without precedent.

It will be remembered that Mr. Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts in the autumn of 1918 for the brief period in which he could obtain his release from an existing engagement as conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House, Manhattan. In the following spring he was engaged at the first opportunity as the regular conductor of the orchestra.

From Herald
New York City

JAN 24 1920

BOSTON ORCHESTRA SIGNS MONTEUX FOR TWO YEARS

(Special Despatch to the Herald.)

BOSTON, Mass., Friday.—Pierre Monteux has been engaged for two more years as Boston Symphony conductor. The trustees of the orchestra have come to an agreement with its eminent French conductor, whereby he is to continue his post during the seasons of 1920, 1921 and 1922.

Under his leadership the present season, now half over, has been most successful.

TOSCANINI PARDONED BY JUDGE

"Genius" Accepted to Explain Attack on Violinist

We have new light on the eccentricities of genius and the extent to which genius should be held responsible for its acts to society. A cable despatch from Milan relates the extraordinary decision handed down by an Italian court when Arturo Toscanini, probably the greatest opera conductor in the world, was cited for assault against an orchestral player.

It appears that during a rehearsal of Beethoven's ninth symphony, Toscanini, in a royal rage, struck out with his baton, hit the bow of the violinist near him, thus causing the bow to rebound into the eye of the player.

The judge heard the complaint and the plea. A psychologist, who knew Toscanini, and who, it seems, had been making a special study of the case, was fetched in to give his testimony, and this testimony completely exonerated the celebrated musician.

This is the substance of the testimony: that "he (the psychologist) had made a special pathological study of Toscanini and had found that on great occasions this prince of conductors becomes so obsessed by sublime frenzy that his normal personality forsakes him. He becomes transfigured by genius, beside, or rather outside of, himself, so that the inhibitory nerves are completely paralyzed. In a paroxysm of inspiration he falls a tragic prey to the tyranny of art, and the faculty of distinguishing good from evil is subordinated to the extreme ebbs and flows of sensibility. Stupendous words and vivacious deeds break forth with volcanic force. (Anyone who ever witnessed a Toscanini rehearsal at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York will verify this latter statement.)

"So impossible is anything like a quiet return to normal equilibrium that throughout the night after a performance he continues in a state of pitiful nervous exhaustion, exaltation. He cannot sleep, his teeth chatter incessantly, the muscles of his arms and legs become painfully rigid and his whole organism vibrates like the subsoil after a terrific earthquake."

"The judges decided that a superman cannot be dealt with after the manner of ordinary mortals, and that it would be a flagrant injustice to penalize a musical genius like Toscanini with even so much as the infliction of a fine."

Toscanini has been often and favorably mentioned as a possibility for the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is known to be tyrannical and domineering in rehearsal. Leadership of the most decisive kind, whatever the means of attaining it, is absolutely imperative in a conductor. At the Metropolitan, Toscanini, half blind, and conducting the scores of innumerable operas from memory, was a demon, a Newesis to any careless or incompetent musician in the performance. It did not matter whether it was the second bassoon player in the orchestra, or Miss Geraldine Farrar on the stage. He had his way, and it is said for once Miss Geraldine did not have hers, even though there was a time when she virtually ran the rehearsals. Toscanini's ears tell him everything that his eyes can not. He does have genius. He does, by the sheer, endless force of his will and his musical consciousness lead performances of inexplicable beauty and eloquence, when the most indifferent artists on the stage sings as if his throat was only another instrument for Toscanini to play, when each player in the orchestra seems to perform as if under a spell.

JAN 8 - 1920 X

From Republican
Springfield, Mass.

CITY NEWS NOTES

Boston Symphony Plays Here Sunday

One of the greatest musical events of the season will be the Boston symphony's concert at the Auditorium on Sunday afternoon next, to be given under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian association. As was the case last season, the orchestra will have its full complement of 100 performers. An added interest is given to the coming concert by the appearance, for the first time in Springfield, of the eminent new conductor, Pierre Monteux, who has chosen an inspiring and engrossing program, which will be published in full later in the week. Front door tickets may be obtained at the Young Men's Christian association and the music stores and season tickets, giving admission at the side entrances, at the Young Men's Christian association office at Chestnut and Hillman streets.

ESTABLISHED 1861
A [illegible]
From Morning Telegra
New York C

BOSTON RETAINS PIERRE MONTEU

French Musician Signs Conductor to Continue Until 1922.

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

BOSTON, Jan. 23.

Pierre Monteux, the French musicia will be the permanent conductor of t Boston Symphony Orchestra by virt of a contract he signed to-day with t board of trustees whereby he is to co tinue at the head of the local organiz tion through the season of 1922. H has been leading the orchestra thus f this season, but the arrangement e tered into at the outset was not a pe manent one.

The trustees expressed their hear approval of the efficient manner which Monteux has discharged h duties.

It will be remembered that Mr. Mon teux conducted the opening Boston Sym phony concerts in the Autumn of 191 for the brief period in whic he could obtain his release from an exist ing engagement as conductor of Frenc opera of the Metropolitan Opera House The following Spring he was engaged at the first opportunity as the regular conductor of the orchestra.

s: New York City

MONTEUX CONDUCTOR.

BOSTON, Jan. 24.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux, its eminent conductor, whereby he is to continue his post during the seasons 1920-1921 and 1921-1922. Under his leadership the present season, not half over, the orchestra has had a success almost without precedent. It will be remembered that Mr. Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts in the autumn of 1918 for the brief period in which he could obtain his release from an existing engagement as conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House. In the following spring he was engaged at the first opportunity as the regular conductor of the orchestra.

From EVENING WORLD
New York City

Pierre Monteux's engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been extended to the season of 1922.

From Times
New York City
JAN 24 1920

Boston Retains Monteux for 3 Years

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Jan. 23.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra's new governing board of nine trustees have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux, the French conductor, whereby he is to continue in his present post here during the seasons of 1920, 1921, and 1922.

Mr. Monteux led the opening Boston concerts in 1918 on a brief release from the Metropolitan Opera, and last Fall he was engaged at the first opportunity as the regular leader.

m TELEGRAM
lress New York City
e

Pierre Monteux has been made permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The trustees of the orchestra have engaged him to continue at his post during the seasons of 1920, 1921 and 1922.

Under his leadership the present season, now half over, has had a success almost without precedent.

It will be remembered that Mr. Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts in the autumn of 1918 for the brief period in which he could obtain his release from an existing engagement as conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House.

In the following spring he was engaged, [illegible] opportunity [illegible] regular [illegible] orch[illegible]

...E SPRINGF

BOSTON SYMPHONY PACKS AUDITORIUM

Hundreds Turned Away, and Twice 4000 Seats Would Have Been in Demand

PIERRE MONTEUX AN ABLE CONDUCTOR

New Director Promptly Wins Favor of Audience — Program Proves Well Adapted to Springfield's Tastes

The Boston symphony orchestra gave its 26th concert in Springfield at the Auditorium yesterday afternoon with Pierre Monteux as conductor. It was of course the star attraction of the excellent series of Sunday afternoon entertainments given under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian association, and if the 4000 seats had been twice as many they would all have been in demand When the doors closed the street was full of disappointed persons who had hoped that at the last there might be a chance to get in. The concert by the orchestra in the same series last year was an audacious venture, but the result was such as to encourage the management in repeating it, in the hope that a concert by the Boston orchestra might become an annual feature. In putting the case to the audience yesterday Kenneth Robbie explained that the concert was costing between $2200 and $2300, and that if everybody gave from 50 cents to $20 all would be well. The collection was taken during the intermission, and before the concert Rev James Gordon Gilkey, pastor of the South church, read from the scriptures and offered prayer. Other exercises were omitted to leave room for the musical program.

Monteux Pleases Audience

This was the first time that the orchestra had played here under its new conductor, Pierre Monteux, who promptly won the favor of the audience. This distinguished French musician is of a rather different type from any of the notable men who have preceded him during the 39 years of the orchestra's existence and who have differed notably from each other. Physically he is of a type commonest in the south of France and in Italy—compact, robust, swarthy, strong-necked, curly-haired, apple-cheeked, quick, quiet and energetic. He is notably free from mannerisms, and his conducting while strong and competent, never attracts attention which should go to the music. Nor does he give in the least the effect, to be noted in some of his eminent predecessors, of being bored at having to give a concert outside of Boston and New York. He gave of his best and with all the effect of taking pleasure in it, and the audience responded in the same spirit. That in itself goes far to make a concert a success.

The program, too, was quite what it should be—good in itself, and suited, as not all good programs are, to a city which the orchestra on the average visits but once in 15 months. In such an audience there will be many music-lovers who hear much good music, but not nearly so much orchestral music as they would like. Naturally, when they have a chance to hear America's most famous orchestra they want not merely good music but a full display of the resources of a great modern orchestra: what they hear will have to last some of them a long time. Their needs were amply met in the program given yesterday:—

Symphony No 6 ("Pathetic"), B minor, Tschaikowsky
"Stenka Razini," symphonic poem, opus 13 ..... Glazounoff
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" ..... Debussy
Mephisto Waltz ..... Liszt

Nothing Tedious in Program

It contained nothing tedious, long-winded, colorless or dull, no outworn modes, no untried novelties; each item, moreover, had orchestral as well as musical interest, and could be listened to with pleasure, bar by bar, for the sheer beauty or the piquant expressions of what the instruments were saying.

The symphony, along with the fifth by the same composer, is one of the very few modern works in this form which have won with the general public a place with the few accepted favorites like Betthoven's fifth and Schubert's "Unfinished." Theodore Thomas, who had his ear as close to the ground as any conductor, used to say that the public readily warmed to Beethoven and Wagner, but that he found no third to put with them till the rise of Tschaikowsky. In listening to the famous symphony which was played yesterday it is not difficult to see why Tschaikowsky's music makes this strong and immediate appeal. Not only is it intensely emotional, but it wholly lacks the reticence of many masterpieces the emotional richness of which is more slowly appreciated. It may rise to a great climax, but it never holds back for a climax—there are weak, thin, scrambled spots in most of Tschaikowsky's scores, but at least he never gives up, as Brahms, for example, does, for the next page; from [illegible] bars his music is full of [illegible] intensity—his hearers never [illegible] while waiting for

The orchestra under Mr Monteux gave the symphony superbly, with no exaggeration of a pathos which can easily be made too morbid for good art, yet with power and intensity of expression and with full regard for the exiqencs of contrast which are an essential part of Tschaikowsky's richly colored music. The capricious second movement in the bizarre dance rhythm was exquisitely played, the least bit more quickly than is usual and with a smoother flow than is sometimes the case. The triple finale of the symphony was made deeply impressive.

Each of the shorter works which made up the second part of the program offered something of interest, and while differing as widely as could well be in other respects, all were orchestrally effective. Glazounoff's music is well known to Springfield's music lovers, but this particular work had not been given here before. It is a fine specimen of the modern Russian school, drawing upon the wealth of Rusian folk music for the song of the Volga boatmen, and abounding in picturesque and colorful passages. What a marvellous range of orchestral "color" modern music possesses was shown by the transition from their vivid hues to the subtle palette of Claude Debussy, whose "Afternoon of a Faun" is the most exquisite of idyls and full of tonal effects that are as marvellous in their symbolic verisimilitude as they are beautiful in themselves; in its visual suggestiveness, even to the suggestion of atmosphere, this music is well nigh miraculous.

Of all the numbers on the program the Liszt Mephisto waltz perhaps made the slightest impression, and in general Lisszt's music is perhaps not so obvious at a first hearing as that of some composers, though it is well liked by the general public when made familiar as "Les Posludes" has been. But the performance yesterday was so spirited and the numerous solo bits were so exquisitely played that all were charmed, and nobody shared the opinion of Boston's famous critic, J. S. Dwight, who 50 years ago called it "positively devilish." A few delicious notes from the violin of the concert master, Frederick Franklin, suggested the hope that he may yet be heard here in a concerto. The orchestra also has a new principal violoncellist, J. Bedetti, whose brief solo passages indicated talent. While there have been many changes in the orchestra in recent years, many of the old faces still appear, and it is now playing better than at any time since things were upset by the general turmoil of the world.

"SIA[illegible]"

From JOURNAL

Address: Minneapolis, Minn.

Date DEC 16 1

On the occasion of the next concert in New York, given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, an orchestral work by the Spanish composer, Albeniz, will be introduced. The work, which is a symphonic poem, is entitled "Catalonia."

well.

Springfield Union Jan 15

SYMPHONY GIVES BRILLIANT PROGRAM

Auditorium Concert of Famous Band Under Pierre Monteux.

The largest audience this season, close to 5000, listened yesterday afternoon with many manifestations of genuine delight to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's superb program in the Auditorium. Although the bare announcement of such a quartet of compositions—by two Russians, a Hungarian and a Frenchman—unrelieved by any solo-variant, is not in itself very alluring to a miscellaneous audience, the fame of this orchestra, now in its 39th season, and the reputation of its new French conductor, Monteux, master of baton-magic, were potent factors in bringing about this greater success in the present season's series of Y. M. C. A. entertainments.

M. Monteux is of the extremely animated modern French school, rather than of that represented by the Chevalier Andre Messager of whose sedate suavity we had an example during the war. Rather is he a happy combination of Modest Altschuler and of the late Cleofonte Campanini, with the unrelaxing grasp of the Russian conductor, and the electric, fervent emotionalism of the Italian; the always attractive quality of fires controled but leaping to unexpected hights. The art of this smiling, black-haired, energetic leader of men is every minute invested with a sort of halo of intensity, instantly communicating itself not only to the members of the orchestra but to hearers as well. The older standbys of the organization will tell you that the assertive, unerring language of M. Monteux's very emphatic baton more nearly resembles the almost hypnotic sway of that of Arthur Nikisch than any of the predecessors in his present office.

Russian Imaginative Music.

The concert was full of color and variety. The movements of the first number, Tschaikowsky's "Symphony Pathetique" really provided four pieces instead of one. This impressive outpouring of the patriot's natural feeling for his star[illegible] country which he felt, even in 1893, to be on the brink of the ruin since engulfing it (and there is no use trying to read anything more morbid than that into its fervent, nationally-characterful lines) was given in beautifully finished fashion. In the march measures of the "vivace," the not altogether thornless flower of the imaginative music of this greatest of all Russian composers is reached; like nothing so much as the measured tread of an unseen host, making the ground tremble as it passes in the middle distance. The eloquent pathos of it always astonishes; and breathless attention invariably proves the universal appeal in a Tschaikowsky composition.

Then was heard Glazounoff of Petrograd, with his realistic little symphony about the Cossack river-pirate, "Stenka Razine," with a facility for capturing fair ladies appealing to his bandit fancy, and for presenting them as "gifts" to the Volga. The swinging, surging song of the boatmen, with its lovely scoring for harp, is one of several outstanding charms of this second specimen of Slavic music.

Debussy and Liszt But No Encores.

More impressionistic was the Debussy "L'Apres-Midi d'un Faun." In this the finest passages of the theme are given to the flute and oboe obligato airs, respectively played by Messrs. Laurent and Longy, against a rich background of florid orchestration. Then the tuneful, lilting melody of Liszt who invests any subject with enchantment, particularly such a romantic one as the story of Faust; and who in this brings out into delightful relief the measures of a melting, even if "devilish" waltz. There was a sublety of inescapable suggestion in the choice of the last two selections for this Sunday concert. By the same sign that every dog has his day, it remained for Debussy to declare, musically, that fauns had their afternoons. One could see, even without opera glasses, that some of them had their Sunday afternoons. Again, the vivid tantalization of Liszt's "Dance at the Village Tavern" could not fail to remind some that it isn't many days now 'till there won't be any tavern, no, not even in all the village of Greenwich.'

The whole orchestra plays with a resonant symmetry of tone characteristic of the world's greatest group of instrumentalists; full-bodied, sensitive, pronounced in its unity yet by no means lacking in individuality. The familiar, but somewhat more whitened head of Alwyn Schroeder, long cellist of the famous Kneisels, as well as one whom the Boston Symphony could not spare; Longy, oboist par excellence; Kloepfel, of the "trumpet that sounds of fame" in innumerable performances of Hendel's "Messiah"; Holy, whose harp-notes fairly sing, and others with well-night international musical reputation were in the studious-looking group of nearly a hundred men. There may be other ochestras side by side with the Boston Symphony; but in the regime of Monteux it seems impossible that any could be superior.

ERNEST NEWTON BAGG.

From EAGLE

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

BOSTON GETS MONTEUX

Made Permanent Director of Symphony Orchestra.

(Special to The Eagle.)

Boston, Mass., Jan. 24—Pierre Monteux has been made permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the trustees of the orchestra have come to an agreement with Monteux whereby he is to continue his services during the season of 1920, 1921 and 1922. Under his leadership during the present season, now half over, has had a success almost without precedent.

It will be remembered that Mr. Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts in the autumn of 1918 for the brief period in which he could obtain his release from an existing engagement as conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House, Manhattan. In the following spring he was engaged at the first opportunity as the regular conductor of the orchestra.

Herald

New York City

JAN 24 1921

ORCHESTRA SIGNS [illegible]EUX FOR TWO YEARS

(Despatch to the Herald.)

[illegible] Mass., Friday.—Pierre Monteux has been engaged for two more years as Boston Symphony conductor. The trustees of the orchestra have come to an agreement with its eminent French conductor whereby he is to continue his services for the seasons of 1920, 1921 and 1922. Under his leadership the present season, now half over, has been most success-

TOSCANINI PARDONED BY JUDGE

"Genius" Accepted to Explain Attack on Violinist

We have new light on the eccentricities of genius and the extent to which genius should be held responsible for its acts to society. A cable despatch from Milan relates the extraordinary decision handed down by an Italian court when Arturo Toscanini, probably the greatest opera conductor in the world, was cited for assault against an orchestral player.

It appears that during a rehearsal of Beethoven's ninth symphony, Toscanini, in a royal rage, struck out with his baton, hit the bow of the violinist near him, thus causing the bow to rebound into the eye of the player.

The judge heard the complaint and the plea. A psychologist, who knew Toscanini, and who, it seems, had been making a special study of the case, was fetched in to give his testimony, and this testimony completely exonerated the celebrated musician.

This is the substance of the testimony: that "he (the psychologist) had made a special pathological study of Toscanini and had found that on great occasions this prince of conductors becomes so obsessed by sublime frenzy that his normal personality forsakes him. He becomes transfigured by genius, beside, or rather outside of, himself, so that the inhibitory nerves are completely paralyzed. In a paroxysm of inspiration he falls a tragic prey to the tyranny of art, and the faculty of distinguishing good from evil is subordinated to the extreme ebbs and flows of sensibility. Stupendous words and vivacious deeds break forth with volcanic force. (Anyone who ever witnessed a Toscanini rehearsal at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York will verify this latter statement.)

"So impossible is anything like a quiet return to normal equilibrium that throughout the night after a performance he continues in a state of pitiful nervous exhaustion, exaltation. He cannot sleep, his teeth chatter incessantly, the muscles of his arms and legs become painfully rigid and his whole organism vibrates like the subsoil after a terrific earthquake."

"The judges decided that a superman cannot be dealt with after the manner of ordinary mortals, and that it would be a flagrant injustice to penalize a musical genius like Toscanini with even so much as the infliction of a fine."

Toscanini has been often and favorably mentioned as a possibility for the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is known to be tyrannical and domineering in rehearsal. Leadership of the most decisive kind, whatever the means of attaining it, is absolutely imperative in a conductor. At the Metropolitan, Toscanini, half blind, and conducting the scores of innumerable operas from memory, was a demon, a Newesis to any careless or incompetent musician in the performance. It did not matter whether it was the second bassoon player in the orchestra, or Miss Geraldine Farrar on the stage. He had his way, and it is said for once Miss Geraldine did not have hers, even though there was a time when she virtually ran the rehearsals. Toscanini's ears tell him everything that his eyes can not. He does have genius. He does, by the sheer, endless force of his will and his musical consciousness lead performances of inexplicable beauty and eloquence, when the most indifferent artists on the stage sings as if his throat was only another instrument for Toscanini to play, when each player in the orchestra seems to perform as if under a spell.

JAN 8 - 1921 X

From Republican

Springfield, Mass.

CITY NEWS NOTES

Boston Symphony Plays Here Sunday

One of the greatest musical events of the season will be the Boston symphony's concert at the Auditorium on Sunday afternoon next, to be given under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian association. As was the case last season, the orchestra will have its full complement of 100 performers. An added interest is given to the coming concert by the appearance, for the first time in Springfield, of the eminent new conductor, Pierre Monteux, who has chosen an inspiring and engrossing program, which will be published in full later in the week. Front door tickets may be obtained at the Young Men's Christian association and the music stores and season tickets, giving admission at the side entrances, at the Young Men's Christian association office at Chestnut and Hillman streets.

ESTABLISHED 1881

A JAN 24 192[illegible]

From Morning Telegra[illegible]

New York C[illegible]

BOSTON RETAINS PIERRE MONTEU[illegible]

French Musician Signs Conductor to Continue Until 1922.

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

BOSTON, Jan. 23

Pierre Monteux, the French musici[illegible] will be the permanent conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra by vir[illegible] of a contract he signed to-day with board of trustees whereby he is to c[illegible] tinue at the head of the local organi[illegible] tion through the season of 1922. has been leading the orchestra thus this season, but the arrangement tered into at the outset was not a p[illegible] manent one.

The trustees expressed their hear[illegible] approval of the efficient manner which Monteux has discharged h[illegible] duties.

It will be remembered that Mr. Mo[illegible] teux conducted the opening Boston Sym[illegible] phony concerts in the Autumn of 191[illegible] for the brief period in whic[illegible] he could obtain his release from an exis[illegible] ing engagement as conductor of Frenc[illegible] opera of the Metropolitan Opera Hous[illegible] The following Spring he was engage[illegible] at the first opportunity as the regula[illegible] conductor of the orchestra.

s: New York City

MONTEUX CONDUCTOR.

BOSTON, Jan. 24.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux, its eminent conductor, whereby he is to continue his post during the seasons 1920-1921 and 1921-1922. Under his leadership the present season, not half over, the orchestra has had a success almost without precedent. It will be remembered that Mr. Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts in the autumn of 1918 for the brief period in which he could obtain his release from an existing engagement as conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House. In the following spring he was engaged at the first opportunity as the regular conductor of the orchestra.

FROM EVENING WORLD New York Ci[illegible]

Pierre Monteux's engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been extended to the season of 1922.

From Times

New York City

JAN 24 192[illegible]

Boston Retains Monteux for 3 Years

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Jan. 23.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra's new governing board of nine trustees have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux, the French conductor, whereby he is to continue in his present post here during the seasons of 1920, 1921, and 1922.

Mr. Monteux led the opening Boston concerts in 1918 on a brief release from the Metropolitan Opera, and last Fall he was engaged at the first opportunity as the regular leader.

m TELEGRAM

ress New York City

e

Pierre Monteux has been made permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The trustees of the orchestra have engaged him to continue at his post during the seasons of 1920, 1921 and 1922.

Under his leadership the present season, now half over, has had a success almost without precedent.

It will be remembered that Mr. Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts in the autumn of 1918 for the brief period in which he could obtain his release from an existing engagement as conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House.

In the following spring he was engaged, [illegible] opportunity as the regular conductor of the orch[illegible]

Republican

THE SPRINGF

BOSTON SYMPHONY PACKS AUDITORIUM

Hundreds Turned Away, and Twice 4000 Seats Would Have Been in Demand

PIERRE MONTEUX AN ABLE CONDUCTOR

New Director Promptly Wins Favor of Audience — Program Proves Well Adapted to Springfield's Tastes

The Boston symphony orchestra gave its 26th concert in Springfield at the Auditorium yesterday afternoon with Pierre Monteux as conductor. It was of course the star attraction of the excellent series of Sunday afternoon entertainments given under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian association, and if the 4000 seats had been twice as many they would all have been in demand When the doors closed the street was full of disappointed persons who had hoped that at the last there might be a chance to get in. The concert by the orchestra in the same series last year was an audacious venture, but the result was such as to encourage the management in repeating it, in the hope that a concert by the Boston orchestra might become an annual feature. In putting the case to the audience yesterday Kenneth Robbie explained that the concert was costing between $2200 and $2300, and that if everybody gave from 50 cents to $20 all would be well. The collection was taken during the intermission, and before the concert Rev James Gordon Gilkey, pastor of the South church, read from the scriptures and offered prayer. Other exercises were omitted to leave room for the musical program.

Monteux Pleases Audience

This was the first time that the orchestra had played here under its new conductor, Pierre Monteux, who promptly won the favor of the audience. This distinguished French musician is of a rather different type from any of the notable men who have preceded him during the 39 years of the orchestra's existence and who have differed notably from each other. Physically he is of a type commonest in the south of France and in Italy—compact, robust, swarthy, strong-necked, curly-haired, apple-cheeked, quick, quiet and energetic. He is notably free from mannerisms, and his conducting while strong and competent, never attracts attention which should go to the music. Nor does he give in the least the effect, to be noted in some of his eminent predecessors, of being bored at having to give a concert outside of Boston and New York. He gave of his best and with all the effect of taking pleasure in it, and the audience responded in the same spirit. That in itself goes far to make a concert a success.

The program, too, was quite what it should be—good in itself, and suited, as not all good programs are, to a city which the orchestra on the average visits but once in 15 months. In such an audience there will be many music-lovers who hear much good music, but not nearly so much orchestral music as they would like. Naturally, when they have a chance to hear America's most famous orchestra they want not merely good music but a full display of the resources of a great modern orchestra; what they hear will have to last some of them a long time. Their needs were amply met in the program given yesterday:—

Symphony No 6 ("Pathetic"), B minor, Tschaikowsky
"Stenka Razini," symphonic poem, opus 13 ..... Glazounoff
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun".Debussy
Mephisto Waltz ..... Liszt

Nothing Tedious in Program

It contained nothing tedious, long-winded, colorless or dull, no outworn modes, no untried novelties; each item, moreover, had orchestral as well as musical interest, and could be listened to with pleasure, bar by bar, for the sheer beauty or the piquant expressions of what the instruments were saying.

The symphony, along with the fifth by the same composer, is one of the very few modern works in this form which have won with the general public a place with the few accepted favorites like Beethoven's fifth and Schubert's "Unfinished." Theodore Thomas, who had his ear as close to the ground as any conductor, used to say that the public readily warmed to Beethoven and Wagner, but that he found no third to put with them till the rise of Tschaikowsky. In listening to the famous symphony which was played yesterday it is not difficult to see why Tschaikowsky's music makes this strong and immediate appeal. Not only is it intensely emotional, but it wholly lacks the reticence of many masterpieces the emotional richness of which is more slowly appreciated. It may rise to a great climax, but it never holds back for a climax—there are weak, thin, scrambled spots in most of Tschaikowsky's scores, but at least he never gives up, as Brahms, for example, often does, for the next page; from the first bars his music is full of throbbing intensity—his hearers never settle to gathering while waiting for it to begin.

The Rendition of the Symphony

The orchestra under Mr Monteux gave the symphony superbly, with no exaggeration of a pathos which can easily be made too morbid for good art, yet with power and intensity of expression and with full regard for the extremes of contrast which are an essential part of Tschaikowsky's richly colored music. The capricious second movement in the bizarre dance rhythm was exquisitely played, the least bit more quickly than is usual and with a smoother flow than is sometimes the case. The triple finale of the symphony was made deeply impressive.

Each of the shorter works which made up the second part of the program offered something of interest, and while differing as widely as could well be in other respects, all were orchestrally effective. Glazounoff's music is well known to Springfield's music lovers, but this particular work had not been given here before. It is a fine specimen of the modern Russian school, drawing upon the wealth of Rusian folk music for the song of the Volga boatmen, and abounding in picturesque and colorful passages. What a marvellous range of orchestral "color" modern music possesses was shown by the transition from their vivid hues to the subtle palette of Claude Debussy, whose "Afternoon of a Faun" is the most exquisite of idyls and full of tonal effects that are as marvellous in their symbolic verisimilitude as they are beautiful in themselves; in its visual suggestiveness even to the suggestion of atmosphere, this music is well nigh miraculous.

Of all the numbers on the program the Liszt Mephisto waltz perhaps made the slightest impression, and in general Lisszt's music is perhaps not so obvious at a first hearing as that of some composers, though it is well liked by the general public when made familiar as "Les Posludes" has been. But the performance yesterday was so spirited and the numerous solo bits were so exquisitely played that all were charmed, and nobody shared the opinion of Boston's famous critic, J. S. Dwight, who 50 years ago called it "positively devilish." A few delicious notes from the violin of the concert master, Frederick Franklin, suggested the hope that he may yet be heard here in a concerto. The orchestra also has a new principal violoncellist, J. Bedetti, whose brief solo passages indicated talent. While there have been many changes in the orchestra in recent years, many of the old faces still appear, and it is now playing better than at any time since things were upset by the general turmoil of the world.

From JOURNAL

Address: Minneapolis, Minn.

Date

On the occasion of the next concert in New York, given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, an orchestral work by the Spanish composer, Albeniz, will be introduced. The work, which is a symphonic poem, is entitled "Catalonia."

well.

Springfield Union Jan 12

SYMPHONY GIVES BRILLIANT PROGRAM

Auditorium Concert of Famous Band Under Pierre Monteux.

The largest audience this season, close to 5000, listened yesterday afternoon with many manifestations of genuine delight to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's superb program in the Auditorium. Although the bare announcement of such a quartet of compositions—by two Russians, a Hungarian and a Frenchman—unrelieved by any solo-variant, is not in itself very alluring to a miscellaneous audience, the fame of this orchestra, now in its 39th season, and the reputation of its new French conductor, Monteux, master of baton-magic, were potent factors in bringing about this greater success in the present season's series of Y. M. C. A. entertainments.

M. Monteux is of the extremely animated modern French school, rather than of that represented by the Chevalier Andre Messager of whose sedate suavity we had an example during the war. Rather is he a happy combination of Modest Altschuler and of the late Cleofonte Campanini, with the unrelaxing grasp of the Russian conductor, and the electric, fervent, emotionalism of the Italian; the always attractive quality of fires controled but leaping to unexpected hights. The art of this smiling, black-haired, energetic leader of men is every minute invested with a sort of halo of intensity, instantly communicating itself not only to the members of the orchestra but to hearers as well. The older standbys of the organization will tell you that the assertive, unerring language of M. Monteux's very emphatic baton more nearly resembles the almost hypnotic sway of that of Arthur Nikisch than any of the predecessors, in his present office.

Russian Imaginative Music.

The concert was full of color and variety. The movements of the first number, Tschaikowsky's "Symphony Pathetique" really provided four pieces instead of one. This impressive outpouring of the patriot's natural feeling for [illegible] starred country which he felt, even in 1893, to be on the brink of the ruin since engulfing it (and there is no use trying to read anything more morbid than that into its fervent, nationally-characterful lines) was given in beautifully finished fashion. In the march measures of the "vivace," the not altogether thornless flower of the imaginative music of this greatest of all Russian composers is reached; like nothing so much as the measured tread of an unseen host, making the ground tremble as it passes in the middle distance. The eloquent pathos of it always astonishes; and breathless attention invariably proves the universal appeal in a Tschaikowsky composition.

Then was heard Glazounoff of Petrograd, with his realistic little symphony about the Cossack river-pirate, "Stenka Razine," with a facility for capturing fair ladies appealing to his bandit fancy, and for presenting them as "gifts" to the Volga. The swinging, surging song of the boatmen, with its lovely scoring for harp, is one of several outstanding charms of this second specimen of Slavic music.

Debussy and Liszt But No Encores.

More impressionistic was the Debussy "L'Apres-Midi d'un Faun." In this the finest passages of the theme are given to the flute and oboe obligato airs, respectively played by Messrs. Laurent and Longy, against a rich background of florid orchestration. Then the tuneful, lilting melody of Liszt who invests any subject with enchantment, particularly such a romantic one as the story of Faust; and who in this brings out into delightful relief the measures of a melting, even if "devilish" waltz. There was a subtlety of inescapable suggestion in the choice of the last two selections for this Sunday concert. By the same sign that every dog has his day, it remained for Debussy to declare, musically, that fauns had their afternoons. One could see, even without opera glasses, that some of them had their Sunday afternoons. Again, the vivid tantalization of Liszt's "Dance at the Village Tavern" could not fail to remind some that it isn't many days now 'till there won't be any tavern, no, not even in all the village of Greenwich.

The whole orchestra plays with a resonant symmetry of tone characteristic of the world's greatest group of instrumentalists; full-bodied, sensitive, pronounced in its unity yet by no means lacking in individuality. The familiar but somewhat more whitened head of Alwyn Schroeder, long cellist of the famous Kneisels, as well as one whom the Boston Symphony could not spare; Longy, oboist par excellence; Kloepfel, of the "trumpet that sounds of fame" in innumerable performances of Hendel's "Messiah"; Holy, whose harp-notes fairly sing, and others with well-night international musical reputation were in the studious-looking group of nearly a hundred men. There may be other ochestras side by side with the Boston Symphony; but in the regime of Monteux it seems impossible that any could be superior.

ERNEST NEWTON BAGG.

From EAGLE

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

BOSTON GETS MONTEUX

Is Made Permanent Director of Symphony Orchestra.

(Special to The Eagle.)

Boston, Mass., Jan. 24—Pierre Monteux has been made permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the trustees of the orchestra and [illegible] come to an agreement with [illegible] whereby he is to continue his [illegible] during the season of 1920, 1921 and 1922. Under his leadership during the present season, now half over, has had a success almost without precedent.

It will be remembered that Mr. Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts in the autumn of 1918 for the brief period in which he could obtain his release from an existing engagement as conductor of the French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House, Manhattan. In the following spring he was engaged at the first opportunity as the regular conductor of the orchestra.

From Herald

New York City

ORCHESTRA SIGNS TEUX FOR TWO YEARS

(Special Despatch to the Herald.)

[illegible], Mass., Friday.—Pierre Monteux has been engaged for two more years as Boston Symphony conductor. [illegible] of the orchestra have come to an agreement with its eminent French conductor whereby he is to continue his services for the seasons of 1920, 1921 and 1922. Under his leadership the present season, now half over, has been most success-

TOSCANINI PARDONED BY JUDGE

"Genius" Accepted to Explain Attack on Violinist

We have new light on the eccentricities of genius and the extent to which genius should be held responsible for its acts to society. A cable despatch from Milan relates the extraordinary decision handed down by an Italian court when Arturo Toscanini, probably the greatest opera conductor in the world, was cited for assault against an orchestral player.

It appears that during a rehearsal of Beethoven's ninth symphony, Toscanini, in a royal rage, struck out with his baton, hit the bow of the violinist near him, thus causing the bow to rebound into the eye of the player.

The judge heard the complaint and the plea. A psychologist, who knew Toscanini, and who, it seems, had been making a special study of the case, was fetched in to give his testimony, and this testimony completely exonerated the celebrated musician.

This is the substance of the testimony: that "he (the psychologist) had made a special pathological study of Toscanini and had found that on great occasions this prince of conductors becomes so obsessed by sublime frenzy that his normal personality forsakes him. He becomes transfigured by genius, beside, or rather outside of, himself, so that the inhibitory nerves are completely paralyzed. In a paroxysm of inspiration he falls a tragic prey to the tyranny of art, and the faculty of distinguishing good from evil is subordinated to the extreme ebbs and flows of sensibility. Stupendous words and vivacious deeds break forth with volcanic force. (Anyone who ever witnessed a Toscanini rehearsal at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York will verify this latter statement.)

"So impossible is anything like a quiet return to normal equilibrium that throughout the night after a performance he continues in a state of pitiful nervous exhaustion, exaltation. He cannot sleep, his teeth chatter incessantly, the muscles of his arms and legs become painfully rigid and his whole organism vibrates like the subsoil after a terrific earthquake."

"The judges decided that a superman cannot be dealt with after the manner of ordinary mortals, and that it would be a flagrant injustice to penalize a musical genius like Toscanini with even so much as the infliction of a fine."

Toscanini has been often and favorably mentioned as a possibility for the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is known to be tyrannical and domineering in rehearsal. Leadership of the most decisive kind, whatever the means of attaining it, is absolutely imperative in a conductor. At the Metropolitan, Toscanini, half blind, and conducting the scores of innumerable operas from memory, was a demon, a Newesis to any careless or incompetent musician in the performance. It did not matter whether it was the second bassoon player in the orchestra, or Miss Geraldine Farrar on the stage. He had his way, and it is said for once Miss Geraldine did not have hers, even though there was a time when she virtually ran the rehearsals. Toscanini's ears tell him everything that his eyes can not. He does have genius. He does, by the sheer, endless force of his will and his musical consciousness lead performances of inexplicable beauty and eloquence, when the most indifferent artists on the stage sings as if his throat was only another instrument for Toscanini to play, when each player in the orchestra seems to perform as if under a spell.

From Republican

Springfield, Mass.

CITY NEWS NOTES

Boston Symphony Plays Here Sunday

One of the greatest musical events of the season will be the Boston symphony's concert at the Auditorium on Sunday afternoon next, to be given under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian association. As was the case last season, the orchestra will have its full complement of 100 performers. An added interest is given to the coming concert by the appearance, for the first time in Springfield, of the eminent new conductor, Pierre Monteux, who has chosen an inspiring and engrossing program, which will be published in full later in the week. Front door tickets may be obtained at the Young Men's Christian association and the music stores and season tickets, giving admission at the side entrances, at the Young Men's Christian association office at Chestnut and Hillman streets.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Morning Telegraph

New York City

BOSTON RETAINS PIERRE MONTEUX

French Musician Signs as Conductor to Continue Until 1922.

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

BOSTON, Jan. 23.

Pierre Monteux, the French musician, will be the permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by virtue of a contract he signed to-day with the board of trustees whereby he is to continue at the head of the local organization through the season of 1922. He has been leading the orchestra thus far this season, but the arrangement entered into at the outset was not a permanent one.

The trustees expressed their hearty approval of the efficient manner in which Monteux has discharged his duties.

It will be remembered that Mr. Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts in the Autumn of 1918 for the brief period in which he could obtain his release from an existing engagement as conductor of French opera of the Metropolitan Opera House. The following Spring he was engaged at the first opportunity as the regular conductor of the orchestra.

From New York City

MONTEUX CONDUCTOR.

BOSTON, Jan. 24.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux, its eminent conductor, whereby he is to continue his post during the seasons 1920-1921 and 1921-1922. Under his leadership the present season, not half over, the orchestra has had a success almost without precedent. It will be remembered that Mr. Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts in the autumn of 1918 for the brief period in which he could obtain his release from an existing engagement as conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House. In the following spring he was engaged at the first opportunity as the regular conductor of the orchestra.

From [illegible]

[illegible] New York City

Pierre Monteux's engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been extended to the season of 1922.

From Times

New York City

Boston Retains Monteux for 3 Years

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Jan. 23.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra's new governing board of nine trustees have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux, the French conductor, whereby he is to continue in his present post here during the seasons of 1920, 1921, and 1922.

Mr. Monteux led the opening Boston concerts in 1918 on a brief release from the Metropolitan Opera, and last Fall he was engaged at the first opportunity as the regular leader.

From TELEGRAM

Address New York City

Pierre Monteux has been made permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The trustees of the orchestra have engaged him to continue at his post during the seasons of 1920, 1921 and 1922.

Under his leadership the present season, now half over, has had a success almost without precedent.

It will be remembered that Mr. Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts in the autumn of 1918 for the brief period in which he could obtain his release from an existing engagement as conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House.

In the following spring he was engaged, at the first opportunity as the regular conductor of the orch[illegible]

Sun
Baltimore, Md.
NOV 30 1919 E

THROUGH OUR OWN OPERA GLASSES

AFTER hearing the splendid performance of Vincent d'Indy's new "war" symphony by the Damrosch Orchestra last Wednesday evening, when much—not most, as was inadvertently printed in the review of the concert the following morning—of the success of the interpretation was due to the fine playing of the brass choir, it becomes immediately evident that we hear far too little music of this particular calibre in Baltimore and that we hear it—and this is the important thing—far too infrequently. On general principles it is perhaps a mistake to repeat symphonies in any given season and probably all Baltimoreans are agreed that when there are so few symphony concerts given here during the winter—that is to say, relatively few, for we have an admirable list of concerts this year—repetitions should be taboo. Why, for instance, should each visiting orchestra, to say nothing of our local organization, play the Beethoven Fifth Symphony? Not that they have as yet, but such things are always under consideration and you will probably find before the musical season is over that the Beethoven Fifth will have been included in every visiting organization's schedule.

Now the classic literature of the orchestra presents no particular difficulties to the auditor who has been made familiar with it through long and continued concert attendance. It is the music that he knows and loves because he has come to understand it and to appreciate its beauties, but in a sense this classic music, of which the "form" is more obvious, the melody more "sustained," the appeal more direct than it is in the works of the neo-moderns, presents no special difficulties even to the neophyte. But the strictly "modern" music is a much harder nut for everyone to crack because it is presented in an entirely different idiom and one with which very few concert goers, even the most receptive, have as yet been made familiar through the necessary number of auditions.

For this reason, as I have indicated, it becomes immediately evident that if we are to know and love the modern compositions we must hear them over and over again and that each new hearing will reveal new beauties and give us a better understanding of their complexities, their atmospheric suggestion, their color and their meaning. So that the general rule that seeks to prevent repetitions of orchestral works in any given season should certainly be "proved" by a series of exceptions that seeks to provide for the frequent and repeated performance of new compositions while we are in a mood to hear and sympathize with them.

It is perfectly obvious that those of us who heard the "Sinfonia Brevis" last Wednesday evening for the first time gained but an inadequate impression of its many beauties. Modern French music, even the simplest, presents very actual difficulties to the unfamiliar listener because of its unusual resolutions, its strange dissonances, its atmospheric color, all things apart in Gallic writing, so that it is only through repeated hearings that one comes to love and understand something of the intricate pattern of these works. Played once, and once for all, and then shelved, as far as we here are concerned, such things will make scarcely a ripple on the pool of our musical appreciation. We will never come to a perfect understanding of modern music until it is played as regularly and as frequently as have been the classic orchestral pieces for the past quarter of a century. It cannot be too insistently reiterated that it is only through hearing music and hearing it over and over again that we come to know it. But modern music we never hear over and over again. We hear it once. And because no modern music of real importance is "obvious" it makes no special impression upon us and sinks into oblivion.

We should know more of Vincent d'Indy in Baltimore, and particularly should we know more of the "Sinfonia Brevis." I think it is very important, therefore, that the Boston Orchestra, which is playing this rather extraordinary work this winter, give this "war" symphony in Baltimore before its season is over; and there is another symphony that we should hear, and that is the Vincent d'Indy symphony in B flat. It created almost a furore when it was first played in Philadelphia soon after it was written, in 1902, and it was only exceeded in popularity there by the "Pathetique" of Tschaikowsky. In those days the final concert of the season was a "request" program, the audience at the previous concert casting a ballot and voting for their favorite numbers. The "Pathetique," new to us all then, was the selection, but the d'Indy symphony in B flat received almost as many votes. Music has traveled far since those days, and probably the B flat symphony would no longer present the difficulties it did in 1902—I mean from the listener's viewpoint—but it is a great work in many respects, foreshadowing the marvelous virtuosity of the scoring for the brasses that is such a vivid feature of the "Sinfonia Brevis." But what Baltimorean is familiar with it?

When there is so much to be played and so few occasions upon which to play that "much," isn't [illegible] conventional in music be shelved for a [illegible]s can be given repeated hearings? Surely [illegible] a year or two while we grow in knowl- [illegible] probably very few people who heard the [illegible]ng who are not eager to hear it all over [illegible]ould be put to the vote. But vote or no [illegible]d enable us to hear the "Sinfonia Brevis [illegible] before the impression made by its first

OREGONIAN
Portland, Oregon
DEC 21 1919

GERMAN PROPAGANDA FAILS TO CHECK MONTEUX SUCCESS

French Conductor Reveals What He Has in Way of Capacity—Fight Against Great Odds Is Carried On in Orchestra Programmes.

EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

NEW YORK, Dec. 19.—(Special.)—Pierre Monteux had a triumph on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, because little by little the French conductor is revealing what he has in the way of capacity and here be it understood that he is fighting the most desperate odds ever attempted by any man. Perhaps when he accepted the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra he knew what was ahead of him. He knew that he was to face audiences that had been trained to find that only German music was good, and perhaps few really know further that he faces audiences which contain gentle propagandists who use every diabolical means known to make his achievements smaller.

If he has a great personal success, the whispering may be heard, "Too bad to waste his time on such programmes." If he concedes and places a classic on the programme these same whispers say, "Well, of course, he has it not in the blood." Pierre Monteux has proven himself a great artist and an invaluable asset to the Boston Symphony orchestra. He knows how to put himself into the spirit of the country and in his heart is a deep and ardent desire to work so that he has accomplished something to build up and not to tear down.

Hearken well, the German propaganda is at work as never before. He knows perfectly the art of tearing down by faint praise, of seeming to applaud while his eyes look a "pity for what this poor public has to stand." He works not even slily, because anyone who understands music knows what his attitude means.

Concerts Cause Thrills.

None could have heard the two concerts given during the week at Carnegie hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Pierre Monteux without feeling a thrill of delight over the steady gain that the organization is making, no one could have heard the programmes without being thankful that there was nothing hackneyed and nothing dragged in from German opera, for the purpose of getting the "hurrah" which the friends of German music are always sure to provide.

Alas, for the short-sighted who believe that the enthusiasm manifested in behalf of German music such as the Wagner excerpts on concert programmes is a frank outburst of enthusiasm for the music itself. Let it be understood that this enthusiasm is whetted on by people who are determined to make musical conditions return to the point where they were when they had everything else by the throat, throttled, strangled, killed!

Conductors naturally like applause; they feel that it is a part of their business asset and to them this is as much of a necessity as it is to a star at the opera. For this reason they incline frequently to what they know beforehand will bring forth the loudest and the longest demonstrations and never do they realize that they are in the hands of a more cunning "claque" than ever shouted itself hoarse for pay.

There was no propaganda "claque" when Monteux sounded the last notes of "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" on Thursday evening; there was an outburst which meant that the public had been taken entirely unawares, that it forgot nationality, that it responded magnetically to the splendid work of the young American, who, when the audience realized his presence in a first tier box, was the recipient of renewed demonstrations. The first of these came to the work as presented by M. Monteux and his men, all of whom showed that it had not been merely "gone over," but it had had excellent and careful working out.

Difficult it is to say whether Monteux or Griffes has made a tremendous move in behalf of the much discussed "American composer." The modest young musician seems to have burst suddenly into the limelight with a spirit in his work that is thoroughly American, entirely personal, devoid of leanings and memories of other schools and, above all, with a modesty that is in itself an achievement. The beautiful atmosphere of the work with touches here and there of oriental languor, the unusual understanding of the technic of the orchestra and the instrumentation have made it clear that the ultra-modern can preach a gospel of beauty.

What a joy it is to support an orchestra that does so much for American art, and does it with the right spirit! Not because the public has come to demand it; not because it represents a sop to Cerberus, but because honestly as a widely schooled and discerning musician and artist Pierre Monteux is able to make his own conclusions concerning an orchestral score which he examines.

Jotty and Elnathan Hear Mr Montoox' Men Play Beeth Oven

How Those Fellers With the Bull-Fiddles Did Saw Wood! Apers Middy Dun Fawn Makes a Big Hit With Men From Quoddy Harbor

By "Saturday Chat" in Lowell Courier-Citizen.

As I turned into the lobby of a Boston Hotel Friday evening I detected something subtly familiar in the rolling gait of two men who were proceeding at reduced speed in the direction of the dining-room. They seemed rather out of place in urban surroundings. The backs of their necks were distinctly red.

I let out a link or two and ranged alongside. Certainty dawned. There was no mistaking the quality of the voices—voices bred of much deep breathing in the fogs of a stern and rockbound coast. The men were, to be brief, my good friend Jotham Bowden, captain, mate and foremast hand of the tiny fishing schooner Starlight, accompanied by his equally good friend, Capt Elnathan Frisbie of the good ship Comet, out of Quoddy Harbor, both men engaging when at home in the lucrative profession of calling crustaceans from the vasty deep.

They were glad to see me. Jotham, or as we usually call him, Jotty, was especially so. We arranged to dine together.

Selectmen More Particular

"We've been in town about three days," volunteered Jotty. "Friz, here, he's had to spend most of his time at Dr Payne and Pulham's havin' his molars renood. But in his loocid intervals we've done a bit of scoutin' around. They's no opery to go to these days, but we've been tryin' to act like real city folks."

I asked him if they'd been to the movies.

"Oh, sure! We tried them the first night—but you have to remember that we have 'em at home now. Our Seelectmen are a bit more chaste, I gather, than yours in Boston be. We don't get much chance to see anythin' more excitin' than 'Not Guilty, Your Honor,' in six reels.

"Friz an' me went to see somethin' called 'Enlighten Thy Wife,' or some such title, the purport of which was that what every schoolboy learns on about the second day is wholly unknown to innocent young soldiers of 19 to 24.

"Friz wanted to drag me off to another, vouched for by all the Baptist clergy as something every young college man should see, called 'Fit to Fight'—but I said I felt virtuous enough already, to last my few remainin' years. So we cast about for the next best thing and found they was to be a Symphony concert.

All They Is to Know About Music

"Friz was all for goin' because his daughter that used to go to school in your town used to talk about them concerts and said they was real worth hearin'. I bellered some when I heard the tickets was well up toward what lobsters costs per pound—but they said they wa'n't no war tax on 'em so that settled us.

"We went. We're just in port from there now. And Friz has got a tune runnin' in his head whom Apers Middy Dun Fawn.

"He was trillin' it all the way down Boyliston st until one of them doughboy cops told him to shut up or he'd shoot him. For the love of Mud, Friz, try to keep it still while we're in the dinin' room.

"Our seats was fully half a mile from the stage, an' we got there before the lights was turned on so that we had a hard time tryin' to read up our libretters ahead of time. Daylight savin' hasn't got anythin' on the electric light savin' propensities of the Symphony.

"We got two little books given us free gratis for nothin' by a gentlemanly usher as we walked in, encased in flesh-colored covers; and now that I've had a squint at it I'll tell the world that it's real interestin'.

I had to wait until the diamond sunburst up in the ceilin' was turned on before I could see anythin' smaller'n the black type at the top of Page One, but when I got into the thing later I found out it was by a Mr Hale, who knows all they is to know about music, and about most every other thing, too.

Interestin' Story of Beeth Oven

"First they was what they call a rooster of the band—the names, you know. I must say they read kind of like a rollcall of the 10th Legion of Von Hindenburg's army, with a platoon or two from Poland and Czecheslowcoach.

"But I understand they're all vouched for as ready an' willin' at all times to jump an' play the Star Spangled Banner on the G-string, both loud an' long, as a proof of their abidin' hatred of all things royal.

"Up back of the stage was an organ of solid gold—all pipes, so far's I could see, an' no way of playin' the thing at all. An' in front was a sort of raised affair for the musicians to set on in rows.

"Two or three of 'em was already there tootlin' away to themselves for fear they might not get it right later on. But I was so interested in readin' the program that I didn't look at 'em much.

"I'd found my specs by this time, and I'd got into a story about a German man named Beeth Oven—a real interestin' story. He was the man who writ the first piece they was to play.

"I supposed it was goin' to tell somethin' dry about the music, but it seems it didn't much. It got hold of Mr Oven sometime before the dawn of the last century an' told what trouble he had with colic.

"He tried various remedies suggested by the old ladies of the neighborhood incloodin' the essential oil of bitter almonds, hopin' they'd give relief and let him work on his new symphony, but they didn't.

"He tried cold baths, which Germans only do when they're real sick. He even drank mineral water. No use—blown up like a baloon.

"He fell in love with a girl many years his junior an' much higher in rank—but her father wouldn't listen to it. So he turned to an' wrote a symphony, in which the critics at first said the woodwind was too prominent.

Skipped the Press Gallery

"Then it told about the king of those parts, an' how he used to overwork and underpay his choir, an' how he got up at 3 in the afternoon an' breakfasted on boiled bacon, an' how he scandalized the neighbors by his Arcours.

"An' it told how the first time this piece was played, some critics said it was bad, an' others that it was worse, an' some that it was the most ridiculous thing that ever was written.

"The musicians had rehearsed it for two solid hours and the union members were just votin' to go on strike, when the local king comes in with a teawagon loaded with doughnuts and every kind of drink in the palace.

"This staved off the strike—but they made the mistake of not feedin' the press gallery, too, I judge, because one an' all the papers crabbed the show when it come off that first night at the Hewandhaus.

"When I found out that Beeth Oven was as deef as a bedpost I wondered how he ever managed to write anythin' at all. It seems he was stone deef worse'n old Aunt Sally Hackett down to Quoddy. But he evidently wrote some pretty good music, at that—and when I come to hear the thing played I concluded it was pretty harsh on poor old Beeth Oven to slam him the way those critics did.

"But I was interested to read about him, of course, because they talked just the way everybody does when it's the first time a thing's done and nobody darst say a decent thing about it for fear of bein' thought an easy mark.

"These critical fellers get my goat, anyhow. They don't like nothin'—at least not for years. It would seem as if they didn't know nothin' if they praised anybody at all.

Mr Montoox and His Band

"Now I'm frank to say that, barrin' it was too long, I liked Mr Beeth Oven's music a whole lot. But I was more interested in watchin' the feller that conducted—a man named Montoox. Friz and me saw him over in N'Yawk last Winter when we went to the opery, conductin' there. I'll say he's good.

"He could tell just when any bunch of those players was due to tune up an' indicated it by pointin' his stick at 'em. He never made one mistake the whole afternoon.

"And Lor', how those fellers in the back row with the bull-fiddles did saw wood! And how the fat little man who plays on the two sap-kettles did drum!

"Friz got to talkin' about him, until a gray-headed old professor behind us poked him with his umbrella and told him for the Lord's sake to keep still a while. Mostly people was attentive; an' when it was over they clapped quite hard. Ain't clappin' your hands a funny way to show your joy, though?

Only High-Class Jazz

"The other pieces of music was more fun for me than Beeth Oven's because they was noisier and more catchy.

"They played somethin' that Friz, who speaks Canadian French, said was called the Cussed Huntsman—who used to hun on the holy Sabbath day, much to the scandal of his village, and finally got switched off to hell where the devils hunted him up and down the slag piles. It was by Julius Caesar Frank, who didn't approve of sunday golf an' wrote this piece to prove it.

"Then they played that thing that Friz is forever hummin'—something about the Dun Fawn—by a man named De Busy. And they was also a Spanish dance that Friz said was only high class jazz. Then we come out.

Funny Dinguses in That Band

"But say, you have to hand it to the men that writ those bits of music. Think of havin' to set the parts for somethin' like 20 different an' distinct fiddlers, tooters, drummers an' such. I got interested in seein' what they had to play on—an' believe me they must be some funny dinguses in that band, 'specially when it was modern music. It's all well enough with old Beeth Oven. He just sat down and wrote things for a dozen of God's own kind of instruments.

"But when you add a humstrum, a swinette, six baby grand pianos, two snare-drums (one interchangeable with tom-tom), a set o' cathedral chimes, three exlophones, one set of musical glasses, church organ, a celesta and one Hungarian piano played by a feller who drums on the strings—not countin' watchman's rattle and certain saxophones—you've got a real job on hand.

"They didn't have any of that stuff today, but the old chap who punched Friz with his brolly was heard to say that he'd seen most all of those things employed to give a modern characteristic piece of real American program-music. I'm goin' to come in some day when they play one of those things, because I like action.

Similar, Only High-Brow

"We used to have 'em years ago—description of a picnic on a steamboat, f'r instance—with lifelike representations of the whistle blowin', bells ringin', engine puffin', an' men stirrin' lemonade in a tub. That's what they mean by 'program music,' I gather.

"The most interestin' performer in those days was a versatile gent who sat down behind the big drum an' worked any quantity of contraptions with sandpaper on 'em, as well as the machine for representin' the cackle of hens, the deep-mouthed bray of the jackass an' the squalls of peevish children.

"I take it a symphony is jest the same, or similar, only it's high-brow. Instead of tryin' to make the audience hear the homely noises of the barnyard, the composer tries to make you think you see blue devils chasin' a distracted huntsman over the hills an' dales of Hell, or a fawn idlin' an' lally-gaggin' with demidryads under the shade of a eucalyptus bush, or in a extreme case soul vibrations suggested by thinkin' about death an' transfiguration.

"Or maybe the artist is tryin' to make you think of a wave of the ocean floodin' into a deep blue grotto. I judge he succeeds chiefly because he has an able agent to write out a story of the thing, like Mr Hale, who will tell you just what means the wave and what means the blue cavern.

"I know I got a lot more out of the Cussed Hunter after readin' what it was all about.

Wait for the Deestrict School

"First the horns toot—that means the old man is summonin' his ungodly pack of hounds. In Maine they'd have had somethin' to represent the yelpin' of the pack an' the cussin' an' swearin' of the keeper—but not so here.

"Then you hear the clamor of church bells callin' the devout. That shows you it's Sunday when everybody ought to be goin' to prayer instead of givin' the hosses a outin' in search of the offensive fox.

"Then of course there's all manner of ragin' by the violins indicatin' a mad gallop o'er the downs so free—followed by the arrival of all the Satanic host in full cry.

"The book said old man Frank who wrote the music was such a decent sort of feller that he never did know how devils would act an' therefore failed to give a convincin' reproduction of their gambols in mere musical notation. I guess that's so.

"But, after all, do any of 'em ever succeed? I doubt it—unless the book's there to tell you.

"Well, if you have to be goin' you have to, of course. But I'd like to have you come down next Summer and hear a real descriptive piece played by our village band entitled "The Deestrict School." It's a lot more realistic than the Dun Fawn—more humorous by a lot, an' you can spot most of the allooosions without aid. You'll come? So do!"

I left Jotty toying with a mammoth segment of lemon meringue pie and a full cup of coffee—with extra cream.

And Fritz was humming in a cautious way the opening seductive cadence of the "Apres-midi d'un Faun."

TRIBUNE
ess: Providence, R. I.
JAN 24 1920 A

ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR

Pierre Monteux to Continue as Head of Boston Symphony.

Boston, Mass., Jan. 24.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux, its eminent conductor, whereby he is to continue in his post during the seasons of 1920-1921 and 1921-1922. Under his inspired leadership the present season, now half over, has had a success almost without precedent, crowded audiences in this and all cities where the orchestra has visited have manifested high enthusiasm, both as regards the quality of the performances and interest of the program. It will be remembered that Mr. Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony corcerts in the autumn of 1918 for the brief period in which he could obtain his release from an existing engagement as conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House.

To hear Sergei Rachmaninoff's latest Concerto (No. 3) would be an event in itself—to hear the great composer-pianist play his own music with the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes the occasion memorable, indeed. And such is to happen at the Boston Symphony concert which at the Boston Symphony Hall next Thursday evening. The phenomenal Russian dedicated the score to Josef Hofmann, but this tremendous music of dark, rich coloring, stinging rhythms, and fiery climaxes, Hofmann has never attempted. The truth is that this unheard of Concerto is so replete with its creator's unique personality and pianistic style that only Rachmaninoff himself can do it full justice.

Pierre Monteux and his men will provide further fare of interest by performing Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C-minor, which they recently played in Boston in memory of Henry Lee Higginson, the founder and sustainer of the historic organization. It has not been heard at these concerts since 1915. The closing number will be Glazounoff's Symphonic poem "Stenka Razine," built upon haunting folk songs of Russia.

Sun
Baltimore, Md.

THROUGH OUR OWN OPERA GLASSES

AFTER hearing the splendid performance of Vincent d'Indy's new "war" symphony by the Damrosch Orchestra last Wednesday evening, when much—not most, as was inadvertently printed in the review of the concert the following morning—of the success of the interpretation was due to the fine playing of the brass choir, it becomes immediately evident that we hear far too little music of this particular calibre in Baltimore and that we hear it—and this is the important thing—far too infrequently. On general principles it is perhaps a mistake to repeat symphonies in any given season and probably all Baltimoreans are agreed that when there are so few symphony concerts given here during the winter—that is to say, relatively few, for we have an admirable list of concerts this year—repetitions should be taboo. Why, for instance, should each visiting orchestra, to say nothing of our local organization, play the Beethoven Fifth Symphony? Not that they have as yet, but such things are always under consideration and you will probably find before the musical season is over that the Beethoven Fifth will have been included in every visiting organization's schedule.

Now the classic literature of the orchestra presents no particular difficulties to the auditor who has been made familiar with it through long and continued concert attendance. It is the music that he knows and loves because he has come to understand it and to appreciate its beauties, but in a sense this classic music, of which the "form" is more obvious, the melody more "sustained," the appeal more direct than it is in the works of the neo-moderns, presents no special difficulties even to the neophyte. But the strictly "modern" music is a much harder nut for everyone to crack because it is presented in an entirely different idiom and one with which very few concert goers, even the most receptive, have as yet been made familiar through the necessary number of auditions.

For this reason, as I have indicated, it becomes immediately evident that if we are to know and love the modern compositions we must hear them over and over again and that each new hearing will reveal new beauties and give us a better understanding of their complexities, their atmospheric suggestion, their color and their meaning. So that the general rule that seeks to prevent repetitions of orchestral works in any given season should certainly be "proved" by a series of exceptions that seeks to provide for the frequent and repeated performance of new compositions while we are in a mood to hear and sympathize with them.

It is perfectly obvious that those of us who heard the "Sinfonia Brevis" last Wednesday evening for the first time gained but an inadequate impression of its many beauties. Modern French music, even the simplest, presents very actual difficulties to the unfamiliar listener because of its unusual resolutions, its strange dissonances, its atmospheric color, all things apart in Gallic writing, so that it is only through repeated hearings that one comes to love and understand something of the intricate pattern of these works. Played once, and once for all, and then shelved, as far as we here are concerned, such things will make scarcely a ripple on the pool of our musical appreciation. We will never come to a perfect understanding of modern music until it is played as regularly and as frequently as have been the classic orchestral pieces for the past quarter of a century. It cannot be too insistently reiterated that it is only through hearing music and hearing it over and over again that we come to know it. But modern music we never hear over and over again. We hear it once. And because no modern music of real importance is "obvious" it makes no special impression upon us and sinks into oblivion.

We should know more of Vincent d'Indy in Baltimore, and particularly should we know more of the "Sinfonia Brevis." I think it is very important, therefore, that the Boston Orchestra, which is playing this rather extraordinary work this winter, give this "war" symphony in Baltimore before its season is over; and there is another symphony that we should hear, and that is the Vincent d'Indy symphony in B flat. It created almost a furore when it was first played in Philadelphia soon after it was written, in 1902, and it was only exceeded in popularity there by the "Pathetique" of Tschaikowsky. In those days the final concert of the season was a "request" program, the audience at the previous concert casting a ballot and voting for their favorite numbers. The "Pathetique," new to us all then, was the selection, but the d'Indy symphony in B flat received almost as many votes. Music has traveled far since those days, and probably the B flat symphony would no longer present the difficulties it did in 1902—I mean from the listener's viewpoint—but it is a great work in many respects, foreshadowing the marvelous virtuosity of the scoring for the brasses that is such a vivid feature of the "Sinfonia Brevis." But what Baltimorean is familiar with it?

When there is so much to be played and so few occasions upon which to play that "much," isn't [illegible] conventional in music be shelved for a [illegible]s can be given repeated hearings? Surely [illegible] a year or two while we grow in knowl- [illegible] probably very few people who heard the [illegible]ng who are not eager to hear it all over [illegible]ould be put to the vote. But vote or no [illegible]d enable us to hear the "Sinfonia Brevis [illegible] before the impression made by its first

OREGONIAN

Portland, Oregon

GERMAN PROPAGANDA FAILS TO CHECK MONTEUX SUCCESS

French Conductor Reveals What He Has in Way of Capacity—Fight Against Great Odds Is Carried On in Orchestra Programmes.

EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

NEW YORK, Dec. 19.—(Special.)—Pierre Monteux had a triumph on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, because little by little the French conductor is revealing what he has in the way of capacity and here be it understood that he is fighting the most desperate odds ever attempted by any man. Perhaps when he accepted the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra he knew what was ahead of him. He knew that he was to face audiences that had been trained to find that only German music was good, and perhaps few really know further that he faces audiences which contain gentle propagandists who use every diabolical means known to make his achievements smaller.

If he has a great personal success, the whispering may be heard, "Too bad to waste his time on such programmes." If he concedes and places a classic on the programme these same whispers say, "Well, of course, he has it not in the blood." Pierre Monteux has proven himself a great artist and an invaluable asset to the Boston Symphony orchestra. He knows how to put himself into the spirit of the country and in his heart is a deep and ardent desire to work so that he has accomplished something to build up and not to tear down.

Hearken well, the German propaganda is at work as never before. He knows perfectly the art of tearing down by faint praise, of seeming to applaud while his eyes look a "pity for what this poor public has to stand." He works not even slily, because anyone who understands music knows what his attitude means.

Concerts Cause Thrills.

None could have heard the two concerts given during the week at Carnegie hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Pierre Monteux without feeling a thrill of delight over the steady gain that the organization is making, no one could have heard the programmes without being thankful that there was nothing hackneyed and nothing dragged in from German opera, for the purpose of getting the "hurrah" which the friends of German music are always sure to provide.

Alas, for the short-sighted who believe that the enthusiasm manifested in behalf of German music such as the Wagner excerpts on concert programmes is a frank outburst of enthusiasm for the music itself. Let it be understood that this enthusiasm is whetted on by people who are determined to make musical conditions return to the point where they were when they had everything else by the throat, throttled, strangled, killed!

Conductors naturally like applause; they feel that it is a part of their business asset and to them this is as much of a necessity as it is to a star at the opera. For this reason they incline frequently to what they know beforehand will bring forth the loudest and the longest demonstrations and never do they realize that they are in the hands of a more cunning "claque" than ever shouted itself hoarse for pay.

There was no propaganda "claque" when Monteux sounded the last notes of "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" on Thursday evening; there was an outburst which meant that the public had been taken entirely unawares, that it forgot nationality, that it responded magnetically to the splendid work of the young American, who, when the audience realized his presence in a first tier box, was the recipient of renewed demonstrations. The first of these came to the work as presented by M. Monteux and his men, all of whom showed that it had not been merely "gone over," but it had had excellent and careful working out.

Difficult it is to say whether Monteux or Griffes has made a tremendous move in behalf of the much discussed "American composer." The modest young musician seems to have burst suddenly into the limelight with a spirit in his work that is thoroughly American, entirely personal, devoid of leanings and memories of other schools and, above all, with a modesty that is in itself an achievement. The beautiful atmosphere of the work with touches here and there of oriental languor, the unusual understanding of the technic of the orchestra and the instrumentation have made it clear that the ultra-modern can preach a gospel of beauty.

What a joy it is to support an orchestra that does so much for American art, and does it with the right spirit! Not because the public has come to demand it; not because it represents a sop to Cerberus, but because honestly as a widely schooled and discerning musician and artist Pierre Monteux is able to make his own conclusions concerning an orchestral score which he examines.

Jotty and Elnathan Hear Mr Montoox' Men Play Beeth Oven

How Those Fellers With the Bull-Fiddles Did Saw Wood! Apers Middy Dun Fawn Makes a Big Hit With Men From Quoddy Harbor

By "Saturday Chat" in Lowell Courier-Citizen.

As I turned into the lobby of a Boston Hotel Friday evening I detected something subtly familiar in the rolling gait of two men who were proceeding at reduced speed in the direction of the dining-room. They seemed rather out of place in urban surroundings. The backs of their necks were distinctly red.

I let out a link or two and ranged alongside. Certainty dawned. There was no mistaking the quality of the voices—voices bred of much deep breathing in the fogs of a stern and rockbound coast. The men were, to be brief, my good friend Jotham Bowden, captain, mate and foremast hand of the tiny fishing schooner Starlight, accompanied by his equally good friend, Capt Elnathan Frisbie of the good ship Comet, out of Quoddy Harbor, both men engaging when at home in the lucrative profession of calling crustaceans from the vasty deep.

They were glad to see me. Jotham, or as we usually call him, Jotty, was especially so. We arranged to dine together.

Selectmen More Particular

"We've been in town about three days," volunteered Jotty. "Friz, here, he's had to spend most of his time at Dr Payne and Pulham's havin' his molars renood. But in his loocid intervals we've done a bit of scoutin' around. They's no opery to go to these days, but we've been tryin' to act like real city folks."

I asked him if they'd been to the movies.

"Oh, sure! We tried them the first night—but you have to remember that we have 'em at home now. Our Seelectmen are a bit more chaste, I gather, than yours in Boston be. We don't get much chance to see anythin' more excitin' than 'Not Guilty, Your Honor,' in six reels.

"Friz an' me went to see somethin' called 'Enlighten Thy Wife,' or some such title, the purport of which was that what every schoolboy learns on about the second day is wholly unknown to innocent young soldiers of 19 to 24.

"Friz wanted to drag me off to another, vouched for by all the Baptist clergy as something every young college man should see, called 'Fit to Fight'—but I said I felt virtuous enough already to last my few remainin' years. So we cast about for the next best thing and found they was to be a Symphony concert.

All They Is to Know About Music

"Friz was all for goin' because his daughter that used to go to school in your town used to talk about them concerts and said they was real worth hearin'. I bellered some when I heard the tickets was well up toward what lobsters costs per pound—but they said they wa'n't no war tax on 'em so that settled us.

"We went. We're just in port from there now. And Friz has got a tune runnin' in his head whom Apers Middy Dun Fawn.

"He was trillin' it all the way down Boylston st until one of them doughboy cops told him to shut up or he'd shoot him. For the love of Mud, Friz, try to keep it still while we're in the dinin' room.

"Our seats was fully half a mile from the stage, an' we got there before the lights was turned on so that we had a hard time tryin' to read up our libretters ahead of time. Daylight savin' hasn't got anythin' on the electric light savin' propensities of the Symphony.

"We got two little books given us free gratis for nothin' by a gentlemanly usher as we walked in, encased in flesh-colored covers; and now that I've had a squint at it I'll tell the world that it's real interestin'.

I had to wait until the diamond sunburst up in the ceilin' was turned on before I could see anythin' smaller'n the black type at the top of Page One, but when I got into the thing later I found out it was by a Mr Hale, who knows all they is to know about music, and about most every other thing, too.

Interestin' Story of Beeth Oven

"First they was what they call a rooster of the band—the names, you know. I must say they read kind of like a rollcall of the 10th Legion of Von Hindenburg's army, with a platoon or two from Poland and Czecheslowcoach.

"But I understand they're all vouched for as ready an' willin' at all times to jump an' play the Star Spangled Banner on the G-string, both loud an' long, as a proof of their abidin' hatred of all things royal.

"Up back of the stage was an organ of solid gold—all pipes, so far's I could see, an' no way of playin' the thing at all. An' in front was a sort of raised affair for the musicians to set on in rows.

"Two or three of 'em was already there tootlin' away to themselves for fear they might not get it right later on. But I was so interested in readin' the program that I didn't look at 'em much.

"I'd found my specs by this time, and I'd got into a story about a German man named Beeth Oven—a real interestin' story. He was the man who writ the first piece they was to play.

"I supposed it was goin' to tell somethin' dry about the music, but it seems it didn't much. It got hold of Mr Oven sometime before the dawn of the last century an' told what trouble he had with colic.

"He tried various remedies suggested by the old ladies of the neighborhood incloodin' the essential oil of bitter almonds, hopin' they'd give relief and let him work on his new symphony, but they didn't.

"He tried cold baths, which Germans only do when they're real sick. He even drank mineral water. No use—blown up like a baloon.

"He fell in love with a girl many years his junior an' much higher in rank—but her father wouldn't listen to it. So he turned to an' wrote a symphony, in which the critics at first said the woodwind was too prominent.

Skipped the Press Gallery

"Then it told about the king of those parts, an' how he used to overwork and underpay his choir, an' how he got up at 3 in the afternoon an' breakfasted on boiled bacon, an' how he scandalized the neighbors by his Arnours.

"An' it told how the first time this piece was played, some critics said it was bad, an' others that it was worse, an' some that it was the most ridiculous thing that ever was written.

"The musicians had rehearsed it for two solid hours and the union members were just votin' to go on strike, when the local king comes in with a teawagon loaded with doughnuts and every kind of drink in the palace.

"This staved off the strike—but they made the mistake of not feedin' the press gallery, too, I judge, because one an' all the papers crabbed the show when it come off that first night at the Tewandhaus.

"When I found out that Beeth Oven was as deef as a bedpost I wondered how he ever managed to write anythin' at all. It seems he was stone deef—worse'n old Aunt Sally Hackett down to Quoddy. But he evidently wrote some pretty good music, at that—and when I come to hear the thing played I concluded it was pretty harsh on poor old Beeth Oven to slam him the way those critics did.

"But I was interested to read about him, of course, because they talked just the way everybody does when it's the first time a thing's done and nobody darst say a decent thing about it for fear of bein' thought an easy mark.

"These critical fellers get my goat, anyhow. They don't like nothin'—at least not for years. It would seem as if they didn't know nothin' if they praised anybody at all.

Mr Montoox and His Band

"Now I'm frank to say that, barrin' it was too long, I liked Mr Beeth Oven's music a whole lot. But I was more interested in watchin' the feller that conducted—a man named Montoox, Friz and me saw him over in N'Yawk last Winter when we went to the opery, conductin' there. I'll say he's good.

"He could tell just when any bunch of those players was due to tune up an' indicated it by pointin' his stick at 'em. He never made one mistake the whole afternoon.

"And Lor', how those fellers in the back row with the bull-fiddles did saw wood! And how the fat little man who plays on the two sap-kettles did drum!

"Friz got to talkin' about him, until a gray-headed old professor behind us poked him with his umbrella and told him for the Lord's sake to keep still a while. Mostly people was attentive; an' when it was over they clapped quite hard. Ain't clappin' your hands a funny way to show your joy, though?

Only High-Class Jazz

"The other pieces of music was more fun for me than Beeth Oven's because they was noisier and more catchy.

"They played somethin' that Friz, who speaks Canadian French, said was called the Cussed Huntsman—who used to hun on the holy Sabbath day, much to the scandal of his village, and finally got switched off to hell where the devils hunted him up and down the slag piles. It was by Julius Caesar Frank, who didn't approve of Sunday golf an' wrote this piece to prove it.

"Then they played that thing that Friz is forever hummin'—something about the Dun Fawn—by a man named De Busy. And they was also a Spanish dance that Friz said was only high class jazz. Then we come out.

Funny Dinguses in That Band

"But say, you have to hand it to the men that writ those bits of music. Think of havin' to set the parts for somethin' like 20 different an' distinct fiddlers, tooters, drummers an' such. I got interested in seein' what they had to play on—an' believe me they must be some funny dinguses in that band, 'specially when it was modern music. It's all well enough with old Beeth Oven. He just sat down and wrote things for a dozen of God's own kind of instruments.

"But when you add a humstrum, a swinette, six baby grand pianos, two snare-drums (one interchangeable with tom-tom), a set o' cathedral chimes, three exlophones, one set of musical glasses, church organ, a celesta and one Hungarian piano played by a feller who drums on the strings—not countin' watchman's rattle and certain saxophones—you've got a real job on hand.

"They didn't have any of that stuff today, but the old chap who punched Friz with his brolly was heard to say that he'd seen most all of those things employed to give a modern characteristic piece of real American program-music. I'm goin' to come in some day when they play one of those things, because I like action.

Similar, Only High-Brow

"We used to have 'em years ago—description of a picnic on a steamboat, f'r instance—with lifelike representations of the whistle blowin', bells ringin', engine puffin', an' men stirrin' lemonade in a tub. That's what they mean by 'program music,' I gather.

"The most interestin' performer in those days was a versatile gent who sat down behind the big drum an' worked any quantity of contraptions with sandpaper on 'em, as well as the machine for representin' the cackle of hens, the deep-mouthed bray of the jackass an' the squalls of peevish children.

"I take it a symphony is jest the same, or similar, only it's high-brow. Instead of tryin' to make the audience hear the homely noises of the barnyard, the composer tries to make you think you see blue devils chasin' a distracted huntsman over the hills an' dales of Hell, or a fawn idlin' an' lally-gaggin' with demidryads under the shade of a eucalyptus bush, or in a extreme case soul vibrations suggested by thinkin' about death an' transfiguration.

"Or maybe the artist is tryin' to make you think of a wave of the ocean floodin' into a deep blue grotto. I judge he succeeds chiefly because he has an able agent to write out a story of the thing, like Mr Hale, who will tell you just what means the wave and what means the blue cavern.

"I know I got a lot more out of the Cussed Hunter after readin' what it was all about."

Wait for the Deestrict School

"First the horns toot—that means the old man is summonin' his ungodly pack of hounds. In Maine they'd have had somethin' to represent the yelpin' of the pack an' the cussin' an' swearin' of the keeper—but not so here.

"Then you hear the clamor of church bells callin' the devout. That shows you it's Sunday when everybody ought to be goin' to prayer instead of givin' the hosses a outin' in search of the offensive fox.

"Then of course there's all manner of ragin' by the violins indicatin' a mad gallop o'er the downs so free—followed by the arrival of all the Satanic host in full cry.

"The book said old man Frank who wrote the music was such a decent sort of feller that he never did know how devils would act an' therefore failed to give a convincin' reproduction of their gambols in mere musical notation. I guess that's so.

"But, after all, do any of 'em ever succeed? I doubt it—unless the book's there to tell you.

"Well, if you have to be goin' you have to, of course. But I'd like to have you come down next Summer and hear a real descriptive piece played by our village band entitled "The Deestrict School." It's a lot more realistic than the Dun Fawn—more humorous by a lot, an' you can spot most of the allooosions without aid. You'll come? So do!"

I left Jotty toying with a mammoth segment of lemon meringue pie and a full cup of coffee—with extra cream.

And Fritz was humming in a cautious way the opening seductive cadence of the "Apres-midi d'un Faun."

TRIBUNE

ess: Providence, R. I.

ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR

Pierre Monteux to Continue as Head of Boston Symphony.

Boston, Mass., Jan. 24.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux, its eminent conductor, whereby he is to continue in his post during the seasons of 1920-1921 and 1921-1922. Under his inspired leadership the present season, now half over, has had a success almost without precedent, crowded audiences in this and all cities where the orchestra has visited have manifested high enthusiasm, both as regards the quality of the performances and interest of the program. It will be remembered that Mr. Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts in the autumn of 1918 for the brief period in which he could obtain his release from an existing engagement as conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House.

To hear Sergei Rachmaninoff's latest Concerto (No. 3) would be an event in itself—to hear the great composer-pianist play his own music with the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes the occasion memorable, indeed. And such is to happen at the Boston Symphony concert which will be given in Infantry Hall next Thursday evening. The phenomenal Russian dedicated the score to Josef Hofmann, but this tremendous music of dark, rich colorings, stinging rhythms, and heavy climaxes, Hofmann has never attempted. The truth is that this unheard of Concerto is so replete with its creator's unique personality and pianistic style that only Rachmaninoff himself can do it full justice.

Pierre Monteux and his men will provide further fare of interest by performing Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C-minor, which they recently played in Boston in memory of Henry Lee Higginson, the founder and sustainer of the historic organization. It has not been heard at these concerts since 1915. The closing number will be Glazounoff's Symphonic poem "Stenka Razine," built upon haunting folk songs of Russia.

From Sun
Baltimore, Md.
NOV 19

THROUGH OUR OWN OPERA GLASSES

AFTER hearing the splendid performance of Vincent d'Indy's new "war" symphony by the Damrosch Orchestra last Wednesday evening, when much—not most, as was inadvertently printed in the review of the concert the following morning—of the success of the interpretation was due to the fine playing of the brass choir, it becomes immediately evident that we hear far too little music of this particular calibre in Baltimore and that we hear it—and this is the important thing—far too infrequently. On general principles it is perhaps a mistake to repeat symphonies in any given season and probably all Baltimoreans are agreed that when there are so few symphony concerts given here during the winter—that is to say, relatively few, for we have an admirable list of concerts this year—repetitions should be taboo. Why, for instance, should each visiting orchestra, to say nothing of our local organization, play the Beethoven Fifth Symphony? Not that they have as yet, but such things are always under consideration and you will probably find before the musical season is over that the Beethoven Fifth will have been included in every visiting organization's schedule.

Now the classic literature of the orchestra presents no particular difficulties to the auditor who has been made familiar with it through long and continued concert attendance. It is the music that he knows and loves because he has come to understand it and to appreciate its beauties, but in a sense this classic music, of which the "form" is more obvious, the melody more "sustained," the appeal more direct than it is in the works of the neo-moderns, presents no special difficulties even to the neophyte. But the strictly "modern" music is a much harder nut for everyone to crack because it is presented in an entirely different idiom and one with which very few concert goers, even the most receptive, have as yet been made familiar through the necessary number of auditions.

For this reason, as I have indicated, it becomes immediately evident that if we are to know and love the modern compositions we must hear them over and over again and that each new hearing will reveal new beauties and give us a better understanding of their complexities, their atmospheric suggestion, their color and their meaning. So that the general rule that seeks to prevent repetitions of orchestral works in any given season should certainly be "proved" by a series of exceptions that seeks to provide for the frequent and repeated performance of new compositions while we are in a mood to hear and sympathize with them.

It is perfectly obvious that those of us who heard the "Sinfonia Brevis" last Wednesday evening for the first time gained but an inadequate impression of its many beauties. Modern French music, even the simplest, presents very actual difficulties to the unfamiliar listener because of its unusual resolutions, its strange dissonances, its atmospheric color, all things apart in Gallic writing, so that it is only through repeated hearings that one comes to love and understand something of the intricate pattern of these works. Played once, and once for all, and then shelved, as far as we here are concerned, such things will make scarcely a ripple on the pool of our musical appreciation. We will never come to a perfect understanding of modern music until it is played as regularly and as frequently as have been the classic orchestral pieces for the past quarter of a century. It cannot be too insistently reiterated that it is only through hearing music and hearing it over and over again that we come to know it. But modern music we never hear over and over again. We hear it once. And because no modern music of real importance is "obvious" it makes no special impression upon us and sinks into oblivion.

We should know more of Vincent d'Indy in Baltimore, and particularly should we know more of the "Sinfonia Brevis." I think it is very important, therefore, that the Boston Orchestra, which is playing this rather extraordinary work this winter, give this "war" symphony in Baltimore before its season is over; and there is another symphony that we should hear, and that is the Vincent d'Indy symphony in B flat. It created almost a furore when it was first played in Philadelphia soon after it was written, in 1902, and it was only exceeded in popularity there by the "Pathetique" of Tschaikowsky. In those days the final concert of the season was a "request" program, the audience at the previous concert casting a ballot and voting for their favorite numbers. The "Pathetique," new to us all then, was the selection, but the d'Indy symphony in B flat received almost as many votes. Music has traveled far since those days, and probably the B flat symphony would no longer present the difficulties it did in 1902—I mean from the listener's viewpoint—but it is a great work in many respects, foreshadowing the marvelous virtuosity of the scoring for the brasses that is such a vivid feature of the "Sinfonia Brevis." But what Baltimorean is familiar with it?

When there is so much to be played and so few occasions upon which to play that "much," isn't it time that the conventional in music be shelved for a few months in order that the new works can be given repeated hearings? Surely we can take the classics for granted for a year or two while we grow in knowledge of contemporary music. There are probably very few people who heard the "war" symphony last Wednesday evening who are not eager to hear it all over again. It would be interesting if this could be put to the vote. But vote or no vote, I think that Pierre Monteux should enable us to hear the "Sinfonia Brevis de D'" Gallico" again—and soon, too, before the impression made by its first

...GANDA FAILS ...NTEUX SUCCESS

French Conductor ... He Has in Way of Capacity—Fight Against Great Odds Is Carried On in Orchestra Programmes.

EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

NEW YORK, Dec. 19.—(Special.)—Pierre Monteux had a triumph on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, because little by little the French conductor is revealing what he has in the way of capacity and here be it understood that he is fighting the most desperate odds ever attempted by any man. Perhaps when he accepted the post of conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra he knew what was ahead of him. He knew that he was to face audiences that had been trained to find that only German music was good, and perhaps few really know further that he faces audiences which contain gentle propagandists who use every diabolical means known to make his achievements smaller.

If he has a great personal success, the whispering may be heard, "Too bad to waste his time on such programmes." If he concedes and places a classic on the programme these same whispers say, "Well, of course, he has it not in the blood." Pierre Monteux has proven himself a great artist and an invaluable asset to the Boston Symphony orchestra. He knows how to put himself into the spirit of the country and in his heart is a deep and ardent desire to work so that he has accomplished something to build up and not to tear down.

Hearken well, the German propaganda is at work as never before. He knows perfectly the art of tearing down by faint praise, of seeming to applaud while his eyes look a "pity for what this poor public has to stand." He works not even slily, because anyone who understands music knows what his attitude means.

Concerts Cause Thrills.

None could have heard the two concerts given during the week at Carnegie hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Pierre Monteux without feeling a thrill of delight over the steady gain that the organization is making, no one could have heard the programmes without being thankful that there was nothing hackneyed and nothing dragged in from German opera, for the purpose of getting the "hurrah" which the friends of German music are always sure to provide.

Alas, for the short-sighted who believe that the enthusiasm manifested in behalf of German music such as the Wagner excerpts on concert programmes is a frank outburst of enthusiasm for the music itself. Let it be understood that this enthusiasm is whetted on by people who are determined to make musical conditions return to the point where they were when they had everything else by the throat, throttled, strangled, killed!

Conductors naturally like applause; they feel that it is a part of their business asset and to them this is as much of a necessity as it is to a star at the opera. For this reason they incline frequently to what they know beforehand will bring forth the loudest and the longest demonstrations and never do they realize that they are in the hands of a more cunning "claque" than ever shouted itself hoarse for pay.

There was no propaganda "claque" when Monteux sounded the last notes of "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" on Thursday evening; there was an outburst which meant that the public had been taken entirely unawares, that it forgot nationality, that it responded magnetically to the splendid work of the young American, who, when the audience realized his presence in a first tier box, was the recipient of renewed demonstrations. The first of these came to the work as presented by M. Monteux and his men, all of whom showed that it had not been merely "gone over," but it had had excellent and careful working out.

Difficult it is to say whether Monteux or Griffes has made a tremendous move in behalf of the much discussed "American composer." The modest young musician seems to have burst suddenly into the limelight with a spirit in his work that is thoroughly American, entirely personal, devoid of leanings and memories of other schools and, above all, with a modesty that is in itself an achievement. The beautiful atmosphere of the work with touches here and there of oriental languor, the unusual understanding of the technic of the orchestra and the instrumentation have made it clear that the ultra-modern can preach a gospel of beauty.

What a joy it is to support an orchestra that does so much for American art, and does it with the right spirit! Not because the public has come to demand it; not because it represents a sop to Cerberus, but because honestly as a widely schooled and discerning musician and artist Pierre Monteux is able to make his own conclusions concerning an orchestral score which he examines.

Jotty and Elnathan Hear Mr Montoox' Men Play Beeth Oven

How Those Fellers With the Bull-Fiddles Did Saw Wood! Apers Middy Dun Fawn Makes a Big Hit With Men From Quoddy Harbor

By "Saturday Chat" in Lowell Courier-Citizen.

As I turned into the lobby of a Boston Hotel Friday evening I detected something subtly familiar in the rolling gait of two men who were proceeding at reduced speed in the direction of the dining-room. They seemed rather out of place in urban surroundings. The backs of their necks were distinctly red.

I let out a link or two and ranged alongside. Certainty dawned. There was no mistaking the quality of the voices—voices bred of much deep breathing in the fogs of a stern and rockbound coast. The men were, to be brief, my good friend Jotham Bowden, captain, mate and foremast hand of the tiny fishing schooner Starlight, accompanied by his equally good friend, Capt Elnathan Frisbie of the good ship Comet, out of Quoddy Harbor, both men engaging when at home in the lucrative profession of calling crustaceans from the vasty deep.

They were glad to see me. Jotham, or as we usually call him, Jotty, was especially so. We arranged to dine together.

Selectmen More Particular

"We've been in town about three days," volunteered Jotty. "Friz, here, he's had to spend most of his time at Dr Payne and Pulham's havin' his molars renood. But in his loocid intervals we've done a bit of scoutin' around. They's no opery to go to these days, but we've been tryin' to act like real city folks."

I asked him if they'd been to the movies.

"Oh, sure! We tried them the first night—but you have to remember that we have 'em at home now. Our Seelectmen are a bit more chaste, I gather, than yours in Boston be. We don't get much chance to see anythin' more excitin' than 'Not Guilty, Your Honor,' in six reels.

"Friz an' me went to see somethin' called 'Enlighten Thy Wife,' or some such title, the purport of which was that what every schoolboy learns on about the second day is wholly unknown to innocent young soldiers of 19 to 24.

"Friz wanted to drag me off to another, vouched for by all the Baptist clergy as something every young college man should see, called 'Fit to Fight'—but I said I felt virtuous enough already to last my few remainin' years. So we cast about for the next best thing and found they was to be a Symphony concert.

All They Is to Know About Music

"Friz was all for goin' because his daughter that used to go to school in your town used to talk about them concerts and said they was real worth hearin'. I bellered some when I heard the tickets was well up toward what lobscers costs per pound—but they said they wa'n't no war tax on 'em so that settled us.

"We went. We're just in port from there now. And Friz has got a tune runnin' in his head whom Apers Middy Dun Fawn.

"He was trillin' it all the way down Boylston st until one of them doughboy cops told him to shut up or he'd shoot him. For the love of Mud, Friz, try to keep it still while we're in the dinin' room.

"Our seats was fully half a mile from the stage, an' we got there before the lights was turned on so that we had a hard time tryin' to read up our libretters ahead of time. Daylight savin' hasn't got anythin' on the electric light savin' propensities of the Symphony.

"We got two little books given us free gratis for nothin' by a gentlemanly usher as we walked in, encased in flesh-colored covers; and now that I've had a squint at it I'll tell the world that it's real interestin'.

I had to wait until the diamond sunburst up in the ceilin' was turned on before I could see anythin' smaller'n the black type at the top of Page One, but when I got into the thing later I found out it was by a Mr Hale, who knows all they is to know about music, and about most every other thing, too.

Interestin' Story of Beeth Oven

"First they was what they call a rooster of the band—the names, you know. I must say they read kind of like a rollcall of the 10th Legion of Von Hindenburg's army, with a platoon or two from Poland and Czecheslowcoach.

"But I understand they're all vouched for as ready an' willin' at all times to jump an' play the Star Spangled Banner on the G-string, both loud an' long, as a proof of their abidin' hatred of all things royal.

"Up back of the stage was an organ of solid gold—all pipes, so far's I could see, an' no way of playin' the thing at all. An' in front was a sort of raised affair for the musicians to set on in rows.

"Two or three of 'em was already there tootlin' away to themselves for fear they might not get it right later on. But I was so interested in readin' the program that I didn't look at 'em much.

"I'd found my specs by this time, and I'd got into a story about a German man named Beeth Oven—a real interestin' story. He was the man who writ the first piece they was to play.

"I supposed it was goin' to tell somethin' dry about the music, but it seems it didn't much. It got hold of Mr Oven sometime before the dawn of the last century an' told what trouble he had with colic.

"He tried various remedies suggested by the old ladies of the neighborhood incloodin' the essential oil of bitter almonds, hopin' they'd give relief and let him work on his new symphony, but they didn't.

"He tried cold baths, which Germans only do when they're real sick. He even drank mineral water. No use—blown up like a baloon.

"He fell in love with a girl many years his junior an' much higher in rank—but her father wouldn't listen to it. So he turned to an' wrote a symphony, in which the critics at first said the woodwind was too prominent.

Skipped the Press Gallery

"Then it told about the king of those parts, an' how he used to overwork and underpay his choir, an' how he got up at 3 in the afternoon an' breakfasted on boiled bacon, an' how he scandalized the neighbors by his Arabours.

"An' it told how the first time this piece was played, some critics said it was bad, an' others that it was worse, an' some that it was the most ridiculous thing that ever was written.

"The musicians had rehearsed it for two solid hours and the union members were just votin' to go on strike, when the local king comes in with a teawagon loaded with doughnuts and every kind of drink in the palace.

"This staved off the strike—but they made the mistake of not feedin' the press gallery, too, I judge, because one an' all the papers crabbed the show when it come off that first night at the Newandhaus.

"When I found out that Beeth Oven was as deef as a bedpost I wondered how he ever managed to write anythin' at all. It seems he was stone deef—worse'n old Aunt Sally Hackett down to Quoddy. But he evidently wrote some pretty good music, at that—and when I come to hear the thing played I concluded it was pretty harsh on poor old Beeth Oven to slam him the way those critics did.

"But I was interested to read about him, of course, because they talked just the way everybody does when it's the first time a thing's done and nobody darst say a decent thing about it for fear of bein' thought an easy mark.

"These critical fellers get my goat, anyhow. They don't like nothin'—at least not for years. It would seem as if they didn't know nothin' if they praised anybody at all.

Mr Montoox and His Band

"Now I'm frank to say that, barrin' it was too long, I liked Mr Beeth Oven's music a whole lot. But I was more interested in watchin' the feller that conducted—a man named Montoox. Friz and me saw him over in N'Yawk last Winter when we went to the opery, conductin' there. I'll say he's good.

"He could tell just when any bunch of those players was due to tune up an' indicated it by pointin' his stick at 'em. He never made one mistake the whole afternoon.

"And Lor', how those fellers in the back row with the bull-fiddles did saw wood! And how the fat little man who plays on the two sap-kettles did drum!

"Friz got to talkin' about him, until a gray-headed old professor behind us poked him with his umbrella and told him for the Lord's sake to keep still a while. Mostly people was attentive; an' when it was over they clapped quite hard. Ain't clappin' your hands a funny way to show your joy, though?

Only High-Class Jazz

"The other pieces of music was more fun for me than Beeth Oven's because they was noisier and more catchy.

"They played somethin' that Friz, who speaks Canadian French, said was called the Cussed Huntsman—who used to hun on the holy Sabbath day, much to the scandal of his village, and finally got switched off to hell where the devils hunted him up and down the slag piles. It was by Julius Caesar Frank, who didn't approve of Sunday golf an' wrote this piece to prove it.

"Then they played that thing that Friz is forever hummin'—something about the Dun Fawn—by a man named De Busy. And they was also a Spanish dance that Friz said was only high class jazz. Then we come out.

Funny Dinguses in That Band

"But say, you have to hand it to the men that writ those bits of music. Think of havin' to set the parts for somethin' like 20 different an' distinct fiddlers, tooters, drummers an' such. I got interested in seein' what they had to play on—an' believe me they must be some funny dinguses in that band, 'specially when it was modern music. It's all well enough with old Beeth Oven. He just sat down and wrote things for a dozen of God's own kind of instruments.

"But when you add a humstrum, a swinette, six baby grand pianos, two snare-drums (one interchangeable with tom-tom), a set o' cathedral chimes, three exlophones, one set of musical glasses, church organ, a celesta and one Hungarian piano played by a feller who drums on the strings—not countin' watchman's rattle and certain saxophones—you've got a real job on hand.

"They didn't have any of that stuff today, but the old chap who punched Friz with his brolly was heard to say that he'd seen most all of those things employed to give a modern characteristic piece of real American program-music. I'm goin' to come in some day when they play one of those things, because I like action.

Similar, Only High-Brow

"We used to have 'em years ago—description of a picnic on a steamboat, f'r instance—with lifelike representations of the whistle blowin', bells ringin', engine puffin', an' men stirrin' lemonade in a tub. That's what they mean by 'program music,' I gather.

"The most interestin' performer in those days was a versatile gent who sat down behind the big drum an' worked any quantity of contraptions with sandpaper on 'em, as well as the machine for representin' the cackle of hens, the deep-mouthed bray of the jackass an' the squalls of peevish children.

"I take it a symphony is jest the same, or similar, only it's high-brow. Instead of tryin' to make the audience hear the homely noises of the barnyard, the composer tries to make you think you see blue devils chasin' a distracted huntsman over the hills an' dales of Hell, or a fawn idlin' an' lally-gaggin' with demidryads under the shade of a eucalyptus bush, or in a extreme case soul vibrations suggested by thinkin' about death an' transfiguration.

"Or maybe the artist is tryin' to make you think of a wave of the ocean floodin' into a deep blue grotto. I judge he succeeds chiefly because he has an able gent to write out a story of the thing, like Mr Hale, who will tell you just what means the wave and what means the blue cavern.

"I know I got a lot more out of the Cussed Hunter after readin' what it was all about.

Wait for the Deestrict School

"First the horns toot—that means the old man is summonin' his ungodly pack of hounds. In Maine they'd have had somethin' to represent the yelpin' of the pack an' the cussin' an' swearin' of the keeper—but not so here.

"Then you hear the clamor of church bells callin' the devout. That shows you it's Sunday when everybody ought to be goin' to prayer instead of givin' the hosses a outin' in search of the offensive fox.

"Then of course there's all manner of ragin' by the violins indicatin' a mad gallop o'er the downs so free—followed by the arrival of all the Satanic host in full cry.

"The book said old man Frank who wrote the music was such a decent sort of feller that he never did know how devils would act an' therefore failed to give a convincin' reproduction of their gambols in mere musical notation. I guess that's so.

"But, after all, do any of 'em ever succeed? I doubt it—unless the book's there to tell you.

"Well, if you have to be goin' you have to, of course. But I'd like to have you come down next Summer and hear a real descriptive piece played by our village band entitled 'The Deestrict School.' It's a lot more realistic than the Dun Fawn—more humorous by a lot, an' you can spot most of the alloosions without aid. You'll come? So do!"

I left Jotty toying with a mammoth segment of lemon meringue pie and a full cup of coffee—with extra cream.

And Fritz was humming in a cautious way the opening seductive cadence of the "Apres-midi d'un Faun."

TRIBUNE
...ess: Providence, R. I.

ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR

Pierre Monteux to Continue as Head of Boston Symphony.

Boston, Mass., Jan. 24.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux, its eminent conductor, whereby he is to continue in his post during the seasons of 1920-1921 and 1921-1922. Under his inspired leadership the present season, now half over, has had a success almost without precedent, crowded audiences in this and all cities where the orchestra has visited have manifested high enthusiasm, both as regards the quality of the performances and interest of the program. It will be remembered that Mr. Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts in the autumn of 1918 for the brief period in which he could obtain his release from an existing engagement as conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House.

To hear Sergei Rachmaninoff's latest Concerto (No. 3) would be an event in itself—to hear the great composer-pianist play his own music with the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes the occasion memorable, indeed. And such is to happen at the Boston Symphony concert which will be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening. The phenomenal Russian dedicated the score to Josef Hofmann, but this tremendous music of dark, rich colorings, stinging rhythms, and many climaxes, Hofmann has never attempted. The truth is that this unheard of Concerto is so replete with its creator's unique personality and pianistic style that only Rachmaninoff himself can do it full justice.

Pierre Monteux and his men will provide further fare of interest by performing Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C-minor, which they recently played in Boston in memory of Henry Lee Higginson, the founder and sustainer of the historic organization. It has not been heard at these concerts since 1915. The closing number will be Glazounoff's Symphonic poem "Stenka Razine," built upon haunting folk songs of Russia.

REVIVE D'INDY'S SYMPHONY NO. 2

Monteux and Orchestra Brilliantly Give the Composer's Masterpiece

ENGAGE CONDUCTOR FOR TWO YEARS MORE

By PHILIP HALE

The 12th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: D'Indy, Symphony No. 2 in B flat major; Beethoven, Violin Concerto.

Vincent d'Indy's Symphony, one of the greatest achievements in symphonic music since the death of Beethoven, had not been performed at these concerts since December 1909. Hardly appreciated at first when it was produced by Mr. Gericke in 1905 and played at the end of that year under the direction of the visiting composer, its beauty, nobility, spirituality, consummate workmanship vitalized by the faith, sincerity and humanity of the composer, were at last recognized in 1909, and so fully that a second performance was given "by request" in that season. Ten years have gone by; the Symphony is still a great work, great in the breadth of conception, in the richness of dramatic material, in the wealth of interesting detail, in the masterly instrumentation.

The performance yesterday was an inspiring one. It will probably be even more elastic this evening, for the symphony is extremely treacherous in the matter of entrances and in other ways; but the performance yesterday was one in which Mr. Monteux and the orchestra may well take pride; one that would have delighted the composer, a man not easily pleased.

Mr. d'Indy in a letter to a friend writes that he has not been idle since the composition of his third Symphony, "De Bello Gallico," which was performed here last October. He has composed a symphonic suite picturing the ocean seen from various shores and under various skies; the incidental music for a drama; piano pieces and French canticles. He hopes to revisit this country next fall.

Mr. Kreisler played Beethoven's Concerto. He had already played it three times at Symphony concerts in Boston. During the last six years this concerto was played five times. It has been performed 13 times at these concerts. Is it not time to shelve it for a few seasons at least?

It would have been gracious, tactful at least, if Mr. Kreisler had chosen a concerto by Lalo or Saint-Saens, as a tribute to France, the country to which he owes so much; for, as a boy he studied at the Paris Conservatory, and at the age of 12 he received a first prize; and after his first visit to the United States in 1888, he returned to Paris for further study. But gratitude is rarely displayed even by applauded virtuosos; tact has not been for the last six years the distinguishing characteristic of Germans and Austrians at home or abroad. It may here be remarked that on the forthcoming trip of the orchestra Mr. Kreisler will play a concerto by Viotti.

The trustees of the orchestra, the members of the orchestra, and the city of Boston may well be congratulated on the re-appointment of Mr. Monteux for a term of two years. Under his leadership the orchestra, containing new members, has now remarkable technical proficiency. The personnel is brilliant; witness the ensemble yesterday: the solo passages for oboe, clarinet, bassoon, violin, viola, and especially the playing of the small trumpet by Mr. Mager. The strings sing as they have not sung since the rule of Mr. Gericke. Performances are now characterized, not only by euphony, a fine sense of proportion, clash, grandeur, but by an imaginative, poetic spirit. For Mr. Monteux is an interpreter as well as a drill-master; an interpreter of Haydn, Beethoven, Schubert, Brahms, Wagner; also fortunate in his readings of the later romantic, also the ultra-modern school. That his musical taste and sympathies are catholic, his programs show. He has given warm encouragement to deserving American composers. As a man, high minded, modest, genuine, he has won the respect of all. No merchant trafficks in his heart. Unlike certain conductors, he is not a poseur. Under his direction the technical and aesthetic future of the orchestra is secure. A change at the beginning of next season would have been fatal to the morale of the orchestra.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next week is as follows: Converse, Symphony in C-minor; Schumann, Concerto for violoncello (Jean Bedetti); Rimsky-Korsakoff, "The Russian Easter." Mr. Converse's symphony will be performed for the first time.

KREISLER HEARD AT HIS BEST

Great Violinist in Rare Mood Playing With Symphony

BY OLIN DOWNES

Two notable works, given equally notable performances, made the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, played yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall and will play again in the same hall this evening. These works were Vincent d'Indy's 2d symphony in B flat, and Beethoven's violin concerto, with Fritz Kreisler as the soloist.

15-YEAR RETROSPECT

It is easy to recall the impression which the wasterwork of d'Indy made when it was first performed in Boston by Wilhelm Gericke in 1905. It then seemed the last word in cacaphony and pedantry of the fussy and futile kind. No words were too hard for it. There was practically no applause when the performance came to an end, and reviewers who refused to be hurried into an adverse opinion on an important and unfamiliar composition were rated as partisans of d'Indy and the modern French school who do not admit that any music from these sources could be poor, bad.

For there seemed at that time no possible question of the fact that this was ugly, inept music.

Its Beauties Displayed

And what was the reception of the symphony yesterday? It was applauded to the echo. Thanks to the musical evolution of 15 years the music seemed crystal clear, in many places of sensuous beauty, full of force, fire, and noble feeling. Much was due, without doubt, to Mr. Monteux's reading. Hitherto the symphony had been heard in Boston as played by German conductors, who gave earnest and well-meant readings of a score which it is probable that they only half understood. They showed the bones of the thing, the structure, the skeleton which underlay the beautiful form, but it is now obvious that the elements of rich beauty and feeling which are so strong in this music were but presented to the hearer.

Therefore it is only to merest justice to Mr. Monteux to say that while the understanding of the audience had grown greatly in 15 years, the performance was also, in many respects and beyond doubt or peradventure, a revelation of much which had not been audible before.

A Stupendous Work

One wonders, indeed, if there has been any other great symphony to compare with this one since the symphonies of Beethoven, Brahms and Franck. In the hurried mental survey of an hour or two there are no works in this form of today to match this vast and heroic structure of d'Indy. A part of the greatness of the symphony is its logical descent from the works of the other men. A work like Debussy's "Nocturnes" or "L'Apres midi d'un Faun" opens a new land, a new era, to us. A symphony like the second symphony of d'Indy is a thing preordained by the labors and achievements of many men, great and small, rather than of one, however unique and unassailable the position in art of that one may be. It has the unity, too, thanks to its structure and workmanship, of one supremely clear, luminous, lofty thought, and the development of thought, which seems as inevitable today as some process of nature, goes hand in hand with the spiritual purpose of a master.

Kreisler's Greatest Performance

Perhaps it was the sympathetic mood established by d'Indy's symphony, perhaps it was the greeting given Mr. Kreisler by the audience, a greeting which meant profound sympathy with a man and artist unreasonably and unjustly persecuted of late, which put the violinist particularly in the vein. At any rate, he gave what impressed the writer as one of the greatest performances of his career, one which put the interpreter at the right hand of the composer, which made even the rather trivial finale of the concerto a thing to marvel at and cherish in the memory.

Of a performance by Mr. Kreisler when he is at his greatest it is futile to speak in detail. The audience was deeply moved.

A feature of this performance was the superb cadenza composed by Mr. Kreisler himself, of which the highest possible praise is that it was worthy of and wholly congruous with the rest of the concerto. Long after Mr. Kreisler had finished the audience remained in the hall applauding and calling him back to the stage. This was a memorable concert because of the music, the orchestra, the conductor and the musician-virtuoso.

KREISLER HAILED AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Reception Unparalleled in Recent Years

No soloist at the Symphony concerts in recent years has ever received an ovation comparable to that given Kreisler yesterday afternoon when he came out to play the solo part in Beethoven's Concerto. The orchestra and Mr Monteux were as demonstrative as the audience. There was prolonged applause in the single pause during the concerto, and at the end of the concert, instead of hurrying away, as usual, everyone stayed to recall Kreisler again and again. The unusual demonstration over Rachmaninoff earlier in the season was far surpassed.

Kreisler has played this concerto here several times. His performance yesterday surpassed his own previous efforts as well as those of all the others heard at these concerts in Beethoven's familiar music. There were those beforehand who regretted that Kreisler altered his original intention of playing the Brahms concerto, because "the Beethoven is played to death," as the malcontents put it.

But the Beethoven is still the finest of all concertos, and most people never tire of such music played as it was yesterday. The glories of piece and soloist are too familiar to need detailed praise. Mr Monteux and the orchestra did their part unusually well. Those who heard it will remember this performance when they come to judge others. It set an almost unattainable standard of dignity and beauty.

D'Indy's Second Symphony, the other item on yesterday's program, has not been heard here for 10 years. It far surpasses his new symphony inspired by the war, played here for the first times this season. It contains many passages of genuine nobility and beauty, but there is too much scholarship and too little genius in it.

One felt in following the lengthy analysis printed in the program that D'Indy had written an admirable illustration for his "Course in Composition" rather than continued the succession of masterpieces which still stop with Brahms' Fourth Symphony.

He has avoided the defects of Beethoven, conventional padding, lack of unity in the work as a whole, and so on. But he is a sort of critic turned composer. His judgment is excellent, his imagination limited, his erudition enormous.

Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, will play Schumann's Concerto in A minor, op 129, at the concerts next week. The other numbers are a new symphony by Mr Converse, to be played for the first times anywhere, and Rimsky Korsakoff's not too familiar overture, "The Russian Easter."

MUSIC

The Music of Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the twelfth concert of the present season on January 23. The program was:

D'Indy—Symphony in B flat major No. 2, op. 57.

Beethoven—Concerto for the violin, op. 61. Fritz Kreisler was the soloist.

D'Indy's symphony has not been played here for a little over 10 years. That a work of such beauty and significance should have been neglected for so long seems a pity. Again Mr. Monteux has given us the opportunity of acquainting ourselves with a work worthy to be ranked with the greatest masterpieces of symphonic literature. He recently performed a like service for us with Chausson's symphony. May he continue in like manner, for our education in modern music, outside Strauss and other Germans, has been sadly neglected. D'Indy's symphony is another evidence of the many-sidedness of the French school. It is of an emotional depth and expressiveness not always found in Saint-Saëns, Debussy, and others among the master Frenchmen, yet it is truly Gallic in its clarity and the logical working-out of its ideas. In this symphony d'Indy seems less restrained, less austere than in many of his other compositions; he seems to show us more of his real self. From the mysterious opening measures, through the moving pages of the adagio, to the sonorous finale, this symphony is one long line of beauty. The orchestration, always brilliant, seems to grow logically from the melodic and harmonic ideas which it clothes, never obstructing their free expression, never meretriciously attracting their attention to itself. A composer rarely climbs to such heights, to such freedom and aptness of expression. The greatness of the work inspired a great rendition of it. The orchestra has seldom played with such abandon and beauty of tone.

Mr. Kreisler's playing of the Beethoven concerto was a fitting aftermath. Only a great master in a great masterpiece could have followed such a piece. The accompaniment to the concerto was uncommonly well played. The pianissimos were of the greatest delicacy and a perfect accord reigned between soloist, conductor, and orchestra.

KREISLER IN RARE FORM AT SYMPHONY

Beethoven's Concerto in D Major Skillfully Interpreted; Orchestra Offers D'Indy

By FRED J. McISAAC.

Fritz Kreisler was soloist at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon, and the world's premier violinist gave a very beautiful performance of Beethoven's concerto in D major; that mighty work which begins with four taps of the kettledrums, like a late visitor banging upon a heavy door.

The news had leaked out that Pierre Monteux has been engaged for two years more to conduct the symphony concerts, a notable achievement for a man who was generally considered a poor choice a year ago, but who has demonstrated conclusively that he is a great conductor.

There was much enthusiasm and a veritable ovation after a brilliant performance of Vincent d'Indy's big symphony in B flat major, No. 2. This is one of the most inspired of modern symphonies, a master work full of rich and rare themes and wonderful harmonies. D'Indy wrote three symphonies, this is the middle one and the only great one.

PARK THEATRE

Another Triumph Scored By Kreisler

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

D'Indy. Symphony in B-flat. No. 2.
Beethoven. Violin Concerto.
Soloist, Fritz Kreisler.

IT has been a Kreisler week. On Sunday last, the violinist drew out the largest audience that has ever crowded Symphony Hall, and practically played two programs, for the number of his encores formed a recital in themselves.

On that occasion the Bach G-minor sonata, for violin alone, was the high-water mark, but at the Symphony concerts on Friday and Saturday, a still higher level was attained with Beethoven's violin concerto. Brahms' concerto had been announced, but in deference to the artist's wish it was changed to Beethoven's, and the change was a wise one, for the Brahms work, in spite of its high development, is not nearly as inspired a composition as the single violin concerto of Beethoven.

The first movement of the Beethoven work is something leonine in its grandeur and few can interpret its majestic power. The reviewer has two great memories of this composition, one as it was given by Wieniawaski, and the other Ysaye's interpretation when he was as his best. To these there will now be added a third—Mr. Kreisler's performance of Friday afternoon.

We always think the treatment of the four ponderous strokes of the chief figure in this a finer development than the four-noted similar figure of the fifth symphony, but it depends much upon the breadth of the solo artist. It was impossible to imagine a loftier treatment of the first movement (the gem of the work) than it received on this occasion, and the expressive tenderness of the slow movement made its due contrast.

The final movement falls off a little, as the concluding rondo does in more than one Beethoven concerto, but it was given with so much of heartiness and vigor that it fairly rivalled the first two movements (which it intrinsically does not), and it led to a furore of recognition from the great audience at its close. The cadenza of the first movement was a great display of virtuosity, but there were much greater things than technical display in this memorable performance.

Yet the construction of that cadenza must not go unrecorded; it was one of the finest specimens of technical development, and was a credit to the composer, Mr. Kreisler himself. The wildly enthusiastic reception given to Mr. Kreisler when he appeared, the applause between the movements and the dozen recalls at the end proved that Boston does not disapprove of this great artist.

D'Indy's second symphony belongs to the masterpieces, even though Boston has not heard it for ten years. It is too learned ever to become a popular work, but it would decidedly grow upon the musical auditor with repeated hearing. It brings unusual instruments into the foreground (the viola and the bass clarinette, for example) and it gives the rhythmic complexities which this master delights in.

It transfers figures from movement to movement, the introduction to the final fugue being, like Brahms' summing-up in his first symphony, a recapitulation of many preceding figures, and the fugue itself is derived from the second movement. Wonderful learning is in this finale, and the whole work shows a great contrapuntist born a little too late, for D'Indy would have been most at home in the Palestrina-Di Lasso epoch.

The first movement has all the bitterness and asceticism of which D'Indy is such a master; it seems rather made for study than for enjoyment, but it is worth studying. The second movement seems rather long for its message. In the brief third movement the chief figure is first cousin to our well-known nursery figure, "Three Blind Mice," which it treats at considerable length.

We have already intimated that the finale is brimful of contrapuntal skill, but it ends with a rousing climax chiefly upon the brasses which must appeal to every auditor. We like the first and last movements best, but why so much bitterness and why seek out such awkward, unattractive and unmanageable figures? D'Indy and Reger do this as a habit.

The work was played in a manner that does credit to M. Monteux and his orchestra. It is full of difficulties, all of which were bravely surmounted, and the intricate figure treatment was made clear to the auditor in a most careful manner. The final climax was superbly powerful. Decidedly M. Monteux is growing and his work with the orchestra is beginning to show good results.

REVIVE D'INDY'S SYMPHONY NO. 2

Monteux and Orchestra Brilliantly Give the Composer's Masterpiece

ENGAGE CONDUCTOR FOR TWO YEARS MORE

By PHILIP HALE

The 12th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: D'Indy, Symphony No. 2 in B flat major; Beethoven, Violin Concerto.

Vincent d'Indy's Symphony, one of the greatest achievements in symphonic music since the death of Beethoven, had not been performed at these concerts since December 1909. Hardly appreciated at first when it was produced by Mr. Gericke in 1905 and played at the end of that year under the direction of the visiting composer, its beauty, nobility, spirituality, consummate workmanship vitalized by the faith, sincerity and humanity of the composer, were at last recognized in 1909, and so fully that a second performance was given "by request" in that season. Ten years have gone by; the Symphony is still a great work, great in the breadth of conception, in the richness of dramatic material, in the wealth of interesting detail, in the masterly instrumentation.

The performance yesterday was an inspiring one. It will probably be even more elastic this evening, for the symphony is extremely treacherous in the matter of entrances and in other ways; but the performance yesterday was one in which Mr. Monteux and the orchestra may well take pride; one that would have delighted the composer, a man not easily pleased.

Mr. d'Indy in a letter to a friend writes that he has not been idle since the composition of his third Symphony, "De Bello Gallico," which was performed here last October. He has composed a symphonic suite picturing the ocean seen from various shores and under various skies; the incidental music for a drama; piano pieces and French canticles. He hopes to revisit this country next fall.

Mr. Kreisler played Beethoven's Concerto. He had already played it three times at Symphony concerts in Boston. During the last six years this concerto was played five times. It has been performed 18 times at these concerts. Is it not time to shelve it for a few seasons at least?

It would have been gracious, tactful at least, if Mr. Kreisler had chosen a concerto by Lalo or Saint-Saens, as a tribute to France, the country to which he owes so much; for, as a boy he studied at the Paris Conservatory, and at the age of 12 he received a first prize; and after his first visit to the United States in 1888, he returned to Paris for further study. But gratitude is rarely displayed even by applauded virtuosos; tact has not been for the last six years the distinguishing characteristic of Germans and Austrians at home or abroad. It may here be remarked that on the forthcoming trip of the orchestra Mr. Kreisler will play a concerto by Viotti.

The trustees of the orchestra, the members of the orchestra, and the city of Boston may well be congratulated on the re-appointment of Mr. Monteux for a term of two years. Under his leadership the orchestra, containing new members, has now remarkable technical proficiency. The personnel is brilliant; witness the ensemble yesterday: the solo passages for oboe, clarinet, bassoon, violin, viola, and especially the playing of the small trumpet by Mr. Mager. The strings sing as they have not sung since the rule of Mr. Gericke. Performances are now characterized, not only by euphony, a fine sense of proportion, dash, grandeur, but by an imaginative, poetic spirit. For Mr. Monteux is an interpreter as well as a drill-master; an interpreter of Haydn, Beethoven, Schubert, Brahms, Wagner; also fortunate in his readings of the later romantic, also the ultra-modern school. That his musical taste and sympathies are catholic, his programs show. He has given warm encouragement to deserving American composers. As a man, high minded, modest, genuine, he has won the respect of all. No merchant trafficks in his heart. Unlike certain conductors, he is not a poseur. Under his direction the technical and aesthetic future of the orchestra is secure. A change at the beginning of next season would have been fatal to the morale of the orchestra.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next week is as follows: Converse, Symphony in C-minor; Schumann, Concerto for violoncello (Jean Bedetti); Rimsky-Korsakoff, "The Russian Easter." Mr. Converse's symphony will be performed for the first time.

KREISLER HEARD AT HIS BEST

Great Violinist in Rare Mood Playing With Symphony

BY OLIN DOWNES

Two notable works, given equally notable performances, made the programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, played yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall and will play again in the same hall this evening. These works were Vincent d'Indy's 2d symphony in B flat, and Beethoven's violin concerto, with Fritz Kreisler as the soloist.

15-YEAR RETROSPECT

It is easy to recall the impression which the wasterwork of d'Indy made when it was first performed in Boston by Wilhelm Gericke in 1905. It then seemed the last word in cacaphony and pedantry of the fussy and futile kind. No words were too hard for it. There was practically no applause when the performance came to an end, and reviewers who refused to be hurried into an adverse opinion on an important and unfamiliar composition were rated as partisans of d'Indy and the modern French school who do not admit that any music from these sources could be poor, bad.

For there seemed at that time no possible question of the fact that this was ugly, inept music.

Its Beauties Displayed

And what was the reception of the symphony yesterday? It was applauded to the echo. Thanks to the musical evolution of 15 years the music seemed crystal clear, in many places of sensuous beauty, full of force, fire, and noble feeling. Much was due, without doubt, to Mr. Monteux's reading. Hitherto the symphony had been heard in Boston as played by German conductors, who gave earnest and well-meant readings of a score which it is probable that they only half understood. They showed the bones of the thing, the structure, the skeleton which underlay the beautiful form, but it is now obvious that the elements of rich beauty and feeling which are so strong in this music were but presented to the hearer.

Therefore it is only to merest justice to Mr. Monteux to say that while the understanding of the audience had grown greatly in 15 years, the performance was also, in many respects and beyond doubt or peradventure, a revelation of much which had not been audible before.

A Stupendous Work

One wonders, indeed, if there has been any other great symphony to compare with this one since the symphonies of Beethoven, Brahms and Franck. In the hurried mental survey of an hour or two there are no works in this form of today to match this vast and heroic structure of d'Indy. A part of the greatness of the symphony is its logical descent from the works of the other men. A work like Debussy's "Nocturnes" or "L'Apres midi d'un Faun" opens a new land, a new era, to us. A symphony like the second symphony of d'Indy is a thing preordained by the labors and achievements of many men, great and small, rather than of one, however unique and unassailable the position in art of that one may be. It has the unity, too, thanks to its structure and workmanship, of one supremely clear, luminous, lofty thought, and the development of thought, which seems as inevitable today as some process of nature, goes hand in hand with the spiritual purpose of a master.

Kreisler's Greatest Performance

Perhaps it was the sympathetic mood established by d'Indy's symphony, perhaps it was the greeting given Mr. Kreisler by the audience, a greeting which meant profound sympathy with a man and artist unreasonably and unjustly persecuted of late, which put the violinist particularly in the vein. At any rate, he gave what impressed the writer as one of the greatest performances of his career, one which put the interpreter at the right hand of the composer, which made even the rather travial finale of the concerto a thing to marvel at and cherish in the memory.

Of a performance by Mr. Kreisler when he is at his greatest it is futile to speak in detail. The audience was deeply moved.

A feature of this performance was the superb cadenza composed by Mr. Kreisler himself, of which the highest possible praise is that it was worthy of and wholly congruous with the rest of the concerto. Long after Mr. Kreisler had finished the audience remained in the hall applauding and calling him back to the stage. This was a memorable concert because of the music, the orchestra, the conductor and the musician-virtuoso.

athetique

KREISLER HAILED AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Reception Unparalleled in Recent Years

No soloist at the Symphony concerts in recent years has ever received an ovation comparable to that given Kreisler yesterday afternoon when he came out to play the solo part in Beethoven's Concerto. The orchestra and Mr Monteux were as demonstrative as the audience. There was prolonged applause in the single pause during the concerto, and at the end of the concert, instead of hurrying away, as usual, everyone stayed to recall Kreisler again and again. The unusual demonstration over Rachmaninoff earlier in the season was far surpassed.

Kreisler has played this concerto here several times. His performance yesterday surpassed his own previous efforts as well as those of all the others heard at these concerts in Beethoven's familiar music. There were those beforehand who regretted that Kreisler altered his original intention of playing the Brahms concerto, because "the Beethoven is played to death," as the malcontents put it.

But the Beethoven is still the finest of all concertos, and most people never tire of such music played as it was yesterday. The glories of piece and soloist are too familiar to need detailed praise. Mr Monteux and the orchestra did their part unusually well. Those who heard it will remember this performance when they come to judge others. It set an almost unattainable standard of dignity and beauty.

D'Indy's Second Symphony, the other item on yesterday's program, has not been heard here for 10 years. It far surpasses his new symphony inspired by the war, played here for the first times this season. It contains many passages of genuine nobility and beauty, but there is too much scholarship and too little genius in it.

One felt in following the lengthy analysis printed in the program that D'Indy had written an admirable illustration for his "Course in Composition" rather than continued the succession of masterpieces which still stop with Brahms' Fourth Symphony.

He has avoided the defects of Beethoven, conventional padding, lack of unity in the work as a whole, and so on. But he is a sort of critic turned composer. His judgment is excellent, his imagination limited, his erudition enormous.

Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, will play Schumann's Concerto in A minor, op 129, at the concerts next week. The other numbers are a new symphony by Mr Converse, to be played for the first times anywhere, and Rimsky Korsakoff's not too familiar overture, "The Russian Easter."

MUSIC

The Music of Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the twelfth concert of the present season on January 23. The program was:

D'Indy—Symphony in B flat major No. 2, op. 57.
Beethoven—Concerto for the violin, op. 61. Fritz Kreisler was the soloist.

D'Indy's symphony has not been played here for a little over 10 years. That a work of such beauty and significance should have been neglected for so long seems a pity. Again Mr. Monteux has given us the opportunity of acquainting ourselves with a work worthy to be ranked with the greatest masterpieces of symphonic literature. He recently performed a like service for us with Chausson's symphony. May he continue in like manner, for our education in modern music, outside Strauss and other Germans, has been sadly neglected. D'Indy's symphony is another evidence of the many-sidedness of the French school. It is of an emotional depth and expressiveness not always found in Saint-Saëns, Debussy, and others among the master Frenchmen, yet it is truly Gallic in its clarity and the logical working-out of its ideas. In this symphony d'Indy seems less restrained, less austere than in many of his other compositions; he seems to show us more of his real self. From the mysterious opening measures, through the moving pages of the adagio, to the sonorous finale, this symphony is one long line of beauty. The orchestration, always brilliant, seems to grow logically from the melodic and harmonic ideas which it clothes, never obstructiing their free expression, never meretriciously attracting their attention to itself. A composer rarely climbs to such heights, to such freedom and aptness of expression. The greatness of the work inspired a great rendition of it. The orchestra has seldom played with such abandon and beauty of tone.

Mr. Kreisler's playing of the Beethoven concerto was a fitting aftermath. Only a great master in a great masterpiece could have followed such a piece. The accompaniment to the concerto was uncommonly well played. The pianissimos were of the greatest delicacy and a perfect accord reigned between soloist, conductor, and orchestra.

KREISLER IN RARE FORM AT SYMPHONY

Beethoven's Concerto in D Major Skillfully Interpreted; Orchestra Offers D'Indy

By FRED J. McISAAC.

Fritz Kreisler was soloist at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon, and the world's premier violinist gave a very beautiful performance of Beethoven's concerto in D major; that mighty work which begins with four taps of the kettledrums, like a late visitor banging upon a heavy door.

The news had leaked out that Pierre Monteux has been engaged for two years more to conduct the symphony concerts, a notable achievement for a man who was generally considered a poor choice a year ago, but who has demonstrated conclusively that he is a great conductor.

There was much enthusiasm and a veritable ovation after a brilliant performance of Vincent d'Indy's big symphony in B flat major, No. 2. This is one of the most inspired of modern symphonies, a master work full of rich and rare themes and wonderful harmonies. D'Indy wrote three symphonies, this is the middle one and the only great one.

PARK THEATRE

Another Triumph Scored By Kreisler

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

D'Indy. Symphony in B-flat. No. 2.
Beethoven. Violin Concerto.
Soloist, Fritz Kreisler.

IT has been a Kreisler week. On Sunday last, the violinist drew out the largest audience that has ever crowded Symphony Hall, and practically played two programs, for the number of his encores formed a recital in themselves.

On that occasion the Bach G-minor sonata, for violin alone, was the high-water mark, but at the Symphony concerts on Friday and Saturday, a still higher level was attained with Beethoven's violin concerto. Brahms' concerto had been announced, but in deference to the artist's wish it was changed to Beethoven's, and the change was a wise one, for the Brahms work, in spite of its high development, is not nearly as inspired a composition as the single violin concerto of Beethoven.

The first movement of the Beethoven work is something leonine in its grandeur and few can interpret its majestic power. The reviewer has two great memories of this composition, one as it was given by Wieniawaski, and the other Ysaye's interpretation when he was as his best. To these there will now be added a third—Mr. Kreisler's performance of Friday afternoon.

We always think the treatment of the four ponderous strokes of the chief figure in this a finer development than the four-noted similar figure of the fifth symphony, but it depends much upon the breadth of the solo artist. It was impossible to imagine a loftier treatment of the first movement (the gem of the work) than it received on this occasion, and the expressive tenderness of the slow movement made its due contrast.

The final movement falls off a little, as the concluding rondo does in more than one Beethoven concerto, but it was given with so much of heartiness and vigor that it fairly rivalled the first two movements (which it intrinsically does not), and it led to a furore of recognition from the great audience at its close. The cadenza of the first movement was a great display of virtuosity, but there were much greater things than technical display in this memorable performance.

Yet the construction of that cadenza must not go unrecorded; it was one of the finest specimens of technical development, and was a credit to the composer, Mr. Kreisler himself. The wildly enthusiastic reception given to Mr. Kreisler when he appeared, the applause between the movements and the dozen recalls at the end proved that Boston does not disapprove of this great artist.

D'Indy's second symphony belongs to the masterpieces, even though Boston has not heard it for ten years. It is too learned ever to become a popular work, but it would decidedly grow upon the musical auditor with repeated hearing. It brings unusual instruments into the foreground (the viola and the bass clarinette, for example) and it gives the rhythmic complexities which this master delights in.

It transfers fig[illegible] to movement, the in[illegible] final fugue being, like B[illegible] up in his first sym[illegible] tion of many preceding [illegible] fugue itself is derived f[illegible] movement. Wonderful [illegible] this finale, and the [illegible] a great contrapuntist [illegible] late, for D'Indy would [illegible] at home in the [illegible] epoch.

The first movement has all the bitterness and asceticism of which D'Indy is such a master; it seems [illegible] for study than for enjoyment, [illegible] worth studying. The second [illegible] seems rather long for its [illegible] the brief third movement [illegible] ure is first cousin to our [illegible] nursery figure, "Three Blind Mice," which it treats at considerable length.

We have already intimated that the finale is brimful of contrapuntal skill, but it ends with a rousing climax chiefly upon the brasses which must appeal to every auditor. We like the first and last movements best, but why so much bitterness and why seek out such awkward, unattractive and unmanageable figures? D'Indy and Reger do this as a habit.

The work was played in a manner that does credit to M. Monteux and his orchestra. It is full of difficulties, all of which were bravely surmounted, and the intricate figure treatment was made clear to the auditor in a most careful manner. The final climax was superbly powerful. Decidedly M. Monteux is growing and his work with the orchestra is beginning to show good results.

Symphony Concert

SYMPHONY CONCERT

KREISLER AND D'INDY DIVIDE A PROGRAMME

Again the Violinist Repeats Beethoven's Hackneyed Concerto in Super-Refined Performance — The Parisian's Masterpiece of Modern Symphonies Played with Signal Eloquence — The Heights and Depths of a Marvellous Music

THROUGH forty-five minutes of the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon, Mr. Kreisler played the solo part in Beethoven's Concerto for violin and orchestra. He was playing it for the seventh time "at these concerts;" while other violinists, choosing the piece and winning the conductor's sanction for it, have played it so often that it has come almost to annual repetition at Symphony Hall. As memory recalls the last ten years of the Symphony Concerts, no other number has been heard so frequently—not even the symphonic masterpieces of Beethoven himself or the high-placed modern symphonies, say of Franck or Brahms. Now, in the ordinary course of a season, the public of the Symphony Orchestra hears only three or at most four Concertos for violin. Bach and Mozart wrote them; Mendelssohn, Bruch, Goldmark, Dvořák, Brahms, Chaikovsky wrote them; so also did Saint-Saëns, Lalo, Weingartner, Elgar—to say nothing of many a minor composer. Some of these Concertos have not been played for years at Symphony Hall; not a few have never been played there; yet nearly all of them have recognized place in the "standard repertory" of violinists.

Why, then, should one-third of all the music for violin and orchestra that Bostonians hear in a season at the Symphony Concerts be Beethoven's Concerto? It is no "master-work," like some of his symphonies and overtures. It is merely an agreeable, displayful, melodious and ornamental piece written to oblige a friend who happened to be a virtuoso of the violin. The orchestral interludes are admittedly old-fashioned and tedious; not a little of the "passage-work" in the first movement owes what little interest it may kindle to the tone and the skill of the playing violinist; by his rhythmic verve the nearly endless returns of the motivs in the final rondo afford what entertainment they may. The Concerto, however, is altogether "grateful" to virtuosi; to them it is a test-piece "enskyed and sainted"; it is their custom to assume that it is equally "grateful" to any and all hearers; whereas an appreciable number of them at symphony concerts, not only in this town but elsewhere, are frankly and justly weary of it. Yet still the violinists insist. Mr. Kreisler proposed it to Mr. Monteux for the programme of yesterday and today. The conductor wisely and firmly preferred the Concerto of Brahms not lately played in Boston, unheard here from Mr. Kreisler since 1905, undertaken by him only a few weeks ago with the Philadelphia Orchestra. Mr. Kreisler assented—and pined for his flesh-pots of Egypt; dissented—and finally prevailed. Now it is his custom to profess a lofty loyalty to the art that he practises; while beyond peradventure no violinist of the hour enjoys greater prestige with American audiences. Whatever Concerto he elected to revive or produce the public of Symphony Hall would hear gladly. And for the seventh and the eighth times in Boston he plays this hackneyed piece by Beethoven and for near the sixtieth time, perhaps for more than the sixtieth, it stands on a programme of the Symphony Orchestra!

Of course Mr. Kreisler played the solo part with superlative elegance of delicately shaded and adroitly propelled tone, with exquisite niceties of inflection, transition and euphony to the orchestral voice, with every refinement and subtlety of his present manner. Of course also, the sensitive and observant Monteux took cue from him with the orchestra. Much of the music is neither more nor less than embroidery, as through the middle movement, and Mr. Kreisler laid it upon the ear like the finest-lined and the most transparent lace-work in tones. Not a little more of it, like the arabesques of the first division, he chiselled as a goldsmith of the Renaissance adorning a cup for cardinal or prince, as a cutter of cameos achieving a brooch of ideal fineness and softness of contour for some loved courtesan of old Athens or pagan Alexandria. The rhythms of sun-kissed dust flying in the air could hardly be lighter than Mr. Kreisler's in the returns of that relentless rondo. It is hard to believe that the tone of the violin may be reduced to a mere thread than he spun and yet hold unbroken and audible; that it may wear softer silken lustres; that it may be more suavely and artfully inflected by touch upon bow and fret light as the fall of a hair. The most perfect of miniature-painting in tones was Mr. Kreisler's playing of the Concerto; refinement upon super-refinement may not farther go; while the music—for the violinist has astute sense of style—well bears such treatment. As the audience at his coming had applauded him in long and high rapture, so it listened and renewed its plaudits. Let only a few unrepentant, unredeemable outlaws confess to each other in their holes and corners that they were equally bored by both piece and performance. Once upon a time, there was a little boy who hid himself behind a bush in the garden and loudly repeated low, vulgar words because he was so sick of super-refinement.

The other half of the concert—a very different and much more exhilarating matter—fell to Mr. d'Indy's second symphony, unheard "at these concerts" since 1900, when it was played four times in a single season under Mr. Fiedler. Mr. Monteux was evidently on his mettle with the music and had kindled the orchestra to equal zest. Sedulous and warm-spirited on the part of both had obviously been the preparation, with outcome in a performance scaling no mean heights of beauty and of power, mingling large eloquence and sensitive detail, as luminous of progress as it was exalted of voice. From first measure to last Mr. d'Indy writes a lucid music; the tonal tracery upon the main stem of the symphony stands as clear as the carvings upon a Gothic cathedral in bright air and light. Throughout, Mr. Monteux shared and sustained this lucidity. From first measure to last Mr. d'Indy writes a manifold but a steadily expanding, deepening, cumulative music, until the germs of motivs in the darkling introduction have swelled into the triumphal chant of the end. Throughout, Mr. Monteux, perceived, felt, achieved this progress.

Mr. d'Indy has enriched the symphony with many passages of lovely or of pungent detail; he has lavished upon it—his masterpiece in symphonic music—his imaginative invention, his spontaneous or meditated resource with harmonic color, his vivid play of instrumental voices. He has woven these decorative periods into the very body of his great tapestry in tones; he has laid this texture upon it. As he wrote in these things, so Mr. Monteux and many an individual virtuoso or choir of the orchestra gave voice and spirit to what were otherwise but notes upon the page. Mr. d'Indy has infused a proud and direct intensity into the music, whether it speaks low and soft or high and full. The conductor so deepened so sharpened the orchestral tones. The symphony summons and sustains a superb fervor of mood and exaltation of emotion. From the outset Mr. Monteux compassed them; to the close he sustained them. Not before in Boston has he seemed a conductor of such high attributes of mind and spirit or his controlling and quickening hand answered so plastically thereto. The orchestra, laid under manifold exaction, could hardly have been a more ready and responsive instrument. Tonal splendor, a heat of the mind, a passion of the spirit, went hand in hand through the performance.

For the student of the score, hour after hour upon the piano or the work-table, for the listener in the concert-hall of acutest ear and prenaturally carrying and discriminating mind, are the wondrous germination, evolution, interplay and repetition of the motivs, primary and secondary, wherewith Mr., d'Indy develops his symphony; the marvellous use, to unify and advance the music, of what the elder pedagogues and analysts would have called merely transitional and incidential figures. For the study, likewise, and for a dimly discerning few in the concert-hall is the masterly workmanship, say, of the fugue of the finale, of the introduction to the first movement of the fantastically rhythmed Scherzo. In no music-making of our time, not even in Strauss's tone-poems, is there such exhibition of intellectual resource and prowess, of craftmanship of the mind as well as of the hand. Again for the keenly sensitive ear, for the finely touched fancy behind is much of the beauty and the suggestion of Mr. d'Indy's harmonic and instrumental coloring—his imagination, for example, with harps so that their voice shall seem as both sound and light, the pulsing depths of tone that he draws from the darker strings, the backgrounds, sombre with tonal shadow or quivering with tonal luminosity that he weaves. Of such, also are modulations and progressions like to darts of imagination upon the thrilled senses. As quick and deep of impression are the wielding of tonal masses that fills the close of the symphony or the tossing of tonal tumults that ends the first movement or—at the other extreme—such beauty as that which clothes the song of the viola at the outset of the third division. Possibly, too, only those whose minds are both logical and architectural may know to the full the expanding unity of design, the unwavering justice of proportion in which the symphony unfolds and ascends from the first pregnant measure to the final period fulfilled.

Yet even those who do but listen casually in the concert-hall must, unless their minds are as impenetrable as stones and their emotions as shallow as a puddle, feel something of the might and magnificence, the fervor and exaltation, the dramatic progress, the spiritual fire of this masterpiece among the symphonies of our time. For what is it in the manifold and pervading conflict of two sharply characterized and differentiated motivs than the eternal conflict between the principle of light and the principle of darkness? Out of the sombre introduction rumbles the motiv which is relatively formless, black and evil. A flute leaps and the second, brighter, warmer, sharper-set motiv springs into being. Thenceforth the music, with a few pauses as in breathless repose, is the far-flung battle of the two motivs and the forces, sombre or radiant, that they engender until at last light conquers and smothers darkness in the majestic sweep of the finale. The conflict is tumultuous in the first movement, as of action; more contemplative in the second, as of meditation, rising into resolute glow; ardent, almost fantastic, in the third, as with a kind of gayety of the mind; conducted with the whole forces of the intellect and the spirit through the fourth.

Behold, then, a symphony that is a veritable marvel of structure and progress, that teems with beauties of texture and of voice, that is manifold and exhaustless of substance, that is all with spiritual impulse and warm with noble fervors; that into a drama in tones embodies the everlasting conflict between light and darkness in the soul of man and by faith, which is faculty of both the intellect and the imagination, bears it to full-throated victory. . . . It was the fashion of the seventies and the eighties to salute the first symphony of Brahms as the tenth in the great line that halted at the ninth of Beethoven. The truer tenth, by twenty titles, is this second symphony of Vincent d'Indy. As some with a faith like to his would believe, our children and our children's children will sit in admiration before it.

H. T. PARKER

Herald Jan 25

JEAN BEDETTI

The eminent violoncellist, Jean Bedetti, who came from Europe last autumn to lead the 'cello section of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be heard as soloist for the first time in Symphony Hall at the Symphony concerts of Friday and Saturday. His beautiful tone and consummate skill have already been discernible. Taking first prize at the Paris Conservatory in 1902, he played in several chamber music ensembles, and in 1904 became first 'cellist of the Opera Comique orchestra. In 1908 he undertook additional duties in the Colonne orchestra, where he played also as first 'cellist, under three conductors, Colonne, Pierne and Monteux. As a virtuoso apart from any organization he became particularly famous. He gave recitals in a number of French cities, also in Spain, Belgium, Switzerland and England. His musical career was interrupted by the war. Called out in the mobilization of Aug. 2, 1914, he served actively at the front for 18 months.

Trans. Jan 24

THE outstanding item upon Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening is Mr. Converse's new symphony, to be played for the first times anywhere—the first likewise that he has written. It begins in the key of C minor; from an "Adagio Misterioso" it runs in the conventional order of the orthodox four movements through a "fiery and a martial" finale. In the course of next week more particulars of an interesting and characteristic music will be printed in this place. The other two numbers on the conductor's list are Schumann's seldom heard concerto for violoncello, in which Mr. Bedetti, the able first 'cellist of the orchestra, will play the solo part; and Rimsky-Korsakov's full-voiced overture, "Russian Easter," built upon liturgical music of the Greek church.

On Thursday afternoon at four o'clock, in Symphony Hall, befalls the first of the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for young people, for which every disposable place has already been taken by the youth of the schools in Boston and the suburban ring. The concert will continue for an hour, divided between Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, Beethoven's overture to Goethe's play, "Egmont," and a suite of dances from Delibes's ballet, "Sylvia." Auspiciously does the orchestra begin a new venture that should pleasure a present, and develop a future, public for its concerts.

Globe Jan 25

The eminent French 'cellist, Jean Bedetti, who came from Europe last Autumn, to lead the 'cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard as soloist for the first time in Symphony Hall, at the concerts of Friday and Saturday. Taking first prize at the Paris Conservatory in 1902, he played in several chamber music ensembles, and in 1904 became first 'cellist in the Opera Comique Orchestra.

In 1908 he undertook additional duties in the Colonne Orchestra, where he played as first 'cellist under three conductors, Colonne, Pierne and Monteux. As a virtuoso, apart from any organization, he gave his own recitals in a number of French cities, also in Spain, Belgium, Switzerland and England. His musical career was interrupted by the war. Called out in the mobilization of Aug 2, 1914, he served actively at the front for 18 months.

Thursday at 4: Boston Symphony Orchestra, first concert for young people. Schubert, Symphony in B flat "Unfinished"; Beethoven, Overture to Egmont; Delibes, suite from "Sylvia"; Pierre Monteux will conduct. This concert was sold out in advance of public sale. No tickets are now procurable.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8: Boston Symphony Orchestra, 13th program. Converse, Symphony in C minor, first performances; Schumann, Concerto in A minor for violoncello and orchestra; Rimsky-Korsakoff, "The Russian Easter." Soloist, Jean Bedetti.

JORDAN HALL, Tuesday, at 8:15.

Advertiser Jan 25

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Jean Bedetti, one of the finest violoncellists France has produced, who came to this country at the beginning of the season to lead the 'cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist at the symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday, playing Schumann's 'Cello Concerto in A Minor. A new symphony by Frederick Converse, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Russian Easter," are also on the program.

AT SYMPHONY HALL

JEAN BEDETTI, VIOLONCELLIST, IN SYMPHONY CONCERTS THIS WEEK

ument to detect a maid, the great scene | ure theatres of a partial eclipse of

OLIN DOWNES

JEAN BEDETTI TO PLAY HERE

Jean Bedetti

Boston Post Sun. Jan. 25

BEDETTI SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Jean Bedetti, who came to this country at the beginning of the season to lead the 'cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist at the symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday, playing Schumann's 'Cello Concerto in A minor. At the same concerts a new Symphony in C minor by Frederick Converse, the noted American composer, will have its first public performance under the guidance of Pierre Monteux. The closing number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's Overture, "The Russian Easter," built upon themes of the Russian church. During the week which follows these concerts the orchestra will travel in the near South.

The eminent French violincellist, Jean Bedetti, who came from Europe last autumn to lead the golden-toned 'cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard as soloist for the first time in Symphony Hall at the symphony concerts of Friday and Saturday. Mr. Bedetti's beautiful tone and his consummate skill with his instrument has certainly already been discernible. Taking first prize at the Paris Conservatory in 1902, he played in several chamber ensembles, and in 1904 became first 'cellist in the Opera Comique Orchestra. In 1908 he undertook additional duties in the Colonne Orchestra, where he played also as first 'cellist under three conductors—Colonne, Pierne and Monteux. As a virtuoso apart from any organization, he became particularly famous and gave his own recitals in a number of French cities, also in Spain, Belgium, Switzerland and England. His musical career was interrupted by the war. Called out in the mobilization of Aug. 2, 1914, he served actively at the front for 18 months.

Symphony Concert

SYMPHONY CONCERT

KREISLER AND D'INDY DIVIDE A PROGRAMME

Again the Violinist Repeats Beethoven's Hackneyed Concerto in Super-Refined Performance — The Parisian's Masterpiece of Modern Symphonies Played with Signal Eloquence — The Heights and Depths of a Marvellous Music

THROUGH forty-five minutes of the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon, Mr. Kreisler played the solo part in Beethoven's Concerto for violin and orchestra. He was playing it for the seventh time "at these concerts" while other violinists, choosing the same and winning the conductor's sanction for it, have played it so often that it has come almost to annual repetition at Symphony Hall. As memory recalls the last ten years of the Symphony Concerts, no other number has been heard so frequently—not even the symphonic masterpieces of Beethoven himself or the high-placed modern symphonies, say of Franck or Brahms. Now, in the ordinary course of a season, the public of the Symphony Orchestra hears only three or at most four Concertos for violin. Bach and Mozart wrote them; Mendelssohn, Bruch, Goldmark, Dvorák, Brahms, Chaikovsky wrote them; so also did Saint-Saëns, Lalo, Weingartner, Elgar—to say nothing of many a minor composer. Some of these Concertos have not been played for years at Symphony Hall; not a few have never been played there; yet nearly all of them have recognized place in the "standard repertory" of violinists.

Why, then, should one-third of all the music for violin and orchestra that Bostonians hear in a season at the Symphony Concerts be Beethoven's Concerto? It is no "master-work," like some of his symphonies and overtures. It is merely an agreeable, displayful, melodious and ornamental piece written to oblige a friend who happened to be a virtuoso of the violin. The orchestral interludes are admittedly old-fashioned and tedious; not a little of the "passage-work" in the first movement owes what little interest it may kindle to the tone and the skill of the playing violinist; by his rhythmic verve the nearly endless returns of the motivs in the final rondo afford what entertainment they may. The Concerto, however, is altogether "grateful" to virtuosi; to them it is a test-piece "enskyed and sainted"; it is their custom to assume that it is equally "grateful" to any and all hearers; whereas an appreciable number of them at symphony concerts, not only in this town but elsewhere, are frankly and justly weary of it. Yet still the violinists insist. Mr. Kreisler proposed it to Mr. Monteux for the programme of yesterday and today. The conductor wisely and firmly preferred the Concerto of Brahms not lately played in Boston, unheard here from Mr. Kreisler since 1905, undertaken by him only a few weeks ago with the Philadelphia Orchestra. Mr. Kreisler assented—and pined for his flesh-pots of Egypt; dissented—and finally prevailed. Now it is his custom to profess a lofty loyalty to the art that he practises; while beyond peradventure no violinist of the hour enjoys greater prestige with American audiences. Whatever Concerto he elected to revive or produce the public of Symphony Hall would hear gladly. And for the seventh and the eighth times in Boston he plays this hackneyed piece by Beethoven and for near the sixtieth time, perhaps for more than the sixtieth, it stands on a programme of the Symphony Orchestra!

Of course Mr. Kreisler played the solo part with superlative elegance of delicately shaded and adroitly propelled tone, with exquisite niceties of inflection, transition and euphony to the orchestral voices with every refinement and subtlety of his present manner. Of course also, the sensitive and observant Monteux took cue from him with the orchestra. Much of the music is neither more nor less than embroidery, as through the middle movement, and Mr. Kreisler laid it upon the ear like the finest-lined and the most transparent lace-work in tones. Not a little more of it, like the arabesques of the first division, he chiseled as a goldsmith of the Renaissance adorning a cup for cardinal or prince, as a cutter of cameos achieving a brooch of ideal fineness and softness of contour for some loved courtesan of old Athens or pagan Alexandria. The rhythms of sun-kissed dust flying in the air could hardly be lighter than Mr. Kreisler's in the returns of that relentless rondo. It is hard to believe that the tone of the violin may be refined even further and than he spun and yet hold under ken and audible; that it may wear softer silken lustres; that it may be more suavely and artfully inflected by touch upon bow and fret light as the fall of a hair. The most perfect of miniature-painting in tones was Mr. Kreisler's playing of the Concerto; refinement upon super-refinement may not farther go; while the music—for the violinist has astute sense of style—well bears such treatment. As the audience at his coming had applauded him in long and high rapture, so it listened and renewed its plaudits. Let only a few unrepentant, unredeemable outlaws confess to each other in their holes and corners that they were equally bored by both piece and performance. Once upon a time, there was a little boy who hid himself behind a bush in the garden and loudly repeated low, vulgar words because he was so sick of super-refinement.

The other half of the concert—a very different and much more exhilarating matter—fell to Mr. d'Indy's second symphony, unheard "at these concerts" since 1900, when it was played four times in a single season under Mr. Fiedler. Mr. Monteux was evidently on his mettle with the music and had kindled the orchestra to equal zest. Sedulous and warm-spirited on the part of both had obviously been the preparation, with outcome in a performance scaling no mean heights of beauty and of power, mingling large eloquence and sensitive detail, as luminous of progress as it was exalted of voice. From first measure to last Mr. d'Indy writes a lucid music; the tonal tracery upon the main stem of the symphony stands as clear as the carvings upon a Gothic cathedral in bright air and light. Throughout, Mr. Monteux shared and sustained this lucidity. From first measure to last Mr. d'Indy writes a manifold but a steadily expanding, deepening, cumulative music, until the germs of motivs in the darkling introduction have swelled into the triumphal chant of the end. Throughout, Mr. Monteux, perceived, felt, achieved this progress.

Mr. d'Indy has enriched the symphony with many passages of lovely or of pungent detail; he has lavished upon it—his masterpiece in symphonic music—his imaginative invention, his spontaneous or meditated resource with harmonic color, his vivid play of instrumental voices. He has woven these decorative periods into the very body of his great tapestry in tones; he has laid this texture upon it. As he wrote in these things, so Mr. Monteux and many an individual virtuoso or choir of the orchestra gave voice and spirit to what were otherwise but notes upon the page. Mr. d'Indy has infused a proud and direct intensity into the music, whether it speaks low and soft or high and full. The conductor so deepened so sharpened the orchestral tones. The symphony summons and sustains a superb fervor of mood and exaltation of emotion. From the outset Mr. Monteux compassed them; to the close he sustained them. Not before in Boston has he seemed a conductor of such high attributes of mind and spirit or his controlling and quickening hand answered so plastically thereto. The orchestra, laid under manifold exaction, could hardly have been a more ready and responsive instrument. Tonal splendor, a heat of the mind, a passion of the spirit, went hand in hand through the performance.

For the student of the score, hour after hour upon the piano or the work-table, for the listener in the concert-hall of acutest ear and prenaturally carrying and discriminating mind, are the wondrous germination, evolution, interplay and repetition of the motivs, primary and secondary, wherewith Mr. d'Indy develops his symphony; the marvellous use, to unify and advance the music, of what the elder pedagogues and analysts would have called merely transitional and incidental figures. For the study, likewise, and for a dimly discerning few in the concert-hall is the masterly workmanship, say, of the fugue of the finale, of the introduction to the first movement of the fantastically rhythmed Scherzo. In no music-making of our time, not even in Strauss's tone-poems, is there such exhibition of intellectual resource and prowess, of craftmanship of the mind as well as of the hand. Again for the keenly sensitive ear, for the finely touched fancy behind is much of the beauty and the suggestion of Mr. d'Indy's harmonic and instrumental coloring—his imagination, for example, with harps so that their voice shall seem as both sound and light, the pulsing depths of tone that he draws from the darker strings, the backgrounds, sombre with tonal shadow or quivering with tonal luminosity that he weaves. Of such, also are modulations and progressions like to darts of imagination upon the thrilled senses. As quick and deep of impression are the wielding of tonal masses that fills the close of the symphony or the tossing of tonal tumults that ends the first movement or—at the other extreme—such beauty as that which clothes the song of the viola at the outset of the third division. Possibly, too, only those whose minds are both logical and architectural may know to the full the expanding unity of design, the unwavering justice of proportion in which the symphony unfolds and ascends from the first pregnant measure to the final period fulfilled.

Yet even those who do but listen casually in the concert-hall must, unless their minds are as impenetrable as stones and their emotions as shallow as a puddle, feel something of the might and magnificence, the fervor and exaltation, the dramatic progress, the spiritual fire of this masterpiece among the symphonies of our time. For what is it in the manifold and pervading conflict of two sharply characterized and differentiated motivs than the eternal conflict between the principle of light and the principle of darkness? Out of the sombre introduction rumbles the motiv which is relatively formless, black and evil. A flute leaps and the second, brighter, warmer, sharper-set motiv springs into being. Thenceforth the music, with a few pauses as in breathless repose, is the far-flung battle of the two motivs and the forces, sombre or radiant, that they engender until at last light conquers and smothers darkness in the majestic sweep of the finale. The conflict is tumultuous in the first movement, as of action; more contemplative in the second, as of meditation, rising into resolute glow; ardent, almost fantastic, in the third, as with a kind of gayety of the mind; conducted with the whole forces of the intellect and the spirit through the fourth.

Behold, then, a symphony that is a veritable marvel of structure and progress, that teems with beauties of texture and of voice, that is massive, yet exhaustless of substance, that is alive with spiritual impulse and warm with noble fervors; that into a drama in tones embodies the everlasting conflict between light and darkness in the soul of man and by faith, which is faculty of both the intellect and the imagination, bears it to full-throated victory. . . . It was the fashion of the seventies and the eighties to salute the first symphony of Brahms as the tenth in the great line that halted at the ninth of Beethoven. The truer tenth, by twenty titles, is this second symphony of Vincent d'Indy. As some with a faith like to his would believe, our children and our children's children will sit in admiration before it.

H. T. PARKER

Herald Jan 25

JEAN BEDETTI

The eminent violoncellist, Jean Bedetti, who came from Europe last autumn to lead the 'cello section of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be heard as soloist for the first time in Symphony Hall at the Symphony concerts of Friday and Saturday. His beautiful tone and consummate skill have already been discernible. Taking first prize at the Paris Conservatory in 1902, he played in several chamber music ensembles and in 1904 became first 'cellist of the Opera Comique orchestra. In 1908 he undertook additional duties in the Colonne orchestra, where he played also as first 'cellist, under three conductors, Colonne, Pierne and Monteux. As a virtuoso apart from any organization he became particularly famous. He gave recitals in a number of French cities, also in Spain, Belgium, Switzerland and England. His musical career was interrupted by the war. Called out in the mobilization of Aug. 2, 1914, he served actively at the front for 18 months.

Trans. Jan 24

THE outstanding item upon Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening is Mr. Converse's new symphony, to be played for the first times anywhere—the first likewise that he has written. It begins in the key of C minor; from an "Adagio Misterioso" it runs in the conventional order of the orthodox four movements through a "fiery and a martial" finale. In the course of next week more particulars of an interesting and characteristic music will be printed in this place. The other two numbers on the conductor's list are Schumann's seldom heard concerto for violoncello, in which Mr. Bedetti, the able first 'cellist of the orchestra, will play the solo part; and Rimsky-Korsakov's full-voiced overture, "Russian Easter," built upon liturgical music of the Greek church.

On Thursday afternoon at four o'clock, in Symphony Hall, befalls the first of the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for young people, for which every disposable place has already been taken by the youth of the schools in Boston and the suburban ring. The concert will continue for an hour, divided between Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, Beethoven's overture to Goethe's play, "Egmont," and a suite of dances from Delibes's ballet, "Sylvia." Auspiciously does the orchestra begin a new venture that should pleasure a present, and develop a future, public for its concerts.

Globe Jan 25

The eminent French 'cellist, Jean Bedetti, who came from Europe last Autumn, to lead the 'cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard as soloist for the first time in Symphony Hall, at the concerts of Friday and Saturday. Taking first prize at the Paris Conservatory in 1902, he played in several chamber music ensembles, and in 1904 became first 'cellist in the Opera Comique Orchestra.

In 1908 he undertook additional duties in the Colonne Orchestra, where he played as first 'cellist under three conductors, Colonne, Pierne and Monteux. As a virtuoso, apart from any organization, he gave his own recitals in a number of French cities, also in Spain, Belgium, Switzerland and England. His musical career was interrupted by the war. Called out in the mobilization of Aug 2, 1914, he served actively at the front for 18 months.

Thursday at 4: Boston Symphony Orchestra, first concert for young people. Schubert, Symphony in B flat "Unfinished"; Beethoven, Overture to Egmont; Delibes, suite from "Sylvia"; Pierre Monteux will conduct. This concert was sold out in advance of public sale. No tickets are now procurable.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8: Boston Symphony Orchestra, 13th program. Converse, Symphony in C minor, first performances; Schumann, Concerto in A minor for violoncello and orchestra; Rimsky-Korsakoff, "The Russian Easter." Soloist, Jean Bedetti.

JORDAN HALL, Tuesday, at 8:15

Advertiser Jan 25

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Jean Bedetti, one of the finest violoncellists France has produced, who came to this country at the beginning of the season to lead the 'cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist at the symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday, playing Schumann's 'Cello Concerto in A Minor. A new symphony by Frederick Converse, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Russian Easter," are also on the program.

AT SYMPHONY HALL

JEAN BEDETTI, VIOLONCELLIST, IN SYMPHONY CONCERTS THIS WEEK

ument to detect a maid, the great scene ure theatres of a partial eclipse of

OLIN DOWNES

JEAN BEDETTI TO PLAY HERE

Jean Bedetti

Boston Post Jan. Jan. 25

BEDETTI SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Jean Bedetti, who came to this country at the beginning of the season to lead the 'cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist at the symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday, playing Schumann's 'Cello Concerto in A minor. At the same concerts a new Symphony in C minor by Frederick Converse, the noted American composer, will have its first public performance under the guidance of Pierre Monteux. The closing number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's Overture, "The Russian Easter," built upon themes of the Russian church. During the week which follows these concerts the orchestra will travel in the near South.

The eminent French violincellist, Jean Bedetti, who came from Europe last autumn to lead the golden-toned 'cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard as soloist for the first time in Symphony Hall at the symphony concerts of Friday and Saturday. Mr. Bedetti's beautiful tone and his consummate skill with his instrument has certainly already been discernible. Taking first prize at the Paris Conservatory in 1902, he played in several chamber ensemblies, and in 1904 became first 'cellist in the Opera Comique Orchestra. In 1908 he undertook additional duties in the Colonne Orchestra, where he played also as first 'cellist under three conductors—Colonne, Pierne and Monteux. As a virtuoso apart from any organization, he became particularly famous and gave his own recitals in a number of French cities, also in Spain, Belgium, Switzerland and England. His musical career was interrupted by the war. Called out in the mobilization of Aug. 2, 1914, he served actively at the front for 18 months.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Music

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

THE GRIST OF WEEK-END MUSIC HARVESTED

Mr. Kreisler as Changed Man and Changed Musician—A Plausible Explanation—Choral Pieces and Notable Singers to Glorify Them — The Fanciful Griffes and the Expert Reuter — The Fokines to Dance in Boston — Programmes in Prospect

As Mr. Kreisler returns from concert to concert in Boston, the change in the aspect of the man and in the playing of the musician become more noticeable. His hair has grizzled in the ordinary course of the years; but few men in the early forties wear so worn a face as the violinist now turns toward his hearers. His figure, too, has lost something of the easy, animated carriage, the erect poise, of old. It slackens, as it were, to Mr. Kreisler's will with it. Similarly the exaction of a long and difficult piece, which he would bring to nearly perfect performance, taxes his nervous and bodily powers. When, for example, he made an end of Beethoven's Concerto at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening and returned again and again to acknowledge the answering plaudits, he was plainly, as the youngsters say, "all in." So has the suffering of the war, as it touched his own fortunes and the fortune of his kinsfolk, friends and country, laid present mark upon Mr. Kreisler. Nor are the pains and penalties of recent and unwarrantable persecution, now happily ending, unwritten upon his countenance and bearing. Once more it is into the men who endure quietly that such experiences sink deepest. For the time they have dulled the physical and nervous vitality that in a recent past each day seemed to renew for Mr Kreisler.

As plain is the change in the violinist's playing. Whether the piece is a sonata of the ancients, a classic concerto, a romantic, a displayful or a merely fanciful and pleasing music, old or new, he seems now to strive for a minute perfection of performance that no detail shall elude. He would draw from his violin a tone of the uttermost fineness; he would touch that tone with the softest of lustres; he would make it sensitive to the slightest inflection of the music, to the most subtle and delicate desires of his own responsive will. It is as though he visioned the music, was in spell to it and to his instrument, would lay that spell upon his hearers. It is as though he heard in the ear of the imagination the tones of the violin in ideal voice, the music in an ideal guise, would attain to both, would impart them. Obviously such playing is intensely introspective; obviously it renounces appreciably the warmth, the vitality that, with all his finesse, leapt of old from Mr. Kreisler's bow. Underneath his calm exterior lies an acutely sensitive mind and heart. If a man be so tempered, suffering drives him into himself. If he must contend with the woes and the hostilities of a world without, the more does he seek solace in self-communion within. So, perhaps, have the experiences of recent years and recent months also set marks on Mr. Kreisler's playing.

H. T. P.

ESTABLISHED 1861

From Morning Telegraph
New York City

Concerts for Boston Children.

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are making plans to bring the finest music possible to the school children of the city, and have arranged for the orchestra to give a special young people's concert on Symphony Hall Thursday evening [illegible]

This may, perhaps, be the commencement of a series of concerts, especially for school children, all of which will be given by the full orchestra under Pierre Monteux, the regular conductor. Prices for these concerts will range from 25 cents to 50 cents [illegible]

TRIBUNE
Providence, R. I.
JAN 10 1920 A

RACHMANINOFF WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY.

In many respects the foremost event of the musical season in Providence will be the appearance of Sergei Rachmaninoff, Russia's giant pianist and greatest composer, at the Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Jan. 27th. Furthermore, Rachmaninoff will on this occasion play his own latest Concerto in D minor, the third. With the sombre grandeur, the tense climaxes, and the fiery rhythms of this mountainous work, he held New York and Boston spell-bound by his genius. After such performances he has justly been pronounced the greatest of them all. Pierre Monteux will begin the concert with the classic masterpiece, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor, the most popular of them all, which has been played at these concerts for a [illegible] of seasons. The program will [illegible] brilliantly scored [illegible] an episode from [illegible]

TRIBUNE
Providence, R. I.
JAN 4 - 1920 A

Matzenauer,

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to play here on Tuesday evening, Jan. 27, with Sergei Rachmaninoff, the great Russian pianist, as soloist, has just announced in Boston a new project of giving special "Young People's Concerts" at minimum prices, the program suitable to the occasion, and the tickets to be distributed through the schools and settlements of greater Boston. This is in a sense an extension of the practice of selling tickets at special students' rates for the concerts in Providence. The first "Young People's Concert" will be given on Thursday afternoon, Jan. 29, at 4 o'clock.

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have taken the further step of insuring all of the musicians against death or total disability to the amount of $1000. This is, of course, entirely distinct from the pension fund, maintained by special concerts and contributions, which institution remains as firm as it is of long standing.

* * *

From Journal
Providence, R. I.

JAN 4 1920 A

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced a new project of giving special "Young People's Concerts" at minimum prices, the programme suitable for children, and the tickets to be distributed through the schools and settlements of Greater Boston. This is, in a sense, an extension of the practice of selling tickets at special students' rates for the concerts in this city. The first "Young People's Concert" will be given on Thursday afternoon, Jan. 29.

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have taken the further step of insuring all of the musicians against death or total disability to the amount of $100,000. This is, of course, entirely distinct from the pension fund maintained by special concerts and contributions.

The concerts of Friday afternoon and last evening in Symphony Hall are well worth note, in that they brought to light Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony," for 33 years buried from Symphony audiences in Boston, and the ballet, "Jeux," written by Debussey and played on Friday for the first time in America.

The ballet was written by Debussey to oblige Mr. Diaghilev, the director of the Russian dancers, and was linked by Nijinsky, who was given to strange and awe-inspiring posturing, to a "choregraphic action at odds with the contours, the rhythms and the implications of the music." After its hard experience with Nijinsky the ballet was played in Paris as a tone poem with a prefatory "argument," and it was thus that Monteux played it. The music, according to the press, "runs brightly, gracefully, charmingly in crossed rythms, interwoven melody and light and glinting harmonic and instrumental color."

Of Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony" it is said that the composer himself came to think ill of the work after its first performance, and it has been practically put aside by conductors. It was written in 1830 on commission for a celebration of the ter-centenary of the adoption of the Augsburg Confession by German Protestants.

Another revival at the concert on Friday was Glazunov's early tone poem, "Stenka Razin," long and, to again quote the Boston critics, "undeservedly" fallen from the active repertory of the orchestra. The work depicts the life and death of the old brigand for whom it is named, his battle with the Volga, won by the Volga river, to whom he gave his bride as a sacrifice, and the struggle of the Volga peasants whose folk songs are interwoven in the music.

From
Journal
Providence, R. I.

JAN 11 1920 A

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer and pianist, is to play as soloist at the next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening, Jan. 27, in Infantry Hall. Last November, while the rumor was being circulated that his estates had been despoiled by the Bolsheviki, and in consequence Rachmaninoff had sought refuge in Scandinavia, he suddenly appeared in New York. Although he was well known as a composer, the public was not acquainted with his ability as a pianist, except through hearsay, and the memory of his work while visiting the United States in 1910.

After a few weeks of concert performance, the name of the composer found a new and vivid significance. He appeared as soloist with the leading orchestras in America and gave concerts in the large cities of the United States. It is in his playing of his own concertos that Rachmaninoff has achieved his greatest successes.

Recently a Boston critic devoted considerable space to speculation as to whether the "romance" of seeing a composer in person had not to a great extent influenced the cordiality of his reception by Bostonian audiences. However, it is conceded that in playing his own compositions, Rachmaninoff has a mastery of both mediums, his resourcefulness of inspiration, and his rhythm and tremendous chords, which explore the range of the keyboard and orchestra. His previous appearances in Providence were in February and December of 1918.

* * *

TRIBUNE
ress: Providence, R. I.
JAN 11 1920 A

RACHMANINOFF NEXT BOSTON SYMPHONY SOLOIST.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the indomitable Russian composer and pianist, is to play as solist at the next Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Jan. 27th.

Last November, while the rumor was going about that Rachmaninoff had been despoiled of his estates by the Bolsheviki and driven to Scandinavia, the musician in person suddenly appeared in New York. As a composer, the public of course knew him well, but as a pianist there had been only dim memory and hearsay. However, after a few weeks of concert performance, the name of the great pianist of Russia found a new and vivid significance.

At each of them, the hynotic effect of his presence was immediately felt. When the guant and angular figure comes upon the stage (he must stoop for some doorways) there is the electric feeling of the presence of genius. Bowed, dark and intent over his instrument, his striking profile is almost a tragic mask. Playing his own concerto, Rachmaninoff the composer and Rachmaninoff the pianist, are blended in his utter mastery of both mediums; his resourcefulness of free inspiration running a riotous course, his rhythm, whiplike and biting, and his tremendous chords, colorful and resi-[illegible]nt, which explore the whole range of [illegible] keyboard and orchestra.

[illegible]mall wonder that no pianist of last [illegible]son won a popularity comparable to [illegible] America is fortunate to have him [illegible] second season.

ESTA[illegible] 1861

From Journal
Providence, R. I.

JAN [illegible] 20 A

An unusual coincidence of bookings give Providence concert goers the portunity of hearing Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist and composer twice within a week. He will be heard soloist at the third of the series of Boston Symphony concerts in this city on Tuesday evening, Jan. 27, in Infantry Hall. He will also give a concert at the Shubert Majestic on Sunday, Feb. 1, in place of the concert which was scheduled for Feb. 15 in the Steinert series.

Rachmaninoff made his American debut in 1909 and 1910, when he appeared as pianist and conductor of his own works. He was born in Novgorod in 1873 and was admitted to the Petrograd Conservatory at the age of nine, where he studied piano with Damjansky for three years. Later he attended the Moscow Conservatory with Zvierev and Siloti as his instructors. With Taneiev and Arensky he studied composition for excellence, in which he won a gold medal in 1895. He toured Russia in the same year and very soon afterward attracted European attention both as composer and pianist, apeparing in London and Vienna often.

He was a teacher at the Maryinsky Institute for Girls in Moscow and after several years residence in Dresden and his visit to the United States was appointed chief conductor of the Imperial Opera in Petrograd. Among his compositions are a number of operas, choral works, particularly noteworthy the six choruses for female voices and the humorous chorus for mixed voices, cantatas, chamber music, orchestra fantasies and symphonies as well as suites for the piano.

In the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be his latest work, the third Concerto in D-minor, which has received favorable comment both in Boston and New York. Pierre Monteux will begin the concert with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C Minor, which has not been played at the concerts in this city for a number of years. The programme will close with Liszt's brilliantly scored "Mephisto Waltz," an episode from Lenau's "Faust."

Rachmaninoff, Eminent Pianist

He Will be the Soloist at the Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be Given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday Evening, Jan. 27.

[illegible] HALL, PROVIDENCE —ALWA[illegible]

CONCERT GIVEN BY SYMPHONY

Third of the Series by Bostdn Orchestra Is Largely Attended.

Infantry Hall held one of the largest and most brilliant audiences in its history at the third in the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, last evening. And not only was the audience one of vast size and notable brilliancy but it was enthusiastic to a degree rarely reached by conservative Providence concert-goers.

The concert, however, was unusual in its interest with such a genius of the key board as Sergei Rachmaninoff as the solist in his own concerto.

Then, too, Mr. Monteux seemed to inspire his forces to an unusual degree, for their playing, always well nigh flawless in character, reached even greater heights of techincal efficiency if, indeed, that were possible and the audience responded to the superb effects achieved by the orchestra with spontaneous bursts of applause.

The program follows: Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67—I. Allegro con brio, II. Andante con moto, III. Allegro (trio), IV. Allegro, Beethoven; Concerto for pianoforte with orchestra, in D minor, No. 3, Op. 30—I. Allegro ma non tanto, II. Intermezzo: Adagio, III. Finale, Rachmaninoff; "Stenka Razine," symphonic poem, Op. 13, Glazounoff.

Beethoven's melodious beautiful "Fifth Symphony" never fails to charm the tireless concert goer. It is the story, in music, of the composer's defiance of fate, the battling of man with nature and unseen forces. It is the story, too, of sublime struggle and exulting triumph. It has been played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on many previous occasions in the past two decades, but not in the memory of those who rarely fail to attend Boston Symphony concerts [illegible]

[illegible]ere has this great work been played [illegible]ith such surpassing tonal beauty, such [illegible]xquisite phrasing, such magnificent ef[illegible]ct as last evening.

[illegible]Mr. Monteux was several times recalled [illegible]the end of the symphony and finally [illegible]alled his men to rise and, with him [illegible]are the plaudits of the audience.

[illegible]he other number played by the or[illegible]estra was Glazounoff's "Symphonic [illegible]em" in which the orchestra again dis[illegible]yed the perfection of its inherent pos[illegible]ilities under the skillful guidance of [illegible] director.

[illegible]uch of the interest of the concert cen[illegible]d naturally in the playing, by the [illegible]at Rachmaninoff, of his own con[illegible]to and it is quite sufficient to add that [illegible] created a profound impression.

[illegible]achmaninoff is now in his early forties [illegible] at the height of his powers. Not [illegible]y is he justly regarded as one of the [illegible]emost living composers but his mag[illegible]cent playing stamps him as a truly [illegible]at pianist as well.

[illegible]he concerto is distinctly original and [illegible]ealing in character, and the first move[illegible]nt especially is most impressive and [illegible]l of melody, so that the attention of [illegible]th hearer is at once riveted. The per[illegible]formance by the composer pianist was a [illegible]remarkable one; remarkable even for [illegible]Mr. Rachmaninoff. The pianist and com[illegible]poser were one and the same being.

[illegible]Throughout the concerto the pianist ex[illegible]hibited again the astonishing manual [illegible]kill and dexterity the remarkable [illegible]beauty and sensitiveness of tone, the ex[illegible]quisite delicacy of expression which [illegible]raises his playing to such dazzling [illegible]eights of perfection.

[illegible]The artist was recalled six times after [illegible]is gigantic performance.

Bror Laws

[illegible]ONESDAY, JANUARY 28

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES FINE CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in its third concert of the season here last night at Infantry Hall before a large audience aroused a "crescendo" of approval early in the programme which developed into a veritable "fortissimo" in the triumphant finale. It was the best appearance the orchestra has made here and the audience was keenly responsive in its responsive in its appreciation.

Pierre Monteux conducted his musicians with admirable unity, but the acme of the programme numbers was reached when Sergei Bachaninoff, on his first appearance here with the Boston Symphony, gave the first presentation here of his third concerto for pianoforte. It was truly an evening of pronounced impressions which Providence music lovers will keep fresh in the memory.

The programme opened with the Beethoven Symphony No. 5, in C-minor. The superior mastery of this symphony has been revealed in this city before, but never with such noble intensity as Monteux secured last night. He was recalled repeatedly after the finale and the players arose for their deserved share of the applause.

"Stenka Razine," the symphonic poem by the Russian, Glazounoff, who was still in his teens when he composed it, was given a most romantic conception by the orchestra [illegible]

RACHMANINOFF IN HIS OWN CONCERTO PLEASES AUDIENCE

Russian Pianist is Soloist at Third Concert of Season Here by Boston Symphony.—Beethoven's Fifth Symphony is Finely Presented.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, with Sergei Rachmaninoff soloist, aroused great enthusiasm last evening at the orchestra's third concert here this season. Infantry Hall was filled and the programme, played magnificently, stirred the audience to tremendous outbursts of applause. And both orchestra and soloist were deserving of their big reception, for seldom if ever have the players semed so keenly alive to the work in hand or Mr. Monteux so filled with inspiration and energy.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, too, made an im[illegible]pression that will linger long in the mem[illegible]ory. It was his first appearance here with the Boston Symphony, and it was also the first presentation in this city of his third concerto for pianoforte. For sustained interest and brilliance of performance the concert undoubtedly set a new high mark for the present season.

The programme follows:

Beethoven—Symphony No. 5, in C-minor, Op. 67
- Allegro con brio.
- Andante con moto.
- Allegro; Trio.
- Allegro.

Rachmaninoff—Concerto for Pianoforte with Orchestra, in D-minor, No. 3, Op. 30.
- Allegro ma non tanto.
- Intermezzo: Adagio.
- Finale.

Glazounoff—"Stenka Razine," Symphonic Poem, Op. 13.

The Beethoven Symphony No. 5, in C-minor, has been played here many, many times. It is always welcome, as it is one of the most interesting and perhaps the most popular of the master's symphonic works. Written in Beethoven's so-called second period, when his creative power was at the full and his emotional nature given free rein, it depicts his various moods with wonderful force and beauty. And it is but giving Mr. Monteux his due to state that this work has never been given, in the last 20 years at least, with such breadth, such grandeur of conception and striking effect. The Fate that knocks at the door in the symphony's opening measures marched steadily, relentlessly onward through the succeeding movements. It was a great performance and Mr. Monteux, recalled several times after the finale, caused the players to rise and share in the applause.

The other orchestral offering, the symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," by the Russian, Glazounoff, was particularly [illegible]

THE EVENING BULLETIN,

[illegible]Ba[illegible]
[illegible]A[illegible]
[illegible]the[illegible]
[illegible]Al[illegible]
[illegible]Ho[illegible]
[illegible]ye[illegible]
[illegible]do[illegible]
[illegible]di[illegible]
[illegible]to[illegible]
[illegible]e[illegible]
[illegible]I[illegible]
[illegible]C[illegible]

interesting as showing the remarkable ability of the composer in his early youth, for Glazounoff was still in his teens when he wrote this, his first tone poem. Russian folk lore teems with stories of Cossack leaders or hetmen, who, at the head of robber bands, plundered and murdered at their hearts' content. Stenka Razine was one of these, famed in song and story. In boats manned by oarsmen he roamed the mighty River Volga and with him a captured Persian princess. Descriptive of these characters, the wild forays of the band, the fate of the princess, who is thrown into the Volga when Stenka finds himself surounded by the soldiers of the Czar, and of the final fight, the young Russian wrote with realistic effect. The orchestra played the piece with appropriate fire and vigor.

Rachmaninoff was given an ovation at the close of his concerto with orchestra. [illegible] work as a whole, while unmistak-

[illegible]ESDAY, JANUARY 28, 1920

[illegible]ably Russian in flavor, is decidedly original. There is a beautiful opening melody given on the piano to accompaniment of muted strings. This is later embellished by the solo instrument and is made to appear in fragmentary manner among the orchestral voices. The movement contains some fine climaxes and ends with a recurrence of the original haunting minor melody on the piano. The second movement is, perhaps, less interesting than the first, although it contains beautiful and unusual effects. The finale is very brilliant and decided in rythmic swing.

Rachmaninoff's playing was appealing [illegible]n its tonal beauty, in its clearness and [illegible]n that indefinable something by which [illegible] player sometimes establishes a feel[illegible]g of intimacy and perfect understand[illegible]g between himself and his audience. [illegible]e was followed with closest attention [illegible]

[illegible]and interest and was recalled [illegible] times.

Mr. Monteux, alert and respo[illegible] [illegible]ompanied with splendid ra[illegible]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Music

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

THE GRIST OF WEEK-END MUSIC HARVESTED

Mr. Kreisler as Changed Man and Changed Musician—A Plausible Explanation—Choral Pieces and Notable Singers to Glorify Them — The Fanciful Griffes and the Expert Reuter — The Fokines to Dance in Boston — Programmes in Prospect

As Mr. Kreisler returns from concert to concert in Boston, the change in the aspect of the man and in the playing of the musician become more noticeable. His hair has grizzled in the ordinary course of the years; but few men in the early forties wear so worn a face as the violinist now turns toward his hearers. His figure, too, has lost something of the easy, animated carriage, the erect poise, of old. It slackens, as it were, to Mr. Kreisler's will with it. Similarly the exaction of a long and difficult piece, which he would bring to nearly perfect performance, taxes his nervous and bodily powers. When, for example, he made an end of Beethoven's Concerto at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening and returned again and again to acknowledge the answering plaudits, he was plainly, as the youngsters say, "all in." So has the suffering of the war, as it touched his own fortunes and the fortune of his kinsfolk, friends and country, laid present mark upon Mr. Kreisler. Nor are the pains and penalties of recent and unwarrantable persecution, now happily ending, unwritten upon his countenance and bearing. Once more it is into the men who endure quietly that such experiences sink deepest. For the time they have dulled the physical and nervous vitality that in a recent past each day seemed to renew for Mr Kreisler.

As plain is the change in the violinist's playing. Whether the piece is a sonata of the ancients, a classic concerto, a romantic, a displayful or a merely fanciful and pleasing music, old or new, he seems now to strive for a minute perfection of performance that no detail shall elude. He would draw from his violin a tone of the uttermost fineness; he would touch that tone with the softest of lustres; he would make it sensitive to the slightest inflection of the music, to the most subtle and delicate desires of his own responsive will. It is as though he visioned the music, was in spell to it and to his instrument, would lay that spell upon his hearers. It is as though he heard in the ear of the imagination the tones of the violin in ideal voice, the music in an ideal guise, would attain to both, would impart them. Obviously such playing is intensely introspective; obviously it renounces appreciably the warmth, the vitality that, with all his finesse, leapt of old from Mr. Kreisler's bow. Underneath his calm exterior lies an acutely sensitive mind and heart. If a man be so tempered, suffering drives him into himself. If he must contend with the woes and the hostilities of a world without, the more does he seek solace in self-communion within. So, perhaps, have the experiences of recent years and recent months also set marks on Mr. Kreisler's playing.

H. T. P.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Morning Telegraph New York City

Concerts for Boston Children.

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are making plans to bring the finest music possible to the school children of the city, and have arranged for the orchestra to give a special young people's concert in Symphony Hall Thursday evening. This may, perhaps, be the commencement of a series of concerts, especially for school children, all of which will be given by the full orchestra under Pierre Monteux, the regular conductor. Prices for these concerts will range from 25 cents to 50 cents and

TRIBUNE

Providence, R. I.

JAN 19 1920

RACHMANINOFF WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY.

In many respects the foremost event of the musical season in Providence will be the appearance of Sergei Rachmaninoff, Russia's giant pianist and greatest composer, at the Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Jan. 27th. Furthermore, Rachmaninoff will on this occasion play his own latest Concerto in D minor, the third. With the sombre grandeur, the tense climaxes, and the fiery rhythms of this mountainous work, he held New York and Boston spell-bound by his genius. After such performances he has justly been pronounced the greatest of them all. Pierre Monteux will begin the concert with the classic masterpiece, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor, the most popular of them all, which has been played at these concerts for a number of seasons. The program will [illegible] Liszt's brilliantly scored [illegible] episode from [illegible] wherein Satan fid[illegible]

TRIBUNE

ress: Providence, R. I.

JAN 4 - 1920

[illegible] Matzenauer.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to play here on Tuesday evening, Jan. 27, with Sergei Rachmaninoff, the great Russian pianist, as soloist, has just announced in Boston a new project of giving special "Young People's Concerts" at minimum prices, the program suitable to the occasion, and the tickets to be distributed through the schools and settlements of greater Boston. This is in a sense an extension of the practice of selling tickets at special students' rates for the concerts in Providence. The first "Young People's Concert" will be given on Thursday afternoon, Jan. 29, at 4 o'clock.

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have taken the further step of insuring all of the musicians against death or total disability to the amount of $1000. This is, of course, entirely distinct from the pension fund, maintained by special concerts and contributions, which institution remains as firm as it is of long standing.

* * *

From Journal Providence, R. I.

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced a new project of giving special "Young People's Concerts" at minimum prices, the programme suitable for children, and the tickets to be distributed through the schools and settlements of Greater Boston. This is, in a sense, an extension of the practice of selling tickets at special students' rates for the concerts in this city. The first "Young People's Concert" will be given on Thursday afternoon, Jan. 29.

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have taken the further step of insuring all of the musicians against death or total disability to the amount of $100,000. This is, of course, entirely distinct from the pension fund maintained by special concerts and contributions.

The concerts of Friday afternoon and last evening in Symphony Hall are well worth note, in that they brought to light Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony," for 33 years buried from Symphony audiences in Boston, and the ballet, "Jeux," written by Debussey and played on Friday for the first time in America.

The ballet was written by Debussey to oblige Mr. Diaghilev, the director of the Russian dancers, and was linked by Nijinsky, who was given to strange and awe-inspiring posturing, to a "choregraphic action at odds with the contours, the rhythms and the implications of the music." After its hard experience with Nijinsky the ballet was played in Paris as a tone poem with a prefatory "argument," and it was thus that Monteux played it. The music, according to the press, "runs brightly, gracefully, charmingly in crossed rythms, interwoven melody and light and glinting harmonic and instrumental color."

Of Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony" it is said that the composer himself came to think ill of the work after its first performance, and it has been practically put aside by conductors. It was written in 1830 on commission for a celebration of the ter-centenary of the adoption of the Augsburg Confession by German Protestants.

Another revival at the concert on Friday was Glazunov's early tone poem, "Stenka Razin," long and, to again quote the Boston critics, "undeservedly" fallen from the active repertory of the orchestra. The work depicts the life and death of the old brigand for whom it is named, his battle with the Volga, won by the Volga river, to whom he gave his bride as a sacrifice, and the struggle of the Volga peasants whose folk songs are interwoven in the music.

From Journal Providence, R. I.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer and pianist, is to play as soloist at the next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening, Jan. 27, in Infantry Hall. Last November, while the rumor was being circulated that his estates had been dospoiled by the Bolsheviki, and in consequence Rachmaninoff had sought refuge in Scandinavia, he suddenly appeared in New York. Although he was well known as a composer, the public was not acquainted with his ability as a pianist, except through hearsay, and the memory of his work while visiting the United States in 1910.

After a few weeks of concert performance, the name of the composer found a new and vivid significance. He appeared as soloist with the leading orchestras in America and gave concerts in the large cities of the United States. It is in his playing of his own concertos that Rachmaninoff has achieved his greatest successes.

Recently a Boston critic devoted considerable space to speculation as to whether the "romance" of seeing a composer in person had not to a great extent influenced the cordiality of his reception by Bostonian audiences. However, it is conceded that in playing his own compositions, Rachmaninoff has a mastery of both mediums, his resourcefulness of inspiration, and his rhythm and tremendous chords, which explore the range of the keyboard and orchestra. His previous appearances in Providence were in February and December of 1918.

* * *

n TRIBUNE

ress: Providence, R. I.

e JAN 11 1920

RACHMANINOFF NEXT BOSTON SYMPHONY SOLOIST.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the indomitable Russian composer and pianist, is to play as solist at the next Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Jan. 27th.

Last November, while the rumor was going about that Rachmaninoff had been despoiled of his estates by the Bolsheviki and driven to Scandinavia, the musician in person suddenly appeared in New York. As a composer, the public of course knew him well, but as a pianist there had been only dim memory and hearsay. However, after a few weeks of concert performance, the name of the great pianist of Russia found a new and vivid significance.

At each of them, the hynotic effect of his presence was immediately felt. When the guant and angular figure comes upon the stage (he must stoop for some doorways) there is the electric feeling of the presence of genius. Bowed, dark and intent over his instrument, his striking profile is almost a tragic mask. Playing his own concerto, Rachmaninoff the composer and Rachmaninoff the pianist, are blended in his utter mastery of both mediums; his resourcefulness of free inspiration running a riotous course, his rhythm, whiplike and biting, and his tremendous chords, colorful and resi-nt, which explore the whole range of e keyboard and orchestra.

mall wonder that no pianist of last son won a popularity comparable to America is fortunate to have him a second season.

ESTA[illegible] 1881

From Journal Providence, R. I.

An unusual coincidence of bookings give Providence concert goers the portunity of hearing Sergei Rachmaoff, the Russian pianist and compos twice within a week. He will be heard soloist at the third of the series of Boston Symphony concerts in this city on Tuesday evening, Jan. 27, in Infantry Hall. He will also give a concert at the Shubert Majestic on Sunday, Feb. 1, in place of the concert which was scheduled for Feb. 15 in the Steinert series.

Rachmaninoff made his American debut in 1909 and 1910, when he appeared as pianist and conductor of his own works. He was born in Novgorod in 1873 and was admitted to the Petrograd Conservatory at the age of nine, where he studied piano with Damjansky for three years. Later he attended the Moscow Conservatory with Zvierev and Siloti as his instructors. With Taneiev and Arensky he studied composition for excellence, in which he won a gold medal in 1892. He toured Russia in the same year and very soon afterward attracted European attention both as composer and pianist, apeparing in London and Vienna often.

He was a teacher at the Maryinsky Institute for Girls in Moscow and after several years residence in Dresden and his visit to the United States was appointed chief conductor of the Imperial Opera in Petrograd. Among his compositions are a number of operas, choral works, particularly noteworthy the six choruses for female voices and the humorous chorus for mixed voices, cantatas, chamber music, orchestra fantasies and symphonies as well as suites for the piano.

In the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be his latest work, the third Concerto in D-minor, which has received favorable comment both in Boston and New York. Pierre Monteux will begin the concert with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C Minor, which has not been played at the concerts in this city for a number of years. The programme will close with Liszt's brilliantly scored "Mephisto Waltz," an episode from Lenau's "Faust."

Rachmaninoff, Eminent Pianist

He Will be the Soloist at the Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be Given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday Evening, Jan. 27.

Tribune Jan 28

E, PROVIDENCE —ALWA

CONCERT GIVEN BY SYMPHONY

Third of the Series by Boston Orchestra Is Largely Attended.

Infantry Hall held one of the largest and most brilliant audiences in its history at the third in the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, last evening. And not only was the audience one of vast size and notable brilliancy but it was enthusiastic to a degree rarely reached by conservative Providence concert-goers.

The concert, however, was unusual in its interest with such a genius of the key board as Sergei Rachmaninoff as the solist in his own concerto.

Then, too, Mr. Monteux seemed to inspire his forces to an unusual degree, for their playing, always well nigh flawless in character, reached even greater heights of techincal efficiency if, indeed, that were possible and the audience responded to the superb effects achieved by the orchestra with spontaneous bursts of applause.

The program follows: Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67—I. Allegro con brio, II. Andante con moto, III. Allegro (trio), IV. Allegro, Beethoven: Concerto for pianoforte with orchestra, in D minor, No. 3, Op. 30—I. Allegro ma non tanto, II. Intermezzo: Adagio, III. Finale, Rachmaninoff; "Stenka Razine," symphonic poem, Op. 13, Glazounoff.

Beethoven's melodious beautiful "Fifth Symphony" never fails to charm the tireless concert goer. It is the story, in music, of the composer's defiance of fate, the battling of man with nature and unseen forces. It is the story, too, of sublime struggle and exulting triumph. It has been played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on many previous occasions in the past two decades, but not in the memory of those who rarely fail to attend Boston Symphony concerts ere has this great work been played ith such surpassing tonal beauty, such xquisite phrasing, such magnificent effect as last evening.

Mr. Monteux was several times recalled the end of the symphony and finally alled his men to rise and, with him are the plaudits of the audience.

The other number played by the orestra was Glazounoff's "Symphonic em" in which the orchestra again disyed the perfection of its inherent posilities under the skillful guidance of director.

uch of the interest of the concert cend naturally in the playing, by the at Rachmaninoff, of his own con- to and it is quite sufficient to add that created a profound impression.

achmaninoff is now in his early forties i at the height of his powers. Not y is he justly regarded as one of the emost living composers but his magicent playing stamps him as a truly at pianist as well.

he concerto is distinctly original and ealing in character and the first movet especially is most impressive and fl of melody, so that the attention of th hearer is at once riveted. The performance by the composer pianist was a remarkable one; remarkable even for Mr. Rachmaninoff. The pianist and composer were one and the same being.

Throughout the concerto the pianist exhibited again the astonishing manual skill and dexterity the remarkable beauty and sensitiveness of tone, the exquisite delicacy of expression which raises his playing to such dazzling heights of perfection.

The artist was recalled six times after his gigantic performance.

1208 Kell

ONESDAY, JANUARY 28

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES FINE CONCERT

The Bostoh Symphony Orchestra in its third concert of the season here last night at Infantry Hall before a large audience aroused a "crescendo" of approval early in the programme which developed into a veritable "fortissimo" in the triumphant finale. It was the best appearance the orchestra has made here and the audience was keenly responsive in its responsive in its appreciation.

Pierre Monteux conducted his musicians with admirable unity, but the acme of the programme numbers was reached when Sergei Bachaninoff, on his first appearance here with the Boston Symphony, gave the first presentation here of his third concerto for pianoforte. It was truly an evening of pronounced impressions which Providence music lowers will keep fresh in the memory,

The programme opened with the Beethoven Symphony No. 5, in C-minor. The superior mastery of this symphony has been revealed in this city before, but never with such noble intensity as Monteux secured last night. He was recalled repeatedly after the finale and the players arose for their deserved share of the applause.

"Stenka Razine," the symphonic poem by the Russian, Glazounoff, who was still in his teens when he composed it, was given a most romantic conception by the orchestra

RACHMANINOFF IN HIS OWN CONCERTO PLEASES AUDIENCE

Russian Pianist is Soloist at Third Concert of Season Here by Boston Symphony.—Beethoven's Fifth Symphony is Finely Presented.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, with Sergei Rachmaninoff soloist, aroused great enthusiasm last evening at the orchestra's third concert here this season. Infantry Hall was filled and the programme, played magnificently, stirred the audience to tremendous outbursts of applause. And both orchestra and soloist were deserving of their big reception, for seldom if ever have the players semed so keenly alive to the work in hand or Mr. Monteux so filled with inspiration and energy.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, too, made an impression that will linger long in the memory. It was his first appearance here with the Boston Symphony, and it was also the first presentation in this city of his third concerto for pianoforte. For sustained interest and brilliance of performance the concert undoubtedly set a new high mark for the present season.

THE EVENING BULLETIN,

The programme follows:

Beethoven—Symphony No. 5, in C-minor, Op. 67
- Allegro con brio.
- Andante con moto.
- Allegro; Trio.
- Allegro.

Rachmaninoff—Concerto for Pianoforte with Orchestra, in D-minor, No. 3, Op. 30.
- Allegro ma non tanto.
- Intermezzo: Adagio.
- Finale.

Glazounoff—"Stenka Razine." Symphonic Poem, Op. 13.

The Beethoven Symphony No. 5, in C-minor, has been played here many, many times. It is always welcome, as it is one of the most interesting and perhaps the most popular of the master's symphonic works. Written in Beethoven's so-called second period, when his creative power was at the full and his emotional nature given free rein, it depicts his various moods with wonderful force and beauty. And it is but giving Mr. Monteux his due to state that this work has never been given, in the last 20 years at least, with such breadth, such grandeur of conception and striking effect. The Fate that knocks at the door in the symphony's opening measures marched steadily, relentlessly onward through the succeeding movements. It was a great performance and Mr. Monteux, recalled several times after the finale, caused the players to rise and share in the applause.

The other orchestral offering, the symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," by the Russian, Glazounoff, was particularly interesting as showing the remarkable ability of the composer in his early youth, for Glazounoff was still in his teens when he wrote this, his first tone poem. Russian folk lore teems with stories of Cossack leaders or hetmen, who, at the head of robber bands, plundered and murdered at their hearts' content. Stenka Razine was one of these, famed in song and story. In boats manned by oarsmen he roamed the mighty River Volga and with him a captured Persian princess. Descriptive of these characters, the wild forays of the band, the fate of the princess, who is thrown into the Volga when Stenka finds himself surounded by the soldiers of the Czar, and of the final fight, the young Russian wrote with realistic effect. The orchestra played the piece with appropriate fire and vigor.

Rachmaninoff was given an ovation at the close of his concerto with orchestra, work as a whole, while unmistak-

ESDAY, JANUARY 28, 1920

ably Russian in flavor, is decidedly original. There is a beautiful opening melody given on the piano to accompaniment of muted strings. This is later embellished by the solo instrument and is made to appear in fragmentary manner among the orchestral voices. The movement contains some fine climaxes and ends with a recurrence of the original haunting minor melody on the piano. The second movement is, perhaps, less interesting than the first, although it contains beautiful and unusual effects. The finale is very brilliant and decided in rythmic swing.

Rachmaninoff's playing was appealing in its tonal beauty, in its clearness and in that indefinable something by which a player sometimes establishes a feeling of intimacy and perfect understanding between himself and his audience. He was followed with closest attention and interest and was recalled times.

Mr. Monteux, alert and respon[illegible] accompanied with splendid r[illegible]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Music

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

THE GRIST OF WEEK-END MUSIC HARVESTED

Mr. Kreisler as Changed Man and Changed Musician—A Plausible Explanation—Choral Pieces and Notable Singers to Glorify Them — The Fanciful Griffes and the Expert Reuter — The Fokines to Dance in Boston — Programmes in Prospect

As Mr. Kreisler returns from concert to concert in Boston, the change in the aspect of the man and in the playing of the musician become more noticeable. His hair has grizzled in the ordinary course of the years; but few men in the early forties wear so worn a face as the violinist now turns toward his nearers. His figure, too, has lost something of the easy, animated carriage, the erect poise, of old. It slackens, as it were, to Mr. Kreisler's will with it. Similarly the exaction of a long and difficult piece, which he would bring to nearly perfect performance, taxes his nervous and bodily powers. When, for example, he made an end of Beethoven's Concerto at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening and returned again and again to acknowledge the answering plaudits, he was plainly, as the youngsters say, "all in." So has the suffering of the war, as it touched his own fortunes and the fortune of his kinsfolk, friends and country, laid present mark upon Mr. Kreisler. Nor are the pains and penalties of recent and unwarrantable persecution, now happily ending, unwritten upon his countenance and bearing. Once more it is into the men who endure quietly that such experiences sink deepest. For the time they have dulled the physical and nervous vitality that in a recent past each day seemed to renew for Mr Kreisler.

As plain is the change in the violinist's playing. Whether the piece is a sonata of the ancients, a classic concerto, a romantic, a displayful or a merely fanciful and pleasing music, old or new, he seems now to strive for a minute perfection of performance that no detail shall elude. He would draw from his violin a tone of the uttermost fineness; he would touch that tone with the softest of lustres; he would make it sensitive to the slightest inflection of the music, to the most subtle and delicate desires of his own responsive will. It is as though he visioned the music, was in spell to it and to his instrument, would lay that spell upon his hearers. It is as though he heard in the ear of the imagination the tones of the violin in ideal voice, the music in an ideal guise, would attain to both, would impart them. Obviously such playing is intensely introspective; obviously it renounces appreciably the warmth, the vitality that, with all his finesse, leapt of old from Mr. Kreisler's bow. Underneath his calm exterior lies an acutely sensitive mind and heart. If a man be so tempered, suffering drives him into himself. If he must contend with the woes and the hostilities of a world without, the more does he seek solace in self-communion within. So, perhaps, have the experiences of recent years and recent months also set marks on Mr. Kreisler's playing.

H. T. P.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Morning Telegraph New York City

TRIBUNE

ss: Providence, R. I.

JAN 4 - 1920

...the Matzenauer,

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to play here on Tuesday evening, Jan. 27, with Sergei Rachmaninoff, the great Russian pianist, as soloist, has just announced in Boston a new project of giving special "Young People's Concerts" at minimum prices, the program suitable to the occasion, and the tickets to be distributed through the schools and settlements of greater Boston. This is in a sense an extension of the practice of selling tickets at special students' rates for the concerts in Providence. The first "Young People's Concert" will be given on Thursday afternoon, Jan. 29, at 4 o'clock.

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have taken the further step of insuring all of the musicians against death or total disability to the amount of $1000. This is, of course, entirely distinct from the pension fund, maintained by special concerts and contributions, which institution remains as firm as it is of long standing.

* * *

From Journal Providence, R. I.

* *

The Boston Symphon... announced a new proj... cial "Young People's C... mum prices, the progra... children, and the tickets ... through the schools and ... Greater Boston. This is, ... extension of the practice o... ets at special students' r... concerts in this city. The ... People's Concert" will be give... day afternoon, Jan. 29.

The trustees of the Boston ... Orchestra have taken the fu... of insuring all of the musician... death or total disability to the am... $100,000. This is, of course, enti... tinct from the pension fund mai... by special concerts and contribut...

The concerts of Friday afternoo... last evening in Symphony Hall are... worth note, in that they brought to ... Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphon... for 33 years buried from Symphony a... diences in Boston, and the ballet, "Jeux," written by Debussey and played on Fri... day for the first time in America.

The ballet was written by Debussey to oblige Mr. Diaghilev, the director of the Russian dancers, and was linked by Nijinsky, who was given to strange and awe-inspiring posturing, to a "choregraphic action at odds with the contours, the rhythms and the implications of the music." After its hard experience with Nijinsky the ballet was played in Paris as a tone poem with a prefatory "argument," and it was thus that Monteux played it. The music, according to the press, "runs brightly, gracefully, charmingly in crossed rythms, interwoven melody and light and glinting harmonic and instrumental color."

Of Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony" it is said that the composer himself came to think ill of the work after its first performance, and it has been practically put aside by conductors. It was written in 1830 on commission for a celebration of the ter-centenary of the adoption of the Augsburg Confession by German Protestants.

Another revival at the concert on Friday was Glazunov's early tone poem, "Stenka Razin," long and, to again quote the Boston critics, "undeservedly" fallen from the active repertory of the orchestra. The work depicts the life and death of the old brigand for whom it is named, his battle with the Volga, won by the Volga river, to whom he gave his bride as a sacrifice, and the struggle of the Volga peasants whose folk songs are interwoven in the music.

Concerts for Boston Children.

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are making plans to bring the finest music possible to the school children of the city, and have arranged for the orchestra to give a special young people's concert in Symphony Hall Thursday evening, January 29.

This may, perhaps, be the commencement of a series of concerts, especially for school children, all of which will be given by the full orchestra under Pierre Monteux, the regular conductor. Prices for these concerts will range from 25 cents to 50 cents and

TRIBUNE

Providence, R. I.

JAN 10 1920

RACHMANINOFF WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY.

In many respects the foremost event of the musical season in Providence will be the appearance of Sergei Rachmaninoff, Russia's giant pianist and greatest composer, at the Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Jan. 27th. Furthermore, Rachmaninoff will on this occasion play his own latest Concerto in D minor, the third. With the sombre grandeur, the tense climaxes, and the fiery rhythms of this mountainous work, he held New York and Boston spell-bound by his genius. After such performances he has justly been pronounced the greatest of them all. Pierre Monteux will begin the concert with the classic masterpiece, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor, the most popular of them all, which ha... been played at these concerts for a... of seasons. The program will ... Liszt's brilliantly scored ... episode from ... wherein Satan fidd...

From Journal Providence, R. I.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer and pianist, is to play as soloist at the next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening, Jan. 27, in Infantry Hall. Last November, while the rumor was being circulated that his estates had been despoiled by the Bolsheviki, and in consequence Rachmaninoff had sought refuge in Scandinavia, he suddenly appeared in New York. Although he was well known as a composer, the public was not acquainted with his ability as a pianist, except through hearsay, and the memory of his work while visiting the United States in 1910.

After a few weeks of concert performance, the name of the composer found a new and vivid significance. He appeared as soloist with the leading orchestras in America and gave concerts in the large cities of the United States. It is in his playing of his own concertos that Rachmaninoff has achieved his greatest successes.

Recently a Boston critic devoted considerable space to speculation as to whether the "romance" of seeing a composer in person had not to a great extent influenced the cordiality of his reception by Bostonian audiences. However, it is conceded that in playing his own compositions, Rachmaninoff has a mastery of both mediums, his resourcefulness of inspiration, and his rhythm and tremendous chords, which explore the range of the keyboard and orchestra. His previous appearances in Providence were in February and December of 1918.

TRIBUNE

ress: Providence, R. I.

e JAN 11 1920

RACHMANINOFF NEXT BOSTON SYMPHONY SOLOIST.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the indomitable Russian composer and pianist, is to play as solist at the next Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Jan. 27th.

Last November, while the rumor was going about that Rachmaninoff had been despoiled of his estates by the Bolsheviki and driven to Scandinavia, the musician in person suddenly appeared in New York. As a composer, the public of course knew him well, but as a pianist there had been only dim memory and hearsay. However, after a few weeks of concert performance, the name of the great pianist of Russia found a new and vivid significance.

At each of them, the hynotic effect of his presence was immediately felt. When the guant and angular figure comes upon the stage (he must stoop for some doorways) there is the electric feeling of the presence of genius. Bowed, dark and intent over his instrument, his striking profile is almost a tragic mask. Playing his own concerto, Rachmaninoff the composer and Rachmaninoff the pianist, are blended in his utter mastery of both mediums; his resourcefulness of free inspiration running a riotous course, his rhythm, whiplike and biting, and his tremendous chords, colorful and resilient, which explore the whole range of the keyboard and orchestra.

Small wonder that no pianist of last season won a popularity comparable to his. America is fortunate to have him for a second season.

ESTA... 1881

From Journal Providence, R. I.

An unusual coincidence of bookings give Providence concert goers the portunity of hearing Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist and compos twice within a week. He will be heard soloist at the third of the series of Boston Symphony concerts in this city on Tuesday evening, Jan. 27, in Infantry Hall. He will also give a concert at the Shubert Majestic on Sunday, Feb. 1, in place of the concert which was scheduled for Feb. 15 in the Steinert series.

Rachmaninoff made his American debut in 1909 and 1910, when he appeared as pianist and conductor of his own works. He was born in Novgorod in 1873 and was admitted to the Petrograd Conservatory at the age of nine, where he studied piano with Damjansky for three years. Later he attended the Moscow Conservatory with Zvierev and Siloti as his instructors. With Taneiev and Arensky he studied composition for excellence, in which he won a gold medal in 1892. He toured Russia in the same year and very soon afterward attracted European attention both as composer and pianist, apeparing in London and Vienna often.

He was a teacher at the Maryinsky Institute for Girls in Moscow and after several years residence in Dresden and his visit to the United States was appointed chief conductor of the Imperial Opera in Petrograd. Among his compositions are a number of operas, choral works, particularly noteworthy the six choruses for female voices and the humorous chorus for mixed voices, cantatas, chamber music, orchestra fantasies and symphonies as well as suites for the piano.

In the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be his latest work the third Concerto in D-minor, which has received favorable comment both in Boston and New York. Pierre Monteux will begin the concert with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C Minor, which has not been played at the concerts in this city for a number of years. The programme will close with Liszt's brilliantly scored "Mephisto Waltz," an episode from Lenau's "Faust."

Rachmaninoff, Eminent Pianist

He Will be the Soloist at the Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be Given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday Evening, Jan. 27.

...E, PROVIDENCE —ALWA...

CONCERT GIVEN BY SYMPHONY

Third of the Series by Boston Orchestra Is Largely Attended.

Infantry Hall held one of the largest and most brilliant audiences in its history at the third in the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, last evening. And not only was the audience one of vast size and notable brilliancy but it was enthusiastic to a degree rarely reached by conservative Providence concert-goers.

The concert, however, was unusual in its interest with such a genius of the key board as Sergei Rachmaninoff as the solist in his own concerto.

Then, too, Mr. Monteux seemed to inspire his forces to an unusual degree, for their playing, always well nigh flawless in character, reached even greater heights of techincal efficiency if, indeed, that were possible and the audience responded to the superb effects achieved by the orchestra with spontaneous bursts of applause.

The program follows: Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67—I. Allegro con brio, II. Andante con moto, III. Allegro (trio), IV. Allegro, Beethoven: Concerto for pianoforte with orchestra, in D minor, No. 3, Op. 30—I. Allegro ma non tanto, II. Intermezzo: Adagio, III. Finale, Rachmaninoff; "Stenka Razine," symphonic poem, Op. 13, Glazounoff.

Beethoven's melodious beautiful "Fifth Symphony" never fails to charm the tireless concert goer. It is the story, in music, of the composer's defiance of fate, the battling of man with nature and unseen forces. It is the story, too, of sublime struggle and exulting triumph. It has been played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on many previous occasions in the past two decades, but not in the memory of those who rarely fail to attend Boston Symphony concerts ere has this great work been played ith such surpassing tonal beauty, such xquisite phrasing, such magnificent ef-

It deals with Russian folk lore and rampages of Cossack bands which plundered and robbed to their heart's content. Stenka skimmed the mighty Volga River with his boats and strong oarsmen, captured a princess, and, at last finds himself surrounded by the soldiers of the czar in the final fight. The orchestra brought out all the dash and vim of the conflict superbly.

Rachmaninoff received distinctive praise for his concerto for the pianoforte with orchestra, in D-minor. It is Russian in background and has an originality about it which kept the audience charmed. The opening piano solo, is accompanied by enreconced muted strings, developing into a series of climaxes and finally swinging into a triumphant finale. It was followed with wrapt attention and the author responded several times to the appreciation of the audience. The programme of the evening as follows:

Beethoven—Smyphony No. 5, in C-minor, Op. 67
- Alegro con brio.
- Andante con moto.
- Allegro; Trio.
- Allegro.

Rachmaninoff—Concerto for Pianoforte with Orchestra, in D-minor, No. 3, Op. 30.
- Allegro ma non tanto.
- Intermezzo: Adagio.
- Finale.

Glazounoff—"Stenka Razine," Symphonic Poem, Op. 13.

RACHMANINOFF IN HIS OWN CONCERTO PLEASES AUDIENCE

Russian Pianist is Soloist at Third Concert of Season Here by Boston Symphony.—Beethoven's Fifth Symphony is Finely Presented.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, with Sergei Rachmaninoff soloist, aroused great enthusiasm last evening at the orchestra's third concert here this season. Infantry Hall was filled and the programme, played magnificently, stirred the audience to tremendous outbursts of applause. And both orchestra and soloist were deserving of their big reception, for seldom if ever have the players semed so keenly alive to the work in hand or Mr. Monteux so filled with inspiration and energy.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, too, made an impression that will linger long in the memory. It was his first appearance here with the Boston Symphony, and it was also the first presentation in this city of his third concerto for pianoforte. For sustained interest and brilliance of performance the concert undoubtedly set a new high mark for the present season.

THE EVENING BULLETIN,

The programme follows:

Beethoven—Symphony No. 5, in C-minor, Op. 67
- Allegro con brio.
- Andante con moto.
- Allegro; Trio.
- Allegro.

Rachmaninoff—Concerto for Pianoforte with Orchestra, in D-minor, No. 3, Op. 30.
- Allegro ma non tanto.
- Intermezzo: Adagio.
- Finale.

Glazounoff—"Stenka Razine," Symphonic Poem, Op. 13.

The Beethoven Symphony No. 5, in C-minor, has been played here many, many times. It is always welcome, as it is one of the most interesting and perhaps the most popular of the master's symphonic works. Written in Beethoven's so-called second period, when his creative power was at the full and his emotional nature given free rein, it depicts his various moods with wonderful force and beauty. And it is but giving Mr. Monteux his due to state that this work has never been given, in the last 20 years at least, with such breadth, such grandeur of conception and striking effect. The Fate that knocks at the door in the symphony's opening measures marched steadily, relentlessly onward through the succeeding movements. It was a great performance and Mr. Monteux, recalled several times after the finale, caused the players to rise and share in the applause.

The other orchestral offering, the symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," by the Russian, Glazounoff, was particularly interesting as showing the remarkable ability of the composer in his early youth, for Glazounoff was still in his teens when he wrote this, his first tone poem. Russian folk lore teems with stories of Cossack leaders or hetmen, who, at the head of robber bands, plundered and murdered at their hearts' content. Stenka Razine was one of these, famed in song and story. In boats manned by oarsmen he roamed the mighty River Volga and with him a captured Persian princess. Descriptive of these characters, the wild forays of the band, the fate of the princess, who is thrown into the Volga when Stenka finds himself surounded by the soldiers of the Czar, and of the final fight, the young Russian wrote with realistic effect. The orchestra played the piece with appropriate fire and vigor.

Rachmaninoff was given an ovation at the close of his concerto with orchestra, work as a whole, while unmistak-

...ESDAY, JANUARY 28, 1920

ably Russian in flavor, is decidedly original. There is a beautiful opening melody given on the piano to accompaniment of muted strings. This is later embellished by the solo instrument and is made to appear in fragmentary manner among the orchestral voices. The movement contains some fine climaxes and ends with a recurrence of the original haunting minor melody on the piano. The second movement is, perhaps, less interesting than the first although it contains beautiful and unusual effects. The finale is very brilliant and decided in rythmic swing.

Rachmaninoff's playing was appealing in its tonal beauty, in its clearness and in that indefinable something by which a player sometimes establishes a feeling of intimacy and perfect understanding between himself and his audience. He was followed with closest attention and interest and was recalled times.

Mr. Monteux, alert and respon... companied with splendid r...

Boston Transcript
Jan 30 - 1920
14

Music

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S NEW VENTURE

A First Afternoon for Young People—An Interested, Pleasured Audience and Generally Auspicious Outcome—The Cecilia, with Mr. Mitchell Leading, in Short, Variegated and Unaccompanied Choral Pieces—Mr. Busoni as Lion of London—A New Piece from Mr. Carpenter—Mr. McCormack's Plans

THERE were new sensations aplenty at the first concert of the Symphony Orchestra for young people in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Contrary to custom, however, they sprang from the auditorium and not from the stage. There, as usual, sat the band in such dimensions as the chosen pieces required, and thence, much as usual in these days of Mr. Monteux, it played Beethovens' overture to Goethe's play of "Egmont," the Unfinished Symphony of Schubert and four numbers—the prelude of the huntresses of Diana, the waltz, the pizzicato polka, and the procession of Bacchus—from Delibes's ballet, "Sylvia." As was to be expected from a conductor and an orchestra with esprit de corps and honneur d'artiste—as the two happy French phrases go—it played all these pieces with the same regard for pace and rhythm, euphony and color, melodic beauty and imaginative suggestion as it is wont to show on a Saturday evening in Boston or a Thursday evening in New York. Exactly as on those occasions did the new audience applaud it, recalling Mr. Monteux at the end as though it already guessed the custom of the Symphony Concerts. Even programme-notes were not overlooked. This time, however, they filled but four pages where Mr. Burk of the staff of Symphony Hall had discerningly and ingeniously written them for young understandings. Whether the spoken word, such as Mr. Stock and Mr. Damrosch use at similar concerts in Chicago and New York, would have more interested the youngsters is hard to say. Mr. Monteux has many talents, but not yet the gift of tongues when he must speak in a free, lightly running and idiomatic English; while Symphony Hall lacks any spokesman likely to be at ease in explanation of music to 2000 young folk. Yet it is easy to remember how apt Mr. Guy Maier was in speech when he carried a similar audience through piano-pieces and how eagerly it followed him. For the purpose and in the circumstances the spoken word may be better than the printed page. If there is to be a series of concerts for young people at Symphony Hall next season, as all concerned now intend, why not "have in" Mr. Maier as "lecturer" of proved abilities?

In parquet and galleries a few seats were allotted to the guardian-teachers, to a few reporters, to a few more adult guests. Otherwise every chair held a young listener. As it seemed in a cursory survey of the hall, more were girls than boys—according to American habit in the concert-hall, or in any other exercise of the arts. As usual also in such circumstances, Italian, Jewish, Slavic, and European faces generally were not few; for the "alien" of much loud-mouthed and current scorn has a quick instinct for the finer things of music and the stage that hardly smoulders in many a native American. Unexpected, however, were the very young years of row upon row of children. Perhaps the unpractised, undiscriminating bachelor eye mistakenly saw them as no more than of nine, ten or eleven summers; but, unless they were unsuspected, and surprisingly numerous prodigies, they did seem rather too young for the pleasures of serious music; while before the hour was ended, more than one was naturally restless. On the other hand, youth of both sexes in their early teens or on the edge of them filled much more than half the hall; for them the concert was intended; and to it they responded with every auspicious sign. They were not merely attentive; they were interested; not merely dutiful but pleasured. They discriminated between the pieces as when they applauded the flowing song of Schubert's Andante more warmly than the less melodious Allegro; as when they perceived that the grace of Delibes's waltz and the snapping gayety of his polka were pleasanter to hear than his louder and more "stagey" music of prelude and procession. Honest, intelligent, too, were overheard comments from mouth to mouth in the intermission; while good to see was as intelligent a curiosity over the instruments and the workings in general of a full orchestra. It would not be misplaced in the audiences of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Rightly for such youth are these concerts for young people designed; theirs are the likings to be fostered through the years in which most of us first discover what sort of entertainment gives us most pleasure entering, as it were, into the knowledge of good taste and bad taste; from them also must come in large part the public that twenty and thirty years hence will be the audience of the Symphony Orchestra. Enough then the reward of the day since the concert interested and pleased them. Would it have warmed them more, had the programme been lighter, had it included more short pieces? Would one movement from a symphony been wiser choice than two? Was the overture to "Egmont" somewhat over many a youngster's head? It is hard to answer. Mr. Stock's practice in Chicago favors more and shorter pieces. Mr. Damrosch's in New York agrees with Mr. Monteux's experimental programme. Inevitably, the youth of yesterday "caught on" quickly and gladly to the bright rhythms, the pretty tunes, the showy sonorities of Delibes's ballet. Yet their interest and seeming pleasure in Shubert (outside the first movement of the Unfinished Symphony) and even in the Beethoven of "Egmont" were not appreciably less.

H. T. P.

Globe Jan 30

CHILDREN HEAR THE SYMPHONY

Display Keen Interest at First School Concert

Boston Post
Jan 30 1920

BY OLIN DOWNES

Those who boarded cars almost anywhere about Boston early yesterday afternoon found themselves surrounded by chattering schoolboys and girls of the city, apparently out for a lark. Passengers and conductors of non-musical habits were at a loss to explain this development. The children were bound for Symphony Hall and the first Young People's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PIECES EASY TO GRASP

These concerts, one more of which will be given this season, have been arranged at a very low rate of admission for the younger people of the city, to give them the opportunity of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra and becoming acquainted under the best possible conditions with symphonic music. This is a new departure for the Boston Symphony, although similar undertakings have ere this met with success and made new audiences for orchestras in other cities. It is certainly a move calculated to make the Boston Symphony more than ever an integral part of the musical life of the community, and to democratize its mission.

The programme arranged by Mr. Monteux for this concert consisted of Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont"; Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony; and the Prelude, Intermezzo and Waltz, "Pizzicati" and "Procession of Bacchus" from Delibe's ballet, "Sylvia."

Readily Understood

Of the orchestral performance of these pieces it is needless to speak in detail. The orchestra gave its best. The individual members of it, if one excepts a harp out of tune—excelled themselves in the performance of solo passages in which they displayed with exceptional mastery the capacities of different instruments. The general character of the music was melodious and domparatively easy to grasp. Whether those unaccustomed to music can be expected to feel the heroic spirit of Beethoven's overture is a question one does not answer with full confidence in the affirmative.

The lofty simplicity of Beethoven may be readily understood by children or youths, but many of us had to grow internally as well as musically for many years to comprehend the grandeur of this overture. It is, however, music, as it seems, of a drama, of movement, action; it has clear melodious outlines and a thrilling finale. And it is music which may well be a part of youth's heritage.

Interested in Players

The Schubert symphony is a work everyone should grow up with, and Mr. Monteux is particularly fortunate in his interpretation of this work. Listeners, old and young, took pleasure in the piquant music of Delibes.

The audience, consisting of children of rich and poor, from every quarter of the city and its environs, with a sprinkling of adults as escorts, was interested no less in the motions of the conductor and the movement of the men, the shape of the instruments, the occasional whistle of a piccolo or whack of the drum than in the melodies themselves. Occasionally, there was an exclamation or a crow from someone very young— a kind of musical commentary of a kind not included in the programme.

The second of these concerts will be given in Symphony Hall on Feb. 26, when preference will be given first to many who applied for tickets for the concert of yesterday afternoon after the hall was sold out. The programme for

---

CHILDREN HEAR CLASSIC MUSIC

Young People's Concert by Symphony Orchestra

Boston Herald
Jan 30 1920

PUPILS COME FROM MANY CITY SCHOOLS

By PHILIP HALE

The first Young People's Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The hall was filled with children of all ages and all sizes from the public and parochial schools and from the various settlements.

The program was as follows: Beethoven, overture to "Egmont"; Schubert's Unfinished Symphony; Delibes, Suite from the ballet "Sylvia."

The question at once comes up: What orchestral compositions are most appropriate for a concert of this nature? Should the music be first of all ear-tickling and heel-stirring? It should certainly be tuneful, and the rhythms should be strongly marked. It is a mistake to think that children do not enjoy music that gives older persons of musical experience genuine pleasure. Music that is often written deliberately for children may easily bore them. Mr. Guy Maier, who gave a piano recital not long ago for children, solved the problem, nor was their enjoyment solely derived from his agreeable talk about the music. They were pleased by the music itself. The selections were admirably chosen and the greater number were by acknowledged masters.

Were the little hearers in Symphony Hall so pleased yesterday that they would gladly attend a second concert? They applauded heartily; but applause does not necessarily mean enjoyment; it is often perfunctory, an expression of politeness, even at the Symphony concerts on Friday afternoons and Saturday nights. Children, fortunately are not sophisticated in this respect. They are, as a rule, brutally frank. The faces yesterday showed curiosity, wonder, pleasure. Some of the younger children, no doubt, twisted in their seats. Perhaps they were bodily uncomfortable; perhaps they were nervous. We have seen men and women restless when long winded symphonies were performed.

The experiment was at least worth trying. In all probability a new world was opened to many, a world that they would gladly visit again. They were not awed by the names "Beethoven," "Schubert." If they enjoyed the music it was not because they thought it necessary to pay homage to these men.

No committee of three or of 10 could vote unanimously for this or that program. One might ask for an overture by Auber, or the overture to "Mignon" or "Zampa"; a gay symphony by Haydn; some pretty Intermezzo or Prelude; a waltz by Johann Strauss. Another, some kill-joy, might say: "No, we must choose only educational music. These children must be trained to love the 'classics' ". And so through the three or 10. A Symphony Orchestra does not lose dignity on an occasion like this by playing a sparkling overture or one of Johann Strauss's waltzes.

The second concert will be on Thursday afternoon, Feb. 26 at 4 o'clock.

The program, which contained pertinent and entertaining notes by Mr. John N. Burke of Symphony Hall, made this announcement:

In allotting tickets for the concert on Feb. 26, preference will be shown those schools who applied for tickets for the first concert but were unable to obtain them. Applications have already been received from more than 40 schools—enough to subscribe for all tickets for the second concert. Since Feb. 26 falls in the vacation period for many schools, tickets will be ready for distribution to the schools, Feb. 16 and 17, and may be returned, if unsold, on or before Feb. 20 (Prices 25, 35 and 50 cents, tax exempt). In view of the other engagements of the orchestra it will not be possible to give additional Young People's Concerts this season."

We are glad to observe that the concert was actually a children's concert. We are certain that we saw some auditors of about five years of age, and they ranged from that to fifteen, with a few adult juveniles among them. Descriptive notes of a chatty character were upon the programs, but a little verbal explanation with piano illustrations might strike home more thoroughly with the young folks. The audience filled the hall entirely and was applausive enough to show that the tonal banquet was relished.

The performance was of the usual high standard. Freedom shrieked upon the piccolo in the coda of the overture and the violins gave their high position with surety. It may be remembered that when this overture was written the violinists rebelled against these passages as impossible, but Beethoven would not change a note.

The Schubert symphony has recently been reviewed, and the "Sylvia" ballet music (the only very light work on the list) was given as M. Monteux always gives ballet-music, with the utmost delicacy and good taste. Therefore the new educational scheme is well launched and it deserves to rosper. A second concert is to be given on February 26, again on a Thursday afternoon.

JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.
JAN 24 1920

CONCERT GIVE BY SYMPHON

Third of the Series by Bo Orchestra Is Largely Attended.

Infantry Hall held one of the l and most brilliant audiences in ry at the third in the series concerts by the Boston Symphon estra, Pierre Monteux, conducto ening. And not only was the au e of vast size and notable bri it was enthusiastic to a degre reached by conservative Prov ncert-goers.

The concert, however, was unus interest with such a genius y board as Sergei Rachmanin soloist in his own concerto. Then, too, Mr. Monteux seemed re his forces to an unusual their playing, always well nig s in character, reached even ights of techincal efficiency if, t were possible and the au ponded to the superb effects a the orchestra with spontaneous applause.

e program follows: Symphony minor, Op. 67—I. Allegro co Andante con moto, III. Allegro Allegro, Beethoven: Concert oforte with orchestra, in D 3, Op. 30—I. Allegro ma non Intermezzo: Adagio, III. hmaninoff: "Stenka Razine, ic poem, Op. 13. Glazounoff. ethoven's melodious beautiful phony" never fails to char ss concert goer. It is the usic, of the composer's defia the battling of man with natu en forces. It is the story, me struggle and exulting as been played here by the phony Orchestra on many p sions in the past two decad not in the memory of those who fail to attend Boston Symphony c ere has this great work been p ith such surpassing tonal beauty xquisite phrasing, such magnific ect as last evening.

Mr. Monteux was several times re t the end of the symphony and s signalled his men to rise and, with share the plaudits of the audience.

The other number played by th chestra was Glazounoff's "Symp Poem" in which the orchestra agai played the perfection of its inheren sibilities under the skilful guidan the director.

Much of the interest of the concer tred naturally in the playing, by great Rachmaninoff, of his own certo and it is quite sufficient to ad he created a profound impression.

Rachmaninoff is now in his early and at the height of his powers. only is he justly regarded as one foremost living composers but his nificent playing stamps him as a great pianist as well.

The concerto is distinctly origina appealing in character and the first ment especially is most impressiv full of melody, so that the atte the hearer is at once riveted. T formance by the composer pianist remarkable one; remarkable ex Mr. Rachmaninoff. The pianist a poser were one and the same be

Throughout the concerto the pian hibited again the astonishin skill and dexterity the are beauty and sensitiveness to exquisite delicacy of fe raises his playing down the heights of per erson, M

The artis his gigantic

SYMPH FIRST FOR

The Boston Pierre Monteux first all-childre Hall yesterda Beethoven's c Schubert's Un the suite from Delibes. The

Post Jan 30

CHILDREN HEAR THE SYMPHONY

Display Keen Interest at First School Concert

BY OLIN DOWNES

Those who boarded cars almost anywhere about Boston early yesterday afternoon found themselves surrounded by chattering schoolboys and girls of the city, apparently out for a lark. Passengers and conductors of non-musical habits were at a loss to explain this development. The children were bound for Symphony Hall and the first Young People's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PIECES EASY TO GRASP

These concerts, one more of which will be given this season, have been arranged at a very low rate of admission for the younger people of the city, to give them the opportunity of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra and becoming acquainted under the best possible conditions with symphonic music. This is a new departure for the Boston Symphony, although similar undertakings have ere this met with success and made new audiences for orchestras in other cities. It is certainly a move calculated to make the Boston Symphony more than ever an integral part of the musical life of the community, and to democratize its mission.

The programme arranged by Mr. Monteux for this concert consisted of Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont"; Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony; and the Prelude, Intermezzo and Waltz, "Pizzicati" and "Procession of Bacchus" from Delibe's ballet, "Sylvia."

Readily Understood

Of the orchestral performance of these pieces it is needless to speak in detail. The orchestra gave its best. The individual members of it, if one excepts a harp out of tune—excelled themselves in the performance of solo passages in which they displayed with exceptional mastery the capacities of different instruments. The general character of the music was melodious and comparatively easy to grasp. Whether those unaccustomed to music can be expected to feel the heroic spirit of Beethoven's overture is a question one does not answer with full confidence in the affirmative.

The lofty simplicity of Beethoven may be readily understood by children or youths, but many of us had to grow internally as well as musically for many years to comprehend the grandeur of this overture. It is, however, music, as it seems, of a drama, of movement, action; it has clear melodious outlines and a thrilling finale. And it is music which may well be a part of youth's heritage.

Interested in Players

The Schubert symphony is a work everyone should grow up with, and Mr. Monteux is particularly fortunate in his interpretation of this work. Listeners, old and young, took pleasure in the piquant music of Delibes.

The audience, consisting of children of rich and poor, from every quarter of the city and its environs, with a sprinkling of adults as escorts, was interested no less in the motions of the conductor and the movement of the men, the shape of the instruments, the occasional whistle of a piccolo or whack of the drum than in the melodies themselves. Occasionally, there was an exclamation or a crow from someone very young— a kind of musical commentary of a kind not included in the programme.

The second of these concerts will be given in Symphony Hall on Feb. 26, when preference will be given first to many who applied for tickets for the concert of yesterday afternoon after the hall was sold out. The programme for this concert will soon be announced.

Republican

CHILDREN HEAR CLASSIC MUSIC

Young People's Concert by Symphony Orchestra Is Rare Treat

PUPILS COME FROM MANY CITY SCHOOLS

By PHILIP HALE

The first Young People's Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The hall was filled with children of all ages and all sizes from the public and parochial schools and from the various settlements.

The program was as follows: Beethoven, overture to "Egmont"; Schubert's Unfinished Symphony; Delibes, Suite from the ballet "Sylvia."

The question at once comes up: What orchestral compositions are most appropriate for a concert of this nature? Should the music be first of all ear-tickling and heel-stirring? It should certainly be tuneful, and the rhythms should be strongly marked. It is a mistake to think that children do not enjoy music that gives older persons of musical experience genuine pleasure. Music that is often written deliberately for children may easily bore them. Mr. Guy Maier, who gave a piano recital not long ago for children, solved the problem, nor was their enjoyment solely derived from his agreeable talk about the music. They were pleased by the music itself. The selections were admirably chosen and the greater number were by acknowledged masters.

Were the little hearers in Symphony Hall so pleased yesterday that they would gladly attend a second concert? They applauded heartily; but applause does not necessarily mean enjoyment; it is often perfunctory, an expression of politeness, even at the Symphony concerts on Friday afternoons and Saturday nights. Children, fortunately are not sophisticated in this respect. They are, as a rule, brutally frank. The faces yesterday showed curiosity, wonder, pleasure. Some of the younger children, no doubt, twisted in their seats. Perhaps they were bodily uncomfortable; perhaps they were nervous. We have seen men and women restless when long winded symphonies were performed.

The experiment was at least worth trying. In all probability a new world was opened to many, a world that they would gladly visit again. They were not awed by the names "Beethoven," "Schubert." If they enjoyed the music it was not because they thought it necessary to pay homage to these men.

No committee of three or of 10 could vote unanimously for this or that program. One might ask for an overture by Auber, or the overture to "Mignon" or "Zampa"; a gay symphony by Haydn; some pretty Intermezzo or Prelude; a waltz by Johann Strauss. Another, some kill-joy, might say: "No, we must choose only educational music. These children must be trained to love the 'classics' ". And so through the three or 10. A Symphony Orchestra does not lose dignity on an occasion like this by playing a sparkling overture or one of Johann Strauss's waltzes.

The second concert will be on Thursday afternoon, Feb. 26 at 4 o'clock.

The program, which contained pertinent and entertaining notes by Mr. John N. Burke of Symphony Hall, made this announcement:

"In allotting tickets for the concert on Feb. 26, preference will be shown those schools who applied for tickets for the first concert but were unable to obtain them. Applications have already been received from more than 40 schools—enough to subscribe for all tickets for the second concert. Since Feb. 26 falls in the vacation period for many schools, tickets will be ready for distribution to the schools, Feb. 16 and 17, and may be returned, if unsold, on or before Feb. 20 (Prices 25, 35 and 50 cents, tax exempt). In view of the other engagements of the orchestra it will not be possible to give additional Young People's Concerts this season."

Globe Jan 30

SYMPHONY CONCERT IS A DELIGHT TO YOUNGSTERS

Symphony Hall was filled to capacity yesterday afternoon for the first of the new Boston Symphony Concerts for young people. The tickets were sold through schools and settlement houses at a nominal price, and each one bore a printed warning that the management reserved the right to refuse admittance if it should be presented by an adult. The result was an audience unique in the annals of the orchestra, with very few grown-ups and many tiny tots. There were children from every section of Greater Boston, representing every element in our cosmopolitan population and all ages from 3 to 18.

They were all on their best behavior, quite as well behaved and much more interested in the occasion than the regular Friday audience. Of course, some were restless and bored, but that has been known to happen at regular Symphony concerts. The majority of faces showed a quiet happiness which proved that "clouds of glory" were in the air.

The orchestra and Mr Monteaux did their part nobly in the chosen numbers, Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, and a Suite from Delibes' ballet, "Sylvia," and the audience applauded vigorously. It tried to encore the pretty "Pizzicati" from "Sylvia," and seemed to prefer the Schubert symphony to the Beethoven overture.

The program contained admirably written brief notes on the music played, which told just the things the thoughtful boy and girl would want to know about the chosen numbers.

The enormous demand for tickets has already exhausted the supply available for the second of these concerts, Feb 26. No others are possible this season, in view of other engagements of the orchestra.

Transcript Jan 30

Music

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S NEW VENTURE

A First Afternoon for Young People—An Interested, Pleasured Audience and Generally Auspicious Outcome—The Cecilia, with Mr. Mitchell Leading, in Short, Variegated and Unaccompanied Choral Pieces—Mr. Busoni as Lion of London—A New Piece from Mr. Carpenter—Mr. McCormack's Plans

THERE were new sensations aplenty at the first concert of the Symphony Orchestra for young people in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Contrary to custom, however, they sprang from the auditorium and not from the stage. There, as usual, sat the band in such dimensions as the chosen pieces required, and thence, much as usual in these days of Mr. Monteux, it played Beethovens' overture to Goethe's play of "Egmont," the Unfinished Symphony of Schubert and four numbers—the prelude of the huntresses of Diana, the waltz, the pizzicato polka, and the procession of Bacchus—from Delibes's ballet, "Sylvia." As was to be expected from a conductor and an orchestra with esprit de corps and honneur d'artiste—as the two happy French phrases go—it played all these pieces with the same regard for pace and rhythm, euphony and color, melodic beauty and imaginative suggestion as it is wont to show on a Saturday evening in Boston or a Thursday evening in New York. Exactly as on those occasions did the new audience applaud it, recalling Mr. Monteux at the end as though it already guessed the custom of the Symphony Concerts. Even programme-notes were not overlooked. This time, however, they filled but four pages where Mr. Burk of the staff of Symphony Hall had discerningly and ingeniously written them for young understandings. Whether the spoken word, such as Mr. Stock and Mr. Damrosch use at similar concerts in Chicago and New York, would have more interested the youngsters is hard to say. Mr. Monteux has many talents, but not yet the gift of tongues when he must speak in a free, lightly running and idiomatic English; while Symphony Hall lacks any spokesman likely to be at ease in explanation of music to 2000 young folk. Yet it is easy to remember how apt Mr. Guy Maier was in speech when he carried a similar audience through piano-pieces and how eagerly it followed him. For the purpose and in the circumstances the spoken word may be better than the printed page. If there is to be a series of concerts for young people at Symphony Hall next season, as all concerned now intend, why not "have in" Mr. Maier as "lecturer" of proved abilities?

In parquet and galleries a few seats were allotted to the guardian-teachers, to a few reporters, to a few more adult guests. Otherwise every chair held a young listener. As it seemed in a cursory survey of the hall, more were girls than boys—according to American habit in the concert-hall, or in any other exercise of the arts. As usual also in such circumstances, Italian, Jewish, Slavic, and European faces generally were not few; for the "alien" of much loud-mouthed and current scorn has a quick instinct for the finer things of music and the stage that hardly smoulders in many a native American. Unexpected, however, were the very young years of row upon row of children. Perhaps the unpractised, undiscriminating bachelor eye [illegible] only saw teen [illegible] more than [illegible] ten or eleven summers; but, unless they were unsuspected and surprisingly numerous prodigies, they did seem rather too young for the pleasures of serious music; while before the hour was ended, more than one was naturally restless. On the other hand, youth of both sexes in their early teens or on the edge of them filled much more than half the hall; for them the concert was intended; and to it they responded with every auspicious sign. They were not merely attentive; they were interested; not merely dutiful but pleasured. They discriminated between the pieces as when they applauded the flowing song of Schubert's Andante more warmly than the less melodious Allegro; as when they perceived that the grace of Delibes's waltz and the snapping gayety of his polka were pleasanter to hear than his louder and more "stagey" music of prelude and procession. Honest, intelligent, too, were overheard comments from mouth to mouth in the intermission; while good to see was as intelligent a curiosity over the instruments and the workings in general of a full orchestra. It would not be misplaced in the audiences of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Rightly for such youth are these concerts for young people designed; theirs are the likings to be fostered through the years in which most of us first discover what sort of entertainment gives us most pleasure entering, as it were, into the knowledge of good taste and bad taste; from them also must come in large part the public that twenty and thirty years hence will be the audience of the Symphony Orchestra. Enough then the reward of the day since the concert interested and pleased them. Would it have warmed them more, had the programme been lighter, had it included more short pieces? Would one movement from a symphony been wiser choice than two? Was the overture to "Egmont" somewhat over many a youngster's head? It is hard to answer. Mr. Stock's practice in Chicago favors more and shorter pieces. Mr. Damrosch's in New York agrees with Mr. Monteux's experimental programme. Inevitably, the youth of yesterday "caught on" quickly and gladly to the bright rhythms, the pretty tunes, the showy sonorities of Delibes's ballet. Yet their interest and seeming pleasure in Shubert (outside the first movement of the Unfinished Symphony) and even in the Beethoven of "Egmont" were not appreciably less.

H. T. P.

Monitor Jan 31

The Boston Symphony Orchestra laid a firm foundation stone for future audiences on January 29, when it gave a concert solely for children. Some 2500 youngsters, filling the capacity of the hall, paid strict attention to the music that was played them, liked it all, were especially pleased with the more obvious things, and clamored for more when the concert was over. Most of them heard this orchestra for the first time. Many of them had had no previous acquaintance with the kind of music set forth. All of them liked it well enough to cease their chatter when the conductor rapped on his desk and to settle down into close attention. The program was made up of Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, and Delibes' "Sylvia" ballet. For the sake of musical missionary work it is to be hoped that these concerts may be made a permanent thing in Boston. One other is scheduled for this season, on February 26.

Advertiser Feb 1

The most important concert of the week outside of the regular symphonic one was the concert for young people given Thursday afternoon by the Symphony Orchestra. It is a noble educational scheme for M. Monteux to give such concerts for the benefit chiefly of our young music-lovers, although there could be an occasional Strauss waltz or Meyerbeer march given, as Theodore Thomas used to do with his popular programs. The list of works given was as follows:

Beethoven, Egmont Overture.
Schubert, Unfinished Symphony.
Delibes, four numbers from "Sylvia."

A sensibly short program and not too heavy. It was delightful to observe that the concert was actually a children's concert. We are certain that we saw some auditors of about five years of age, and they ranged from that to fifteen, with a few adult juveniles among them. Descriptive notes of a chatty character were upon the programs, but a little verbal explanation with piano illustrations might strike home more thoroughly with the young folks. The audience filled the hall entirely and was applausive enough to show that the tonal banquet was relished.

The performance was of the usual high standard. Freedom shrieked upon the piccolo in the coda of the overture and the violins gave their high position with surety. It may be remembered that when this overture was written the violinists rebelled against these passages as impossible, but Beethoven would not change a note.

The Schubert symphony has recently been reviewed, and the "Sylvia" ballet music (the only very light work on the list) was given as M. Monteux always gives ballet-music, with the utmost delicacy and good taste. Therefore the new educational scheme is well launched and it deserves to rosper. A second concert is to be given, on February 26, again on a Thursday afternoon.

JOURNAL

ss Providence, R. I.

JAN 1 1920

RACHMANINOFF, PIANIST, TO PLAY HERE TUESD

Composer Will Give Latest C certo at Infantry Hall.

A feature of the Boston Symph Orchestra concert in Infantry Hall Tuesday evening will be the appeara of Sergei Rachmaninoff. The great c poser-pianist will play his latest certo, which is dedicated to Josef mann, but the latter has never atten this tremendous music of dark, rich orings, tinging rythms and fiery maxes. This concerto is said to replete with its creator's unique sonality and style that no one but self can do it full justice.

Pierre Monteux and his orchestra furnish additional interest by perfor Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C-m which they recently played in Bost memory of Henry Lee Higginson, founder and sustainer of this his organization. The closing number be Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "St Razine," which is constructed upon folk songs of Russia.

Providence, R. I.

JAN 28 1920

CONCERT GIVE BY SYMPHON

This of the Series by B Orchestra Is Largely Attended.

Infantry Hall held one of the l and most brilliant audiences in it tory at the third in the series concerts by the Boston Symphor chestra, Pierre Monteux, conducto evening. And not only was the a one of vast size and notable bri but it was enthusiastic to a degre ly reached by conservative Prov concert-goers.

The concert, however, was unus its interest with such a genius key board as Sergei Rachmanin the solist in his own concerto.

Then, too, Mr. Monteux seemed spire his forces to an unusual for their playing, always well nig less in character, reached even heights of techincal efficiency if, that were possible and the au responded to the superb effects ac by the orchestra with spontaneous of applause.

The program follows: Symphony in C minor, Op. 67—I. Allegro co II. Andante con moto, III. Allegro IV. Allegro, Beethoven; Concert pianoforte with orchestra, in D No. 3, Op. 30—I. Allegro ma non II. Intermezzo: Adagio, III. Rachmaninoff; "Stenka Razine," phonic poem, Op. 13, Glazounoff.

Beethoven's melodious beautiful Symphony" never fails to char tireless concert goer. It is the in music, of the composer's defia fate, the battling of man with natu unseen forces. It is the story, sublime struggle and exulting t It has been played here by the Symphony Orchestra on many p occasions in the past two decad not in the memory of those who fail to attend Boston Symphony c ere has this great work been p ith such surpassing tonal beauty, xquisite phrasing, such magnifice ect as last evening.

Mr. Monteux was several times re t the end of the symphony and f signalled his men to rise and, with share the plaudits of the audience.

The other number played by th chestra was Glazounoff's "Symp Poem" in which the orchestra again played the perfection of its inherent sibilities under the skillful guidan the director.

Much of the interest of the concer tred naturally in the playing, by great Rachmaninoff, of his own certo and it is quite sufficient to ad he created a profound impression.

Rachmaninoff is now in his early and at the height of his powers. only is he justly regarded as one foremost living composers but his nificent playing stamps him as a great pianist as well.

The concerto is distinctly origina appealing in character, and the first ment especially is most impressive full of melody, so that the atten the hearer is at once riveted. T formance by the composer pianis remarkable one; "remarkable Mr. Rachmaninoff." The pianist a poser were one and the same beg

Throughout the concerto the pian hibited again the astonishing skill and dexterity the [illegible] beauty and sensitiveness to exquisite delicacy of [illegible] raises his playing down to heights of per[illegible]son, M

The artist [illegible] has gigantic [illegible]

Traveler JANUARY 30, 1920

SYMPHONY GIVES FIRST CONCERT FOR CHILDREN

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conducting, gave its first all-children's concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, playing Beethoven's overture to "Egmont"; Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, and the suite from the ballet "Sylvia," by Delibes. The hall was filled to the last seat by the little ones from the public schools, parochial schools and settlements. Never has the orchestra played to a more eager, attentive audience. The concert, giving hopes of interesting the younger folks in classical music, was an unqualified success.

As a result of the large demand for tickets for this concert, a demand that required twice the seating capacity of the hall, a second concert for children will be given on Thursday afternoon, Feb. 26, at 4.

Post Jan 30

CHILDREN HEAR THE SYMPHONY

Display Keen Interest at First School Concert

BY OLIN DOWNES

Those who boarded cars almost anywhere about Boston early yesterday afternoon found themselves surrounded by chattering schoolboys and girls of the city, apparently out for a lark. Passengers and conductors of non-musical habits were at a loss to explain this development. The children were bound for Symphony Hall and the first Young People's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PIECES EASY TO GRASP

These concerts, one more of which will be given this season, have been arranged at a very low rate of admission for the younger people of the city, to give them the opportunity of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra and becoming acquainted under the best possible conditions with symphonic music. This is a new departure for the Boston Symphony, although similar undertakings have ere this met with success and made new audiences for orchestras in other cities. It is certainly a move calculated to make the Boston Symphony more than ever an integral part of the musical life of the community, and to democratize its mission.

The programme arranged by Mr. Monteux for this concert consisted of Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont"; Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony; and the Prelude, Intermezzo and Waltz, "Pizzicati" and "Procession of Bacchus" from Delibe's ballet, "Sylvia."

Readily Understood

Of the orchestral performance of these pieces it is needless to speak in detail. The orchestra gave its best. The individual members of it, if one excepts a harp out of tune—excelled themselves in the performance of solo passages in which they displayed with exceptional mastery the capacities of different instruments. The general character of the music was melodious and comparatively easy to grasp. Whether those unaccustomed to music can be expected to feel the heroic spirit of Beethoven's overture is a question one does not answer with full confidence in the affirmative.

The lofty simplicity of Beethoven may be readily understood by children or youths, but many of us had to grow internally as well as musically for many years to comprehend the grandeur of this overture. It is, however, music, as it seems, of a drama, of movement, action; it has clear melodious outlines and a thrilling finale. And it is music which may well be a part of youth's heritage.

Interested in Players

The Schubert symphony is a work everyone should grow up with, and Mr. Monteux is particularly fortunate in his interpretation of this work. Listeners, old and young, took pleasure in the piquant music of Delibes.

The audience, consisting of children of rich and poor, from every quarter of the city and its environs, with a sprinkling of adults as escorts, was interested no less in the motions of the conductor and the movement of the men, the shape of the instruments, the occasional whistle of a piccolo or whack of the drum than in the melodies themselves. Occasionally, there was an exclamation or a crow from someone very young— a kind of musical commentary of a kind not included in the programme.

The second of these concerts will be given in Symphony Hall on Feb. 26, when preference will be given first to many who applied for tickets for the concert of yesterday afternoon after the hall was sold out. The programme for this concert will soon be announced.

Herald

CHILDREN HEAR CLASSIC MUSIC

Young People's Concert by Symphony Orchestra Is Rare Treat

PUPILS COME FROM MANY CITY SCHOOLS

By PHILIP HALE

The first Young People's Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The hall was filled with children of all ages and all sizes from the public and parochial schools and from the various settlements.

The program was as follows: Beethoven, overture to "Egmont"; Schubert's Unfinished Symphony; Delibes, Suite from the ballet "Sylvia."

The question at once comes up: What orchestral compositions are most appropriate for a concert of this nature? Should the music be first of all ear-tickling and heel-stirring? It should certainly be tuneful, and the rhythms should be strongly marked. It is a mistake to think that children do not enjoy music that gives older persons of musical experience genuine pleasure. Music that is often written deliberately for children may easily bore them. Mr. Guy Maier, who gave a piano recital not long ago for children, solved the problem, nor was their enjoyment solely derived from his agreeable talk about the music. They were pleased by the music itself. The selections were admirably chosen and the greater number were by acknowledged masters.

Were the little hearers in Symphony Hall so pleased yesterday that they would gladly attend a second concert? They applauded heartily; but applause does not necessarily mean enjoyment; it is often perfunctory, an expression of politeness, even at the Symphony concerts on Friday afternoons and Saturday nights. Children, fortunately are not sophisticated in this respect. They are, as a rule, brutally frank. The faces yesterday showed curiosity, wonder, pleasure. Some of the younger children, no doubt, twisted in their seats. Perhaps they were bodily uncomfortable; perhaps they were nervous. We have seen men and women restless when long winded symphonies were performed.

The experiment was at least worth trying. In all probability a new world was opened to many, a world that they would gladly visit again. They were not awed by the names "Beethoven," "Schubert." If they enjoyed the music it was not because they thought it necessary to pay homage to these men.

No committee of three or of 10 could vote unanimously for this or that program. One might ask for an overture by Auber, or the overture to "Mignon" or "Zampa"; a gay symphony by Haydn; some pretty Intermezzo or Prelude; a waltz by Johann Strauss. Another, some kill-joy, might say: "No, we must choose only educational music. These children must be trained to love the 'classics'". And so through the three or 10. A Symphony Orchestra does not lose dignity on an occasion like this by playing a sparkling overture or one of Johann Strauss's waltzes.

The second concert will be on Thursday afternoon, Feb. 26 at 4 o'clock.

The program, which contained pertinent and entertaining notes by Mr. John N. Burke of Symphony Hall, made this announcement:

In allotting tickets for the concert on Feb. 26, preference will be shown those schools who applied for tickets for the first concert but were unable to obtain them. Applications have already been received from more than 40 schools—enough to subscribe for all tickets for the second concert. Since Feb. 26 falls in the vacation period for many schools, tickets will be ready for distribution to the schools, Feb. 16 and 17, and may be returned, if unsold, on or before Feb. 20 (Prices 25, 35 and 50 cents, tax exempt). In view of the other engagements of the orchestra it will not be possible to give additional Young People's Concerts this season."

Globe Jan 30

SYMPHONY CONCERT IS A DELIGHT TO YOUNGSTERS

Symphony Hall was filled to capacity yesterday afternoon for the first of the new Boston Symphony Concerts for young people. The tickets were sold through schools and settlement houses at a nominal price, and each one bore a printed warning that the management reserved the right to refuse admittance if it should be presented by an adult. The result was an audience unique in the annals of the orchestra, with very few grown-ups and many tiny tots. There were children from every section of Greater Boston, representing every element in our cosmopolitan population and all ages from 3 to 18.

They were all on their best behavior, quite as well behaved and much more interested in the occasion than the regular Friday audience. Of course, some were restless and bored, but that has been known to happen at regular Symphony concerts. The majority of faces showed a quiet happiness which proved that "clouds of glory" were in the air.

The orchestra and Mr Monteaux did their part nobly in the chosen numbers, Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, and a Suite from Delibes' ballet, "Sylvia," and the audience applauded vigorously. It tried to encore the pretty "Pizzicati" from "Sylvia," and seemed to prefer the Schubert symphony to the Beethoven overture.

The program contained admirably written brief notes on the music played, which told just the things the thoughtful boy and girl would want to know about the chosen numbers.

The enormous demand for tickets has already exhausted the supply available for the second of these concerts, Feb 26. No others are possible this season, in view of other engagements of the orchestra.

Transcript Jan 30

Music

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S NEW VENTURE

A First Afternoon for Young People—An Interested, Pleasured Audience and Generally Auspicious Outcome—The Cecilia, with Mr. Mitchell Leading, in Short, Variegated and Unaccompanied Choral Pieces—Mr. Busoni as Lion of London—A New Piece from Mr. Carpenter—Mr. McCormack's Plans

THERE were new sensations aplenty at the first concert of the Symphony Orchestra for young people in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Contrary to custom, however, they sprang from the auditorium and not from the stage. There, as usual, sat the band in such dimensions as the chosen pieces required, and thence, much as usual in these days of Mr. Monteux, it played Beethovens' overture to Goethe's play of "Egmont," the Unfinished Symphony of Schubert and four numbers—the prelude of the huntresses of Diana, the waltz, the pizzicato polka, and the procession of Bacchus—from Delibes's ballet, "Sylvia." As was to be expected from a conductor and an orchestra with esprit de corps and honneur d'artiste—as the two happy French phrases go—it played all these pieces with the same regard for pace and rhythm, euphony and color, melodic beauty and imaginative suggestion as it is wont to show on a Saturday evening in Boston or a Thursday evening in New York. Exactly as on those occasions did the new audience applaud it, recalling Mr. Monteux at the end as though it already guessed the custom of the Symphony Concerts. Even programme-notes were not overlooked. This time, however, they filled but four pages where Mr. Burk of the staff of Symphony Hall had discerningly and ingeniously written them for young understandings. Whether the spoken word, such as Mr. Stock and Mr. Damrosch use at similar concerts in Chicago and New York, would have more interested the youngsters is hard to say. Mr. Monteux has many talents, but not yet the gift of tongues when he must speak in a free, lightly running and idiomatic English; while Symphony Hall lacks any spokesman likely to be at ease in explanation of music to 2000 young folk. Yet it is easy to remember how apt Mr. Guy Maier was in speech when he carried a similar audience through piano-pieces and how eagerly it followed him. For the purpose and in the circumstances the spoken word may be better than the printed page. If there is to be a series of concerts for young people at Symphony Hall next season, as all concerned now intend, why not "have in" Mr. Maier as "lecturer" of proved abilities?

In parquet and galleries a few seats were allotted to the guardian-teachers, to a few reporters, to a few more adult guests. Otherwise every chair held a young listener. As it seemed in a cursory survey of the hall, more were girls than boys—according to American habit in the concert-hall, or in any other exercise of the arts. As usual also in such circumstances, Italian, Jewish, Slavic, and European faces generally were not few; for the "alien" of much loud-mouthed and current scorn has a quick instinct for the finer things of music and the stage that hardly smoulders in many a native American. Unexpected, however, were the very young years of row upon row of children. Perhaps the unpractised, undiscriminating bachelor eye mistakenly saw them as no more than of nine, ten or eleven summers; but, unless they were unsuspected and surprisingly numerous prodigies, they did seem rather too young for the pleasures of serious music; while before the hour was ended, more than one was naturally restless. On the other hand, youth of both sexes in their early teens or on the edge of them filled much more than half the hall; for them the concert was intended; and to it they responded with every auspicious sign. They were not merely attentive; they were interested; not merely dutiful but pleasured. They discriminated between the pieces as when they applauded the flowing song of Schubert's Andante more warmly than the less melodious Allegro; as when they perceived that the grace of Delibes's waltz and the snapping gayety of his polka were pleasanter to hear than his louder and more "stagey" music of prelude and procession. Honest, intelligent, too, were overheard comments from mouth to mouth in the intermission; while good to see was as intelligent a curiosity over the instruments and the workings in general of a full orchestra. It would not be misplaced in the audiences of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Rightly for such youth are these concerts for young people designed; theirs are the likings to be fostered through the years in which most of us first discover what sort of entertainment gives us most pleasure entering, as it were, into the knowledge of good taste and bad taste; from them also must come in large part the public that twenty and thirty years hence will be the audience of the Symphony Orchestra. Enough then the reward of the day since the concert interested and pleased them. Would it have warmed them more, had the programme been lighter, had it included more short pieces? Would one movement from a symphony been wiser choice than two? Was the overture to "Egmont" somewhat over many a youngster's head? It is hard to answer. Mr. Stock's practice in Chicago favors more and shorter pieces. Mr. Damrosch's in New York agrees with Mr. Monteux's experimental programme. Inevitably, the youth of yesterday "caught on" quickly and gladly to the bright rhythms, the pretty tunes, the showy sonorities of Delibes's ballet. Yet their interest and seeming pleasure in Shubert (outside the first movement of the Unfinished Symphony) and even in the Beethoven of "Egmont" were not appreciably less.

H. T. P.

Monitor Jan 31

The Boston Symphony Orchestra laid a firm foundation stone for future audiences on January 29, when it gave a concert solely for children. Some 2500 youngsters, filling the capacity of the hall, paid strict attention to the music that was played them, liked it all, were especially pleased with the more obvious things, and clamored for more when the concert was over. Most of them heard this orchestra for the first time. Many of them had had no previous acquaintance with the kind of music set forth. All of them liked it well enough to cease their chatter when the conductor rapped on his desk and to settle down into close attention. The program was made up of Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, and Delibes' "Sylvia" ballet. For the sake of musical missionary work it is to be hoped that these concerts may be made a permanent thing in Boston. One other is scheduled for this season, on February 26.

Advertiser Feb 1

The most important concert of the week outside of the regular symphonic one was the concert for young people given Thursday afternoon by the Symphony Orchestra. It is a noble educational scheme for M. Monteux to give such concerts for the benefit chiefly of our young music-lovers, although there could be an occasional Strauss waltz or Meyerbeer march given, as Theodore Thomas used to do with his popular programs. The list of works given was as follows:

Beethoven, Egmont Overture.
Schubert, Unfinished Symphony.
Delibes, four numbers from "Sylvia."

A sensibly short program and not too heavy. It was delightful to observe that the concert was actually a children's concert. We are certain that we saw some auditors of about five years of age, and they ranged from that to fifteen, with a few adult juveniles among them. Descriptive notes of a chatty character were upon the programs, but a little verbal explanation with piano illustrations might strike home more thoroughly with the young folks. The audience filled the hall entirely and was applausive enough to show that the tonal banquet was relished.

The performance was of the usual high standard. Freedom shrieked upon the piccolo in the coda of the overture, and the violins gave their high position with surety. It may be remembered that when this overture was written the violinists rebelled against these passages as impossible, but Beethoven would not change a note.

The Schubert symphony has recently been reviewed, and the "Sylvia" ballet music (the only very light work on the list) was given as M. Monteux always gives ballet-music, with the utmost delicacy and good taste. Therefore the new educational scheme is well launched and it deserves to rosper. A second concert is to be given on February 26, again on a Thursday afternoon.

JOURNAL

ss Providence, R. I.

RACHMANINOFF, PIANIST, TO PLAY HERE TUESD

Composer Will Give Latest C certo at Infantry Hall.

A feature of the Boston Symph Orchestra concert in Infantry Hall Tuesday evening will be the appeara of Sergei Rachmaninoff. The great c poser-pianist will play his latest certo, which is dedicated to Josef mann, but the latter has never attem this tremendous music of dark, rich orings, tinging rythms and fiery maxes. This concerto is said to b replete with its creator's unique sonality and style that no one but self can do it full justice.

Pierre Monteux and his orchestra furnish additional interest by perfor Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C-m which they recently played in Bost memory of Henry Lee Higginson, founder and sustainer of this hig organization. The closing number be Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "St Razine," which is constructed upon folk songs of Russia.

Providence, R. I.

CONCERT GIVE BY SYMPHON

...f the Series by Bo Orchestra Is Largely Attended.

Infantry Hall held one of the l and most brilliant audiences in it tory at the third in the series o concerts by the Boston Symphon chestra, Pierre Monteux, conducto evening. And not only was the au one of vast size and notable bri but it was enthusiastic to a degre ly reached by conservative Prov concert-goers.

The concert, however, was unus its interest with such a genius key board as Sergei Rachmanin the solist in his own concerto.

Then, too, Mr. Monteux seemed spire his forces to an unusual for their playing, always well nig less in character, reached even heights of techincal efficiency if, that were possible and the au responded to the superb effects ac by the orchestra with spontaneous of applause.

The program follows: Symphony in C minor, Op. 67—I. Allegro co II. Andante con moto, III. Allegro IV. Allegro, Beethoven; Concert pianoforte with orchestra, in D No. 3, Op. 30—I. Allegro ma non II. Intermezzo: Adagio, III. Rachmaninoff; "Stenka Razine," phonic poem, Op. 13, Glazounoff.

Beethoven's melodious beautiful Symphony" never fails to char tireless concert goer. It is the in music, of the composer's defia fato, the battling of man with natu unseen forces. It is the story, sublime struggle and exulting t It has been played here by the Symphony Orchestra on many p occasions in the past two decad not in the memory of those who fail to attend Boston Symphony c ere has this great work been p ith such surpassing tonal beauty, xquisite phrasing, such magnificen ect as last evening.

Mr. Monteux was several times re t the end of the symphony and h signalled his men to rise and, with share the plaudits of the audience.

The other number played by th chestra was Glazounoff's "Symp Poem" in which the orchestra again played the perfection of its inherent sibilities under the skillful guidan the director.

Much of the interest of the concert tred naturally in the playing by great Rachmaninoff, of his own certo and it is quite sufficient to add he created a profound impression.

Rachmaninoff is now in his early f and at the height of his powers. only is he justly regarded as one o foremost living composers but his nificent playing stamps him as a great pianist as well.

The concerto is distinctly origina appealing in character and the first ment especially is most impressive full of melody, so that the attenti the hearer is at once riveted. The formance by the composer pianist remarkable one; remarkable even Mr. Rachmaninoff. The pianist and poser were one and the same being

Throughout the concerto the pian hibited again the astonishing skill and dexterity the are beauty and sensitiveness to quisite delicacy of raises his playing heights of perfe

The artist wa his gigantic pe

Post Traveler JANUARY 30, 1920

SYMPHONY GIVES FIRST CONCERT FOR CHILDREN

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conducting, gave its first all-children's concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, playing Beethoven's overture to "Egmont"; Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, and the suite from the ballet "Sylvia," by Delibes. The hall was filled to the last seat by the little ones from the public schools, parochial schools and settlements. Never has the orchestra played to a more eager, attentive audience. The concert, giving hopes of interesting the younger folks in classical music, was an unqualified success.

As a result of the large demand for tickets for this concert, a demand that required twice the seating capacity of the hall, a second concert for children will be given on Thursday afternoon, Feb. 26, at 4.

Jan 29 Music and Mus

CONVERSE'S SYMPHONY

HIS EMOTIONAL BACKGROUND OF THE WAR

The New Piece to Be Played at the Symphony Concerts of Tomorrow and Saturday—Course and Structure of the Music—Implications Along the Way—Ripened Work in the Voice of a Matured Composer

IN the past, war has not infrequently kindled the imagination of composers. Even in the remote sixteenth century, Clément Jannequin, a pioneer realist, was moved to depict in tones the signal victory of the French over the Swiss at the battle of Marignan. The resultant choral work has recently diverted not a little the audiences of Mr. Schindler's Schola Cantorum in New York and of the Cecilia in Boston. Weber, after stirring all Germany with his settings of Körner's "Lyre and Sword," followed up his success with a spirited cantata "Struggle and Victory." After the battle of Waterloo Beethoven sought the same end in his little known "Battle Symphony." Chaikovsky's "1812" overture, perilously near hackneyed though it be, is still a compelling record of patriotic emotion when heard under the baton of Mr. Stokowski. Even Liszt's symphonic poem "The Battle of the Huns" though of necessity inspired by Kaulbach's painting instead of the reality, may fitly be cited as another instance of music proceeding from a military source.

The recent world-war has had its proportionate share in re-vitalizing the creative forces of composers, although the vast scale of operations in the field, as well as the comprehensive disturbance of civilian and industrial life were so gigantic as rather to chill inspiration and baffle the adequate picturing of the material and spiritual upheaval involved. Mr. Casella, whose "War Films" were first played in this country under Mr Damrosch, and which were only heard here privately in a four-hand version, were composed from the suggestion of the screen and not from the actual scenes. If the "Defile of German Heavy Artillery" and the "Charge of Russian Cossacks" were exceedingly vivid pictures which well-nigh overwhelmed by their unique descriptive force, they were after all exterior in viewpoint, and left sentiment relatively untouched. On the other hand, Mr. d'Indy in his third symphony, "De Bello Fallico," dealt largely with the spiritual aspects of struggle and ultimate victory, although he also made a telling use of an irony whose significance escaped the major part of his listeners. But aside from Debussy's "Berceuse Héroique," dedicated to King Albert of Belgium, and a few scattering pieces, European composers as a rule shunned music of the war because doubtless they had known too much of its intolerable hardships to wish to perpetuate their impressions in tones.

Backgrounds

Mr. Converse, like other American musicians of his generation, did what he could to turn his professional capacities to the service of his country. He served on a committee to reorganize bands; he wrote war-songs; he addressed or conducted "community sings," arranged music for bands and orchestrated "The Star-Spangled Banner" for performance at our Symphony Concerts. Now, he like d'Indy, has put into music the emotional and spiritual reaction of the war upon himself, and like d'Indy also has chosen the symphony as the medium of expression best suited to his purpose. Since this symphony, the first he has composed since his student days at Munich, is to have its first performances at the forthcoming Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday, some statement as to the emotional background as well as some hints as to the constructive features may possibly heighten the receptivity of the listener on these occasions.

Mr. Converse's symphony has no "programme" in the ordinarily accepted sense of the term. It pictures no definite series of events, no precise personal ties; it does not attempt to illustrate. With the possible exception of the dramatic finale, it may be listened to as "absolute music." Its architecture, emotional content and orchestral effect are self-sufficient. First of all, then, this music stands the test along critical lines. It is obedient to the basic principles of symphonic form; its musical style is purely symphonic and does not at all encroach upon the domain of the symphonic poem. It remains a symphony and achieves its end as such. None the less, in composing this music Mr. Converse kept in mind certain generalized moods. He bethought himself of the common experience of thousands of young men and young women during the past few years, and the consciousness of their existence vitalized his musical thought. The main themes of the first movement symbolize in his mind the ardent and self-sacrificing youth eager to answer the call of his country, and the young girl equally bent upon having her lover assert his patriotism even at the expense of their mutual happiness. The slow movement, voicing the calm and penetrating sentiment of the thoughtful night, suggests also an intimate dialogue of lovers facing the future with a resolute acceptance of duty. The scherzo is a typical moment of play, such as were found in hundreds of instances in the football games behind the English lines, in the baseball or other sports behind those of the Americans, or in the many and widespread camps of this country. It suggests the few minutes snatched from responsibility to enjoy muscular exertion to the utmost tempered only by momentary pause for thought. The finale movement presents the march to battle, complex and titanic struggle, with the overmastering triumph of a victorious return. As stated before, these vivid and searching imaginings of Mr. Converse served first of all to quicken his musical invention through the visualization of a dramatic picture. None the less they remained subordinate in his mind to the problems of construction and expression embodied in the symphony. They must also rest securely in the background with the listener, since the intrinsically musical qualities of the symphony are their own justification. Certain features, however, of the thematic manipulation do gain in poignancy if the general emotional drift of the symphony be kept in mind. Their significance will be apparent when the structural basis of the symphony has been analyzed.

Process

The first movement proper is preceded by a short introduction, adagio misterioso. This begins with a "motto" of three chords for divided strings answered by muted horn. This motto exercises a very definite unifying power. It is utilized as an introduction to the finale; it appears in the "transition" of the same movement, again in extended form as the second subject and it adds significantly to the exaltation of the conclusion. The motto is repeated for stopped trumpets, woodwind and lower strings, and is once more answered by the horn leading directly to the first movement, allegro moderato. The first subject is given out by second violins, violas and English horn. A complementary phrase, allegro appassionato, leads to an extension of the first theme. The transition to the second subject begins with a mysterious figure in horns, violas and harp under an ascending phrase divided between oboe, flute and clarinet. This phrase plays an important part in the scherzo and is heard again at the end of the finale. The figure gains greatly in force and animation, spreading through the entire orchestra. The second theme, of feminine sensibility, is given to the oboe with accompaniment of bass clarinet, horns and lower strings. It is transferred to the violins at some length, gradually leading to a quiet close of the "exposition." The "development section," brilliant and dramatic in character, employs the first theme in various aspects, some of them in "augmented" notation. Skillful use is made of the "allegro appassionato" phrase heard just after the initial appearance of the first theme. The second subject is also drawn upon for diverse commentary. The "recapitulation" begins with a forceful utterance of the first theme by the horns. "Transition" passages and the second subject follow in due course, but with a notably varied treatment. With a short coda, maestoso, the movement ends firmly and vigorously.

The slow movement, adagio tranquillo molto e rubato, after one preliminary measure, begins with a serene and idyllic theme in a clarinet over horns and lower strings. This is continued with varying rhythms in the accompaniment. The strings carry on the same idea with flutes and celesta breathing ineffable calm and peace. A new phrase momentarily heard in the oboe is likewise taken up by violins, giving way in turn to a return of the first subject with still different rhythmical figures in flutes, clarinet and strings. A contrasting section is cast in dialogue form for solo 'cello and solo violin in which the respective phrases are derived from the first and second themes of the opening movement. After a somewhat extended elaboration of this material in which all the 'cellos and first violins are added, the first idea returns still in solo clarinet, with a freshly diversified accompaniment. The strings take the theme into a new key. Returning to its original tonality, the movement closes with fainter and fainter sonorities over which the solo violin soars.

After a few introductory measures, the scherzo begins with a jocose and playful theme in the clarinet, continued by the flute in a figure modified from the "transition" passage in the first movement. The theme is tossed from clarinet to oboe and horn with whimsical and engrossing humor. Little by little the whole orchestra becomes engaged, a transformation of the first subject in the first movement is heard, the mood becomes more animated, and the fun becomes "fast and furious." The trio is more serious and reflective, while a new modification of the transition passage serves as background. Then with a few preparatory measures the scherzo returns, but considerably abbreviated, offering a different presentation of material, but retaining enough of its essence for continuity and proportion. A droll trill on kettledrums, 'cellos and double basses and the mood of play vanishes.

The finale, somewnat further removed from orthodox course than the other movements, is still reasonably close to sonata form, and attains undeniably the emotional climax of the symphony. In it are found references to the first and second themes of the first movement, while the "motto" is employed in the transition to the second subject, of which it is an extension, as well as at the close of the movement. Material from the scherzo, part of which in turn came from the "transition" passage of the first movement, also adds additional interest to the coda. There is no attempt to follow the "cyclical" method of treatment dear to Franck and his pupils, but merely a spontaneous use of "cross references" by which structural and emotional unity are maintained. The finale opens, allegro maestoso, with a statement of the motto as in the beginning of the symphony, sonorous and assertive rather than mysterious. The stopped horn phrase of the former instance is now transferred robustly to the trombones, leading at once to the main body of the movement, molto con fuoco e marziale. Its theme is an old Indian war song, utilized by Mr. Converse in his cantata "The Peace Pipe," here given to the trumpets with an incisive triplet figure in the violas. This theme is developed at some length with sharp and intense rhythms. A reference to the principal theme of the first movement in trombones and violas introduces the transition in which the melody of the "motto" occurs in the bass. The second subject, an extremely expressive amplification of the "motto" melody is given to the oboe with first horn and strings. It is continued by the clarinet to the accompaniment of wind instruments. It passes to the violins in octaves, when the harps give additional rhythmic and coloristic support.

This episode, broadly treated and poignantly emotional, completes the "exposition." The "development" following portrays graphically the breathless strain of combat, although never losing its character as an architectural element in the structure of the movement as a whole. In it the Indian war song, given as before to the trumpet, takes the first place with varying rhythmical changes in the accompaniment. Then, the principal subject of the first movement appears in the basses combined contrapuntally with the war-song motive. This material is considerably extended by fresh rhythmic and contrapuntal devices through various tonalities. At length there is a lull in the conflict. The first theme does not "return" in conventional aspect, but instead over the high tremolo of violins a faint echo of it is heard, first in clarinet and horns, then in flutes. Then follow two meausres, derived from part of the first theme and now suggesting a premonition of a victorious song in folk-style. They are abruptly cut short by the "motto" to which is added a brilliant flourish of trumpets hinting at the plaudits of a welcoming throng. This is repeated, and the song of triumph gains in force as if the conquerors were drawing near. Again the "motto" asserts itself, and the concluding phrase of the second subject from the opening movement, at first somewhat modified, then in almost literal quotation, adds emphasis to the pæan of victory. In the coda, the second subject of the finale is heard in the trumpet over a rapid figure for clarinet, harp and violas. It passes to violins and flute with increasing animation in the accompaniment. Fragments of the Indian war-song are interwoven. As the coda swells in sonority, the principal subject from the first movement is combined with the war-song with increasing sweep and vigor. In conclusion, the "motto" is triumphantly affirmed, while the scherzo theme, in ascending figure, the dominating subject of the second theme of the first movement, heard in succession and in combination, portray graphically the comprehensive triumph of victory and safe return.

Style

Such, in outline, are the main features of the formal manipulation employed by Mr. Converse in his symphony. His devices are clear in architectural purpose, resourcefully carried out, and above all are devoid of mere concession to convention. The contrapuntal style of this symphony is especially notable; it grows out of the material and is never a scholastic substitute for inspiration. Nor is Mr. Converse's thematic treatment an exhibit of technical dexterity. It is allied to his dramatic plan, while it is the obvious outcome of a cogent grasp upon his medium of expression. Mr. Converse has been content to remain within the "frame" of the symphony, and the resultant stylistic balance seems to have insured greater resilience of expression rather than that inhibition of spontaneity which too often attacks a composer when confronted with this time-honored, if academic, form.

From the viewpoint of orchestral style, Mr. Converse has attained firm and ingratiating sonority without abuse of resource, variety and distinction in color without seeking extremes, and his indication of the polyphonic outlines has been happy in its due sense of emphasis. To select a few instances: the mysterious poetry of the opening measures of the introduction, the broad lyricism of the second theme, the delicate sonorities and "half-lights" of the slow movement, the brilliant humor of the scherzo and the dramatic grimness of the finale attest his flexible mastery of the orchestral medium.

Quality

It remains to indicate something of the musical contents of this symphony. If the "motto" of the introduction at once arrests the attention by reason of its poetry and originality, the first movement as a whole leaves an impression of a dominating vigor. The themes, characteristic in rhythm and harmonic conception, are well contrasted; the commentaries on them found in the "development" section are vitally fresh modifications, and their restatement avoids the pitfalls of monotony too often disfiguring this portion of the sonata-form. In the slow movement the atmospheric mood of thoughtful and reflective poetry is well sustained and deftly varied with a sure and delicate craftsmanship. The contagious humor of the scherzo is of an original type for which there exists no precedent in musical literature. It is at once notably fluid in musical texture, abounding in unexpected turns of thematic expansion, whimsical and droll in musical idiom, yet carried out with a sure mastery of logical continuity. In the repetition of the scherzo, where many a composer is turned into the ruts of an unwilling and literal restatement, Mr. Converse surprises and delights with his fund of new resource. The finale, as unhappily is not always the case, affords a genuine climax of sheer power in emotional realization, while the lovely and poignant second theme is perhaps the jewel of the entire work. In the development section one notes with relief the absence of the studied tricks by which conflict is usually represented, the irresistible onsweep of tragic force with its telling quotations from other movements, and the compelling realization at the end, of a triumph which is not material but inherently spiritual.

The dominating quality of this symphony is its vitality. It possesses a mature and deep-rooted vigor which one involuntarily compares with the immeasurable outpouring of energy which this country was put to bear on entering the war. This parallel seems so apt that Mr. Converse seems unconsciously to have been the spokesman of his country's heart. It is a concrete expression of "the American spirit" from a new angle, which as far as I know has not been approached in this country. Other American-born composers in Mr. Converse's generation have written symphonies in which there may have been more subtlety of musical expression, greater complexity of outline and striving towards originality. But these works, despite their virtues, have suffered as symphonies. In striving to be more "personal" these composers have lost their grip on the fundamental problems of symphonic form and style. Mr. Converse has not forgotten these responsibilities, and the gain is his and ours. He has become more universal but none the less eloquent, and unless all signs fail he is likely to attain fresh laurels at the forthcoming Symphony Concerts.

EDWARD BURLINGAME HILL

American

NY, JANUARY 31, 1920

NEW CONVERSE WORK CHARMS

Boston Composer's Symphony Fanciful and Artistic; Bedetti Skilful Soloist

By FRED J. McISAAC.

A new and interesting symphony by a Boston composer, Frederick S. Converse, was the feature of yesterday's program at Symphony Hall. Mr. Converse wrote in C minor. It seemed to me that this composition contains the best work that he has done since the "Mystic Trumpeter."

The central idea is a musical expression of some of the emotions and trials of our young people during the war. There is no effort at description or program music, but the moods and fancies of the symphony suggest something of the sort. To my mind the second and third movements are the most attractive, the scherzo being quite delightful and ingenious. Mr. Converse's istrumentation throughout is noted for its cleverness and skillful use of the colors of the different orchestral voices. The finale is very impressive.

Jean Bedetti, the new French cellist of the orchestra, was soloist and in the Schumann concerto for that instrument gave evidence of exceptional talent.

Monitor

, SATURDAY, JANUAR

MUSIC 31

The Music of Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The years of war through which the world has been passing are beginning now to be reflected in the creative works from those who minister to us through the arts. Such a work is the new symphony in C minor by Frederick S. Converse, which had its first presentation at the Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on January 30. It is a grave and thoughtful work and a first hearing impresses one that it is the best thing that has thus far come from Mr. Converse's pen. The weight of the war years hung heavy over him as he wrote it, and even in the scherzo-like third movement there is little lightness of touch, although the ending is clev... There is a duet for 'cello and so... violin with a quiet background ... accompaniment in the second mov... ment, which is very lovely. The la... movement seems the most closely k... of the four, though the whole sy... phony is a scholarly piece of work.

Jean Bedetti, the first 'cellist of t... orchestra, left his place to play t... Schumann concerto and received t... warmest of applause, and deserved... for his playing. His intonation ... impeccable, and he has a flair for t... right nuance that betokens the tr... artist. He is a rare addition to t... orchestra.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easte... overture concluded the program.

SYMPHONY TO GIVE CARPENTER NUMBER

Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will introduce to Boston at the concerts of Friday and Saturday, Feb. 13 and 14, the Piano Concertino by John Alden Carpenter, American composer. The soloist will be Robert E. Schmitz, French pianist. Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony No. 3 and Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala" complete the program.

NEW CONVERSE SYMPHONY MADE GOOD IMPRESSION

Tribune

The Symphony in C minor by F. S. Converse, given for the first time at the Symphony concerts yesterday afternoon, was well received. In it the composer seeks to give his impressions of some features of the world war. The first hearing leaves the feeling that the work, while interesting in spots, is not as a whole up to Mr. Converse's best, nor does it seem to convey any adequate idea of the great conflict. Perhaps it's too early for as clear an expression of that great event as could be desired. Mr. Monteux gave the work a fine reading.

Second only in interest to the first hearing of the Converse number was the first appearance of Mr. Dedetti, leader of the 'cellos, as soloist. He elected the Schumann concerto and played it as can few 'cellists of today. True artist that he is, never did he lose sight of the fact a that the composition came first and the artist second.

A notably brilliant reading was given Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Russian Easter."

There will be no concerts the coming week, the orchestra making one of its periodical trips.

Jan 29 Music and Mus

CONVERSE'S SYMPHONY

HIS EMOTIONAL BACKGROUND OF THE WAR

The New Piece to Be Played at the Symphony Concerts of Tomorrow and Saturday—Course and Structure of the Music—Implications Along the Way—Ripened Work in the Voice of a Matured Composer

IN the past, war has not infrequently kindled the imagination of composers. Even in the remote sixteenth century, Clément Jannequin, a pioneer realist, was moved to depict in tones the signal victory of the French over the Swiss at the battle of Marignan. The resultant choral work has recently diverted not a little the audiences of Mr. Schindler's Schola Cantorum in New York and of the Cecilia in Boston. Weber, after stirring all Germany with his settings of Körner's "Lyre and Sword," followed up his success with a spirited cantata "Struggle and Victory." After the battle of Waterloo Beethoven sought the same end in his little known "Battle Symphony." Chaikovsky's "1812" overture, perilously near hackneyed though it be, is still a compelling record of patriotic emotion when heard under the baton of Mr. Stokowski. Even Liszt's symphonic poem "The Battle of the Huns" though of necessity inspired by Kaulbach's painting instead of the reality, may fitly be cited as another instance of music proceeding from a military source.

The recent world-war has had its proportionate share in re-vitalizing the creative forces of composers, although the vast scale of operations in the field, as well as the comprehensive disturbance of civilian and industrial life were so gigantic as rather to chill inspiration and baffle the adequate picturing of the material and spiritual upheaval involved. Mr. Casella, whose "War Films" were first played in this country under Mr Damrosch, and which were only heard here privately in a four-hand version, were composed from the suggestion of the screen and not from the actual scenes. If the "Defile of German Heavy Artillery" and the "Charge of Russian Cossacks" were exceedingly vivid pictures which well-nigh overwhelmed by their unique descriptive force, they were after all exterior in viewpoint, and left sentiment relatively untouched. On the other hand, Mr. d'Indy in his third symphony, "De Bello Gallico," dealt largely with the spiritual aspects of struggle and ultimate victory, although he also made a telling use of an irony whose significance escaped the major part of his listeners. But aside from Debussy's "Berceuse Héroique," dedicated to King Albert of Belgium, and a few scattering pieces, European composers as a rule shunned music of the war because doubtless they had known too much of its intolerable hardships to wish to perpetuate their impressions in tones.

Backgrounds

Mr. Converse, like other American musicians of his generation, did what he could to turn his professional capacities to the service of his country. He served on a committee to reörganize bands; he wrote war-songs; he addressed or conducted "community sings," arranged music for bands and orchestrated "The Star-Spangled Banner" for performance at our Symphony Concerts. Now, he like d'Indy, has put into music the emotional and spiritual reaction of the war upon himself, and like d'Indy also has chosen the symphony as the medium of expression best suited to his purpose. Since this symphony, the first he has composed since his student days at Munich, is to have its first performances at the forthcoming Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday, some statement as to the emotional background as well as some hints as to the constructive features may possibly heighten the receptivity of the listener on these occasions.

Mr. Converse's symphony has no "programme" in the ordinarily accepted sense of the term. It pictures no definite series of events, no precise personal ties; it does not attempt to illustrate. With the possible exception of the dramatic finale, it may be listened to as "absolute music." Its architecture, emotional content and orchestral effect are self-sufficient. First of all, then, this music stands the test along critical lines. It is obedient to the basic principles of symphonic form; its musical style is purely symphonic and does not at all encroach upon the domain of the symphonic poem. It remains a symphony and achieves its end as such. None the less, in composing this music Mr. Converse kept in mind certain generalized moods. He bethought himself of the common experience of thousands of young men and young women during the past few years, and the consciousness of their existence vitalized his musical thought. The main themes of the first movement symbolize in his mind the ardent and self-sacrificing youth eager to answer the call of his country, and the young girl equally bent upon having her lover assert his patriotism even at the expense of their mutual happiness. The slow movement, voicing the calm and penetrating sentiment of the thoughtful night, suggests also an intimate dialogue of lovers facing the future with a resolute acceptance of duty. The scherzo is a typical moment of play, such as were found in hundreds of instances in the football games behind the English lines, in the baseball or other sports behind those of the Americans, or in the many and widespread camps of this country. It suggests the few minutes snatched from responsibility to enjoy muscular exertion to the utmost tempered only by momentary pause for thought. The finale movement presents the march to battle, complex and titanic struggle, with the overmastering triumph of a victorious return. As stated before, these vivid and searching imaginings of Mr. Converse served first of all to quicken his musical invention through the visualization of a dramatic picture. None the less they remained subordinate in his mind to the problems of construction and expression embodied in the symphony. They must also rest securely in the background with the listener, since the intrinsically musical qualities of the symphony are their own justification. Certain features, however, of the thematic manipulation do gain in poignancy if the general emotional drift of the symphony be kept in mind. Their significance will be apparent when the structural basis of the symphony has been analyzed.

Process

The first movement proper is preceded by a short introduction, adagio misterioso. This begins with a "motto" of three chords for divided strings answered by muted horn. This motto exercises a very definite unifying power. It is utilized as an introduction to the finale; it appears in the "transition" of the same movement, again in extended form as the second subject and it adds sigrificantly to the exaltation of the conclusion. The motto is repeated for stopped trumpets, woodwind and lower strings, and is once more answered by the horn leading directly to the first movement, allegro moderato. The first subject is given out by second violins, violas and English horn. A complementary phrase, allegro appassionato, leads to an extension of the first theme. The transition to the second subject begins with a mysterious figure in horns, violas and harp under an ascending phrase divided between oboe, flute and clarinet. This phrase plays an important part in the scherzo and is heard again at the end of the finale. The figure gains greatly in force and animation, spreading through the entire orchestra. The second theme, of feminine sensibility, is given to the oboe with accompaniment of bass clarinet, horns and lower strings. It is transferred to the violins at some length, gradually leading to a quiet close of the "exposition." The "development section," brilliant and dramatic in character, employs the first theme in various aspects, some of them in "augmented" notation. Skillful use is made of the "allegro appassionato" phrase heard just after the initial appearance of the first theme. The second subject is also drawn upon for diverse commentary. The "recapitulation" begins with a forceful utterance of the first theme by the horns. "Transition" passages and the second subject follow in due course, but with a notably varied treatment. With a short coda, maestoso, the movement ends firmly and vigorously.

The slow movement, adagio tranquillo molto e rubato, after one preliminary measure, begins with a serene and idyllic theme in a clarinet over horns and lower strings. This is continued with varying rhythms in the accompaniment. The strings carry on the same idea with flutes and celesta breathing ineffable calm and peace. A new phrase momentarily heard in the oboe is likewise taken up by violins, giving way in turn to a return of the first subject with still different rhythmical figures in flutes, clarinet and strings. A contrasting section is cast in dialogue form for solo 'cello and solo violin in which the respective phrases are derived from the first and second themes of the opening movement. After a somewhat extended elaboration of this material in which all the 'cellos and first violins are added, the first idea returns still in solo clarinet, with a freshly diversified accompaniment. The strings take the theme into a new key. Returning to its original tonality, the movement closes with fainter and fainter sonorities over which the solo violin soars.

After a few introductory measures, the scherzo begins with a jocose and playful theme in the clarinet, continued by the flute in a figure modified from the "transition" passage in the first movement. The theme is tossed from clarinet to oboe and horn with whimsical and engrossing humor. Little by little the whole orchestra becomes engaged, a transformation of the first subject in the first movement is heard, the mood becomes more animated, and the fun becomes "fast and furious." The trio is more serious and reflective, while a new modification of the transition passage serves as background. Then with a few preparatory measures the scherzo returns, but considerably abbreviated, offering a different presentation of material, but retaining enough of its essence for continuity and proportion. A droll trill on kettledrums, 'cellos and double basses and the mood of play vanishes.

The finale, somewnat further removed from orthodox course than the other movements, is still reasonably close to sonata form, and attains undeniably the emotional climax of the symphony. In it are found references to the first and second themes of the first movement, while the "motto" is employed in the transition to the second subject, of which it is an extension, as well as at the close of the movement. Material from the scherzo, part of which in turn came from the "transition" passage of the first movement, also adds additional interest to the coda. There is no attempt to follow the "cyclical" method of treatment dear to Franck and his pupils, but merely a spontaneous use of "cross references" by which structural and emotional unity are maintained. The finale opens, allegro maestoso, with a statement of the motto as in the beginning of the symphony, sonorous and assertive rather than mysterious. The stopped horn phrase of the former instance is now transferred robustly to the trombones, leading at once to the main body of the movement, molto con fuoco e marziale. Its theme is an old Indian war song, utilized by Mr. Converse in his cantata "The Peace Pipe," here given to the trumpets with an incisive triplet figure in the violas. This theme is developed at some length with sharp and intense rhythms. A reference to the principal theme of the first movement in trombones and violas introduces the transition in which the melody of the "motto" occurs in the bass. The second subject, an extremely expressive amplification of the "motto" melody is given to the oboe with first horn and strings. It is continued by the clarinet to the accompaniment of wind instruments. It passes to the violins in octaves, when the harps give additional rhythmic and coloristic support.

This episode, broadly treated and poignantly emotional, completes the "exposition." The "development" following portrays graphically the breathless strain of combat, although never losing its character as an architectural element in the structure of the movement as a whole. In it the Indian war song, given as before to the trumpet, takes the first place with varying rhythmical changes in the accompaniment. Then, the principal subject of the first movement appears in the basses combined contrapuntally with the war-song motive This material is considerably extended by fresh rhythmic and contrapuntal devices through various tonalities. At length there is a lull in the conflict. The first theme does not "return" in conventional aspect, but instead over the high tremolo of violins a faint echo of it is heard, first in clarinet and horns, then in flutes. Then follow two meausres, derived from part of the first theme and now suggesting a premonition of a victorious song in folk-style. They are abruptly cut short by the "motto" to which is added a brilliant flourish of trumpets hinting at the plaudits of a welcoming throng. This is repeated, and the song of triumph gains in force as if the conquerors were drawing near. Again the "motto" asserts itself, and the concluding phrase of the second subject from the opening movement, at first somewhat modified, then in almost literal quotation, adds emphasis to the pæan of victory. In the coda, the second subject of the finale is heard in the trumpet over a rapid figure for clarinet, harp and violas. It passes to violins and flute with increasing animation in the accompaniment. Fragments of the Indian war-song are interwoven. As the coda swells in sonority, the principal subject from the first movement is combined with the war-song with increasing sweep and vigor. In conclusion, the "motto" is triumphantly affirmed, while the scherzo theme, in ascending figure, the dominating subject of the second theme of the first movement heard in succession and in combination, portray graphically the comprehensive triumph of victory and safe return.

Style

Such, in outline, are the main features of the formal manipulation employed by Mr. Converse in his symphony. His devices are clear in architectural purpose, resourcefully carried out, and above all are devoid of mere concession to convention. The contrapuntal style of this symphony is especially notable; it grows out of the material and is never a scholastic substitute for inspiration. Nor is Mr. Converse's thematic treatment an exhibit of technical dexterity. It is allied to his dramatic plan, while it is the obvious outcome of a cogent grasp upon his medium of expression. Mr. Converse has been content to remain within the "frame" of the symphony, and the resultant stylistic balance seems to have insured greater resilience of expression rather than that inhibition of spontaneity which too often attacks a composer when confronted with this time-honored, if academic, form.

From the viewpoint of orchestral style, Mr. Converse has attained firm and ingratiating sonority without abuse of resource, variety and distinction in color without seeking extremes, and his indication of the polyphonic outlines has been happy in its due sense of emphasis. To select a few instances: the mysterious poetry of the opening measures of the introduction, the broad lyricism of the second theme, the delicate sonorities and "half-lights" of the slow movement, the brilliant humor of the scherzo and the dramatic grimness of the finale attest his flexible mastery of the orchestral medium.

Quality

It remains to indicate something of the musical contents of this symphony. If the "motto" of the introduction at once arrests the attention by reason of its poetry and originality, the first movement as a whole leaves an impression of a dominating vigor. The themes, characteristic in rhythm and harmonic concention, are well contrasted; the commentaries on them found in the "development" section are vitally fresh modifications, and their restatement avoids the pitfalls of monotony too often disfiguring this portion of the sonata-form. In the slow movement the atmospheric mood of thoughtful and reflective poetry is well sustained and deftly varied with a sure and delicate craftsmanship. The contagious humor of the scherzo is of an original type for which there exists no precedent in musical literature. It is at once notably fluid in musical texture, abounding in unexpected turns of thematic expansion, whimsical and droll in musical idiom, yet carried out with a sure mastery of logical continuity. In the repetition of the scherzo, where many a composer is turned into the ruts of an unwilling and literal restatement, Mr. Converse surprises and delights with his fund of new resource. The finale, as unhappily is not always the case, affords a genuine climax of sheer power in emotional realization, while the lovely and poignant second theme is perhaps the jewel of the entire work. In the development section one notes with relief the absence of the studied tricks by which conflict is usually represented, the irresistible onsweep of tragic force with its telling quotations from other movements, and the compelling realization at the end, of a triumph which is not material but inherently spiritual.

The dominating quality of this symphony is its vitality. It possesses a mature and deep-rooted vigor which one involuntarily compares with the immeasurable outpouring of energy which this country brought to bear on entering the war. This parallel seems so apt that Mr. Converse seems unconsciously to have been the spokesman of his country's heart. It is a concrete expression of "the American spirit" from a new angle, which as far as I know has not been approached in this country. Other American-born composers in Mr. Converse's generation have written symphonies in which there may have been more subtlety of musical expression, greater complexity of outline and striving towards originality. But these works, despite their virtues, have suffered as symphonies. In striving to be more "personal" these composers have lost their grip on the fundamental problems of symphonic form and style. Mr. Converse has not forgotten these responsibilities, and the gain is his and ours. He has become more universal but none the less eloquent, and unless all signs fail he is likely to attain fresh laurels at the forthcoming Symphony Concerts.

EDWARD BURLINGAME HILL

American

[illegible], January 31, 1920

NEW CONVERSE WORK CHARMS

Boston Composer's Symphony Fanciful and Artistic; Bedetti Skilful Soloist

By FRED J. McISAAC.

A new and interesting symphony by a Boston composer, Frederick S. Converse, was the feature of yesterday's program at Symphony Hall. Mr. Converse wrote in C minor. It seemed to me that this composition contains the best work that he has done since the "Mystic Trumpeter."

The central idea is a musical expression of some of the emotions and trials of our young people during the war. There is no effort at description or program music, but the moods and fancies of the symphony suggest something of the sort. To my mind the second and third movements are the most attractive, the scherzo being quite delightful and ingenious. Mr. Converse's istrumentation throughout is noted for its cleverness and skillful use of the colors of the different orchestral voices. The finale is very impressive.

Jean Bedetti, the new French cellist of the orchestra, was soloist and in the Schumann concerto for that instrument gave evidence of exceptional talent.

Monitor

[illegible], SATURDAY, JANUAR

MUSIC 31

The Music of Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The years of war through which the world has been passing are beginning now to be reflected in the creative works from those who minister to us through the arts. Such a work is the new symphony in C minor by Frederick S. Converse, which had its first presentation at the Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on January 30. It is a grave and thoughtful work and a first hearing impresses one that it is the best thing that has thus far come from Mr. Converse's pen. The weight of the war years hung heavy over him as he wrote it, and even in the scherzo-like third movement there is little lightness touch, although the ending is clev There is a duet for 'cello and sc violin with a quiet background accompaniment in the second mov ment, which is very lovely. The la movement seems the most closely k of the four, though the whole sy phony is a scholarly piece of work.

Jean Bedetti, the first 'cellist of t orchestra, left his place to play t Schumann concerto and received t warmest of applause, and deserved for his playing. His intonation impeccable, and he has a flair for t right nuance that betokens the tr artist. He is a rare addition to t orchestra.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easte overture concluded the program.

SYMPHONY TO GIVE CARPENTER NUMBER

Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will introduce to Boston at the concerts of Friday and Saturday, Feb. 13 and 14, the Piano Concertino by John Alden Carpenter, American composer. The soloist will be Robert E. Schmitz, French pianist. Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony No. 3 and Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala" complete the program.

NEW CONVERSE SYMPHONY MADE GOOD IMPRESSION

The Symphony in C minor by F. S. Converse, given for the first time at the Symphony concerts yesterday afternoon, was well received. In it the composer seeks to give his impressions of some features of the world war. The first hearing leaves the feeling that the work, while interesting in spots, is not as a whole up to Mr. Converse's best, nor does it seem to convey any adequate idea of the great conflict. Perhaps it's too early for as clear an expression of that great event as could be desired. Mr. Monteux gave the work a fine reading.

Second only in interest to the first hearing of the Converse number was the first appearance of Mr.—Dedetti, leader of the 'cellos, as soloist. He elected the Schumann concerto and played it as can few 'cellists of today. True artist that he is, never did he lose sight of the fact that the composition came first and the artist second.

A notably brilliant reading was given Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Russian Easter."

There will be no concerts the coming week, the orchestra making one of its periodical trips.

Herald Jan 31

PLAY SYMPHONY INSPIRED BY WAR

Converse's Work Portrays Emotions Evolved by Titanic Conflict

SHUDDER OF NATURE IN MYSTIC OPENING

By PHILIP HALE

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Converse, Symphony in C-minor (first performance); Schumann, Violoncello Concerto (Mr. Bedetti, violoncellist); Rimsky-Korsakoff, "The Russian Easter."

Mr. Converse's symphony, composed during the summer and fall of 1919, was inspired by the great war; it expresses moods and emotion due to the terrible struggle. Mr. Converse says there is no program, but he has told what he had in mind. Even if he had said merely that the war had urged him to composition, a hearer of the music might easily shape a program for himself that probably would not be wholly foreign to Mr. Converse's thoughts. He would find in the two chief themes of the first movement, the heroic resolve of men and the tender solicitude of women, loving and anxious; he would trace the employment of these themes. In the Finale he would note the unmistakably martial character, the fanfares of victory, the tumultuous rejoicing, the ecstatic reunions. For this Finale the familiar lines of Schiller describing the return of troops in triumph might serve as a motto. And in the solemn section of this Finale, he would recognize the remembrance of those that perished nobly for an ideal.

Yet those portions of the Symphony that appeal especially to one hearing it for the first time are not indissolubly associated with the thought of war. We refer to the second movement, a Nocturne of rare beauty, in which a poetic mood is maintained throughout, and the light-hearted Scherzo, a spontaneous expression of gaiety, with contrasting measures of a fateful nature. To these movements must be added the mysterious opening of the Symphony, which are as a shudder of nature foreseeing the impending cataclasm. These pages seem to us the most noteworthy. Mr. Converse may well be proud of them.

In the first movement the expression of heroism, of the spasm and shudder of war, of the world's turmoil, is more convincing than the theme given to woman. This theme has a homely character—we use the word "homely" in its old sense, it has warmth, but it does not make an irresistible appeal; it is dangerously near the commonplace. So, too, in the finale there are pages that are conventionally triumphal, though the composer has avoided the vulgarity that often taints musical jubilation. It is not an easy thing to be strikingly jubilant even with a full modern orchestra. It is easy to be merely noisy. Mr. Converse has shunned this pitfall. It was given to Beethoven with a comparatively small orchestra, an orchestra that a young composer today would despise, to voice the frantic joy of a liberated people in his overture to "Egmont."

One finds in this symphony a curious mixture of ultra-modern musical thought—witness the opening measures of the symphony and those of the nocturne—and that which is orthodox and of long standing. One also finds in the first movement and in the finale a lack of condensation, a too great amplification of rhetorical expression, so many climaxes that the effect of the one great climax is anticipated or at least lessened.

The performance was a brilliant one; carefully prepared, carefully considered, conducted and played appreciatively and sympathetically.

Mr. Bedetti did not choose for his first appearance as soloist at a Symphony concert a work in which he could win easy success. Schumann's concerto is seldom performed; when it is played it is for the sake of the romantically dreamy and lovely andante. Mr. Bedetti, it is needless to say, played this andante most poetically; but he did more than this; by his technical skill, his unfailing accuracy, his beautiful tonal quality, his phrasing, his fine differentiation, he made the other portions of the concerto interesting; perhaps it is not extravagant to say, engrossing. Even the passage-work, inherently dry, was vitalized by his skill, tone and taste.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture had not been performed at a Symphony concert since 1897, the year that "Scheherezade" introduced this composer to a Symphony audience. Yesterday the performance of this subtly and gorgeously orchestrated overture revealed again the great talent—he was a genius in orchestration—of this man of Oriental feeling, a disciple of Berlioz and Liszt. How infinitely varied are the repetitions of the liturgical theme! Here are repetitions of which one does not weary.

This concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week. The program of Feb. 13-14 is as follows: Schumann, Symphony in E flat, No. 3 (Rhenish); Carpenter, Concertino for piano and orchestra (first time here); Goldmark, Overture to "Sakuntala." Mr. E. Robert Schmitz, a Parisian pianist, now sojourning in New York, will play in Boston for the first time.

Post Jan 31

CONVERSE'S SYMPHONY PERFORMED

First Hearing of Work —Bedetti a First Rank Artist

BY OLIN DOWNES

F. S. Converse's Symphony in C minor was played for the first time at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. On this occasion Jean Bedetti, the new first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony, made his first appearance at these concerts as soloist, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Russian Easter," brought the programme to an end.

ON WAR EXPERIENCES

Mr. Converse states in the programme book that he took to the symphony form as his vehicle of expression, not because he had determined to write a symphony, but simply because this form seemed the most fitting vehicle for the natural and logical expression of his ideas. The symphony, which was completed in 1919, has no detailed programme, but there is the thought of "the experiences" of the young men and women of our land during the trials of the war—the thought of high resolve, of farewells, of the triumphant return and reunion.

The opening movement is spirited, with motives stern and tender, with three introductory chords which occur significantly in the course of the work. There is a slow movement in the character of a nocturne, a portrayal, perhaps, of moonshine and flowing waters; a gay scherzo; a finale which is energetic, martial, with reminiscences of themes of earlier movements.

Two Distinct Elements

The curious thing is that on a first hearing this symphony resolves itself into two divisions of elements—the first and fourth movements, and the second and third. In the first and fourth movements Mr. Converse is symphonic in thought as well as in method. In the two middle movements, which are much simpler, he is simple and melodious, and not to our mind, symphonic—this though the outward dictates of the form of the symphony are followed. Nor do the two middle movements seem especially related, despite such thematic affiliations as there may be with the other two movements. And what have they, necessarily, to do with the war?

The audience enjoyed these movements with reason. The slow movement is a simple song without words. There are long, melodious phrases, and pretty accompaniments. The scherzo is for us trivial and wholly beneath the symphonic ideal, and also rather too short for just proportion with the other movements. This may be said: The composer dares to use well-known chords, and musical phrases of orthodox divisions and cadences, without pretence or affectation. His sincerity is felt, his thought is readily grasped. But for us this is not symphonic music, and we do not have the feeling of continuity of thought running through the four movements of the work.

Large Masses of Tone

The other two movements are very vigorous in feeling, admirably put together, with a sure hand in the development of the themes and with very brilliant and pleasing instrumentation. Perhaps too many instruments are used too much of the time, but the tonal canvass is itself large, and large masses of tone are not disproportionate to its measurements. But on initial acquaintance with this symphony we do not find the distinction of themes and the closely welded development, the long sustained musical breath of, for example, Mr. Converse's tone poem after Whitman, "The Mystic Trumpeter."

The work, with all its sincerity, straightforwardness and practiced workmanship, does not remove the scepticism we entertain of any music inspired by the recent war. We believe that substantial musical results of the war will not be seen for perhaps another generation.

Bedetti a First Rank Artist

Mr. Bedetti proved himself an extraordinary artist. In all respects he is an addition to the Symphony Orchestra of which that organization may well feel proud.

The Schumann concerto is not in itself a strong work, but Mr. Bedetti gave so artistic and so intimate a performance of this music, he played it with such consummate technical skill, such fine molding of every phrase and such genuinely Schumannish sentiment, that one was glad instead of sorry to have listened to it, from beginning to end, once more. The conception of the interpreter was an orchestral conception, a conception of the work as a whole, and not the conception of a soloist who was every moment seeking a chance for individual display.

Even today, when players should know better, how often the sensation obtains of a player who performs his solo as brilliantly as possible, resting for a little while during which the orchestra makes a noise to distract the audience, and then going at it again, with renewed bounce and vigor. But Mr. Bedetti was conveying the musical thought of the composer, whether in singing passages to which he gave the utmost richness and variety of tone color, or in tracing fleet arabesques about a melody given to the instruments of the orchestra.

His technical resources seemed to be endless. There was no difficulty, however unwieldy the occasional passage for solo instrument, which he did not completely and masterfully surmount, and every talent of the performer was modestly subordinated to the message of the music. Mr. Bedetti was recalled with a warmth most emphatically deserved. He took his place as one of the most gifted 'cellists who have been associated with this orchestra.

Russian Easter Music

Rinsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter" is a typical musical sketch of a Russian scene. It echoes the antiphonal chants, the churchly ceremonies and festivities of the Russian Christmastide. There is not very much real musical development of the old model chants of the Greek church, but simply tone-painting of the most gorgeous kind-tone painting as it were, in reds and blues and golds of the interior of a cathedral during Easter services, and a close with the ringing of bells, which echoes jubilantly the outbursts of the choir and the popular rejoicing.

The orchestral performances of the afternoon were of the highest quality, and Mr. Converse's symphony, in particular, was received with much enthusiasm.

Advertiser Feb 1

Bedetti Scores Triumph at Symphony

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

Converse, Symphony in C minor.
Schumann, Violoncello Concerto.
Soloist, M. Jean Bedetti.
Rimsky-Korsakoff, "The Russian Easter," overture on Russian church themes

IT is gratifying to see that the great violoncello traditions, in which Boston has been prominent even from the days of Fritz Giese, have now a new and excellent exponent in M. Jean Bedetti. One could have wished a more effective work for the artist, for although there are some fine touches in this concerto, the highest powers of Schumann are not present and the cello works of Lalo, Boellman, Saint-Saens, Volkmann, or even of Dvorak, are more effective. All the more credit, then, to the artist who carried the composition to success. M. Bedetti has abundant technique and temperament, too, although there were not many opportunities to display the latter. He has a sympathetic rather than a broad tone, but his effects upon the C string were striking. His cadenza work was remarkably fluent. He was greatly applauded and on Friday afternoon was recalled three times at the end of the concerto.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's work, the "Easter Overture," is caviare to the general, but it is as Russian as Bortsch. Russia is the land of wonderful basses, which are very prominent in the church music, and the deep and ponderous effects of the trombones in this work called these vividly to mind. Many of the ecclesiastical works are founded on the Byzantine scale (the scale of C with D and A flat), and this gave a flavor that was very quaint at times. As the overture is dedicated to the memory of Moussorgsky and Borodin, one can imagine that it is entirely Muscovite in its construction; there is not a trace of German influence in its measures. There were strange antiphonal passages between trombones and strings that were finely brought out, and these points, if not beautiful, were at least bizarre and unusual. There was but little continuity in the work, and its sketchy character may be considered a fault. Everything was dramatic; sudden and portentous pause ushered in the wildest percussion, from Glockenspiel to gong. In fact, there was so much percussion that at times one thought rather of a blacksmith's shop than of a church. The end was noisy beyond compare, the din suggesting wild festivity in which vodka played a prominent part. All this was read by the conductor in a flttingly emphatic manner, and the whole work was so out of the common that it became very attractive and interesting, perhaps beyond its intrinsic musical merits.

* * *

The new symphony by Mr. Converse is an important work. Although we admire this eminent composer most in the freer forms, where his poetic instinct has more unrestricted play, yet his mastery of the modern orchestra and his melodic thought make itself felt no matter what form he may choose. Mr. Converse is not one of the modern noise-mongers. He shows himself master of the symphonic form instead of being mastered by it, for the shape of the epic form is preserved, but the movements are not conventional. The scherzo, for example, which we found the most interesting portion of the work, has the regular form, but with such varied treatment that it may stand as a model for modern composers.

Continuity and homogeneity is attained by considerable transference of thematic material from movement to movement, and there is also one chief figure (three chords) which plays an important part in the finale as well as in the first movement. Without seeking a definite picture of the recent war in the work, one can recognize the note of triumph and victory in the great climax of the last movement of this American heroic symphony, yet the two interior movements show us the composer in his most natural mood. Mr. Converse has probably never given us a work in which so much of learning is displayed. There is an abundance of contrapuntal treatment and, as already intimated, the great modern orchestra is handled with complete mastery.

* * *

We are told that there is a real Indian war song used in the last movement. We are not of those who believe that there is any reason to go back to aboriginal, tribal music. MacDowell's Indian Suite and the last movement of this symphony are interesting and beautiful because of the treatment of the theme and not because of its origin or of its intrinsic worth. The symphony as a whole is too intricate to become immediately popular, but repeated hearing would reveal many unexpected beauties. The military character of the finale and the sparkling vein of the scherzo, however, are sufficiently obvious to win immediate recognition.

The execution of the work was an excellent one and M. Monteux had evidently spared no pains to make this first performance a success. Altogether the new symphony is a most important addition to the American repertoire, and we trust that at least the scherzo will also be heard abroad, to prove to Europeans that there are American symphonies worthy of the classical name.

CONVERSE LIMNS WAR MOODS IN MUSIC

Symphony in C Minor Given First Time in Public —New Composition by an American Warmly Applauded

The chief item on the program of yesterday's Symphony concert was the first performance in public of the Symphony in C minor by F. S. Converse, completed last month at his home in Westwood and begun last August at Lake Sunapee, N H. The composer explains in a note printed in the program book that although the work has no "program," "there is an expression of moods and emotions, which I think reflects something of the feelings that we have all been through during the stress of the last few years.

"I had in mind the experiences of the young men and women of our land during the trials of the war. The two main themes of the first movement, suggesting the high resolve of the youths and the tenderer feminine traits of the maidens, the wives and mothers, move through the whole work, like characters through the varied situations of a drama.

"The point of view is subjective and human, rather than impersonal and epic. I have used the symphonic form because it suited my needs of expression, not from my especial desire to write a conventional symphony. The large modern orchestra is used."

Fine Orchestral Technique

These quotations sufficiently explain the scope and intention of the new work, and suggest comparisons with "Wellington's Victory" by Beethoven, Tschaikowsky's "1812 Overture," Liszt's "Battle of the Huns" and D'Indy's "Brief Symphony on the War in France," recently played here, not forgetting Debussy's "Berceuse Heroique," dedicated to King Albert of Belgium.

Mr Converse avoids the error made by some of his predecessors in literal echoing of the tumult and shouting of warfare. Like Beethoven in the "Pastoral" Symphony, he is concerned chiefly with the depiction of moods. There were many subtle touches which proved his fine orchestral technique and ingenuity in thematic development. The result is one of the best of American compositions. It was warmly applauded by yesterday's audience.

The scherzo with its sparkling theme and cleverly interwoven rhythms is a genuine triumph. Mr Converse excels in such music. The slow movement, as Mr Converse says, is "a sort of nocturne, quiet and tranquil as a moonlit night by some still lake." The first movement and finale alternate adroitly between martial flourishes of trumpets and gentler, more serious, more feminine passages.

These contrasts add attractiveness to the work and give it the variety without which, proverbially, there can be no unity. There is little doubt that this symphony will soon be heard in many other cities, and applauded for its many merits.

Solo From Schumann

Jen Bedetti, the new first 'cellist of the orchestra, played the solo part in Schumann's Concerto in A minor with the skill and taste which have been evident in the numerous solo passages he has played in various works this season.

He surpasses any of his recent predecessors and adds strength to one of the most salient portions of the orchestra. The concerto is rather too long for the value of the musical material it contains, but well adapted to the purpose of allowing the soloist to display his technique.

The other number was Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Russian Easter," based on the music of the Russian Church, of the sort sung here by the Russian Cathedral Choir of New York two years ago. It has not been played here since 1897, and is far inferior to "Scheherezade" and "Antar," though not without interest, especially for the student of orchestration.

There are no more Symphony concerts until Feb 13 and 14, as the orchestra goes on tour after tonight.

Globe Feb 1

Events and Comments

There are no Symphony concerts this week, since the orchestra is again on tour. The soloist on Feb 13 and 14 will be the new pianist, who has a great reputation in his native France, Robert Schmitz. He will play the piano part in John Alden Carpenter's Concertino. The Symphony will be Schumann's "Rhenish."

Advertiser Feb 1

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts on February 13 and 14, Pierre Monteux will introduce to Boston the concertino for piano and orchestra by John Alden Carpenter, the Chicago composer. The piano part will be played by E. Robert Schmitz, the French pianist. Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony and Carl Goldmark's Overture to "Sakuntala" will also be played.

Transcript Jan 30

News and Prospects

As Mr. Monteux long since proposed, Mr. Carpenter's Concertino for piano and orchestra will be played for the first times in Boston at the Symphony Concerts of Feb. 13 and 14, with Mr. Schmitz for assisting pianist. Schumann's Rhenish Symphony will begin the programme and Goldmark's overture to the Hindu play, "Sakuntala," will end it. Contrary to expectation there seems to be no room for Franck's tone-poem, "The Djinns," which Mr. Monteux had in mind and in which Mr. Schmitz stood ready to play the piano part. The piece is characteristic, interesting and seldom heard nowadays in Boston or anywhere else. Since, moreover, it requires an assisting pianist, opportunity to play it may not soon recur. Why, then, should not Mr Monteux take his courage in his hands and for a single pair of concerts risk a programme two hours long? When necessity warranted his predecessors did so.

When the Symphony Orchestra visits New York next week, it will play both Mr. d'Indy's and Mr. Converse's symphonies from recent programmes in Boston. Brooklyn, as well, will hear Mr. Converse's new music; while Philadelphia and Baltimore are to have the pleasure of d'Indy's. Outside New York, Mr. Kreisler will play with the orchestra—in one of Viotti's ancient concertos.

Herald Feb 1

CARPENTER CONCERTINO

At the Boston Symphony concerts, Feb. 13 and 14, following a trip which the orchestra will take this week, Mr. Monteux will introduce to Boston the concertino for piano and orchestra by John Alden Carpenter of Chicago, whose symphony and suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator," have been heard at these concerts. Mr. Carpenter's songs are well known. His new ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta," has been highly spoken of. The piano part of the concertino will be played by E. Robert Schmitz, a brilliant French pianist who has been highly praised in New York and Chicago. The program will also include Schumann's symphony No. 3 ("Rhenish"), and Goldmark's enduringly popular overture, "Sakuntala."

Transcript Feb 31

Friday afternoon, Feb. 13, in Symphony Hall, the fourteenth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Monteux conducting and Robert Schmitz as assisting pianist. The programme traverses Schumann's Rhenish Symphony; Goldmark's overture to the ancient Hindu play, "Sakuntala"; and Mr. Carpenter's Concertino for piano and orchestra, to be heard for the first time here.

Saturday afternoon, Feb. 14, in [illegible] who are principa[illegible] orchestra [illegible]erson, M[illegible]

Herald Jan 31

PLAY SYMPHONY INSPIRED BY WAR

Converse's Work Portrays Emotions Evolved by Titanic Conflict

SHUDDER OF NATURE IN MYSTIC OPENING

By PHILIP HALE

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Converse, Symphony in C minor (first performance); Schumann, Violoncello Concerto (Mr. Bedetti, violoncellist); Rimsky-Korsakoff, "The Russian Easter."

Mr. Converse's symphony, composed during the summer and fall of 1919, was inspired by the great war; it expresses moods and emotion due to the terrible struggle. Mr. Converse says there is no program, but he has told what he had in mind. Even if he had said merely that the war had urged him to composition, a hearer of the music might easily shape a program for himself that probably would not be wholly foreign to Mr. Converse's thoughts. He would find in the two chief themes of the first movement, the heroic resolve of men and the tender solicitude of women, loving and anxious; he would trace the employment of these themes. In the Finale he would note the unmistakably martial character, the fanfares of victory, the tumultuous rejoicing, the ecstatic reunions. For this Finale the familiar lines of Schiller describing the return of troops in triumph might serve as a motto. And in the solemn section of this Finale, he would recognize the remembrance of those that perished nobly for an ideal.

Yet those portions of the Symphony that appeal especially to one hearing it for the first time are not indissolubly associated with the thought of war. We refer to the second movement, a Nocturne of rare beauty, in which a poetic mood is maintained throughout, and the light-hearted Scherzo, a spontaneous expression of gaiety, with contrasting measures of a fateful nature. To these movements must be added the mysterious opening of the Symphony, which are as a shudder of nature foreseeing the impending cataclasm. These pages seem to us the most noteworthy. Mr. Converse may well be proud of them.

In the first movement the expression of heroism, of the spasm and shudder of war, of the world's turmoil, is more convincing than the theme given to woman. This theme has a homely character—we use the word "homely" in its old sense, it has warmth, but it does not make an irresistible appeal; it is dangerously near the commonplace. So, too, in the finale there are pages that are conventionally triumphal, though the composer has avoided the vulgarity that often taints musical jubilation. It is not an easy thing to be strikingly jubilant even with a full modern orchestra. It is easy to be merely noisy. Mr. Converse has shunned this pitfall. It was given to Beethoven with a comparatively small orchestra, an orchestra that a young composer today would despise, to voice the frantic joy of a liberated people in his overture to "Egmont."

One finds in this symphony a curious mixture of ultra-modern musical thought—witness the opening measures of the symphony and those of the nocturne—and that which is orthodox and of long standing. One also finds in the first movement and in the finale a lack of condensation, a too great amplification of rhetorical expression, so many climaxes that the effect of the one great climax is anticipated or at least lessened.

The performance was a brilliant one; carefully prepared, carefully considered, conducted and played appreciatively and sympathetically.

Mr. Bedetti did not choose for his first appearance as soloist at a Symphony concert a work in which he could win easy success. Schumann's concerto is seldom performed; when it is played it is for the sake of the romantically dreamy and lovely andante. Mr. Bedetti, it is needless to say, played this andante most poetically; but he did more than this; by his technical skill, his unfailing accuracy, his beautiful tonal quality, his phrasing, his fine differentiation, he made the other portions of the concerto interesting; perhaps it is not extravagant to say, engrossing. Even the passage-work, inherently dry, was vitalized by his skill, tone and taste.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture had not been performed at a Symphony concert since 1897, the year that "Scheherezade" introduced this composer to a Symphony audience. Yesterday the performance of this subtly and gorgeously orchestrated overture revealed again the great talent—he was a genius in orchestration—of this man of Oriental feeling, a disciple of Berlioz and Liszt. How infinitely varied are the repetitions of the liturgical theme! Here are repetitions of which one does not weary.

This concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week. The program of Feb. 13-14 is as follows: Schumann, Symphony in E flat, No. 3 (Rhenish); Carpenter, Concertino for piano and orchestra (first time here); Goldmark, Overture to "Sakuntala." Mr. E. Robert Schmitz, a Parisian pianist, now sojourning in New York, will play in Boston for the first time.

Post Jan 31

CONVERSE'S SYMPHONY PERFORMED

First Hearing of Work —Bedetti a First Rank Artist

BY OLIN DOWNES

F. S. Converse's Symphony in C minor was played for the first time at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. On this occasion Jean Bedetti, the new first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony, made his first appearance at these concerts as soloist, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Russian Easter," brought the programme to an end.

ON WAR EXPERIENCES

Mr. Converse states in the programme book that he took to the symphony form as his vehicle of expression, not because he had determined to write a symphony, but simply because this form seemed the most fitting vehicle for the natural and logical expression of his ideas. The symphony, which was completed in 1919, has no detailed programme, but there is the thought of "the experiences" of the young men and women of our land during the trials of the war—the thought of high resolve, of farewells, of the triumphant return and reunion.

The opening movement is spirited, with motives stern and tender, with three introductory chords which occur significantly in the course of the work. There is a slow movement in the character of a nocturne, a portrayal, perhaps, of moonshine and flowing waters; a gay scherzo; a finale which is energetic, martial, with reminiscences of themes of earlier movements.

Two Distinct Elements

The curious thing is that on a first hearing this symphony resolves itself into two divisions of elements—the first and fourth movements, and the second and third. In the first and fourth movements Mr. Converse is symphonic in thought as well as in method. In the two middle movements, which are much simpler, he is simple and melodious, and not to our mind, symphonic—this though the outward dictates of the form of the symphony are followed. Nor do the two middle movements seem especially related, despite such thematic affiliations as there may be with the other two movements. And what have they, necessarily, to do with the war?

The audience enjoyed these movements with reason. The slow movement is a simple song without words. There are long, melodious phrases, and pretty accompaniments. The scherzo is for us trivial and wholly beneath the symphonic ideal, and also rather too short for just proportion with the other movements. This may be said: The composer dares to use well-known chords, and musical phrases of orthodox divisions and cadences, without pretence or affectation. His sincerity is felt, his thought is readily grasped. But for us this is not symphonic music, and we do not have the feeling of continuity of thought running through the four movements of the work.

Large Masses of Tone

The other two movements are very vigorous in feeling, admirably put together, with a sure hand in the development of the themes and with very brilliant and pleasing instrumentation. Perhaps too many instruments are used too much of the time, but the tonal canvass is itself large, and large masses of tone are not disproportionate to its measurements. But on initial acquaintance with this symphony we do not find the distinction of themes and the closely welded development, the long sustained musical breath of, for example, Mr. Converse's tone poem after Whitman, "The Mystic Trumpeter."

The work, with all its sincerity, straightforwardness and practiced workmanship, does not remove the scepticism we entertain of any music inspired by the recent war. We believe that substantial musical results of the war will not be seen for perhaps another generation.

Bedetti a First Rank Artist

Mr. Bedetti proved himself an extraordinary artist. In all respects he is an addition to the Symphony Orchestra of which that organization may well feel proud.

The Schumann concerto is not in itself a strong work, but Mr. Bedetti gave so artistic and so intimate a performance of this music, he played it with such consummate technical skill, such fine molding of every phrase and such genuinely Schumannish sentiment, that one was glad instead of sorry to have listened to it, from beginning to end, once more. The conception of the interpreter was an orchestral conception, a conception of the work as a whole, and not the conception of a soloist who was every moment seeking a chance for individual display.

Even today, when players should know better, how often the sensation obtains of a player who performs his solo as brilliantly as possible, resting for a little while during which the orchestra makes a noise to distract the audience, and then going at it again, with renewed bounce and vigor. But Mr. Bedetti was conveying the musical thought of the composer, whether in singing passages to which he gave the utmost richness and variety of tone color, or in tracing fleet arabesques about a melody given to the instruments of the orchestra.

His technical resources seemed to be endless. There was no difficulty, however unwieldy the occasional passage for solo instrument, which he did not completely and masterfully surmount, and every talent of the performer was modestly subordinated to the message of the music. Mr. Bedetti was recalled with a warmth most emphatically deserved. He took his place as one of the most gifted 'cellists who have been associated with this orchestra.

Russian Easter Music

Rinsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter" is a typical musical sketch of a Russian scene. It echoes the antiphonal chants, the churchly ceremonies and festivities of the Russian Christmastide. There is not very much real musical development of the old model chants of the Greek church, but simply tone-painting of the most gorgeous kind-tone painting as it were, in reds and blues and golds of the interior of a cathedral during Easter services, and a close with the ringing of bells, which echoes jubilantly the outbursts of the choir and the popular rejoicing.

The orchestral performances of the afternoon were of the highest quality, and Mr. Converse's symphony, in particular, was received with much enthusiasm.

Advertiser Feb 1

Bedetti Scores Triumph at Symphony

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

Converse, Symphony in C minor.
Schumann, Violoncello Concerto.
Soloist, M. Jean Bedetti.
Rimsky-Korsakoff, "The Russian Easter," overture on Russian church themes

It is gratifying to see that the great violoncello traditions, in which Boston has been prominent even from the days of Fritz Giese, have now a new and excellent exponent in M. Jean Bedetti. One could have wished a more effective work for the artist, for although there are some fine touches in this concerto, the highest powers of Schumann are not present and the cello works of Lalo, Boellman, Saint-Saens, Volkmann, or even of Dvorak, are more effective. All the more credit, then, to the artist who carried the composition to success. M. Bedetti has abundant technique and temperament, too, although there were not many opportunities to display the latter. He has a sympathetic rather than a broad tone, but his effects upon the C string were striking. His cadenza work was remarkably fluent. He was greatly applauded and on Friday afternoon was recalled three times at the end of the concerto.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's work, the "Easter Overture," is caviare to the general, but it is as Russian as Bortsch. Russia is the land of wonderful basses, which are very prominent in the church music, and the deep and ponderous effects of the trombones in this work called these vividly to mind. Many of the ecclesiastical works are founded on the Byzantine scale (the scale of C with D and A flat), and this gave a flavor that was very quaint at times. As the overture is dedicated to the memory of Moussorgsky and Borodin, one can imagine that it is entirely Muscovite in its construction; there is not a trace of German influence in its measures. There were strange antiphonal passages between trombones and strings that were finely brought out, and these points, if not beautiful, were at least bizarre and unusual. There was but little continuity in the work, and its sketchy character may be considered a fault. Everything was dramatic; sudden and portentous pause ushered in the wildest percussion, from Glockenspiel to gong. In fact, there was so much percussion that at times one thought rather of a blacksmith's shop than of a church. The end was noisy beyond compare, the din suggesting wild festivity in which vodka played a prominent part. All this was read by the conductor in a fittingly emphatic manner, and the whole work was so out of the common that it became very attractive and interesting, perhaps beyond its intrinsic musical merits.

* * *

The new symphony by Mr. Converse is an important work. Although we admire this eminent composer most in the freer forms, where his poetic instinct has more unrestricted play, yet his mastery of the modern orchestra and his melodic thought make itself felt no matter what form he may choose. Mr. Converse is not one of the modern noise-mongers. He shows himself master of the symphonic form instead of being mastered by it, for the shape of the epic form is preserved, but the movements are not conventional. The scherzo, for example, which we found the most interesting portion of the work, has the regular form, but with such varied treatment that it may stand as a model for modern composers.

Continuity and homogeneity is attained by considerable transference of thematic material from movement to movement, and there is also one chief figure (three chords) which plays an important part in the finale as well as in the first movement. Without seeking a definite picture of the recent war in the work, one can recognize the note of triumph and victory in the great climax of the last movement of this American heroic symphony, yet the two interior movements show us the composer in his most natural mood. Mr. Converse has probably never given us a work in which so much of learning is displayed. There is an abundance of contrapuntal treatment and, as already intimated, the great modern orchestra is handled with complete mastery.

* * *

We are told that there is a real Indian war song used in the last movement. We are not of those who believe that there is any reason to go back to aboriginal, tribal music. MacDowell's Indian Suite and the last movement of this symphony are interesting and beautiful because of the treatment of the theme and not because of its origin or of its intrinsic worth. The symphony as a whole is too intricate to become immediately popular, but repeated hearing would reveal many unexpected beauties. The military character of the finale and the sparkling vein of the scherzo, however, are sufficiently obvious to win immediate recognition.

The execution of the work was an excellent one and M. Monteux had evidently spared no pains to make this first performance a success. Altogether the new symphony is a most important addition to the American repertoire, and we trust that at least the scherzo will also be heard abroad, to prove to Europeans that there are American symphonies worthy of the classical name.

Herald Feb 1

CARPENTER CONCERTINO

At the Boston Symphony concerts, Feb. 13 and 14, following a trip which the orchestra will take this week, Mr. Monteux will introduce to Boston the concertino for piano and orchestra by John Alden Carpenter of Chicago, whose symphony and suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator," have been heard at these concerts. Mr. Carpenter's songs are well known. His new ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta," has been highly spoken of. The piano part of the concertino will be played by E. Robert Schmitz, a brilliant French pianist who has been highly praised in New York and Chicago. The program will also include Schumann's symphony No. 3 ("Rhenish"), and Goldmark's enduringly popular overture, "Sakuntala."

CONVERSE LIMNS WAR MOODS IN MUSIC

Symphony in C Minor Given First Time in Public —New Composition by an American Warmly Applauded

The chief item on the program of yesterday's Symphony concert was the first performance in public of the Symphony in C minor by F. S. Converse, completed last month at his home in Westwood and begun last August at Lake Sunapee, N H. The composer explains in a note printed in the program book that although the work has no "program," "there is an expression of moods and emotions, which I think reflects something of the feelings that we have all been through during the stress of the last few years.

"I had in mind the experiences of the young men and women of our land during the trials of the war. The two main themes of the first movement, suggesting the high resolve of the youths and the tenderer feminine traits of the maidens, the wives and mothers, move through the whole work, like characters through the varied situations of a drama.

"The point of view is subjective and human, rather than impersonal and epic. I have used the symphonic form because it suited my needs of expression, not from my especial desire to write a conventional symphony. The large modern orchestra is used."

Fine Orchestral Technique

These quotations sufficiently explain the scope and intention of the new work, and suggest comparisons with "Wellington's Victory" by Beethoven, Tschaikowsky's "1812 Overture," Liszt's "Battle of the Huns" and D'Indy's "Brief Symphony on the War in France," recently played here, not forgetting Debussy's "Berceuse Heroique," dedicated to King Albert of Belgium.

Mr Converse avoids the error made by some of his predecessors in literal echoing of the tumult and shouting of warfare. Like Beethoven in the "Pastoral" Symphony, he is concerned chiefly with the depiction of moods. There were many subtle touches which proved his fine orchestral technique and ingenuity in thematic development. The result is one of the best of American compositions. It was warmly applauded by yesterday's audience.

The scherzo with its sparkling theme and cleverly interwoven rhythms is a genuine triumph. Mr Converse excels in such music. The slow movement, as Mr Converse says, is "a sort of nocturne, quiet and tranquil as a moonlit night by some still lake." The first movement and finale alternate adroitly between martial flourishes of trumpets and gentler, more serious, more feminine passages.

These contrasts add attractiveness to the work and give it the variety without which, proverbially, there can be no unity. There is little doubt that this symphony will soon be heard in many other cities, and applauded for its many merits.

Solo From Schumann

Jen Bedetti, the new first 'cellist of the orchestra, played the solo part in Schumann's Concerto in A minor with the skill and taste which have been evident in the numerous solo passages he has played in various works this season.

He surpasses any of his recent predecessors and adds strength to one of the most salient portions of the orchestra. The concerto is rather too long for the value of the musical material it contains, but well adapted to the purpose of allowing the soloist to display his technique.

The other number was Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Russian Easter," based on the music of the Russian Church, of the sort sung here by the Russian Cathedral Choir of New York two years ago. It has not been played here since 1897, and is far inferior to "Scheherezade" and "Antar," though not without interest, especially for the student of orchestration.

There are no more Symphony concerts until Feb 13 and 14, as the orchestra goes on tour after tonight.

Globe Feb 1

Events and Comments

There are no Symphony concerts this week, since the orchestra is again on tour. The soloist on Feb 13 and 14 will be the new pianist, who has a great reputation in his native France, Robert Schmitz. He will play the piano part in John Alden Carpenter's Concertino. The Symphony will be Schumann's "Rhenish."

Advertiser Feb

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts on February 13 and 14, Pierre Monteux will introduce to Boston the concertino for piano and orchestra by John Alden Carpenter, the Chicago composer. The piano part will be played by E. Robert Schmitz, the French pianist. Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony and Carl Goldmark's Overture to "Sakuntala" will also be played.

Transcript Jan 30

Plans and Prospects

As Mr. Monteux long since proposed, Mr. Carpenter's Concertino for piano and orchestra will be played for the first times in Boston at the Symphony Concerts of Feb. 13 and 14, with Mr. Schmitz for assisting pianist. Schumann's Rhenish Symphony will begin the programme and Goldmark's overture to the Hindu play, "Sakuntala," will end it. Contrary to expectation there seems to be no room for Franck's tone-poem, "The Djinns," which Mr. Monteux had in mind and in which Mr. Schmitz stood ready to play the piano part. The piece is characteristic, interesting and seldom heard nowadays in Boston or anywhere else. Since, moreover, it requires an assisting pianist, opportunity to play it may not soon recur. Why, then, should not Mr Monteux take his courage in his hands and for a single pair of concerts risk a programme two hours long? When necessity warranted his predecessors did so.

When the Symphony Orchestra visits New York next week, it will play both Mr. d'Indy's and Mr. Converse's symphonies from recent programmes in Boston. Brooklyn, as well, will hear Mr. Converse's new music; while Philadelphia and Baltimore are to have the pleasure of d'Indy's. Outside New York, Mr. Kreisler will play with the orchestra—in one of Viotti's ancient concertos.

Transcript Feb 31

Friday afternoon, Feb. 13, in Symphony Hall, the fourteenth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Monteux conducting and Robert Schmitz as assisting pianist. The programme traverses Schumann's Rhenish Symphony; Goldmark's overture to the ancient Hindu play, "Sakuntala"; and Mr. Carpenter's Concertino for piano and orchestra, to be heard for the first time here.

Saturday afternoon, Feb. 14, in Jordan

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Transcript Jan 31

SYMPHONY CONCERT

RUSSIAN REVIVAL AND AMERICAN "NOVELTY"

Mr. Monteux Deservingly Resurrects a Churchly Overture of Rimsky-Korsakov—The Intermezzo of Mr. Bedetti as Rare Violoncellist—Mr. Converse's New Symphony of War-Time Moods — Clear Merits, Obvious Shortcomings and Notably American Voice

FOR the first time in many a week an overture stood, yesterday afternoon, on the programme of the Symphony Concert—an overture, moreover, unheard in Boston for twenty-two years, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter." The names of few composers seem more familiar in the repertory of the orchestra; yet as a curious table in the indefatigable programme-book disclosed, not a measure of his music was played at its concerts until they had been established fifteen years. It was the catholic and energetic Paur who then led him into Symphony Hall with the glowing suite, "Scheherazade," so well liked that heard first in April, it was repeated in the following October. In the ensuing twenty years, not only "Scheherazade," but also "Antar," the "Spanish Caprice" and the overture to the opera, "The Betrothed or the Tsar" have all passed into the active repertory of the band; while twice it has played the tone-poem of "Sadko" and the underworld of the waters. Somehow until Mr. Monteux resurrected it, the overture of the Russian Easter has been overlooked from the distant day in which Mr. Paur first set it in a programme. It deserved the conductor's pains and the audience's interest and applause; it hinted also that equally pleasurable discoveries might be possible in the neglected music of Rimsky-Korsakov. A month ago, for example, Mr. Bodanzky and his New Symphony Orchestra played in New York the suite that the Russian arranged from his opera of old legend, "The Tale of Tsar Saltan." The three tone-pictures are indeed no "Scheherazade," but the first in which the Tsar goes forth to war, is a spirited and colorful music; the second, in which the Tsaritsa sails the sea in the cask in which she and her suspected babe were imprisoned, is plaintive and pleasing; while the third, of the wondrous enchanted isle on which she is cast and whither the Tsar comes to rescue her, is bravely fantastic with Rimsky's magic of imagination and of voice. Evidently score and parts are obtainable in this country. They even await Mr. Monteux's hand.

Verses from the Psalm, "Let God Arise, Let His Enemies Be Scattered"; verses from the gospel of Mark, wherein "Mary Magdalen and Mary, the mother of James and Salome" come to the empty tomb of Jesus; and sundry pious "ejaculations" (to borrow George Herbert's word) of the composer himself, preface the Easter overture; while the title specifies the motivs as drawn from the liturgy of the Greek church. The music begins in finely drawn, shadowy preluding as of a holy mystery. The single voice of the violin, familiar device of Rimsky, bears it into measures of more churchly accent; the trombones, grave and stately, sound the liturgical note. The ready violin leads the orchestra out of darkness into light. There is hint of the joy of the festival; the rejoicing of folk, as well of priests, sounds. Upon music very like an Easter hymn Rimsky-Korsakov lavishes his rhythmic verve, his glow of harmonic and instrumental color. Out of scanty motivs he makes much; the churchly voices recur; the voices of a gladdened world absorb them. No masterpiece is this overture, but music good to hear for a richness of imagination, a warmth of mood flowering into a like richness and warmth of expression. As usual, by instinct, by practice, Rimsky seeks motion, color, heat. Not for him the bare austerities, the piercing simplicities of the evangelist, albeit he quotes him:

> And entering into the sepulchre, they saw a young man sitting on the right side, clothed in a long white garment; and they were affrighted. And he saith unto them: Be not affrighted; ye seek Jesus of Nazareth, which was crucified. He is risen.

Of the composers of Rimsky-Korsakov's generation only a d'Indy—and not even he in more sophisticated moods—could set music to these words that should be like unto them.

The middle piece of the day was Schumann's Concerto for violoncello, with Mr. Bedetti of the orchestra to play the solo part, as a fortnight ago at Cambridge. For one reason only the 'cellists do well to perpetuate a piece that otherwise would be as rarely heard as that other music of Schumann's clouding years, the Fantasia for violin, once revived by Mr. Kreisler and more recently by Mr. Thibaud. That reason is the undiminishing beauty of the slow division—the Andante in which Schumann rises to a sustained loveliness of song that is not invention but inspiration, that distills for the instant the purest essence of music, that turns to water the listening ear, mind and heart. In the "literature" of the violoncello, cursorily recalled, there is nothing to match it in beauty of ordered sound or charm of pensive melancholy. Played as it was by Mr. Bedetti, it is the singing voice of the violoncello idealized almost beyond composer's or virtuoso's vision. For it the usually tedious "passage-work" of the first division, the no less tedious figuration and ornament of the third are relatively easy to endure. Moreover, Mr. Bedetti's playing steadily lightened, at moments almost dispelled, this tedium. Only by Mr. Casals and Miss Harrison has the violoncello been played in Boston in recent years—[illegible] ease and s[illegible] ness and elastic[illegible] bow and fingers, rich, transparent, unforced tone, such freedom from every trick of displayful or sentimental exaggeration, such taste, sensibility and intelligence of musician as well as virtuoso. When Mr. Monteux persuaded Mr. Bedetti, his friend, into the Symphony Orchestra, it gained one of the rare violoncellists of this present day.

Mr. Converse's new symphony filled the rest of the concert. The more the pity that it did not also fill the second balcony, usually tenanted to the last chair, and that the applause, both in the intervals and at the end, was not more hearty and less labored. Since the days of "The Mystic Trumpeter," his tone-poem of 1905, he has written no such interesting music—no music, indeed, that seems so clearly the outcome of upspringing creative impulse rather than of deliberating will and musicianly calculation. As it seemed at a single hearing, there were obvious shortcomings, but shortcomings, for the most part, that resolute revision and self-criticism might remove. Possibly, for example, the tumults of the first movement are long-drawn until they tend to become prolix, monotonous. Shortened, sharpened, they might be more impressive. So, too, with the martial and triumphant music of the Finale. It gets under way slowly; at moments it halts as though it were becoming unwieldy of progress; once and again it sounds too thick-voiced. More concision, more clarity might speed it—and as the Scherzo proved, Mr. Converse can be both succinct and vivid in tones. Again, as in many a measure in the slow movement, he can use readily and imaginatively the harmonic and instrumental devices for coloring and atmosphere that it is the custom to call ultra-modern. At the same time he is prone, as by a sort of composing habit, to the thick tonal texture of the musical generation rooted in Liszt and Wagner and flowering in Strauss. A minor outcome is a certain contradiction of style as tonal paragraph succeeds tonal paragraph; a major outcome are occasional measures repeating trite formulas of romantic music and so inviting excision. It is not wise for a composer of Mr. Converse's stature to be too eclectic—better his own chosen manner. In a symphony in which he has much to say that is interesting and spontaneous, he has no need to pad—to linger, as it were, until he gains his second creative wind.

To set down these reservations and suggestions is not to diminish the clear merit, the quickening interest of the symphony. With reason, students of form will admire the fertility and the skill with which, by interplay, repetition, and transformation of motivs, Mr. Converse keeps his music in unified expansion upon itself; while even the casual listener will feel the sustained unfolding of his large design. With seeming ease he manipulates the exacting symphonic form, yet he conditions it steadily to his more imaginative and emotional purposes. In turn, students of modulation, harmonic texture and instrumental color will take keen pleasure in the misty measures of the beginning, in which the music as from spiritual contemplation flames into lusty vigor; in the soft and silvery lustres, the gentle undulation, of not a little of the slow movement; in the quick and novel turns of the beginning and the end of the Scherzo. For the merely curious ear there is atmosphere in the introductory Adagio; illusion, besides, in the whole slow movement, outside a few superfluous measures wherein it drops for the instant into commonplace; while the Scherzo stings with high musical spirits at once robust and fanciful. If Mr. Converse would shorten the tumults of the first movement, they would seem less rhetorical. Did he lighten the progress of the Finale, it would swell more surely into idealized and elate march of victory.

Above all, Mr. Converse has written an American music—a music that does speak in tones the American spirit, through the late war, especially as it shone out of those who voluntarily gave their bodies, their substance, their every personal service to the cause in which they believed. (Not for a horde of "draftees" is the high voice of music.) Nay, some of the very shortcomings of the symphony make it the more expressive of the war-time moods of this democracy of ours. Imagine Sibelius, for example, setting to pages, as Mr. Converse does in the first movement, that should be both grim and ardent with the resolution of war time. How bare would be the texture, austere the progress, sharp the modulations, economical the means, of the Finn's music! Thereby he would release a wholly individual, an irremovably self-centred temperament. In contrast, Mr. Converse in his thick-fibred, full voiced, reiterative, insistent periods, speaks the American mood in those first months of preparation.

Or imagine Liszt, who dearly loved an "Allegro molto con fuoco e marziale" as Mr. Converse labels his Finale, writing such a music of conflict touched with exaltation of victory almost mute with elation. It would reek of the theatre; the eye of the imagination would see the procession advancing upon the stage from the wings as it does in the "triumph" of Tasso, in the apotheosis of Mazeppa. Mr. Converse, in a Finale in which emotion struggles into expression and sometimes remains inarticulate, but not a whit less genuine, is transfusing into tones, feelingly, graphically, an American mood at the end of the war. There is not a trace of sensuous passion in his music through the slow movement of the communing and parting lovers in the night; the substance and the coloring of the motiv of the stirred maiden in the first movement, are idealized, yielding not a hint of "sex." Yet how clear through it and through the "Adagio Tranquillo" runs the tender sentiment that in the arts—and presumably the hearts—of most Americans is the substitute for passion. Again, how altogether American are the lusty high spirits, the hearty and changeful play, the momentary lapse into more subdued mood, of the Scherzo. Play it in London, in Paris, in Munich, in Vienna and twenty listeners, who know our temperament and ways would say under their breaths: "What a very American [illegible]"

Not so long ago, Mr. Carpenter, for another American composer, wrote a symphony that seemed to some hearers to speak with a certain American spirit. It was a finely spun, artfully contrived music; here it courted a capricious gayety; there it gained a bright exaltation; throughout it ran in changeful mood that would not avow too much or too deeply; from beginning to end, it set forth, so to say, cultivated emotions. If Mr. Carpenter's symphony mirrored an American spirit, it was the spirit of the American aristocracy which may take such title not from "wealth and position," but from clear trait and way, code and conduct. In contrast, Mr. Converse's symphony, robust of voice, firm, full, even thick, warm of sentiment, lusty of spirit, obvious of mood, inarticulate now and then, over insistent here and there, commonplace on occasion and also unashamed, is veritable music of an American democracy—as tones may reflect and, perchance idealize it.

H. T. PARKER

Transc. Feb 2

Music

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

AS AN "OUTSIDER" HEARS OUR ORCHESTRA

A Chicagoan Reviewer's Impressions of Pieces and Performance—Mr. Hofmann Pursues Perfection, Gains and Sustains It—His Rarefied but by No Means Passionless Playing—Kreisler and the Harvard Glee Club—Without Demur, London Hears the Music of a Living German

HEARING the Symphony Orchestra week after week from October through April its public may easily fall into routine before it, become too indifferent to its virtues, too accustomed to its shortcomings. It is timely and tonic, then, to set down the impressions of it and of a Symphony Concert as a whole that a practised "outsider" received last Friday afternoon. He is Mr. Maurice Rosenfeld, the reviewer of concerts and opera for The Chicago Daily News, and at The Transcript's request, he hands it a copy of the telegram he sent to his own paper:

> Visitors are expected to repay hospitality at least with the coin of gratitude, and thus after the kindness accorded me by my colleagues of the press and by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, I am sure that my opinion of that organization and its playing should be complimentary. Indeed, were I ungrateful, still in honesty I could hardly find fault with the concert which the orchestra gave last Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall under the direction of Pierre Monteux.
>
> Reports have reached the West that the orchestra was somewhat disintegrated since last summer, and that a considerable part of the personnel had been changed. This, I was informed, was not the case, and there were fewer changes than had been mentioned. Thus, the orchestra as it stands today, resembles the Chicago Symphony Orchestra closely, in the dignity of its mien, in the evident artistic striving of each individual player, as was noticed in their performance, and in the cohesive unity of musical intent and purpose. Perhaps much of this new virility, this enthusiasm and this eagerness is due to the serious, business-like methods of Mr. Monteux and to the care and pains taken by the men at rehearsals. It is surely a fact, that no symphonic body comes nearer the Western ideals of the Chicago Orchestra than does the Boston, and these two bands stand forth preëminent as the representative symphonic bodies of America. No comparison has been contemplated, but the Bostonians have some qualities which might be equalled but not excelled. Their string division is particularly suave and velvety in tone: the 'celli and violas deep and sonorous in quality. The oboe possesses a unique timbre never heard in any other orchestra, and the entire wood-winds are of rare tonal charm.
>
> There was a new symphony by F. S. Converse on the programme, for a première performance, and the virtuosity of the orchestra came to the fore in the interpretation given this music. It adds a distinctive composition to the symphonic literature by American writers and is a piece which has strong native characteristics. It is straightforward and clear in outline and in structure. The four movements are definite in contrasting moods, and there are more than a few melodic themes of original pattern and design. The performance of Schumann's violoncello concerto, by Jean Bedetti, the young French principal 'cellist of the orchestra, was brilliant, and the second section of the piece disclosed musical feeling. The closing number, an overture by Rimsky-Korsakov, on themes of the Russian Church, while impressively played, is not an engrossing symphonic number.

Advertiser Feb 8

Dollar Reward" comedy and news films and new vaudeville.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

An event of some importance at the Symphony concerts next Friday and Saturday will be the first Boston performance of John Alden Carpenter's concertino for piano and orchestra. The piano part will be played by E. Robert Schmitz, the French pianist, who will make his first visit to Boston for the purpose. Schuman[illegible] Rhenish" symphony and Gold[illegible]

Transc. Feb 7

Concerts-P[illegible]

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

A New Piece by Mr. Carpenter and Schmitt's Remarkable Quintet in Prospect—Mr. Ysaye and Mr. Elman Together—Mr. de Gogorza, Mr. McCormack and Other Singers—An Evening of Folk-Music — Young Mr. Smith, Pianist

THE one symphonic piece by Mr. Carpenter that has not yet been played at the Symphony Concerts will be heard at them on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next—his Concertino for piano and orchestra originally produced by the Chicago Orchestra on March 10, 1916. In spite of the diminutive title, the music runs through half an hour, divided between an Allegro con Moto, a Lento Grazioso and an Allegro Risoluto. For the first performances of the Concertino the composer drafted the following note for the programme-book of the Chicago Orchestra:

> Not to impose upon it a definite programme, but merely to establish the mood of the piece, it may be suggested that the Concertino is, in effect, a light-hearted conversation between piano and orchestra—as between two friends who have travelled different paths and become a little garrulous over their separate experiences. The conversation is mostly of rhythms—American, oriental and otherwise. The rules of polite talk, as always, between friends, are not strictly observed. Often, in animated moments they talk both at once, each hearing only what he says himself. Presently the moment comes, as always, between friends, when no conversation is necessary—a relaxed moment, when Friendship itself takes them in hand, and they have nothing to say. But the reaction is quick and strong: there is still so much that presses to be said—on a pleasant night—with youth in the air—between friends.
>
> In form the Concertino is in three short movements: Allegro con moto, Lento grazioso, and Allegro risoluto—the last two separated by an almost imperceptible pause. Each movement is in the simplest song form—first subject, second subject and repetition—except the last movement, which has a short coda based on the first subject in the first movement.

Otherwise there is no clue to music designed to speak for itself. Here in Boston Mr. Robert Schmitz, a young French pianist, lately come to America and called to the Symphony Concerts at Mr. Monteux's request, will play the pianoforte part. At a recital a month or two ago in New York, reviewers and audience thought well of him. Schumann's symphony in E-flat major—the "Rhenish Symphony" seldom heard in recent years in Boston, will precede the Concertino. Goldmark's lush and colorful overture to the romantic Hindu play, "Sakuntala," will follow it.

On Thursday evening in Sanders Theatre at Harvard Mr. Monteux and the orchestra give the fifth of their series of concerts in Cambridge. They will begin the programme with Mr. Converse's new symphony and end it with Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala." The middle piece is Saint-Saëns's seldom chosen concerto in F major for pianoforte and orchestra in which Miss Martha Baird, the young pianist of Boston, recently heard and applauded in a recital of her own, will play the solo part.

Globe Feb 8

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, 14th program: Schumann, Symphony No. 3, "Rhenish"; Carpenter, "Concertino" for piano and orchestra; Goldmark, "Sakuntala" overture. Soloist, E. Robert Schmitz.

[illegible] HALL — Tuesday at 8:15 [illegible] ated it.

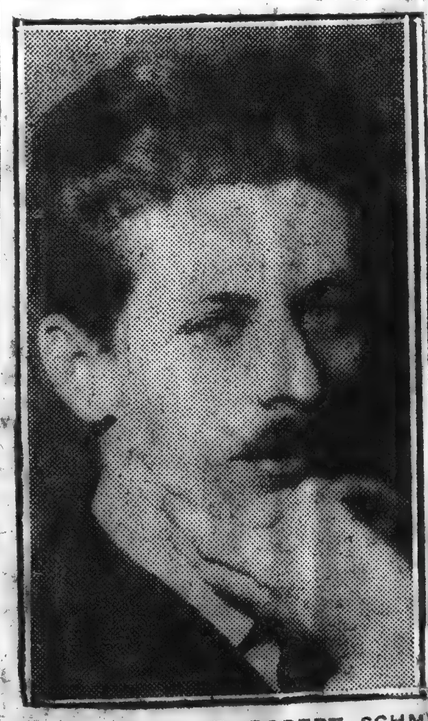
The much discussed French pianist, E. Robert Schmitz, will make his first appearance in Boston when he plays Carpenter's Concertino with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week. As a pupil of Diemer and a winner of the first prize at the Paris Conservatory, he gave recitals in each musical metropolis.

A versatile musician and a thorough artist, he founded and conducted his own Symphony Orchestra in Paris, consorted closely with such men as Debussy, Saint-Saens and d'Indy, and figured prominently upon certain memorable programs of the Schola Cantorum.

Joining his country's Army in 1914, he fought actively in the fiercest campaigns of the war with an anti-aircraft battery. Honorably discharged by Premier Clemenceau, he came to this country and took up his abode in Chicago, where his concerts became immediately popular. In New York he was received with enthusiasm as a brilliant musician and as a devoted exponent of the works of such composers as Debussy, Ravel and Maganard. He has lately announced a series of lecture-recitals to be given there.

Herald Feb 8

E. Robert Schmitz



LEFT TO RIGHT—E. ROBERT SCHM[illegible]

E. Robert Schmitz, pianist, who will play at the Symphony concerts this week, was born in Paris of an Alsatian family. He studied the piano at the Paris Conservatory with the late Louis Diemer and was awarded the first prize in 1910. He then made concert tours and accompanied Maggie Teyte, Julia Culp, Lula Mysz-Gmeiner and other singers. In 1911-12 he began as pianist and conductor to give concerts in Paris and paid especial attention to the works of the ultra-modern composers. He played the piano part D'Indy's "Mountain" Symphony, with the composer conducting. In the foundation of the "Association des Concerts Schmitz" he was assisted by Debussy, Gabriel Faure, Saint-Saens, Bruneau, Diemer, Florent Schmitt and others. In 1914 he joined the army of France, and during a service of 38 months was wounded twice, gassed severely, and sent to a hospital, where he remained six months. In the fall of 1918, honorably discharged, he went to Chicago, where he taught for a few months and played in public. Go[illegible] ng to New York, which is now his home, he at once gained fame by his recital in Aeolian Hall on April 17, 1919. He gave a second recital on Dec. 6. He began in New York on the 22d of last month a series of four recitals with comments. The general subject is "The Spirit of Modern Music compared with the Spirit of Classical and Romantic Music and its Relations with the other Fine Arts." The subject of the last (Feb. 11) is: "The Scientific connection between the fine arts, the tradition of the masses in its erroneous expression: Bach, the first cubist; Debussy, the first classic."

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

At the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday and Saturday the Piano Concertino by John Alden Carpenter of Chicago will have its first performances here. The piano part will be played by E. Robert Schmitz, a French pianist, who will be heard here for the first time. For the same program Mr. Monteux has chosen Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony, No. 3, and Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala."

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Transcript Jan 31

SYMPHONY CONCERT

RUSSIAN REVIVAL AND AMERICAN "NOVELTY"

Mr. Monteux Deservingly Resurrects a Churchly Overture of Rimsky-Korsakov —The Intermezzo of Mr. Bedetti as Rare Violoncellist—Mr. Converse's New Symphony of War-Time Moods — Clear Merits, Obvious Shortcomings and Notably American Voice

FOR the first time in many a week an overture stood, yesterday afternoon, on the programme of the Symphony Concert—an overture, moreover, unheard in Boston for twenty-two years, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter." The names of few composers seem more familiar in the repertory of the orchestra; yet as a curious table in the indefatigable programme-book disclosed, not a measure of his music was played at its concerts until they had been established fifteen years. It was the catholic and energetic Paur who then led him into Symphony Hall with the glowing suite, "Scheherazade," so well liked that heard first in April, it was repeated in the following October. In the ensuing twenty years, not only "Scheherazade," but also "Antar," the "Spanish Caprice" and the overture to the opera, "The Betrothed of the Tsar" have all passed into the active repertory of the band; while twice it has played the tone-poem of "Sadko" and the underworld of the waters. Somehow until Mr. Monteux resurrected it, the overture of the Russian Easter has been overlooked from the distant day in which Mr. Paur first set it in a programme. It deserved the conductor's pains and the audience's interest and applause; it hinted also that equally pleasurable discoveries might be possible in the neglected music of Rimsky-Korsakov. A month ago, for example, Mr. Bodanzky and his New Symphony Orchestra played in New York the suite that the Russian arranged from his opera of old legend, "The Tale of Tsar Saltan." The three tone-pictures are indeed no "Scheherazade," but the first in which the Tsar goes forth to war, is a spirited and colorful music; the second, in which the Tsaritsa sails the sea in the cask in which she and her suspected babe were imprisoned, is plaintive and pleasing; while the third, of the wondrous enchanted isle on which she is cast and whither the Tsar comes to rescue her, is bravely fantastic with Rimsky's magic of imagination and of voice. Evidently score and parts are obtainable in this country. They even await Mr. Monteux's hand.

Verses from the Psalm, "Let God Arise, Let His Enemies Be Scattered"; verses from the gospel of Mark, wherein "Mary Magdalen and Mary, the mother of James and Salome" come to the empty tomb of Jesus; and sundry pious "ejaculations" (to borrow George Herbert's word) of the composer himself, preface the Easter overture; while the title specifies the motivs as drawn from the liturgy of the Greek church. The music begins in finely drawn, shadowy preluding as of a holy mystery. The single voice of the violin, familiar device of Rimsky, bears it into measures of more churchly accent; the trombones, grave and stately, sound the liturgical note. The ready violin leads the orchestra out of darkness into light. There is hint of the joy of the festival; the rejoicing of folk, as well of priests, sounds. Upon music very like an Easter hymn Rimsky-Korsakov lavishes his rhythmic verve, his glow of harmonic and instrumental color. Out of scanty motivs he makes much; the churchly voices recur; the voices of a gladdened world absorb them. No masterpiece is this overture, but music good to hear for a richness of imagination, a warmth of mood flowering into a like richness and warmth of expression. As usual, by instinct, by practice, Rimsky seeks motion, color, heat. Not for him the bare austerities, the piercing simplicities of the evangelist, albeit he quotes him:

> And entering into the sepulchre, they saw a young man sitting on the right side, clothed in a long white garment; and they were affrighted. And he saith unto them: Be not affrighted; ye seek Jesus of Nazareth, which was crucified. He is risen.

Of the composers of Rimsky-Korsakov's generation only a d'Indy—and not even he in more sophisticated moods—could set music to these words that should be like unto them.

The middle piece of the day was Schumann's Concerto for violoncello, with Mr. Bedetti of the orchestra to play the solo part, as a fortnight ago at Cambridge. For one reason only the 'cellists do well to perpetuate a piece that otherwise would be as rarely heard as that other music of Schumann's clouding years, the Fantasia for violin, once revived by Mr. Kreisler and more recently by Mr. Thibaud. That reason is the undiminishing beauty of the slow division—the Andante in which Schumann rises to a sustained loveliness of song that is not invention but inspiration, that distills for the instant the purest essence of music, that turns to water the listening ear, mind and heart. In the "literature" of the violoncello, cursorily recalled, there is nothing to match it in beauty of ordered sound or charm of pensive melancholy. Played as it was by Mr. Bedetti, it is the singing voice of the violoncello idealized almost beyond composer's or virtuoso's vision. For it the usually tedious "passage-work" of the first division, the no less tedious figuration and ornament of the third are relatively easy to endure. Moreover, Mr. Bedetti's playing steadily lightened, at moments almost dispelled, this tedium. Only by Mr. Casals and Miss Harrison has the violoncello been played in Boston in recent years—[illegible] technical ease and s[illegible] bow and fingers, rich, transparent, unforced tone, such freedom from every trick of displayful or sentimental exaggeration, such taste, sensibility and intelligence of musician as well as virtuoso. When Mr. Monteux persuaded Mr. Bedetti, his friend, into the Symphony Orchestra, it gained one of the rare violoncellists of this present day.

Mr. Converse's new symphony filled the rest of the concert. The more the pity that it did not also fill the second balcony, usually tenanted to the last chair, and that the applause, both in the intervals and at the end, was not more hearty and less labored. Since the days of "The Mystic Trumpeter," his tone-poem of 1905, he has written no such interesting music—no music, indeed, that seems so clearly the outcome of upspringing creative impulse rather than of deliberating will and musicianly calculation. As it seemed at a single hearing, there were obvious shortcomings, but shortcomings, for the most part, that resolute revision and self-criticism might remove. Possibly, for example, the tumults of the first movement are long-drawn until they tend to become prolix, monotonous. Shortened, sharpened, they might be more impressive. So, too, with the martial and triumphant music of the Finale. It gets under way slowly; at moments it halts as though it were becoming unwieldy of progress; once and again it sounds too thick-voiced. More concision, more clarity might speed it—and as the Scherzo proved, Mr. Converse can be both succinct and vivid in tones. Again, as in many a measure in the slow movement, he can use readily and imaginatively the harmonic and instrumental devices for coloring and atmosphere that it is the custom to call ultra-modern. At the same time he is prone, as by a sort of composing habit, to the thick tonal texture of the musical generation rooted in Liszt and Wagner and flowering in Strauss. A minor outcome is a certain contradiction of style as tonal paragraph succeeds tonal paragraph; a major outcome are occasional measures repeating trite formulas of romantic music and so inviting excision. It is not wise for a composer of Mr. Converse's stature to be too eclectic—better his own chosen manner. In a symphony in which he has much to say that is interesting and spontaneous, he has no need to pad—to linger, as it were, until he gains his second creative wind.

To set down these reservations and suggestions is not to diminish the clear merit, the quickening interest of the symphony. With reason, students of form will admire the fertility and the skill with which, by interplay, repetition, and transformation of motivs, Mr. Converse keeps his music in unified expansion upon itself; while even the casual listener will feel the sustained unfolding of his large design. With seeming ease he manipulates the exacting symphonic form, yet he conditions it steadily to his more imaginative and emotional purposes. In turn, students of modulation, harmonic texture and instrumental color will take keen pleasure in the misty measures of the beginning, in which the music as from spiritual contemplation flames into lusty vigor; in the soft and silvery lustres, the gentle undulation, of not a little of the slow movement; in the quick and novel turns of the beginning and the end of the Scherzo. For the merely curious ear there is atmosphere in the introductory Adagio; illusion, besides, in the whole slow movement, outside a few superfluous measures wherein it drops for the instant into commonplace; while the Scherzo stings with high musical spirits at once robust and fanciful. If Mr. Converse would shorten the tumults of the first movement, they would seem less rhetorical. Did he lighten the progress of the Finale, it would swell more surely into idealized and elate march of victory.

Above all, Mr. Converse has written an American music—a music that does speak in tones the American spirit, through the late war, especially as it shone out of those who voluntarily gave their bodies, their substance, their every personal service to the cause in which they believed. (Not for a horde of "draftees" is the high voice of music.) Nay, some of the very shortcomings of the symphony make it the more expressive of the war-time moods of this democracy of ours. Imagine Sibelius, for example, setting to pages, as Mr. Converse does in the first movement, that should be both grim and ardent with the resolution of war time. How bare would be the texture, austere the progress, sharp the modulations, economical the means, of the Finn's music! Thereby he would release a wholly individual, an irremovably self-centred temperament. In contrast, Mr. Converse in his thick-fibred, full voiced, reiterative, insistent periods, speaks the American mood in those first months of preparation.

Or imagine Liszt, who dearly loved an "Allegro molto con fuoco e marziale" as Mr. Converse labels his Finale, writing such a music of conflict touched with exaltation of victory almost mute with elation. It would reek of the theatre; the eye of the imagination would see the procession advancing upon the stage from the wings as it does in the "triumph" of Tasso, in the apotheosis of Mazeppa. Mr. Converse, in a Finale in which emotion struggles into expression and sometimes remains inarticulate, but not a whit less genuine, is transfusing into tones, feelingly, graphically, an American mood at the end of the war. There is not a trace of sensuous passion in his music through the slow movement of the communing and parting lovers in the night; the substance and the coloring of the motiv of the stirred maiden in the first movement, are idealized, yielding not a hint of "sex." Yet how clear through it and through the "Adagio Tranquillo" runs the tender sentiment that in the arts—and presumably the hearts—of most Americans is the substitute for passion. Again, how altogether American are the lusty high spirits, the hearty and changeful play, the momentary lapse into more subdued mood, of the Scherzo. Play it in London, in Paris, in Munich, in Vienna and twenty listeners, who know our temperament and ways would say under their breaths: "What a very American thing!"

Not so long ago, Mr. Carpenter, for another American composer, wrote a symphony that seemed to some hearers to speak with a certain American spirit. It was a finely spun, artfully contrived music; here it courted a capricious gayety; there it gained a bright exaltation; throughout it ran in changeful mood that would not avow too much or too deeply; from beginning to end, it set forth, so to say, cultivated emotions. If Mr. Carpenter's symphony mirrored an American spirit, it was the spirit of the American aristocracy which may take such title not from "wealth and position," but from clear trait and way, code and conduct. In contrast, Mr. Converse's symphony, robust of voice, firm, full, even thick, warm of sentiment, lusty of spirit, obvious of mood, inarticulate now and then, over insistent here and there, commonplace on occasion and also unashamed, is veritable music of an American democracy—as tones may reflect and, perchance idealize it.

H. T. PARKER

Trans. Feb 2

Music

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

AS AN "OUTSIDER" HEARS OUR ORCHESTRA

A Chicagoan Reviewer's Impressions of Pieces and Performance—Mr. Hofmann Pursues Perfection, Gains and Sustains It—His Rarefied but by No Means Passionless Playing—Kreisler and the Harvard Glee Club—Without Demur, London Hears the Music of a Living German

HEARING the Symphony Orchestra week after week from October through April its public may easily fall into routine before it, become too indifferent to its virtues, too accustomed to its shortcomings. It is timely and tonic, then, to set down the impressions of it and of a Symphony Concert as a whole that a practised "outsider" received last Friday afternoon. He is Mr. Maurice Rosenfeld, the reviewer of concerts and opera for The Chicago Daily News, and at The Transcript's request, he hands it a copy of the telegram he sent to his own paper:

> Visitors are expected to repay hospitality at least with the coin of gratitude, and thus after the kindness accorded me by my colleagues of the press and by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, I am sure that my opinion of that organization and its playing should be complimentary. Indeed, were I ungrateful, still in honesty I could hardly find fault with the concert which the orchestra gave last Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall under the direction of Pierre Monteux.
>
> Reports have reached the West that the orchestra was somewhat disintegrated since last summer, and that a considerable part of the personnel had been changed. This, I was informed, was not the case, and there were fewer changes than had been mentioned. Thus, the orchestra as it stands today, resembles the Chicago Symphony Orchestra closely, in the dignity of its mien, in the evident artistic striving of each individual player, as was noticed in their performance, and in the cohesive unity of musical intent and purpose. Perhaps much of this new virility, this enthusiasm and this eagerness is due to the serious, business-like methods of Mr. Monteux and to the care and pains taken by the men at rehearsals. It is surely a fact, that no symphonic body comes nearer the Western ideals of the Chicago Orchestra than does the Boston, and these two bands stand forth preëminent as the representative symphonic bodies of America. No comparison has been contemplated, but the Bostonians have some qualities which might be equalled but not excelled. Their string division is particularly suave and velvety in tone; the 'celli and violas deep and sonorous in quality. The oboe possesses a unique timbre never heard in any other orchestra, and the entire wood-winds are of rare tonal charm.
>
> There was a new symphony by F. S. Converse on the programme, for a première performance, and the virtuosity of the orchestra came to the fore in the interpretation given this music. It adds a distinctive composition to the symphonic literature by American writers and is a piece which has strong native characteristics. It is straightforward and clear in outline and in structure. The four movements are definite in contrasting moods, and there are more than a few melodic themes of original pattern and design. The performance of Schumann's violoncello concerto, by Jean Bedetti, the young French principal 'cellist of the orchestra, was brilliant, and the second section of the piece disclosed musical feeling. The closing number, an overture by Rimsky-Korsakov, on themes of the Russian Church, while impressively played, is not an engrossing symphonic number.

Trans. Feb 7

Concerts-P[illegible]

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

A New Piece by Mr. Carpenter and Schmitt's Remarkable Quintet in Prospect—Mr. Ysaye and Mr. Elman Together—Mr. de Gogorza, Mr. McCormack and Other Singers—An Evening of Folk-Music — Young Mr. Smith, Pianist

THE one symphonic piece by Mr. Carpenter that has not yet been played at the Symphony Concerts will be heard at them on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next—his Concertino for piano and orchestra originally produced by the Chicago Orchestra on March 10, 1916. In spite of the diminutive title, the music runs through half an hour, divided between an Allegro con Moto, a Lento Grazioso and an Allegro Risoluto. For the first performances of the Concertino the composer drafted the following note for the programme-book of the Chicago Orchestra:

> Not to impose upon it a definite programme, but merely to establish the mood of the piece, it may be suggested that the Concertino is, in effect, a light-hearted conversation between piano and orchestra—as between two friends who have travelled different paths and become a little garrulous over their separate experiences. The conversation is mostly of rhythms—American, oriental and otherwise. The rules of polite talk, as always, between friends, are not strictly observed. Often, in animated moments they talk both at once, each hearing only what he says himself. Presently the moment comes, as always, between friends, when no conversation is necessary—a relaxed moment, when Friendship itself takes them in hand, and they have nothing to say. But the reaction is quick and strong; there is still so much that presses to be said—on a pleasant night—with youth in the air—between friends. . . .
>
> In form the Concertino is in three short movements: Allegro con moto, Lento grazioso, and Allegro risoluto—the last two separated by an almost imperceptible pause. Each movement is in the simplest song form—first subject, second subject and repetition—except the last movement, which has a short coda based on the first subject in the first movement.

Otherwise there is no clue to music designed to speak for itself. Here in Boston Mr. Robert Schmitz, a young French pianist, lately come to America and called to the Symphony Concerts at Mr. Monteux's request, will play the pianoforte part. At a recital a month or two ago in New York, reviewers and audience thought well of him. Schumann's symphony in E-flat major—the "Rhenish Symphony" seldom heard in recent years in Boston, will precede the Concertino. Goldmark's lush and colorful overture to the romantic Hindu play, "Sakuntala," will follow it.

On Thursday evening in Sanders Theatre at Harvard Mr. Monteux and the orchestra give the fifth of their series of concerts in Cambridge. They will begin the programme with Mr. Converse's new symphony and end it with Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala." The middle piece is Saint-Saëns's seldom chosen concerto in F major for pianoforte and orchestra in which Miss Martha Baird, the young pianist of Boston, recently heard and applauded in a recital of her own, will play the solo part.

Club Feb 8

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, 14th program. Schumann, Symphony No. 3, "Rhenish." Carpenter, "Concertino" for piano and orchestra; Goldmark, "Sakuntala" overture. Soloist, E. Robert Schmitz.

[illegible] HALL.—Tuesday at 8:15 ated it.

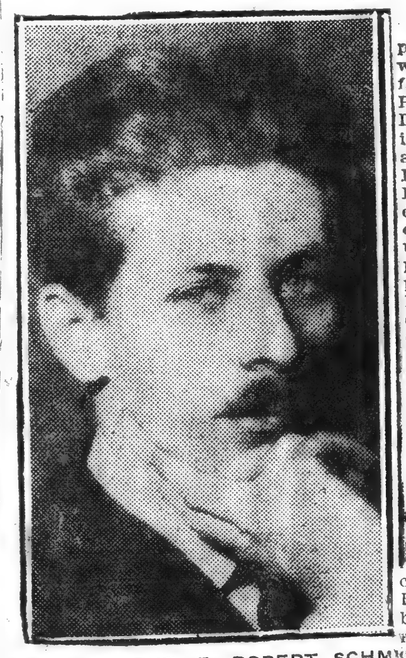
The much discussed French pianist, E. Robert Schmitz, will make his first appearance in Boston when he plays Carpenter's Concertino with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week. As a pupil of Diemer and a winner of the first prize at the Paris Conservatory, he gave recitals in each musical metropolis.

A versatile musician and a thorough artist, he founded and conducted his own Symphony Orchestra in Paris, consorted closely with such men as Debussy, Saint-Saens and d'Indy, and figured prominently upon certain memorable programs of the Schola Cantorum.

Joining his country's Army in 1914, he fought actively in the fiercest campaigns of the war with an anti-aircraft battery. Honorably discharged by Premier Clemenceau, he came to this country and took up his abode in Chicago, where his concerts became immediately popular. In New York he was received with enthusiasm as a brilliant musician and as a devoted exponent of the works of such composers as Debussy, Ravel and Magnard. He has lately announced a series of lecture-recitals to be given there.

Herald Feb 8

E. Robert Schmitz



LEFT TO RIGHT—E. ROBERT SCHM[illegible]

E. Robert Schmitz, pianist, who will play at the Symphony concerts this week, was born in Paris of an Alsatian family. He studied the piano at the Paris Conservatory with the late Louis Diemer and was awarded the first prize in 1910. He then made concert tours and accompanied Maggie Teyte, Julia Culp, Lula Mysz-Gmeiner and other singers. In 1911-12 he began as pianist and conductor to give concerts in Paris and paid especial attention to the works of the ultra-modern composers. He played the piano part D'Indy's "Mountain" Symphony, with the composer conducting. In the foundation of the "Association des Concerts Schmitz" he was assisted by Debussy, Gabriel Faure, Saint-Saens, Bruneau, Diemer, Florent Schmitt and others. In 1914 he joined the army of France, and during a service of 38 months was wounded twice, gassed severely, and sent to a hospital, where he remained six months. In the fall of 1918, honorably discharged, he went to Chicago, where he taught for a few months and played in public. Going to New York, which is now his home, he at once gained fame by his recital in Aeolian Hall on April 17, 1919. He gave a second recital on Dec. 6. He began in New York on the 22d of last month a series of four recitals with comments. The general subject is "The Spirit of Modern Music compared with the Spirit of Classical and Romantic Music and its Relations with the other Fine Arts." The subject of the last (Feb. 11) is: "The Scientific connection between the fine arts, the tradition of the masses in its erroneous expression: Bach, the first cubist; Debussy, the first classic."

Advertiser Feb 8

Dollar Reward" comedy and news films and new vaudeville.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

An event of some importance at the Symphony concerts next Friday and Saturday will be the first Boston performance of John Alden Carpenter's concertino for piano and orchestra. The piano part will be played by E. Robert Schmitz, the French pianist, who will make his first visit to Boston for the purpose. Schuman' Rhenish" symphony and Gold-

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

At the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday and Saturday the Piano Concertino by John Alden Carpenter of Chicago will have its first performances here. The piano part will be played by E. Robert Schmitz, a French pianist, who will be heard here for the first time. For the same program Mr. Monteux has chosen Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony, No. 3, and Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala."

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Post Feb 8

Robert Schmidt, pianist, soloist this week with the Boston Symphony.

E. ROBERT SCHMITZ

The much discussed French pianist, E. Robert Schmitz, will make his first appearance in Boston, when he plays Carpenter's concertino with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week. Mr. Schmitz's European career has been extensive and distinctive as well. As a pupil of Diemer and a winner of the first prize at the Paris Conservatory, he gave recitals in each musical metropolis, making his mark as a bold and discerning pioneer of new music. A versatile musician and a thorough artist, he founded and conducts his own symphony Orchestra in Paris, consorted closely with such men as Debussy, Saint-Saens and D'Indy, and figured prominently upon certain memorable programmes of the Schola Cantorum. Joining his country's army in 1914, he fought actively in the fiercest campaigns of the war, with an anti-aircraft battery. Honorably discharged by Premier Clemenceau, he came to this country and took up his abode in Chicago, where his concerts became immediately popular. In New York he was received with enthusiasm as a brilliant musician, and as a devoted exponent of the works of such composers as Debussy, Ravel and Magnard. He has further announced a series of lecture-recitals to be given there.

CARPENTER'S MUSIC AT SYMPHO

An event of some importance at pair of Boston Symphony concerts Friday and Saturday, will be the Boston performance of John Alden penter's concertino for piano and chestra. This is considered one of finest works of the talented com from Chicago, whose symphony, ventures in a Perambulator," and son are well known here, and whose ballet, "The Birthday of the Infant is being staged. The piano part in concertino will be played by E. Rob Schmitz, the French pianist of cons erable note, who will make his first v to Boston for the purpose. Pierre M teux will begin the programme w Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony, 3, which is supposed to reflect beauty of the Rhine country, and scribe in the third movement a mony in the Cologne cathedral. closing number will be Goldmark's ture to "Sakuntala."

URDAY, FEBRUARY 7,

As the World Wags

By PHILIP HALE.

Teutons Still Toot

As the World Wags:

Did you notice how the recent Symphony concert at which Wagner reappeared brought out our pre-war German friends? One greeted me "sehr lebhaft" in the corridor during the intermission—"Isn't it beautiful, like a little bit of Germany again yet, German songs and a German singer?" (Matzenauer).

I couldn't let it go. "Oh, Matzenauer? She is a Hungarian."

"So? Yes, but she married a German."

I couldn't let it go either. "Oh, yes, but she also married an Italian."

Spiteful American. Yet I did refrain from saying, "Bruennhilde sings English now." I didn't think of it in time.

Boston. SYLVA LYNING.

Feb 9

What Does He Sell?

As the World Wags:

Coming out of a concert after Bruennhilde's "Immolation" music had been sung, I heard two men talking it over. One said: "That's a fine song." The other said: "Yes, and she demonstrated it well, too." J. L. B.

Boston.

om JOURNAL

dress Providence, R. I.

te JAN 2 4 1920 A

With Sergei Rachmaninoff scheduled for two concerts in the space of a week Providence can well afford a few moments of self-congratulation. His recitals will inaugurate a fairly substantial musical schedule for the coming weeks when numerous offerings from the clubs of the city will fill the interim of concerts arranged in the Steinert series.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening at Infantry Hall will play Rachmaninoff's Third Concerto, which has never been given in this city. Critics have described it as full of "dark and splendid colorings, with wide rhythms and fiery climaxes," and is essentially characteristic of Rachmaninoff's style. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C Minor, which was recently played in Boston in memory of Henry Lee Higginson and which has not been heard here since 1915, will be played, as will also Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," built upon the haunting folk-song of Russia.

Next Sunday in his recital at the Shubert Majestic Rachmaninoff will play his "Valse, opus 10" and the "Etude, tableaux, opus 39." Other numbers of the programme are: "Sonata, Opus 31, No. 2,"; Allegro, Adagio, Allgretto, Beethoven; "Rondo Capriccioso," Mendelssohn; "Ballade, F minor," "Valse," "Scherzo, Opus 31," Chopin; valse, "Faust," Gounod-Liszt.

NEW YORK

ESTABLISHED 1861

Bulletin

From Providence, R. I.

JAN 24 1920 A

RACHMANINOFF, PIANIST, TO PLAY HERE TUESDAY

Composer Will Give Latest Concerto at Infantry Hall.

A feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening will be the appearance of Sergei Rachmaninoff. The great composer-pianist will play his latest concerto, which is dedicated to Josef Hofmann, but the latter has never attempted ...ndous music of dark, rich col... ...ging rythms and fiery cli... his concerto is said to be so ...th its creator's unique per... ...nd style that no one but him... ...o it full justice.

...onteux and his orchestra will ...ditional interest by performing ...s Fifth Symphony in C-minor, ... recently played in Boston in ...f Henry Lee Higginson, the ...nd sustainer of this historic ...on. The closing number will ...hoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka ...which is constructed upon the ... of Russia.

...announced last night by trus... ...he orchestra that M. Monteux ...made permanent conductor, and ...ill continue in that position dur... ...easons of 1920, 1921 and 1922. ...tor Monteux made a favorable

From Bulletin Providence, R. I. JAN 17 1920

Famous Russian Pianist Coming.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, called the greatest pianist and composer that Russia has produced, will play his third and latest composition, "Concerto in D-minor," when he appears with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall, Tuesday evening, Jan. 27. New York and Boston music lovers were unanimous in saying that such music and such playing had never been heard before. Pierre Monteux will conduct Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C-minor. Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" will be the closing number.

From Brooklyn Life New York City

Kreisler Soloist with Boston Symphony.

Those Boston Symphony concerts of past years in which Fritz Kreisler matched his exquisite tones with those of the great Orchestra stand out in the memories of many as supreme and unforgettable events. The master violinist's return as soloist at the Symphony concert to be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, February sixth, will be made the more notable by Beethoven's Violin Concerto, the finest ever composed. In such hands it should have an ideal performance. The same concert will be made memorable by a new symphony of Frederick Converse, the noted American composer, which Pierre Monteux is giving its first public performances. Rimsky Korsakoff's Overture on Russian Church themes, "A Russian Easter," will complete the program.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA UNDER M. MONTEAUX

Personnel Much Same as Before War; New Converse Symphony.

BY MAURICE ROSENFELD.

[Special Correspondence of The Daily News.]

Boston, Mass., Jan. 30.—Far afield, near the Atlantic coast, a stranger among friends, I visited Symphony hall and heard the Boston Symphony orchestra this afternoon under its director, Pierre Monteaux.

The impression that the orchestra has been disrupted and that it had undergone drastic changes in personnel is erroneous. W. H. Brennan, the manager, informed me that many of the members who had been dropped for a period were reinstated as soon as they had become citizens, and so nearly the entire orchestra remains as it was before the war.

There is a new horn quartet and there are also several members who are newcomers this year, but otherwise the change has been slight.

Resembles Chicago Orchestra.

As far as the orchestra is concerned, in dignity, in suavity and unity, it resembles the Chicago Symphony orchestra. It is a genuine symphonic body, which plays with the same spirit of artistry that distinguishes our orchestra, and no other orchestra that I have ever heard comes nearer to our ideal than does the Boston band.

Then also, M. Monteaux, the conductor, has some traits in common with Frederick Stock. Perhaps Monteaux has not quite that same elasticity, that broader sweep or that personal magnetism, particularly with the members of his orchestra that Stock has over his men, but he has excellent control over the band and produces fine graduations of tone, of power, of color and of accent.

Symphony hall is an ornate, impressive concert auditorium. Its acoustic properties are as near perfect as possible, and the music sounds effectively from any place in the hall. The seating capacity is but slightly in excess of that of Orchestra hall, but it is rather longer and not quite so high.

Architecturally it presents a very fine and imposing appearance.

Of the orchestra itself, there is a large string section, which is particularly good. Its tone, body and quality is rich and smooth and there is music in its tone production suggesting but little of the mechanical.

The new violoncellest, Jean Bedetti, is a French artist of high qualifications. His tone is true and ringing and it has a warm and human quality which is pitched low and sonorous.

He was the soloist of the day and played the Schumann concerto for violoncello with orchestral accompaniment in ... minor opus 109. The work itself is ... old time classic, but its second divi... on with its smoothly flowing legato ...elody was beautifully played by the ...oloist, and the accompaniment was a ...arvel of delicacy and accuracy of tempo. Then the oboe of Mr. Longy is known ...roughout the world and it has a pe...liarly fascinating timbre, quite differ...t from that of any other instrument ... its kind, and the entire woodwind ...ction is noted for its ready tonal char...ter.

...w Symphony by Boston Composer

The program contained a new symphony ... C minor by Frederick Shepherd Con...rse, a Boston composer, whose sym...phonic works have had performance with the Chicago orchestra. This work is the first of its kind which Composer Converse has presented and it is a fine addition to American symphonic literature.

Mr. Converse has kept to the older ...tructural form, though the ideas, the themes and their developments all have a flavor of newness in their build. Throughout the work, however, is some...ding suggestively American in rhythmic ...lse and beat, and also in thematic line. The four movements are written to a ...rt of mental program which is, as Mr. ...onverse expresses it, "subjective and ...uman, rather than impersonal and epic," ...nd so the second and third movements ...re most characteristic of the composer's ...usical ideals. The second is a fine, ...uiet movement, sustained and contem...lative, in which the mood is serene.

The third is gay and full of exuberance ...nd is sparkling with life and even hu...mor. The last division brings the threads ...f the entire symphony together in a ... march movement, which is a trifle long.

The orchestra gave to the performance of the symphony a virile and clearly defined interpretation and M. Monteaux brought forth its salient points comprehensively and with fine musical feeling.

The program closed with an overture, "La Grande Paque Russe," on themes of the Russian church, by Rimsky-Korsakow, and while it is an interesting example of Greek chants, converted into orchestral combinations and colors, is rather dry in content. It also was well performed by the orchestra.

From Providence Journal Providence, R. I. 108 JAN 25 1920 A

For the first time since the end of the war the Boston Symphony Orchestra played at its concert in Boston a little over a week ago excerpts from an opera by Wagner, and for the first time since the late war classic German songs were sung at a symphony concert. The songs were sung by Margaret Matzenauer and they were evidently appreciated by the audience, whose attitude was reflected in the remarks of the critics. The opera passages were from "The Dream of the Gods," the orchestral interlude recalling and glorifing the deed of the dead Siegfried and the long last speech of Brunhild before she mounts the pyre.

The songs had been translated by Mr. Krehbiel of the New York Tribune and were, according to the Boston Evening Transcript, "pleasing to the mind, the taste and the ear." Mr. Krehbiel has also translated the whole "book" of "Parsifal" which will soon be produced at the Metropolitan Opera House. The announcement of the German programme appeared to arouse no antagonism in Boston.

At the same concert a symphony new to Boston, Gluck's overture to his opera, "Iphigenia in Aulis," was played, but was rather overshadowed in attention by the Wagnerian music. Sigmund Stojowski's concerto in D-minor for piano and orchestra, which has been given in various European cities and in New York, was played for the first time by Mr. Monteux and his orchestra recently at Cambridge and repeated with interest.

* * *

Two compositions new to New York were brought forward by the New York Symphony Orchestra at a recent concert. The American John Alden Carpenter's first symphony, "Sermons in Stones," and the "Piano concerto in C-sharp," by the Russian, Tcherepnine, played by Benno Moiseiwitsch. New York was glad to hear these pieces and registered pride in its orchestra for playing the comparatively new American work. The Boston reviewers, however, see no reason why New York should pat itself on the back, as both Boston and Chicago orchestras recognized the symphony's merits last season and included it in their programmes.

It was played for the first time anywhere, two years and a half ago, at the annual music festival in Norfolk, and last season by the orchestras mentioned. Chicago has heard it several times this season and it is promised by Mr. Monteux for the current musical year. The critics are agreed as to the originality of the composition, its ingenuity and real value. But they view its modernity in entirely different lights.

Mr. Krehbiel of the Tribune feels that the "sometimes garish harmonious instrumental outfit" of the ground theme is prompted by a desire to be "original at any costs" and he regrets the use of the violins, "a la mandolin" in the Schertzo. The Sun also feels that the multitude of orchestral effects is astonishing, to say the least, and it can't help mourning the "good old days" when music employed few of the "bang-bang" instruments of the modern era. The Tribune, however, finds nothing but praise for Carpenter's work and lauds his courage in keeping clear of the old path of traditions and his success in the "thorniest paths of modern harmony."

* * *

Mr. Converse uses the largest of modern orchestras, and has sought a wealth of instrumental color that is often striking, and a potent enhancement of the value of the musical thought. The first movement is perhaps somewhat too long in elaboration; and there is a haunting feeling that all the movements would gain in power through a greater conciseness. There are beauty and deep feeling in the slow movement, and vigor and sonorous development in the last two. The music has not always the greatest distinction or the greatest originality in thematic material, but it is finely and deeply felt, and is developed with a more certain touch and a riper skill than any of Mr. Converse's previous productions.

Mr. Krehbiel, in The Tribune, judges "the symphony to be 'good music.' There are signs of labor in it, but the striving is not in vain. It yields results which charm the senses (especially in the second movement, with its peaceful nocturnal mood), excite the fancy and stir the emotions. As performed there were some crudenesses in the color scheme, in the combination of instruments, it seemed to us, but perhaps some of them did not sound in the mind of the composer as they came to the ears of the hearers. But the composer of today seems unable to dissociate conflict from noise and victory from din."

Feb. 9—Transcript

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

WELCOME BREAK IN ORCHESTRAL ROUTINE

The Impending Visit of Mr. Stransky and the New York Philharmonic Society—Mr. Ysaye and Mr. Elman in Seldon Heard Music for Two Violins, Variously Played—Mr. Lhevinne as a Pianist fo Pianists — Mr. Converse's Symphony Heard and Judged in New York—Programmes in Prospect

IT is not good for man or woman, institution or community, to fall int routine. Therefore there should be becoming curiosity among the frequenters of orchestral concerts in Boston to hear the Philharmonic Society of New York and Mr. Stransky, conductor, when they revisit Symphony Hall on Tuesday of next week. True, week in and week out from October through April, Bostonians may hear, and in numbers do hear, the orchestra that the successors of Mr. Higginson maintain for them. For that very reason, however, they should be the more eager to hear well-reputed bands from other cities. They do not come hither often; their visits in the past have oftener rewarded their pride than their pocket. Still, albeit at lengthening intervals, they come. There is not a conductor who would not prove his abilities upon new publics, an orchestra that would not show its mettle elsewhere than at home.

The more, perhaps, does a variously judged, a warmly debated conductor like Mr. Stransky crave such opportunity. He has devotees in New York who set him high among his fellow conductors in America; he enjoys there an eager following that flocks to his many concerts. On the other hand, there are those who reproach him with frequent shortcomings. Naturally he has set on his programme in Boston pieces (as even these detractors acknowledge) that suit his better powers—the Venusberg Music from "Tannhauser," for example, and Rakhmaninov's tone-poem, "The Isle of the Dead." Such music, moreover, invites the proved qualities of the Philharmonic Society, like breadth and sweep of tone, energy of accent, warmth of color. For the sake of these virtues in band and conductor, we must even make the best of Chaikovsky's thunderous overture, "1812"; while they are not without advantage to the chosen symphony, Beethoven's "Eroica."

Here in Boston we hear Mr. Stransky too seldom to take sides in the endless debate over his qualities as conductor; but that very debate sharpens curiosity. It is worse than provincial to believe that there are no interesting conductors outside the conductor who happens to be leading the Symphony Concerts and no orchestra to stir the ear except that which sits permanently in Symphony Hall. The Chicago Orchestra, Mr. Damrosch's, the Philharmonic itself, long ago gainsaid to the dullest Bostonian ear this parochial notion. By the same token, in the last ten years interesting conductors have been heard in Boston besides Dr. Muck and Mr. Monteux. The more heartily—and also the more discriminatingly—we come back to our own symphonic fare, when we have tasted that which

Mr. Converse Heard in New York

Mr. Converse's new symphony, played in New York last Saturday afternoon by Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra, was received by the reviewers there much as it was received by the reviewers here. Mr. Aldrich, for example, writes in The Times

From News Baltimore, Md. JAN 11 1920

A Revised Opinion.

I would not dare repeat—and The News wouldn't think for a moment of printing it if I did—the language I used following the local debut of Leo Ornstein, the extraordinary young Russian pianist, a couple of season's ago.

The occasion was one of those dreadful benefit affairs we all had to stand during the war. Probably it was no worse than a hundred others, but there were "features" (Oh! Oh!) that made it conspicuous. For instance, there was a certain young amateur Duchess soprano who publicly rebuked her accompanist and otherwise — but what's the use proceeding with further details of her part in the event?

It was Ornstein's "carryin's on" that contributed the most spectacular element. The audience roared and it seemed about as good a tribute as any vaudeville act could win.

I got the opinion, then and there, to summarize that here was surely the world's freakiest pianist. Accordingly, it was with great curiosity that I went to hear him at the Boston Symphony concert the other night. I wanted to discover what effect a second hearing, and under such vastly more important conditions, would produce.

And I am now convinced that something was very radically wrong either with me or with Ornstein on that former occasion.

He held me with a strong grip throughout his performance of the MacDowell Concerto by the strength, the virility of his reading and by his musical intelligence and insight. When he finished I felt that he was justly entitled to a place among the really big virtuosi of the day.

How foolish it is always to assert a dogmatic opinion at a premiere acquaintance! How dangerous extremes are anyway! And journalistic life be a proof of this.

Later Dates.

Among the events scheduled to take place later in the season are a recital by Tetrazzini on March 10 and a recital by Fritz Kreisler on March 24.

JACK DAW.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Post Feb 8

Robert Schmidt, pianist, soloist this week with the Boston Symphony.

E. ROBERT SCHMITZ

The much discussed French pianist, E. Robert Schmitz, will make his first appearance in Boston, when he plays Carpenter's concertino with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week. Mr. Schmitz's European career has been extensive and distinctive as well. As a pupil of Diemer and a winner of the first prize at the Paris Conservatory, he gave recitals in each musical metropolis, making his mark as a bold and discerning pioneer of new music. A versatile musician and a thorough artist, he founded and conducts his own symphony Orchestra in Paris, consorted closely with such men as Debussy, Saint-Saens and D'Indy, and figured prominently upon certain memorable programmes of the Schola Cantorum. Joining his country's army in 1914, he fought actively in the fiercest campaign of the war, with an anti-aircraft battery. Honorably discharged by Premier Clemenceau, he came to this country and took up his abode in Chicago, where his concerts became immediately popular. In New York he was received with enthusiasm as a brilliant musician, and as a devoted exponent of the works of such composers as Debussy, Ravel and Magnard. He has further announced a series of lecture-recitals to be given there.

CARPENTER'S MUSIC AT SYMPHO

An event of some importance at pair of Boston Symphony concerts Friday and Saturday, will be the Boston performance of John Alden penter's concertino for piano and chestra. This is considered one of finest works of the talented comp from Chicago, whose symphony, ventures in a Perambulator," and son are well known here, and whose n ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta," is being staged. The piano part in concertino will be played by J. Rob Schmitz, the French pianist of cons erable note, who will make his first v to Boston for the purpose. Pierre M teux will begin the programme w Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony, 3, which is supposed to reflect beauty of the Rhine country, and scribe in the third movement a c mony in the Cologne cathedral. closing number will be Goldmark's c ture to "Sakuntala."

URDAY, FEBRUARY 7,

Herald Chicago Press Feb 8

As the World Wags

By PHILIP HALE.

Teutons Still Toot

As the World Wags:

Did you notice how the recent Symphony concert at which Wagner reappeared brought out our pre-war German friends? One greeted me "sehr lebhaft" in the corridor during the intermission—"Isn't it beautiful, like a little bit of Germany again yet, German songs and a German singer?" (Matzenauer).

I couldn't let it go. "Oh, Matzenauer? She is a Hungarian."

"So? Yes, but she married a German."

I couldn't let it go either. "Oh, yes, but she also married an Italian."

Spiteful American. Yet I did refrain from saying, "Bruennhilde sings English now." I didn't think of it in time.

Boston. SYLVA LYNING.

What Does He Sell?

As the World Wags:

Coming out of a concert after Bruennhilde's "Immolation" music had been sung, I heard two men talking it over. One said: "That's a fine song." The other said: "Yes, and she demonstrated it well, too." J. L. B.

Boston.

om JOURNAL

dress Providence, R. I.

te

With Sergei Rachmaninoff scheduled for two concerts in the space of a week Providence can well afford a few moments of self-congratulation. His recitals will inaugurate a fairly substantial musical schedule for the coming weeks when numerous offerings from the clubs of the city will fill the interim of concerts arranged in the Steinert series.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening at Infantry Hall will play Rachmaninoff's Third Concerto, which has never been given in this city. Critics have described it as full of "dark and splendid colorings, wi[ld] rhythms and fiery climaxes," and is essentially characteristic of Rachmaninoff's style. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C Minor, which was recently played in Boston in memory of Henry Lee Higginson and which has not been heard here since 1915, will be played, as will also Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," built upon the haunting folk-song of Russia.

Next Sunday in his recital at the Shubert Majestic Rachmaninoff will play his "Valse, opus 10" and the "Etude, tableaux, opus 39." Other numbers of the programme are: "Sonata, Opus 31, No. 2,"; Allegro, Adagio, Allgretto, Beethoven; "Rondo Capriccioso," Mendelssohn; "Ballade, F-minor," "Valse," "Scherzo, Op[us] 31," Chopin; valse, "Faust," Gounod-Liszt.

NEW YORK

ESTABLISHED 1881

From

RACHMANINOFF, PIANIST, TO PLAY HERE TUESDAY

Composer Will Give Latest Concerto at Infantry Hall.

A feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening will be the appearance of Sergei Rachmaninoff. The great composer-pianist will play his latest concerto, which is dedicated to Josef Hofmann, but the latter has never attempted [the] tremendous music of dark, rich colo[r]ing, ringing rythms and fiery ch[a]racter. This concerto is said to be so [full] with its creator's unique personality and style that no one but himself can do it full justice.

Monteux and his orchestra will add additional interest by performing [Tchaikovsky's] Fifth Symphony in C-minor, [which] only recently played in Boston in memory of Henry Lee Higginson, the [great] friend and sustainer of this historic [institu]tion. The closing number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," which is constructed upon the [folk-]songs of Russia.

It is announced last night by trustees of the orchestra that M. Monteux has been made permanent conductor, and that he will continue in that position during the seasons of 1920, 1921 and 1922. Director Monteux made a favorable

From

Brooklyn Life

New York City

JAN 17 19

Famous Russian Pianist Coming.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, called the greatest pianist and composer that Russia has produced, will play his third and latest composition, "Concerto in D-minor," when he appears with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall, Tuesday evening, Jan. 27. New York and Boston music lovers were unanimous in saying that such music and such playing had never been heard before. Pierre Monteux will conduct Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C-minor. Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" will be the closing number.

Kreisler Soloist with Boston Symphony.

Those Boston Symphony concerts of past years in which Fritz Kreisler matched his exquisite tones with those of the great Orchestra stand out in the memories of many as supreme and unforgettable events. The master violinist's return as soloist at the Symphony concert to be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, February sixth, will be made the more notable by Beethoven's Violin Concerto, the finest ever composed. In such hands it should have an ideal performance. The same concert will be made memorable by a new symphony of Frederick Converse, the noted American composer, which Pierre Monteux is giving its first public performance. Rimsky Korsakoff's Overture on Russian Church themes, "A Russian Easter," will complete the program.

Chicago Press Feb 8

BOSTON ORCHESTRA UNDER M. MONTEAUX

Personnel Much Same as Before War; New Converse Symphony.

BY MAURICE ROSENFELD.

[Special Correspondence of The Daily News.]

Boston, Mass., Jan. 30.—Far afield, near the Atlantic coast, a stranger among friends, I visited Symphony hall and heard the Boston Symphony orchestra this afternoon under its director, Pierre Monteaux.

The impression that the orchestra has been disrupted and that it had undergone drastic changes in personnel is erroneous. W. H. Brennan, the manager, informed me that many of the members who had been dropped for a period were reinstated as soon as they had become citizens, and so nearly the entire orchestra remains as it was before the war.

There is a new horn quartet and there are also several members who are newcomers this year, but otherwise the change has been slight.

Resembles Chicago Orchestra.

As far as the orchestra is concerned, in dignity, in suavity and unity, it resembles the Chicago Symphony orchestra. It is a genuine symphonic body, which plays with the same spirit of artistry that distinguishes our orchestra, and no other orchestra that I have ever heard comes nearer to our ideal than does the Boston band.

Then also, M. Monteaux, the conductor, has some traits in common with Frederick Stock. Perhaps Monteaux has not quite that same elasticity, that broader sweep or that personal magnetism, particularly with the members of his orchestra that Stock has over his men, but he has excellent control over the band and produces fine graduations of tone, of power, of color and of accent.

Symphony hall is an ornate, impressive concert auditorium. Its acoustic properties are as near perfect as possible, and the music sounds effectively from any place in the hall. The seating capacity is but slightly in excess of that of Orchestra hall, but it is rather longer and not quite so high.

Architecturally it presents a very fine and imposing appearance.

Of the orchestra itself, there is a large string section, which is particularly good. Its tone, body and quality is rich and smooth and there is music in its tone production suggesting but little of the mechanical.

The new violoncellest, Jean Bedetti, is a French artist of high qualifications. His tone is true and ringing and it has a warm and human quality which is pitched low and sonorous.

He was the soloist of the day and played the Schumann concerto for violoncello with orchestral accompaniment in [A] minor opus 109. The work itself is [an] old time classic, but its second division with its smoothly flowing legato [mel]ody was beautifully played by the [so]loist, and the accompaniment was a [mar]vel of delicacy and accuracy of tempo. Then the oboe of Mr. Longy is known throughout the world and it has a peculiarly fascinating timbre, quite different from that of any other instrument [of] its kind, and the entire woodwind [sec]tion is noted for its reed[i]onal character.

New Symphony by Boston Composer

The program contained a new symphony [in] C minor by Frederick Shepherd Converse, a Boston composer, whose symphonic works have had performance with the Chicago orchestra. This work is the first of its kind which Composer Converse has presented and it is a fine addition to American symphonic literature.

Mr. Converse has kept to the older structural form, though the ideas, the themes and their developments all have a flavor of newness in their build. Throughout the work, however, is something suggestively American in rhythmic pulse and beat, and also in thematic line. The four movements are written to a part of mental program which is, as Mr. Converse expresses it, "subjective and human, rather than impersonal and epic," and so the second and third movements are most characteristic of the composer's musical ideals. The second is a fine, quiet movement, sustained and contemplative, in which the mood is serene.

The third is gay and full of exuberance and is sparkling with life and even humor. The last division brings the threads of the entire symphony together in a march movement, which is a trifle long.

The orchestra gave to the performance of the symphony a virile and clearly defined interpretation and M. Monteaux brought forth its salient points comprehensively and with fine musical feeling.

The program closed with an overture, "La Grande Paque Russe," on themes of the Russian church, by Rimsky-Korsakow, and while it is an interesting example of Greek chants, converted into orchestral combinations and colors, is rather dry in content. It also was well performed by the orchestra.

URNAL

Providence, R. I.

JAN 25 192[1]

For the first time since the end of the war the Boston Symphony Orchestra played at its concert in Boston a little over a week ago excerpts from an opera by Wagner, and for the first time since the late war classic German songs were sung at a symphony concert. The songs were sung by Margaret Matzenauer and they were evidently appreciated by the audience, whose attitude was reflected in the remarks of the critics. The opera passages were from "The Dream of the Gods," the orchestral interlude recalling and glorifing the deed of the dead Siegfried and the long last speech of Brunhild before she mounts the pyre.

The songs had been translated by Mr. Krehbiel of the New York Tribune and were, according to the Boston Evening Transcript, "pleasing to the mind, the taste and the ear." Mr. Krehbiel has also translated the whole "book" of "Parsifal" which will soon be produced at the Metropolitan Opera House. The announcement of the German programme appeared to arouse no antagonism in Boston.

At the same concert a symphony new to Boston, Gluck's overture to his opera, "Iphigenia in Aulis," was played, but was rather overshadowed in attention by the Wagnerian music. Sigmund Stojowski's concerto in D-minor for piano and orchestra, which has been given in various European cities and in New York, was played for the first time by Mr. Monteux and his orchestra recently at Cambridge and repeated with interest.

* * *

Two compositions new to New York were brought forward by the New York Symphony Orchestra at a recent concert. The American John Alden Carpenter's first symphony, "Sermons in Stones," and the "Piano concerto in C-sharp," by the Russian, Tcherepnine, played by Benno Moiseiwitsch. New York was glad to hear these pieces and registered pride in its orchestra for playing the comparatively new American work. The Boston reviewers, however, see no reason why New York should pat itself on the back, as both Boston and Chicago orchestras recognized the symphony's merits last season and included it in their programmes.

It was played for the first time anywhere, two years and a half ago, at the annual music festival in Norfolk, and last season by the orchestras mentioned. Chicago has heard it several times this season and it is promised by Mr. Monteux for the current musical year. The critics are agreed as to the originality of the composition, its ingenuity and real value. But they view its modernity in entirely different lights.

Mr. Krehbiel of the Tribune feels that the "sometimes garish harmonious instrumental outfit" of the ground theme is prompted by a desire to be "original at any costs" and he regrets the use of the violins, "a la mandolin" in the Schertzo. The Sun also feels that the multitude of orchestral effects is astonishing, to say the least, and it can't help mourning the "good old days" when music employed few of the "bang-bang" instruments of the modern era. The Tribune, however, finds nothing but praise for Carpenter's work and lauds his courage in keeping clear of the old path of traditions and his success in the "thorniest paths of modern harmony."

* * *

Mr. Converse uses the largest of modern orchestras, and has sought a wealth of instrumental color that is often striking, and a potent enhancement of the value of the musical thought. The first movement is perhaps somewhat too long in elaboration; and there is a haunting feeling that all the movements would gain in power through a greater conciseness. There are beauty and deep feeling in the slow movement, and vigor and sonorous development in the last two. The music has not always the greatest distinction or the greatest originality in thematic material, but it is finely and deeply felt, and is developed with a more certain touch and a riper skill than any of Mr. Converse's previous productions.

Mr. Krehbiel, in The Tribune, judges "the symphony to be 'good music.' There are signs of labor in it, but the striving is not in vain. It yields results which charm the senses (especially in the second movement, with its peaceful nocturnal mood), excite the fancy and stir the emotions. As performed there were some crudenesses in the color scheme, in the combination of instruments, it seemed to us, but perhaps some of them did not sound in the mind of the composer as they came to the ears of the hearers. But the composer of today seems unable to dissociate conflict from noise and victory from din."

Feb. 9—Transcript

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

WELCOME BREAK IN ORCHESTRAL ROUTINE

The Impending Visit of Mr. Stransky and the New York Philharmonic Society —Mr. Ysaye and Mr. Elman in Seldom Heard Music for Two Violins, Variously Played—Mr. Lhevinne as a Pianist fo[r] Pianists — Mr. Converse's Symphony Heard and Judged in New York—Programmes in Prospect

IT is not good for man or woman, institution or community, to fall into routine. Therefore there should be [a] becoming curiosity among the frequenters of orchestral concerts in Boston to hear the Philharmonic Society of New York and Mr. Stransky, conductor, when they revisit Symphony Hall on Tuesday of next week. True, week in and week out from October through April, Bostonians may hear, and in numbers do hear, the orchestra that the successors of Mr. Higginson maintain for them. For that very reason, however, they should be the more eager to hear well-reputed bands from other cities. They do not come hither often; their visits in the past have oftener rewarded their pride than their pocket. Still, albeit at lengthening intervals, they come. There is not a conductor who would not prove his abilities upon new publics, an orchestra that would not show its mettle elsewhere than at home.

The more, perhaps, does a variously judged, a warmly debated conductor like Mr. Stransky crave such opportunity. He has devotees in New York who set him high among his fellow conductors in America; he enjoys there an eager following that flocks to his many concerts. On the other hand, there are those who reproach him with frequent shortcomings. Naturally he has set on his programme in Boston pieces (as even these detractors acknowledge) that suit his better powers—the Venusberg Music from "Tannhäuser," for example, and Rakhmaninov's tone-poem, "The Isle of the Dead." Such music, moreover, invites the proved qualities of the Philharmonic Society, like breadth and sweep of tone, energy of accent, warmth of color. For the sake of these virtues in band and conductor, we must even make the best of Chaikovsky's thunderous overture, "1812"; while they are not without advantage to the chosen symphony, Beethoven's "Eroica."

Here in Boston we hear Mr. Stransky too seldom to take sides in the endless debate over his qualities as conductor; but that very debate sharpens curiosity. It is worse than provincial to believe that there are no interesting conductors outside the conductor who happens to be leading the Symphony Concerts and no orchestra to stir the ear except that which sits permanently in Symphony Hall. The Chicago Orchestra, Mr. Damrosch's, the Philharmonic itself, long ago gainsaid to the dullest Bostonian ear this parochial notion. By the same token, in the last ten years interesting conductors have been heard in Boston besides Dr. Muck and Mr. Monteux. The more heartily—and also the more discriminatingly—we come back to our own symphonic fare, when we have tasted that which [other] cities receive.

Mr. Converse Heard in New York

Mr. Converse's new symphony, played in New York last Saturday afternoon by Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra, was received by the reviewers there much as it was received by the reviewers here. Mr. Aldrich, for example, writes in The Times

From News Baltimore, Md.

A Revised Opinion.

I would not dare repeat—and The News wouldn't think for a moment of printing it if I did—the language I used following the local debut of Leo Ornstein, the extraordinary young Russian pianist, a couple of season's ago.

The occasion was one of those dreadful benefit affairs we all had to stand during the war. Probably it was no worse than a hundred others, but there were "features" (Oh! Oh!) that made it conspicuous. For instance, there was a certain young amateur Duchess soprano who publicly rebuked her accompanist and otherwise — but what's the use proceeding with further details of her part in the event?

It was Ornstein's "carryin's on" that contributed the most spectacular element. The audience roared and it seemed about as good a tribute as any vaudeville act could win.

I got the opinion, then and there, to summarize that here was surely the world's freakiest pianist. Accordingly, it was with great curiosity that I went to hear him at the Boston Symphony concert the other night. I wanted to discover what effect a second hearing, and under such vastly more important conditions, would produce.

And I am now convinced that something was very radically wrong either with me or with Ornstein on that former occasion.

He held me with a strong grip throughout his performance of the MacDowell Concerto by the strength, the virility of his reading and by his musical intelligence and insight. When he finished I felt that he was justly entitled to a place among the really big virtuosi of the day.

How foolish it is always to assert a dogmatic opinion at a premiere acquaintance! How dangerous extremes are anyway! And journalistic life be a proof of this.

Later Dates.

Among the events scheduled to take place later in the season are a recital by Tetrazzini on March 10 and a recital by Fritz Kreisler on March 24.

JACK DAW.

[Pe]rson, M[d.]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

New York City

For the season's last Boston Symphony concert but one, to be given on Thursday evening, February 5, at Carnegie Hall, Pierre Monteux has chosen chiefly Vincent d'Indy's Second Symphony, and for the ensuing Saturday matinee, a new symphony by the American composer, Frederick Converse.

HERALD

New York City

JAN 25 1920

The last but one Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, February 6, will be made memorable by the reappearance of Fritz Kreisler as soloist after an absence of two seasons. Fitting music for the occasion will be Beethoven's incomparable violin concerto. In such hands it should have an ideal performance. The same programme is notable on account of a new symphony by Frederick Converse, the admired American composer. Mr. Monteux is giving the work its first public performances. The closing number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture on Russian church themes, "A Russian Easter."

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Morning Telegraph

New York City

JAN 25 1920

BOSTONIAN SYMPHONY.

Monteux Chooses Interesting Programme for Next Week's Concerts at Carnegie Hall.

For the season's last Boston Symphony Concert but one, to be given on Thursday evening, February 5, at Carnegie Hall, Pierre Monteux has chosen the following program: Vincent d'Indy's Second Symphony in B Flat, Mozart's Overture to "The Magic Flute," Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death, from "Tristan and Isolde," and Liszet's "Les Preludes." For the ensuing Saturday matinee the most notable work will be a new Symphony in C Minor, by the American composer, Frederick Converse, which Mr. Monteux is giving its first public performances. For the rest, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Overture, "The Russian Easter," on themes of the Russ church.

EVENING SUN

New York City

JAN 24 1920

For the season's last Boston Symphony concert but one to be given on Thursday evening, Feb. 5, at Carnegie Hall, Pierre Monteux has chosen the following programme: Vincent d'Indy's Second Symphony in B flat, Mozart's Overture to "The Magic Flute," Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" and Liszt's "Les Preludes." For the ensuing Saturday matinee the most notable work will be a new symphony in C minor by the American composer, Frederick Converse, which Mr. Monteux is giving its first public performances. For the rest, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Overture, "The Russian Easter," on themes of the Russian Church.

From WORLD,

New York City

JAN 25 1920

For the season's last Boston Symphony concert but one, to be given on Thursday evening, Feb. 5, at Carnegie Hall, Pierre Monteux has chosen the following programme: Vincent d'Indy's second symphony in B flat, Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," Wagner's prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," and Liszt's "Les Preludes." For the ensuing Saturday matinee the most notable work will be a new symphony in C minor by the American composer, Frederick Converse, which Mr. Monteux is giving its first public performances. For the rest, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Overture, "The Russian Easter," on themes of the Russian Church.

From TIMES,

Brooklyn, N

JAN 25 1920

FRITZ KREISLER TO PLAY.

The last Boston Symphony concert but one of the season, to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, February 6, will be made memorable by the reappearance of Fritz Kreisler as soloist after an absence of two seasons. Fitting music for the occasion will be Beethoven's incomparable violin concerto. In such hands it should have an ideal performance. The same program is notable on account of a new symphony by Frederick Converse, the admired American composer. Mr. Monteux is giving the work its first public performances. The closing number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's Overture on Russian Church themes, "A Russian Easter."

From EVENING POST,

New York City

JAN 31 1920 K

Boston Symphony Programmes

AT the last Boston Symphony Orchestra evening concert but one, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday, Pierre Monteux will conduct Vincent d'Indy's second symphony, Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," Wagner's Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde" and Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Preludes."

For the following Saturday matinée, a new symphony in C minor by the American composer, Frederick Converse, will have its first performance in New York. The remainder of the programme will be Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Russian Easter."

om HERALD

dress New York City

SUN

FEB - 1 1920

The Boston Orchestra will play Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall D'Indy's symphony No. 2, Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture; the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde" and Liszt's "Les Preludes." Saturday afternoon it will be heard in Frederick Converse's new symphony in C minor, which will then have its first public performance; Schubert's unfinished symphony and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter" overture.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From American

New York City

FEB - 1 1920

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, on the evening of February 5 in Carnegie Hall, plays Symphony No. 2 by d'Indy; overture to "Magic Flute," by Mozart; Prelude and Love-Death, from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde"; "Les Preludes," by Liszt. On the afternoon of February 7 the orchestra will present Sympahony C minor, by Converse (first public performance); "Unfinished" symphony by Schubert; overture, "Rusisan Easter," by Rimsky-Karsakoff.

From Times

New York City

FEB 1 - 1920

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play Thursday in Carnegie Hall D'Indy's symphony No. 2, Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture; the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde" and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

EVENING SUN

New York City

JAN 31 1920 D

At the last Boston Symphony Orchestra evening concert but one, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday, Pierre Monteux will conduct Vincent d'Indy's Second Symphony in B flat, Mozart's Overture to the "Magic Flute," Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," and Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes."

For the following Saturday matinee a new Symphony in C minor by the noted American composer Frederick Converse will have its first performance in New York. The remainder of the programme will be Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Overture, "The Russian Easter," on themes of the Russian Church.

EVENING JOURNAL

New York City

JAN 31 1920 K

At the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall next Thursday, Pierre Monteux will conduct Vincent d'Indy's Second Symphony, Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," Wagner's prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolda," and Liszt's "Les Preludes." For the following Saturday matinee a new symphony in C minor by Frederick Converse, will have its first performance in New York.

From Times

New York City

BROOKLYN MUSIC.

Alessandro Bonci will sing for the Little Italy Settlement on Monday evening at the Brooklyn Academy, assisted by Eleanor Brock.

Fritz Kreisler will play the Beethoven concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy on Friday evening.

rom EAGLE

ddress Brooklyn, N. Y.

ate D JAN 25 1920

Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony at the concert to be given at the Academy of Music, on Friday evening, Feb. 6. Beethoven's Violin Concerto is on the program. At that time also a new symphony of Frederick Converse, the American composer, which Pierre Monteux is giving its first public performances. Rimsky Korsakoff's overture on Russian Church themes, "A Russian Easter," will complete the programme.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From STANDARD UNION

Brooklyn, N. Y.

FEB 3 1920 A

Those Boston Symphony concerts of past years in which Fritz Kreisler matched his exquisite tones with those of the great orchestra, stand out in the memories of many as supreme and unforgetable events. The master violinist's return as soloist at the symphony concert to be given at the Academy of Music here on Friday evening, Feb. 6, will be made the more notable by Beethoven's Violin Concerto, the finest ever composed. In such hands it should have an ideal performance. The same concert will be made memorable by a new symphony of Frederick Converse, the noted American composer, which Pierre Monteux is giving its first public performances. Rimsky Korsakoff's overture on Russian Church themes, "A Russian Easter," will complete the programme.

m EAGLE

dress Brooklyn, N. Y.

Boston Symphony.

At the last Boston Symphony Orchestra evening concert, but one, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday, Feb. 5, Pierre Monteux will conduct Vincent d'Indy's Second Symphany in B flat, Mozart's Overture to the "Magic Flute," Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," and Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes."

For the following Saturday matinee, a new symphony in C minor by the noted American composer, Frederick Converse, will have its first performance in New York. The remainder of the program will be Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Overture, "The Russian Easter," on themes of the Russian Church.

CITIZEN

ss: Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSIC NOTES OF INTEREST

Fritz Kreisler to Be Soloist at Boston Symphony Concert.

Fritz Kreisler, the master violinis will be the soloist at the last Bosto Symphony concert of the season, bu one to be given in the Academy o Music next Friday evening, playing Beethoven's vlinon concerto. Another work of unusual interest will be Frederick Converse's new symphony in C minor which Pierre Monteux is giving its first public performance. Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture on Russian church themes, "The Russian Easter," will close the evening.

Sun

Baltimore, Md.

Kreisler With The Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony concerts of past years in which Fritz Kreisler matched his exquisite tones with those of the great orchestra, stand out in the memories of many as supreme and unforgettable events. The master-violinist's return as soloist at the last symphony concert but one of the season, to be given at the Lyric Theatre on Wednesday evening, February 4, will be made the more notable by the music in hand—Viotti's graceful and sparkling Concerto in A minor, which Kreisler has revived and bestowed with a new fame.

Music which should also be particularly welcome in Vincent d'Indy's powerful and rhythmic Symphony in B flat No. 2, admittedly the composer's master work and the foremost of the French school. Pierre Monteux will close the concert with Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter," a characteristic overture on themes of the Russian Church.

From News

Baltimore, Md.

JAN 25 1920

Music and Musicians

Kreisler's Return.

Fritz Kreisler will make his second local appearance of the season at the Lyric with the Boston Symphony Orchestra the night of February 4. He will present the rather unfamiliar Concerto by Viotti.

Mr. Kreisler will play here once again after this date, being booked for a recital at the Lyric on March 24.

Pierre Monteux, director of the Boston Symphony, further shows his fondness for novelties in the program he has arranged for his fourth Baltimore concert.

It is doubtful if there is any conductor now in this country who has

ESTABLISHED 1881

From EVENING SUN,

Baltimore, Md.

JAN 24 1920 E

Fritz Kreisler will play at the Boston Symphony Concert Wednesday evening, February 4, the little-known Viotti violin concerto in A minor. The symphony will be the wonderful one in B flat by D'Indy, also a very rarely played composition.

From AMERICAN,

Baltimore, Md.

JAN 25

KREISLER—BOSTON SYMPHONY

The master violinist, Fritz Kreisler's return as soloist at the last Boston Symphony concert, but one of the season to be given at the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, February 4, will be made the more notable by the music in hand—Viotti's graceful and sparkling Concerto in A minor, which Kreisler has revived and bestowed with a new fame.

From JAN 24 1920 E

Evening Star

Baltimore, Md.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

The last Boston Symphony concert but one, of the season, to be given at the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, February 4, will be made memorable by the reappearance with this orchestra of Fritz Kreisler, as soloist, after an absence of two seasons. Fitting music for the occasion is Viotti's sparkling and graceful Concerto in A minor, which, under the master's inspired bow, has made a new fame. Another notable part of the same concert will be d'Indy's powerful and eloquent Second Symphony in B flat, admittedly his master work and with scarcely a peer in the French school. Pierre Monteux will close the concert with Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture on Russian church themes, "A Russian Easter."

From JAN 1

EVENING SUN,

Baltimore, Md.

Fritz Kreisler, the master violinist, will be the soloist at the next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which takes place at the Lyric on the evening of Wednesday, February 4. He will also give a recital at the Lyric on March 24.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From

nquirer

Philadelphia, Pa.

JAN 25 1920 E

At the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Monday evening, February 2, the programme will include d'Indy's second symphony in B flat and the Russian Easter overture of Rimsky-Kosakoff. Mr. Fritz Kreisler will be the assisting artist and will play a concerto by Viotti.

From JAN 24 1920 E

Evening Public Ledger

Philadelphia, Pa.

The next Boston Symphony concert at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 2, will be made memorable by the appearance of Fritz Kreisler as soloist in the Viotti A minor concerto. The orchestra Vincent d'Indy's second s

From North Amer

Jan 25

Philadelphia

Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist at the last Boston Symphony concert but one of the season at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 2. He will be heard in Viotti's concerto, which he has modernized in interest by his own genius. The principal orchestral work will be Vincent d'Indy's Second Symphony in B flat, admittedly d'Indy's masterwork. The closing piece will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter," a characteristic overture on Russian church themes.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From STANDARD UNION

Brooklyn, N. Y.

Fritz Kreisler, the master violinist, will be the soloist at the last Boston Symphony concert of the season, but one, to be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, playing Beethoven's Violin Concerto. Surely no other violinist can reveal the greatness of this music in such impeccable fashion. Another work of unusual interest will be Frederick Converse's new Symphony in C minor which Pierre Monteux is giving its first public performance. Rimsky-Korsakoff's Overture on Russian Church Themes, "The Russian Easter," will close the evening.

om HERALD

dress: Washington, D. C.

te JAN 25 1920

The last but one Boston Symphony concert of the season to fall on Tuesday after, February 3, at the New National Theater, will be made memorable by the reappearance of Fritz Kreisler, as soloist, after an absence of two seasons. Fitting music for the occasion is Violti's graceful and sparkling concerto which under the master violinist's inspired bow has made a new fame. For the rest of the concert Pierre Monteux has chosen works of direct appeal which nevertheless constitute the highest symphonic achievement — Mozart's swift and dainty overture to "The Magic Flute," Schubert's immortal "Unfinished" Symphony, and Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death—the introduction and final apotheosis of the music drama, "Tristan and Isolde."

From

EVENING SUN,

Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The next to the last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given at the Lyric Theatre next Wednesday evening. It will mark the reappearance of Fritz Kreisler as soloist with the orchestra, playing Viotti's delightful concerto in A minor, and the revival by Pierre Monteaux, who has just been made permanent conductor of the Orchestra of Vincent d'Indy's second symphony in B flat. The power of this music and the brilliance of its performance under the baton of the composer's compatriot made a marked impression upon the audiences at the Boston concerts last week. The final number next Wednesday will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Russian Easter," built upon Russian church themes.

PUBLIC

EVENING TELEGRAM

Philadelphia, Pa.

FEB 1 - 1920 K

Viotti's delightful concerto in A minor, which has long been a special favorite with Fritz Kreisler's audiences, will be the music of the evening when the master violinist plays as soloist at the Boston Symphony concert, to be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow. Pierre Monteux, who has just been re-engaged as permanent conductor of the orchestra, will make this concert an event of two-fold interest, by reviving D'Indy's master work, the second symphony in B flat. The performance under the French conductor's baton has made a marked impression upon the audiences of Boston. The closing number will be Liszt's most popular symphonic poem, "The Preludes."

From JAN 25

Press,

Matching his exquisite tones with those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Fritz Kreisler should make the last Boston Symphony concert but one of the season at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 2, a memorable event. Suitable music for the occasion will be Viotti's sparkling and graceful concerto, which the master violinist has clothed with a new fame.

Pierce Monteux will make this concert further notable by conducting Vincent d'Indy's Second Symphony in B flat. This mighty, rhythmic music is admittedly d'Indy's masterwork, standing in unique grandeur among the achievements of the French school. The closing piece will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter"— a characteristic Overture on Russian Church themes.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

EVENING JOURNAL
New York City

For the season's last Boston Symphony concert but one, to be given on Thursday evening, February 5, at Carnegie Hall, Pierre Monteux has chosen chiefly Vincent d'Indy's Second Symphony, and for the ensuing Saturday matinee, a new symphony by the American composer, Frederick Converse.

HERALD
New York City

The last but one Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, February 6, will be made memorable by the reappearance of Fritz Kreisler as soloist after an absence of two seasons. Fitting music for the occasion will be Beethoven's incomparable violin concerto. In such hands it should have an ideal performance. The same programme is notable on account of a new symphony by Frederick Converse, the admired American composer. Mr. Monteux is giving the work its first public performances. The closing number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture on Russian church themes, "A Russian Easter."

ESTABLISHED 1881
From Morning Telegraph
New York City

BOSTONIAN SYMPHONY.

Monteux Chooses Interesting Program for Next Week's Concerts at Carnegie Hall.

For the season's last Boston Symphony Concert but one, to be given on Thursday evening, February 5, at Carnegie Hall, Pierre Monteux has chosen the following program: Vincent d'Indy's Second Symphony in B Flat, Mozart's Overture to "The Magic Flute," Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death, from "Tristan and Isolde," and Liszet's "Les Preludes." For the ensuing Saturday matinee the most notable work will be a new Symphony in C Minor, by the American composer. Frederick Converse, which Mr. Monteux is giving its first public performances. For the rest, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Overture, "The Russian Easter," on themes of the Russ- church.

EVENING SUN
New York City

For the season's last Boston Symphony concert but one to be given on Thursday evening, Feb. 5, at Carnegie Hall, Pierre Monteux has chosen the following programme: Vincent d'Indy's Second Symphony in B flat, Mozart's Overture to "The Magic Flute," Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" and Liszt's "Les Preludes." For the ensuing Saturday matinee the most notable work will be a new symphony in C minor by the American composer, Frederick Converse, which Mr. Monteux is giving its first public performances. For the rest, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Overture, "The Russian Easter," on themes of the Russian Church.

From WORLD,
New York City

For the season's last Boston Symphony concert but one, to be given on Thursday evening, Feb. 5, at Carnegie Hall, Pierre Monteux has chosen the following programme: Vincent d'Indy's second symphony in B flat, Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," Wagner's prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan und Isolde," and Liszt's "Les Preludes." For the ensuing Saturday matinee the most notable work will be a new symphony in C minor by the American composer, Frederick Converse, which Mr. Monteux is giving its first public performances.

From TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

FRITZ KREISLER TO PLAY.

The last Boston Symphony concert but one of the season, to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, February 6, will be made memorable by the reappearance of Fritz Kreisler as soloist after an absence of two seasons. Fitting music for the occasion will be Beethoven's incomparable violin concerto. In such hands it should have an ideal performance. The same program is notable on account of a new symphony by Frederick Converse, the admired American composer. Mr. Monteux is giving the work its first public performances. The closing number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's Overture on Russian [illegible] "A Russian Easter."

From
EVENING POST,
New York City

Boston Symphony Programmes

At the last Boston Symphony Orchestra evening concert but one, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday, Pierre Monteux will conduct Vincent d'Indy's second symphony, Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," Wagner's Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde" and Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Preludes."

For the following Saturday matinée, a new symphony in C minor by the American composer, Frederick Converse, will have its first performance in New York. The remainder of the programme will be Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Russian Easter."

om HERALD
ddress New York City

The Boston Orchestra will play Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall D'Indy's symphony No. 2, Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture; the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde" and Liszt's "Les Preludes." Saturday afternoon it will be heard in Frederick Converse's new symphony in C minor, which will then have its first public performance; Schubert's unfinished symphony and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter" overture.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From American
New York City

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, on the evening of February 5 in Carnegie Hall, plays Symphony No. 2 by d'Indy; overture to "Magic Flute," by Mozart; Prelude and Love-Death, from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde"; "Les Preludes," by Liszt. On the afternoon of February 7 the orchestra will present Sympahony C minor, by Converse (first public performance); "Unfinished" symphony by Schubert; overture, "Rusisan Easter," by Rimsky-Karsakoff.

From Times
New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play Thursday in Carnegie Hall D'Indy's symphony No. 2, Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, Wagner's "Tristan" finale, and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

EVENING SUN
New York City

At the last Boston Symphony Orchestra evening concert but one, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday, Pierre Monteux will conduct Vincent d'Indy's Second Symphony in B flat, Mozart's Overture to the "Magic Flute," Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," and Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes."

For the following Saturday matinee a new Symphony in C minor by the noted American composer Frederick Converse will have its first performance in New York. The remainder of the programme will be Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Overture, "The Russian Easter," on themes of the Russian Church.

EVENING JOURNAL
New York City

At the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall next Thursday, Pierre Monteux will conduct Vincent d'Indy's Second Symphony, Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," Wagner's prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolda," and Liszt's "Les Preludes." For the following Saturday matinee a new symphony in C minor by Frederick Converse, will have its first performance in New York.

From Times
New York City

BROOKLYN MUSIC.

Alessandro Bonci will sing for the [illegible] tle Italy Settlement on Monday ev at the Brooklyn Academy, assiste Eleanor Brock.

Fritz Kreisler will play the Beeth concerto with the Boston Symphon chestra at the Academy on Friday ning.

rom EAGLE
ddress Brooklyn, N. Y.
ate D JAN 25 1920

Fritz Kreisler will be the soloi with the Boston Symphony at th concert to be given at the Academy Music, on Friday evening, Feb. 6. Be thoven's Violin Concerto is on t program. At that time also a ne symphony of Frederick Converse, th American composer, which Pierr Monteux is giving its first public performances, will be heard. Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture on Russian church themes, "A Russian Easter," will complete the program.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Those Boston Symphony concerts of past years in which Fritz Kreisler matched his exquisite tones with those of the great orchestra, stand out in the memories of many as supreme and unforgetable events. The master violinist's return as soloist at the symphony concert to be given at the Academy of Music here on Friday evening, Feb. 6, will be made the more notable by Beethoven's Violin Concerto, the finest ever composed. In such hands it should have an ideal performance. The same concert will be made memorable by a new symphony of Frederick Converse, the noted American composer, which Pierre Monteux is giving its first public performances. Rimsky Korsakoff's overture on Russian Church themes, "A Russian Easter," will complete the programme.

m EAGLE
dress Brooklyn, N. Y.

Boston Symphony.

At the last Boston Symphony Orchestra evening concert, but one, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday, Feb. 5, Pierre Monteux will conduct Vincent d'Indy's Second Symphany in B flat, Mozart's Overture to the "Magic Flute," Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," and Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes."

For the following Saturday matinee, a new symphony in C minor by the noted American composer, Frederick Converse, will have its first performance in New York. The remainder of the program will be Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Overture "The Russian Easter" on themes of the Russian Church.

CITIZEN
Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSIC NOTES OF INTEREST

Fritz Kreisler to Be Soloist at Boston Symphony Concert.

Fritz Kreisler, the master violinis will be the soloist at the last Bosto Symphony concert of the season, bu one to be given in the Academy o Music next Friday evening, playing Beethoven's vlinon concerto. Another work of unusual interest will be Frederick Converse's new symphony in C minor which Pierre Monteux is giving its first public performance. Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture on Russian church themes, "The Russian Easter," will close the evening.

Sun
Baltimore, Md.

Kreisler With The Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony concerts of past years, in which Fritz Kreisler matched his exquisite tones with those of the great orchestra, stand out in the memories of many as supreme and unforgettable events. The master-violinist's return as soloist at the last symphony concert but one of the season, to be given at the Lyric Theatre on Wednesday evening, February 4, will be made the more notable by the music in hand—Viotti's graceful and sparkling Concerto in A minor, which Kreisler has revived and bestowed with a new fa Music which should also be parti larly welcome is Vincent d'Indy's pow ful and rhythmic Symphony in B f No. 2, admittedly the composer's m ter work and the foremost of the Fren school. Pierre Monteux will close concert with Rimsky-Korsakoff's "R sian Easter," a characteristic overt on themes of the Russian Church.

From
Baltimore, Md.

Music and Musicians

Kreisler's Return.

Fritz Kreisler will make his second local appearance of the season at the Lyric with the Boston Symphony Orchestra the night of February 4. He will present the rather unfamiliar Concerto by Viotti.

Mr. Kreisler will play here once again after this date, being booked for a recital at the Lyric on March 24.

Pierre Monteux, director of the Boston Symphony, further shows his fondness for novelties in the program he has arranged for his fourth Baltimore concert.

It is doubtful if there is any conductor now in this country who has

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.

Fritz Kreisler will play at the Boston Symphony Concert Wednesday evening, February 4, the little-known Viotti violin concerto in A minor. The symphony will be the wonderful one in B flat by D'Indy, also a very rarely played composition.

From AMERICAN,
Baltimore, Md.

KREISLER—BOSTON SYMPHONY

The master violinist, Fritz Kreisler's return as soloist at the last Boston Symphony concert, but one of the season to be given at the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, February 4, will be made the more notable by the music in hand—Viotti's graceful and sparkling Concerto in A minor, which Kreisler has revived and bestowed with a new fame.

From
Evening Star
Baltimore, Md.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

The last Boston Symphony concert but one, of the season, to be given at the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, February 4, will be made memorable by the reappearance with this orchestra of Fritz Kreisler, as soloist, after an absence of two seasons. Fitting music for the occasion is Viotti's sparkling and graceful Concerto in A minor, which, under the master's inspired bow, has made a new fame. Another notable part of the same concert will be d'Indy's powerful and eloquent Second Symphony in B flat, admittedly his master work and with scarcely a peer in the French school. Pierre Monteux will close the concert with Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture on Russian church themes, "A Russian Easter."

From
EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.

Fritz Kreisler, the master violinist, will be the soloist at the next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which takes place at the Lyric on the evening of Wednesday, February 4. He will also give a recital at the Lyric on March 24.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
nquirer
Philadelphia, Pa.

At the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Monday evening, February 2, the programme will include d'Indy's second symphony in B flat and the Russian Easter overture of Rimsky-Kosakoff. Mr. Fritz Kreisler will be the assisting artist and will play a concerto by Viotti.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

The next Boston Symphony concert, at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 2, will be made memorable by the appearance of Fritz Kreisler as soloist in the Viotti A minor concerto. The orchestr [illegible] Vincent d'Indy's second s [illegible] Korsako

From North Amer
Philadelphia

Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist at the last Boston Symphony concert but one of the season at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 2. He will be heard in Viotti's concerto, which he has modernized in interest by his own genius. The principal orchestral work will be Vincent d'Indy's Second Symphony in B flat, admittedly d'Indy's masterwork. The closing piece will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter," a characteristic overture on Russian church themes.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Fritz Kreisler, the master violinist, will be the soloist at the last Boston Symphony concert of the season, but one, to be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, playing Beethoven's Violin Concerto. Surely no other violinist can reveal the greatness of this music in such impeccable fashion. Another work of unusual interest will be Frederick Converse's new Symphony in C minor which Pierre Monteux is giving its first public performance. Rimsky-Korsakoff's Overture on Russian Church Themes, "The Russian Easter," will close the evening.

om HERALD
ddress: Washington, D. C.
ate

The last but one Boston Symphony concert of the season to fall on Tuesday after, February 3, at the New National Theater, will be made memorable by the reappearance of Fritz Kreisler, as soloist, after an absence of two seasons. Fitting music for the occasion is Violti's graceful and sparkling concerto which under the master violinist's inspired bow has made a new fame. For the rest of the concert Pierre Monteux has chosen works of direct appeal which nevertheless constitute the highest symphonic achievement — Mozart's swift and dainty overture to "The Magic Flute," Schubert's immortal "Unfinished" Symphony, and Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death—the introduction and final apotheosis of the music drama, "Tristan and Isolde."

From
EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The next to the last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given at the Lyric Theatre next Wednesday evening. It will mark the reappearance of Fritz Kreisler as soloist with the orchestra, playing Viotti's delightful concerto in A minor, and the revival by Pierre Monteaux, who has just been made permanent conductor of the Orchestra of Vincent d'Indy's second symphony in B flat. The power of this music and the brilliance of its performance under the baton of the composer's compatriot made a marked impression upon the audiences at the Boston concerts last week. The final number next Wednesday will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Russian Easter," built upon Russian church themes.

EVENING TELEGRAM
Philadelphia, Pa.

Viotti's delightful concerto in A minor, which has long been a special favorite with Fritz Kreisler's audiences, will be the music of the evening when the master violinist plays as soloist at the Boston Symphony concert, to be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow. Pierre Monteux, who has just been re-engaged as permanent conductor of the orchestra, will make this concert an event of two-fold interest, by reviving D'Indy's master work, the second symphony in B flat. The performance under the French conductor's baton has made a marked impression upon the audiences of Boston. The closing number will be Liszt's most popular symphonic poem, "The Preludes."

From
Press,

Matching his exquisite tones with those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Fritz Kreisler should make the last Boston Symphony concert but one of the season at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 2, a memorable event. Suitable music for the occasion will be Viotti's sparkling and graceful concerto, which the master violinist has clothed with a new fame.

Pierce Monteux will make this concert further notable by conducting Vincent d'Indy's Second Symphony in B flat. This mighty, rhythmic music is admittedly d'Indy's masterwork, standing in unique grandeur among the achievements of the French school. The closing piece will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter"— a characteristic Overture on Russian Church themes.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

ESTABLISHED 1881
From FEB 6 1920 H
EVENING WORLD,
New York City

Vincent d'Indy's second symphony was the feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall last night. It has not been heard so often that it has ceased to be novel, and it is intricate enough to demand close attention. Intellectual rather than emotional, up-to-date in construction, peppered with dissonances, it has fascinating

Rhythms and is full of color. It was exceedingly well played by the orchestra, and Mr. Monteux, as conductor, has never shone so signally. Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," Liszt's "The Preludes," and Wagner's prelude and love-death from "Tristan and Isolde" completed the programme.

CITIZEN
ess: Brooklyn, N. Y.

FRITZ KREISLER HERE.

Appears as Soloist with the Boston Orchestra.

The fourth of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Pierre Monteaux conducting, was given at the Academy of Music last night. Fritz Kreisler was the soloist.

The entertainment opened with the first execution in Brooklyn of the new symphony in C minor (Converse), a very delightful composition, and arranged in four parts for orchestration. The first part is in three movements, adagio misteriosi, allegro moderato and allegro appassionato; part two, adagio tranquillo molto e rubato; part three, allegro vivace scherzando, and the fourth part, allegro maestoso molto con fuoco e marziale. As was to be expected, the Boston aggregation of artists under the able leadership of the great French conductor, played perfectly the many different moods of the piece and were tremendously encored by the packed house.

Fritz Kreisler, than whom there is no greater violinist, was on the programme for one solo, Beethoven's concerto in D major, Op. 61, one of the great composer's master works, but his work was so highly appreciated by the auditors that he favored with another number quite as ambitious and well-played.

The final number for the orchestra was composed of Russian Church music, "La Grance Paque Russe" (The Russian Easter), arranged by Rimsky-Korsakoff. It is music quite apart from the average run of Russian as we have come to know it in late years and was a pleasing finish to a great programme.

EVENING SUN
ress New York City
FEB 6 1920 D

D'Indy From Boston.

In Boston it is probable that the works of Vincent d'Indy find a more willing and understanding ear than they do in New York. Here Walter Damrosch has been the celebrated French composer's prophet and chief interpreter, and has worked sincerely against a public lassitude, to create a feeling for his chief works. Last night, however, it was for M. Monteux and his players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to carry back to us the D'Indy Second Symphony and to bring home the learned, if unexciting, virtues of the work. It was finely played and had, no doubt, the native sympathy from its conductor. And this commodity was, in spite of all else, somewhat in demand.

For D'Indy is still upon a plateau high—and dry. His harmonics are those of a gray bearded Faust who is forever at his study table; the longing is there, but is hemmed about by knowledge—what a prodigious, passive, cautious knowledge of all musical idioms which must be shunned for the sake of an implacable artistic aristocracy! Dig deep, very deep under the aridity of it, and no doubt there are wells of thoughtfulness. But surface and subsoil are all of a desert monochrome, horny with inventions which will bloom only once a century. Harp and wood winds, muted horns: in this Second Symphony are all the instrumental characteristics of D'Indy's carefully cumbersome, reflective prose. Attending circumstances, and its worthy playing, were rather the features which made the return of the work interesting to the audience.

M. Monteux, thrice permanent conductor now of the Boston Orchestra, was equally fortunate in his directing of the overture to "The Magic Flute." Here was Mozart played with rare exquisiteness; and the prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," which followed it, served equally well, with the concluding "Les Preludes" of Liszt to bring the programme its balance of romanticism.

om Tribune
New York City

Boston Orchestra Revives Symphony By Vincent D'Indy

ork Given Here Ten Years Ago Still Impresses Upon Repetition as Failing to Attain Heights of Genius

By H. E. Krehbiel

ymphony concerts not only "tread each others' heels so fast they fol-," but their programs of late have ntained so many repetitions and so overlapped each other that to hear all the compositions in the current list one need but attend any single series of concerts. The Boston Orchestra gave its fourth evening concert for this year last night in Carnegie Hall. Its addition to the season's repertoire consisted of Vincent d' Indy's symphony in B flat. The rest of the program was made up of tales that have been more than twice told—Mozart's overtrue to "The Magic Flute," the prelude and finale of Wagner's "Tristan und Isaldi" and Liszt's "Preludes."

The symphony was doubtless a novelty, or as good as a novelty to the audience. The musicians from Boston gave it to us ten seasons ago. We were not favorably impressed with it then and last night's performance, perhaps equally intelligible if less finished, did not reconcile us to its dry scholasticism, its purely cerebral workmanship. Its harmonies did not lacerate our ears so much, but that may have been because we have heard so much dissonant music in the inerim that our sensibilities have been dulled. One may adhere to one' theory that a symphony should have charm, should present beautiful thoughts in a beautiful manner, and yet grow callous. Its structure was clear enough, its manifestation of skill and learning obvious, but æsthitically it still seemed to us an apotheosis of niggledly-piggedly, ingenious juggling with a fundamental theme which starts out with the motive which in Wagner's "Meistersinger" sings of love and youth and springtime, and with all its juggling does not get far beyond a bald presentation of the melodic germ.

Its third movement, which aims to be jocose, may be an expression of the composer's Gallicism in its multiplicity of rhythmical changes, but if it had been permitted to become frankly Gaelic, by which we mean modern Irish, as it seemed occasionally to be trying to do, it would have given us a more convincing proof of musical humor.

Obviously there was a programatic conceit at the bottom of the work in the mind of the composer, though the composer has not vouchsafed us a confession of the nature of the conceit. By saying that in absolute music form is becoming submissive to the incidents of veritable action, M. d'Indy has made confusion worse confounded, in this symphony at least.

m TELEGRAM
lress: New York City.
FEB 6 1
te

French Conductor Leads French Symphony.

Without soloists to attract its audiences, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has held its public throughout the season under its new French conductor, Pierre Monteux. Last night it came to Carnegie Hall for its next to last Thursday concert. The most pretentious number was d'Indy's second symphony, in which the men from Boston were at their best. D'Indy's music is always a little dull, but Monteux made it as interesting as any of his hearers could have expected. Mozart's "The Magic Flute" overture and Liszt's "Les Preludes" also were heard, and, in addition, Wagner's Prelude and Finale to "Tristan and Isolde." In Paris before the war Mr. Monteux was considered a good Wagnerian conductor.

PAUL MORRIS.

dress New York City
FEB 6 - 1920 A
te

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN FOURTH CONCERT HERE

John Aubert, Pianist, Entertains Audience With Well-Played Recital Program.

Wild weather did not deter a loyal and even zealous army of symphony devotees from besieging Carnegie Hall last evening when the Boston Orchestra played its fourth New York concert. D'Indy's B-flat major Symphony (No. 2) occupied the first half of the program, and its four indescribably beautiful movements, with their singularly charming uses of the horn and reeds and the utter and unaffected absence of any definite dramatic argument or descriptive purpose in the sequence, fully rewarded the enthusiasts of the audience. The Overture to "The Magic Flute," the Prelude and Love-death from "Tristan and Isolde," and Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes" (after Lamartine) completed the program.

From WORLD, New York City

MUSICAL MANNA FROM BOSTON.

There is a certain musical provinciality about New York City that attracts the attention and doubtless the commisseration of such metropolises as Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago; else how account for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Carnegie Hall? Had such a night to fetch musical manna from Bach Bay! We missed the prelude and love scene from "Tristan and Isolde" because we don't care for Bostonese Wagner. But there were the "Magic Flute" overture and that old warhorse, "Les Preludes," by Kriss-Kringle Liszt.

The clou of the evening, however, was Vincent D'Indy's symphony in B flat major, his second, in which is depicted the conflict between the composer's conscience and his craving to quote, boldly quote be it understood, from "The Mastersingers" and in which he compromises by absorbing the atmosphere and reproducing it in a scholastic manner; scholasticism doubled by cacophony. The facture is remarkable; D'Indy has intellect but little thematic invention. He is complex, cryptic, but in his third movement, when he does escape the Wagner obsession, he becomes Slavic, even Rimski-Korsakoff. The learning displayed is appalling, the results slender, musically speaking. It wasn't worth all the trouble that perspicacious Pierre Montenx bestowed upon the performance, which was not technically flawless. What went ye forth to hear last night, brother? Well, later we supped on the east wind. It was not too filling. Neither was D'Indy.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
FEB 6 - 1920 M
From Times
New York City

MUSIC

By Richard Aldrich

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Some of the auditors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who usually fill Carnegie Hall to the doors when it comes to New York, were kept away by the storm last evening from the fourth concert of the organization. Those who came heard a program composed of d'Indy's second symphony in B flat, the overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute," the prelude and final scene of Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Préludes."

D'Indy's symphony has had a few, not many, performances in New York, the most notable doubtless having been the one by the Boston Orchestra under his own direction fifteen years ago. It seems now the most distinguished production of the modern French school, something that the composer himself has not surpassed and that he came far from equaling in his last symphony called "De Bello Gallico," played here earlier in the season.

The one heard last evening is a difficult and complex work, alike for players and listeners; nor is it too much to say that it is a profound one, the product not only of a fertile imagination and a masterly command of symphonic structure and orchestral technique, but also of a deep intellectual conception. In this symphony the principle of the development of a complex thematic outfit from a very few "generative themes" has been carried to its extreme. It is a principle that was much favored by d'Indy's master, César Franck, and one that he himself has worked much on in the compositions of his later period.

Such a principle, or any other in art, must be justified by its results. In this symphony the results are deeply engrossing, and comprise many pages of great beauty. Nor can the full significance of these results be seized by the most attentive listener except after considerable immersion in the work. It has been called "cerebral"; it is unquestionably an intellectual product, but it cannot be denied musical beauty of a high order, imagination, potent inventiveness.

D'Indy writes, of course, in the extreme of the modern French idiom. There are harmonic acerbities; there are evolved unusual and frequently shifting rhythms. The orchestration has not always richness of a deep and glowing sound, but often a many facetted brilliancy of varied and sometimes piercing instrumental timbres. The melodiousness and pulsing rhythm of the first theme, the seizing beauty of the slow movement, the folk-like tune first an-

SUN FEB 8
From Herald
New York City

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS.

Plays d'Indy's Second Symphony; Also Mozart and Liszt.

The fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, took place last evening in Carnegie Hall. The programme comprised Vincent d'Indy's second symphony, in B flat, opus 57, the overture to "The Magic Flute" of Mozart, the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde" and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

The playing of the orchestra was very enjoyable, although its powers perhaps were not put to the fullest test in this programme. Mr. Monteux is an able conductor of the music of his native French soil, and in his reading of the

New York City. 110
FEB 8 1920 L

Boston Orchestra Plays Boston Symphony

Composition by Frederick Converse Heard at Carnegie Hall—Mme. Barrientos Returns to Metropolitan—Miss Garden in "Louise" at Lexington.

Boston is faithful to its own musicians The Boston Symphony Orchestra has always been liberal to its local composers Yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall it played a new symphony of Frederick Converse who is best known as the composer of the opera, "The Pipe of Desire," sung at the Metropolitan Opera House a few years ago. Other orchestral works of Mr. Converse have been played here, and in all he has shown an unusual talent combined with an immaturity of style. His music did not fit together well. But yesterday's symphony was an exception. Many recent symphonies from Europe heard here in the last few seasons have been less important.

The new work was written last summer and it had never been played in New York before. It is not a heavy, sorrow-laden symphony like the most famous German and Russian music in the same form. Its purpose is to "suggest the experiences of the young men and young women of our land during the trials of the war," to quote Mr. Converse. It is, to be sure a war symphony, but it is musically rather light. Mr. Converse's melodies are broad and weell suited to orchestral development. He has written good sweeping melody in earlier works. Not too original or too dissonant, the composer has avoided direct plagiarism. A few suggestions of Wagner are prominently noticeable and there is often a suggestion of the atmosphere of the modern French school. His harmonies are chromatic, but not too much so. The string section of the orchestra is well handled. There is, however, a little too much brass, and the wood winds at times appear to be neglected. But on the whole it is a good symphony, one of the best that has been introduced to New York this season.

The orchestra, led by Pierre Monteux, gave it a good reading. The tone of the string section has improved since the start of the season. Weak spots in the wood wind section, particularly among the clarinets, still are evident. Schubert's unfinished symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Russian Easter" overture completed the programme.

ESTABLISHED 1881
FEB 8 - 1920 D
From Times
New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At its afternoon concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday the Boston Symphony Orchestra played a program headed by a new symphony in C minor by Frederick Shepherd Converse, and containing also Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "La Grande Pâque Russe."

Mr. Converse is well known as one of the most talented of the youngest—no, now, alas! middle-aged—American composers. He is remembered as the composer of the prize-winning American opera, "The Pipe of Desire," produced at the Metropolitan Opera House ten years ago; of the symphonic poems "The Mystic Trumpeter" and "Ormazd"; of a string quartet, and of other compositions declaring him a serious and accomplished musician.

He has written but this one symphony, which he says has no program, though in writing it he had in mind "the experiences of the young men and young women of our land during the trials of the war." The two main themes of the first movement suggest the high resolve of the youths and the tender feminine traits of the maidens, wives and mothers; and these, continues Mr. Converse, move through the whole work like characters through the varied situations of a drama.

He writes for the largest of modern orchestras, and has sought a wealth of instrumental color that is often striking, and a potent enhancement of the value of the musical thought. The first movement is sombre in mood; "stern and determined," the composer has characterized it, with a contrasting feminine quality in the second theme. It is perhaps somewhat too long in its elaboration; and there is a haunting feeling that all the movements would gain in power through a greater conciseness.

There are beauty and deep feeling in the slow movement, from which Mr. Converse hints at a nocturne-like character, and there are vigor and sonorous development in the last two, the last suggesting, as the composer intended it should suggest, war and struggle, and jubilation over victory.

And so the symphony may be considered a direct product of the war and its reaction upon the composer's inspiration; and it may not be rash to deem it superior in some respects to the other "war" symphony played not long ago, d'Indy's "De Bello Gallico."

It has not always the greatest distinction or the greatest originality in the thematic material, but the music is finely and deeply felt, and is developed with a more certain touch and a riper skill than any of Mr. Converse's previous productions.

Mr. Monteux conducted it with much zeal and with apparent sympathy, and it was well played.

From EVENING POST, New York City FEB 6 1920

Music

Henry T. Finck

Operas and Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its Carnegie Hall concert last night, featured the Second Symphony of Vincent d'Indy. It was played by the same orchestra a number of years ago, and it is not one of those works which, like good wine and coffee beans, improve with age. Of all the French composers of the period, D'Indy is the least interesting. He has plenty of scholarship but little invention. Form is to him more important than ideas, duration more important than inspiration. The symphony bears out these remarks. It was well played, under the bâton of M. Monteux, recently elected for three more years as the conductor of the Boston orchestra.

m HERALD
ress New York City
e FEB 8 1920

Boston Orchestra Heard.

The fourth afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday in Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of Frederick S. Converse's symphony in C minor, Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter." Mr. Converse, an American living in Boston, is well known to American music lovers. His "Mystic Trumpeter" in particular is remembered with favor. The symphony heard yesterday is his first composition in this form, which he chose, according to his own statement, not because he desired especially to write a symphony, but because the form readily lent itself to his ideas.

This music is the outcome of Mr. Converse's feelings and reflections during the great war. It was written at Lake Sunapee last summer and has no definite programmatic intent. Moods are its materials, and these are published in the traditional four symphonic movements, an opening and a closing allegro, a slow second movement and a scherzo as the third. Two principal themes appear in the first movement, one designed to express the resolution of young American manhood facing the conflict and the other the tenderness and fortitude of the women.

The slow movement is soberly reflective, while the scherzo, somewhat restrained in gayety at the outset, finally bursts into a brilliant waltz. In the finale the brazen challenge of martial trumpets is heard and the ultimate development of the two chief themes of the first movement, which dominate the entire composition, rises to warlike clangors. Mr. Converse's music is interesting. The character of the thematic subjects is dignified and the developments clear, and with only sufficient modern harmony to prevent continual sweetness.

The symphony shows much sincerity of feeling and some imagination. It is the creation of a mind accustomed to self analysis and to scrutiny of human experience. If it lacks the note of profound eloquence it is in company with practically all the music thus far suggested by the war. It was admirably conducted by Pierre Monteux.

ESTABLISHED 1881
FEB 6 - 1920
From American
New York City

Symphony Featured by Boston Orchestra

The Boston orchestra was heard in a conservative programme in Carnegie Hall last night. Mr. Monteux made his selection from works long familiar to the concert public. And following the fashion adopted for the past two years by the New Englanders, there was no soloist.

The opening number was D'Indy's Second Symphony, which was interpreted with a sympathetic understanding of its moods and message. Mr. Monteux, as in the past, has individual ideas of tempo and inflection, and these were prominent, though not unpleasant, points in his reading.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

ESTABLISHED 1881
From EVENING WORLD,
New York City

FEB 6 1920 E

Vincent d'Indy's second symphony was the feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall last night. It has not been heard so often that it has ceased to be novel, and it is intricate enough to demand close attention. Intellectual rather than emotional, up-to-date in construction, peppered with dissonances, it has fascinating rhythms and is full of color. It was exceedingly well played by the orchestra, and Mr. Monteux, as conductor, has never shone so signally. Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," Liszt's "The Preludes," and Wagner's prelude and love-death from "Tristan and Isolde" completed the programme.

CITIZEN
ess: Brooklyn, N. Y.

FRITZ KREISLER HERE.

Appears as Soloist with the Boston Orchestra.

The fourth of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Pierre Monteaux conducting, was given at the Academy of Music last night. Fritz Kreisler was the soloist.

The entertainment opened with the first execution in Brooklyn of the new symphony in C minor (Converse), a very delightful composition, and arranged in four parts for orchestration. The first part is in three movements, adagio misteriosi, allegro moderato and allegro appassionato; part two, adagio tranquillo molto e rubato; part three, allegro vivace scherzando, and the fourth part, allegro maestoso molto con fuoco e marziale. As was to be expected, the Boston aggregation of artists under the able leadership of the great French conductor, played perfectly the many different moods of the piece and were tremendously encored by the packed house.

Fritz Kreisler, than whom there is no greater violinist, was on the programme for one solo, Beethoven's concerto in D major, Op. 61, one of the great composer's master works, but his work was so highly appreciated by the auditors that he favored with another number quite as ambitious and well-played.

The final number for the orchestra was composed of Russian Church music, "La Grance Paque Russe" (The Russian Easter), arranged by Rimsky-Korsakoff. It is music quite apart from the average run of Russian as we have come to know it in late years and was a pleasing finish to a great programme.

EVENING SUN
ress New York City

FEB 6 1920 D

D'Indy From Boston.

In Boston it is probable that the works of Vincent d'Indy find a more willing and understanding ear than they do in New York. Here Walter Damrosch has been the celebrated French composer's prophet and chief interpreter, and has worked sincerely against a public lassitude, to create a feeling for his chief works. Last night, however, it was for M. Monteux and his players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to carry back to us the D'Indy Second Symphony and to bring home the learned, if unexciting, virtues of the work. It was finely played and had, no doubt, the native sympathy from its conductor. And this commodity was, in spite of all else, somewhat in demand.

For D'Indy is still upon a plateau high—and dry. His harmonics are those of a gray bearded Faust who is forever at his study table; the longing is there, but is hemmed about by knowledge—what a prodigious, passive, cautious knowledge of all musical idioms which must be shunned for the sake of an implacable artistic aristocracy! Dig deep, very deep under the aridity of it, and no doubt there are wells of thoughtfulness. But surface and subsoil are all of a desert monochrome, horny with inventions which will bloom only once a century. Harp and wood winds, muted horns: in this Second Symphony are all the instrumental characteristics of D'Indy's carefully cumbersome, reflective prose. Attending circumstances, and its worthy playing, were rather the features which made the return of the work interesting to the audience.

M. Monteux, thrice permanent conductor now of the Boston Orchestra, was equally fortunate in his directing of the overture to "The Magic Flute." Here was Mozart played with rare exquisiteness; and the prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," which followed it, served equally well, with the concluding "Les Preludes" of Liszt to bring the programme its balance of romanticism.

om
Tribune
New York City

Boston Orchestra Revives Symphony By Vincent D'Indy

ork Given Here Ten Years Ago Still Impresses Upon Repetition as Failing to Attain Heights of Genius

By H. E. Krehbiel

Symphony concerts not only "tread each others' heels so fast they fol-," but their programs of late have contained so many repetitions and so overlapped each other that to hear all the compositions in the current list one need but attend any single series of concerts. The Boston Orchestra gave its fourth evening concert for this year last night in Carnegie Hall. Its addition to the season's repertoire consisted of Vincent d' Indy's symphony in B flat. The rest of the program was made up of tales that have been more than twice told—Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," the prelude and finale of Wagner's "Tristan und Isaldi" and Liszt's "Preludes."

The symphony was doubtless a novelty, or as good as a novelty to the audience. The musicians from Boston gave it to us ten seasons ago. We were not favorably impressed with it then and last night's performance, perhaps equally intelligible if less finished, did not reconcile us to its dry scholasticism, its purely cerebral workmanship. Its harmonies did not lacerate our ears so much, but that may have been because we have heard so much dissonant music in the inerim that our sensibilities have been dulled. One may adhere to one' theory that a symphony should have charm, should present beautiful thoughts in a beautiful manner, and yet grow callous. Its structure was clear enough, its manifestation of skill and learning obvious, but æsthitically it still seemed to us an apotheosis of niggledly-piggedly, ingenious juggling with a fundamental theme which starts out with the motive which in Wagner's "Meistersinger" sings of love and youth and springtime, and with all its juggling does not get far beyond a bald presentation of the melodic germ.

Its third movement, which aims to be jocose, may be an expression of the composer's Gallicism in its multiplicity of rhythmical changes, but if it had been permitted to become frankly Gaelic, by which we mean modern Irish, as it seemed occasionally to be trying to do, it would have given us a more convincing proof of musical humor.

Obviously there was a programatic conceit at the bottom of the work in the mind of the composer, though the composer has not vouchsafed us a confession of the nature of the conceit. By saying that in absolute music form is becoming submissive to the incidents of veritable action, M. d'Indy has made confusion worse confounded, in this symphony at least.

m TELEGRAM
iress: New York City.

FEB 6

French Conductor Leads French Symphony.

Without soloists to attract its audiences, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has held its public throughout the season under its new French conductor, Pierre Monteux. Last night it came to Carnegie Hall for its next to last Thursday concert. The most pretentious number was d'Indy's second symphony, in which the men from Boston were at their best. D'Indy's music is always a little dull, but Monteux made it as interesting as any of his hearers could have expected. Mozart's "The Magic Flute" overture and Liszt's "Les Preludes" also were heard, and, in addition, Wagner's Prelude and Finale to "Tristan and Isolde." In Paris before the war Mr. Monteux was considered a good Wagnerian conductor.

PAUL MORRIS.

dress New York City
te

FEB 6 1920 A

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN FOURTH CONCERT HERE

John Aubert, Pianist, Entertains Audience With Well-Played Recital Program.

Wild weather did not deter a loyal and even zealous army of symphony devotees from besieging Carnegie Hall last evening when the Boston Orchestra played its fourth New York concert. D'Indy's B-flat major Symphony (No. 2) occupied the first half of the program, and its four indescribably beautiful movements, with their singularly charming uses of the horn and reeds and the utter and unaffected absence of any definite dramatic argument or descriptive purpose in the sequence, fully rewarded the enthusiasts of the audience. The Overture to "The Magic Flute," the Prelude and Love-death from "Tristan and Isolde," and Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes" (after Lamartine) completed the program.

From WORLD,
New York City

MUSICAL MANNA FROM BOSTON.

There is a certain musical provinciality about New York City that attracts the attention and doubtless the commiseration of such metropolises as Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago; else how account for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Carnegie Hall? Had such a night to fetch musical manna from Bach Bay! We missed the prelude and love scene from "Tristan and Isolde" because we don't care for Bostonese Wagner. But there were the "Magic Flute" overture and that old warhorse, "Les Preludes," by Kriss-Kringle Liszt.

The clou of the evening, however, was Vincent D'Indy's symphony in B flat major, his second, in which is depicted the conflict between the composer's conscience and his craving to quote, boldly quote be it understood, from "The Mastersingers" and in which he compromises by absorbing the atmosphere and reproducing it in a scholastic manner; scholasticism doubled by cacophony. The facture is remarkable; D'Indy has intellect but little thematic invention. He is complex, cryptic, but in his third movement, when he does escape the Wagner obsession, he becomes Slavic, even Rimski-Korsakoff. The learning displayed is appalling, the results slender, musically speaking. It wasn't worth all the trouble that perspicacious Pierre Montenx bestowed upon the performance, which was not technically flawless. What went ye forth to hear last night, brother? Well, later we supped on the east wind. It was not too filling. Neither was D'Indy.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From Times
New York City

MUSIC

By Richard Aldrich

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Some of the auditors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who usually fill Carnegie Hall to the doors when it comes to New York, were kept away by the storm last evening from the fourth concert of the organization. Those who came heard a program composed of d'Indy's second symphony in B flat, the overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute," the prelude and final scene of Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Préludes."

D'Indy's symphony has had a few, not many, performances in New York, the most notable doubtless having been the one by the Boston Orchestra under his own direction fifteen years ago. It seems now the most distinguished production of the modern French school, something that the composer himself has not surpassed and that he came far from equaling in his last symphony called "De Bello Gallico," played here earlier in the season.

The one heard last evening is a difficult and complex work, alike for players and listeners; nor is it too much to say that it is a profound one, the product not only of a fertile imagination and a masterly command of symphonic structure and orchestral technique, but also of a deep intellectual conception. In this symphony the principle of the development of a complex thematic outfit from a very few "generative themes" has been carried to its extreme. It is a principle that was much favored by d'Indy's master, César Franck, and one that he himself has worked much on in the compositions of his later period.

Such a principle, or any other in art, must be justified by its results. In this symphony the results are deeply engrossing, and comprise many pages of great beauty. Nor can the full significance of these results be seized by the most attentive listener except after considerable immersion in the work. It has been called "cerebral"; it is unquestionably an intellectual product, but it cannot be denied musical beauty of a high order, imagination, potent inventiveness.

D'Indy writes, of course, in the extreme of the modern French idiom. There are harmonic acerbities; there are evolved unusual and frequently shifting rhythms. The orchestration has not always richness of a deep and glowing kind, but often a many facetted brilliancy of varied and sometimes piercing instrumental timbres. The melodiousness and pulsing rhythm of the first theme, the seizing beauty of the slow movement, the folk-like tune first an-

From Herald
New York City

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS.

Plays d'Indy's Second Symphony; Also Mozart and Liszt.

The fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, took place last evening in Carnegie Hall. The programme comprised Vincent d'Indy's second symphony, in B flat, opus 57, the overture to "The Magic Flute" of Mozart, the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde" and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

The playing of the orchestra was very enjoyable, although its powers perhaps were not put to the fullest test in this programme. Mr. Monteux is an able conductor of the music of his native French soil, and in his reading of the

New York City.

Boston Orchestra Plays Boston Symphony

Composition by Frederick Converse Heard at Carnegie Hall—Mme. Barrientos Returns to Metropolitan—Miss Garden in "Louise" at Lexington.

Boston is faithful to its own musicians The Boston Symphony Orchestra has always been liberal to its local composers. Yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall it played a new symphony of Frederick Converse who is best known as the composer of the opera, "The Pipe of Desire," sung at the Metropolitan Opera House a few years ago. Other orchestral works of Mr. Converse have been played here, and in all he has shown an unusual talent combined with an immaturity of style. His music did not fit together well. But yesterday's symphony was an exception. Many recent symphonies from Europe heard here in the last few seasons have been less important.

The new work was written last summer and it had never been played in New York before. It is not a heavy, sorrow-laden symphony like the most famous German and Russian music in the same form. Its purpose is to "suggest the experiences of the young men and young women of our land during the trials of the war," to quote Mr. Converse. It is, to be sure a war symphony, but it is musically rather light. Mr. Converse's melodies are broad and weell suited to orchestral development. He has written good sweeping melody in earlier works. Not too original or too dissonant, the composer has avoided direct plagiarism. A few suggestions of Wagner are prominently noticeable and there is often a suggestion of the atmosphere of the modern French school. His harmonies are chromatic, but not too much so. The string section of the orchestra is well handled. There is, however, a little too much brass, and the wood winds at times appear to be neglected. But on the whole it is a good symphony, one of the best that has been introduced to New York this season.

The orchestra, led by Pierre Monteux, gave it a good reading. The tone of the string section has improved since the start of the season. Weak spots in the wood wind section, particularly among the clarinets, still are evident. Schubert's unfinished symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Russian Easter" overture completed the programme.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Times
New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At its afternoon concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday the Boston Symphony Orchestra played a program headed by a new symphony in C minor by Frederick Shepherd Converse, and containing also Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "La Grande Pâque Russe."

Mr. Converse is well known as one of the most talented of the youngest—no, now, alas! middle-aged—American composers. He is remembered as the composer of the prize-winning American opera, "The Pipe of Desire," produced at the Metropolitan Opera House ten years ago; of the symphonic poems "The Mystic Trumpeter" and "Ormazd"; of a string quartet, and of other compositions declaring him a serious and accomplished musician.

He has written but this one symphony, which he says has no program, though in writing it he had in mind the experiences of the young men and young women of our land during the trials of the war." The two main themes of the first movement suggest the high resolve of the youths and the tender feminine traits of the maidens, wives and mothers; and these, continues Mr. Converse, move through the whole work like characters through the varied situations of a drama.

He writes for the largest of modern orchestras, and has sought a wealth of instrumental color that is often striking, and a potent enhancement of the value of the musical thought. The first movement is sombre in mood; "stern and determined," the composer has characterized it, with a contrasting feminine quality in the second theme. It is perhaps somewhat too long in its elaboration; and there is a haunting feeling that all the movements would gain in power through a greater conciseness.

There are beauty and deep feeling in the slow movement, from which Mr. Converse hints at a nocturne-like character, and there are vigor and sonorous development in the last two, the last suggesting, as the composer intended it should suggest, war and struggle, and jubilation over victory.

And so the symphony may be considered a direct product of the war and its reaction upon the composer's inspiration; and it may not be rash to deem it superior in some respects to the other "war" symphony played not long ago, d'Indy's "De Bello Gallico."

It has not always the greatest distinction or the greatest originality in the thematic material, but the music is finely and deeply felt, and is developed with a more certain touch and a riper skill than any of Mr. Converse's previous productions.

Mr. Monteux conducted it with much zeal and with apparent sympathy, and it was well played.

From
EVENING POST,
New York City

FEB 6 1920

Music

Henry T. Finck

Operas and Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its Carnegie Hall concert last night, featured the Second Symphony of Vincent d'Indy. It was played by the same orchestra a number of years ago, and it is not one of those works which, like good wine and coffee beans, improve with age. Of all the French composers of the period, D'Indy is the least interesting. He has plenty of scholarship but little invention. Form is to him more important than ideas, duration more important than inspiration. The symphony bears out these remarks. It was well played, under the bâton of M. Monteux, recently elected for three more years as the conductor of the Boston orchestra.

m HERALD
ress New York City
e

FEB 8

Boston Orchestra Heard.

The fourth afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday in Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of Frederick S. Converse's symphony in C minor, Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter." Mr. Converse, an American living in Boston, is well known to American music lovers. His "Mystic Trumpeter" in particular is remembered with favor. The symphony heard yesterday is his first composition in this form, which he chose, according to his own statement, not because he desired especially to write a symphony, but because the form readily lent itself to his ideas.

This music is the outcome of Mr. Converse's feelings and reflections during the great war. It was written at Lake Sunapee last summer and has no definite programmatic intent. Moods are its materials, and these are published in the traditional four symphonic movements: an opening and a closing allegro, a slow second movement and a scherzo as the third. Two principal themes appear in the first movement, one designed to express the resolution of young American manhood facing the conflict and the other the tenderness and fortitude of the women.

The slow movement is soberly reflective, while the scherzo, somewhat restrained in gayety at the outset, finally bursts into a brilliant waltz. In the finale the brazen challenge of martial trumpets is heard and the ultimate development of the two chief themes of the first movement, which dominate the entire composition, rises to warlike clangors. Mr. Converse's music is interesting. The character of the thematic subjects is dignified and the developments clear, and with only sufficient modern harmony to prevent continual sweetness.

The symphony shows much sincerity of feeling and some imagination. It is the creation of a mind accustomed to self analysis and to scrutiny of human experience. If it lacks the note of profound eloquence it is in company with practically all the music thus far suggested by the war. It was admirably conducted by Pierre Monteux.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From American
New York City

Symphony Featured by Boston Orchestra

The Boston orchestra was heard in a conservative programme in Carnegie Hall last night. Mr. Monteux made his selection from works long familiar to the concert public. And following the fashion adopted for the past two years by the New Englanders, there was no soloist.

The opening number was D'Indy's Second Symphony, which was interpreted with a sympathetic understanding of its moods and message. Mr. Monteux, as in the past, has individual ideas of tempo and inflection, and these were prominent, though not unpleasant, points in his reading.

EVENING GLOBE
New York City
FEB 6 1920 E

Music.

The Boston Symphony Concert Draws Large Audience.

In spite of all the rigors of the weather, a large audience attended the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening, though some empty seats, it is true, were visible. The programme followed the lines of the programme of the local Thursday night concert of the Boston organization immediately preceding—first a symphony, d'Indy's in B flat major instead of Brahms's in C minor; then Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture instead of Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," the prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan und Isolde" instead of the "Parsifal" prelude, and Liszt's "Les Préludes" instead of his "Mephisto Waltz." The basis of selection and arrangement in such a programme, I confess, baffles me. But doubtless Mr. Monteux understands it, and last month public and press seemed to be delighted. So why not repeat?

The B flat symphony of d'Indy was once rather the property of the Boston orchestra. The Boston men under Mr. Gericke introduced it to New York fifteen years ago. The following year d'Indy himself, appearing as guest with the Bostonians, led it here. Then Dr. Muck let it alone; Dr. Muck did not conduct music by d'Indy in America. Naturally enough Mr. Monteux revives it, for indisputably it is one of the most important of French symphonies and Mr. Monteux is a Frenchman.

A great deal of water has swept under a great many bridges in the last fifteen years. When the symphony came to us first, Richard Strauss was still writing "music of the future"; Debussy and Max Reger were deemed dangerous anarchs of art—Reger dangerous chiefly to himself, for to-day people scarcely remember him even by name; along with these d'Indy was ultra-modern. Just fancy that! People fussed so much about his being a cerebral" and dealing in the mathematics of music with the enthusiasm of some dread sorcerer stirring a particularly insidious brew.

And why not? Fifteen years ago Stravinsky was a docile pupil of Rimsky-Korsakoff. Schönberg was just out of the Ueberbrettl, Leo Ornstein was a little boy in knickerbockers playing the Liszt concertos, Scriabine was ignorant of the light machine, the Italian futurists had not been heard of even by themselves, Erik Satie was still to discover an orchestral instrument in the typewriter. To-day the B flat symphony of d'Indy has none of the interest of a stranger or a freak. You take it or leave it as an expression of genius, as a work of art.

This symphony has been praised extravagantly. It has been rated above the symphony of César Franck, on a par with the greatest of the Beethoven symphonies. Personally, let me say in all modesty, I have always found it a hard nut to crack. In yesterday's blizzard I found it a little harder than usual. That it is "cerebral" music matters not a jot to me. Music has as much right to be "cerebral" as to be anything else. Thought itself, in the fine phrase of Arthur Symons, can take fire and become a sort of passion.

But in spite of d'Indy's sumptuous scoring, I have never got very far into this symphony. In each of the four movements there are superb moments, particularly, it seemed to me last night, in the first movement and in the finale. The audience, however, seemed impressed by it all. There was close attention, there was hearty applause, at the end enough applause to justify Mr. Monteux in calling on his men to rise. At any rate, the work was performed admirably under the guidance of Mr. Monteux.

The overture to "The Magic Flute" was given with technical brilliance, with accent, with vivacity. There was magic in the performance as well as in the name. The "Tristan" excerpts I have known Mr. Monteux to lead with a more overwhelming eloquence, though the band itself was not so good, when he was conductor of the Civic Concerts. Still, there was much to commend in the performance last night and the audience applauded it enthusiastically. For one listener the concert was complete without Liszt's hackneyed tone poem.

PITTS SANBORN.

EVENING JOURNAL
New York City
FEB 9 1920 K

MATTERS SYMPHONIC.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Orchestra, brought to a first New York hearing on Saturday, at Carnegie Hall, Frederick S. Converse's contribution to the impotencies of artistic expression superinduced by the war. This was a symphony in C minor (hallowed signature!) stodily of the New England school, in which the composer's reaction to the conflict, as he tells one, is "subjective and human, rather than impersonal and epic." Surely the adjectives need rearrangement—"subjective and impersonal, rather than human and epic" tricks out description much better.

Walter Damrosch, for the concert

EAGLE
Brooklyn, 1920 D
FEB 8

the vitality and

The Boston Symphony [illegible] main section of its program last ev ning in Carnegie Hall to the expo tion of Mr. Monteux's ideas regardi d'Indy's Second Symphony. The oth numbers included Liszt's "Les Pr ludes," the prelude to "Tristan an Isolde," and the overture to Mozart "Magic Flute." The orchestra is Brooklyn this evening.—W. B. M.

From WORLD, New York City FEB 8 1920

AMERICAN COMPOSITION BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Converse's Work Deals With Trying Times of War—At the Operas.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, introduced a new symphony by an American composer, Frederick Converse. The composition was suggested by the events of the last five years and in it the composer attempted to portray something of the feelings and experiences of the young women and men of America in those times of stress. A big orchestra is required and some of the writing is highly intricate and involved and ranges from a light scherzo to the victorious return home of the soldiers.

The symphony is well made and is interesting to listen to, but at times seems diffuse.

Schubert's simple and calm "Unfinished Symphony" followed it. The band was in fine playing trim and there was much spirit and dash in its performance.

EVENING GLOBE
New York City

Music.

Boston and New York Orchestras —Other Music.

A new symphony in C minor by Frederick Shepherd Converse was introduced to New York Saturday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Converse is a Boston, or at any rate a Massachusetts, composer. The fact that he used to write very much in the manner of Richard Strauss might make pertinent the inquiry, "What is a Boston composer?" The symphony in question is a symphony of the Great War. Query second: "Why must a Boston composer forsake Richard Strauss because he hymns the victory of Boston over the kaiser?"

The subject is as fertile as a garden of weeds. But symphonies of the Great War so far bewray a weedy tendency. We have heard the cloistered d'Indy's "De Bello Gallico." Mr. Converse is a much younger man than M. d'Indy. He composed his work farther om the battle front, as far away as e shores of Lake Sunapee, New ampshire. In a somewhat longish planation of the purpose of the symhony he declares that he has in mind he experiences of the young men nd the young women of our land durng the trials of the war." Hence a ale theme and a female theme move hrough the work like characters in a rama.

The finale is martial, suggesting both the din of battle and the jubilation of victory. And yet the adagio, in the mood and manner of a nocturne, and the brief and joyous scherzo pleased most the large audience on Saturday. After the new work Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter" overture continued and completed the programme. The performance of Schubert's symphony was pulsating with life, and at the same time euphonious, elegant, and marked by an appreciation of the peculiar tenderness of Schubert. Of course, Mr. Monteux gave an impressive reading of the overture, which closed the concert in superb sonorities of Russian ceremonial and oriental color.

The Symphony Society of New York, in Aeolian Hall yesterday afternoon, presented a well-selected and arranged programme, consisting of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, d'Indy's "Istar" variations, and Saint-Saëns' C minor piano concerto. The soloist was Alfred Cortot, who played the piano part of the concerto in masterly fashion to a well-nigh ideal accompaniment conducted by Walter Damrosch. An appreciative audience filled the hall.

PITTS SANBORN.

From TRIBUNE
[illegible]dress New York City
[illegible]te FEB 8 1920

New Symphony by Converse Is Given At Carnegie Hall

Piece "Reflects Something of the Feelings We Have All Been Through in Last Few Years," Says Composer

By H. E. Krehbiel

Mr. Monteux, at the fourth afternoon concert in Carnegie Hall, gave us a new symphony by Mr. Frederick Converse, the much-beloved symphonic torso in B minor by Schubert and Rimsky-Korsakoff's overtrue on liturgic themes from the Greek Church, entitled "La Grande Paque Russe."

Mr. Converse's symphony, the other pieces being familiar, was the most arresting feature, because it was new and the work of an experienced American composer who does not seem to have difficulty in gaining a hearing in all manner of dignified concerts. His latest work, Mr. Hale tells us, was written in the summer and fall of last year and is the first symphony composed by Mr. Converse outside of one composed when he was a student at Harvard University, which Mr. Gericke brought forward at a concert in Boston in January, 1890. Supplementary to this information we have the composer's statement that though not programmatic in the ordinary sense of the term, it is yet designed to be expressive of "moods and emotions" which he thinks "reflect something of the feelings we have all been through during the stress of the last few years."

In other words, it is, in a way, a "war symphony," and as such may be looked upon as a companion to "Sinfonia de Bello Gallico" by Vincent d'Indy, with which Mr. Walter Damrosch favored us earlier in the present season. Its martial character, however, seems to us to be confined to its last movement, in which there is a delineation of combatant elements, of triumph and jubilation.

In a sense all great symphonies are programmatic, the finest illustration of the truth being found in Beethoven's Fifth, where, however, we are estopped from all thought of physical combat and invited to observe the struggle between the human and divine elements in our own souls. The conflict indicated by the contrasting character of the first and second themes, which we find in the classics as well as in Mr. Converse's work, is a musical conflict inherent in the conventional conception of the sonata form—major and minor, doing and suffering, masculine and feminine, as we used to phrase it when man was looked upon as the vigorous animal and woman as the gentle.

Mr. Converse's symphony is good music. There are signs of labor in it, but the striving is not in vain. It yields results which charm the senses (especially in the second movement, with its peaceful nocturnal mood), excite the fancy and stir the emotions. As performed there were some crudenesses in the color scheme, in the combination of instruments, it seemed to us, but perhaps some of them did not sound in the mind of the composer as they came to the ears of the hearers. But the composer of to-day seems unable to dissociate conflict from noise and victory from din.

NEW YORK
ABLISHED FEB
om
VENING POST,

Music

Henry T. Finck

A New American Symphony

The programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday included a Bostonian novelty in the form of a new symphony by Frederick Converse. It is in the venerable key of C minor and there is nothing in it to offend the ears of conservatives. It will be remembered that an opera by this composer, "The Pipe of Desire," after winning a prize, was performed at the Metropolitan. It did not enverse, be it recalled, is a Boston composer whose opera, "The Pipe of Desire," was featured at the Metropolitan Opera House some ten years ago. His symphony, as heard on Friday evening, unquestionably has distinction, even if lacking in those marked traits of Americanism that are anxiously being sought in the serious native music of to-day. Mr. Converse (like Mr. Carpenter) has modern French and Russian leanings. In his music is heard the impressionistic tendencies of those two schools. The symphony is in four movements, the first of which adheres rather strictly to the conventional form wherein there is a presentation, working out and repetition of prominent thematic material. The themes in this movement are of an original character, original by reason of their peculiar intervalic makeup. Unexpected leaps there are, and the effect created by their appearance us unusual. The second movement, in slow tempo, is the weakest of the four. A quiet and tranquil nocturne, this section, with the composer seemingly not attaining high inspiration, or at least perhaps falling short of what he had intended. The following "Allegro vivace scherzando" is imbued with spontaniety of mood, an expression of carefree youth and joy. "The best music is the joyful music," recently declared the blind pianist, John Meldrum. It is the keynote of courageous optimism that is felt in Mr. Converse's scherzando, and also a ruling sentiment that perhaps will underlie all great American music of the future.

But more attractive still, at least from the first hearing, is the finale of Mr. Converse's symphony, martial in spirit and highly dramatic in the scoring. The instrumentation is for a large modern orchestra and the manipulation exceedingly expert. The composer, commenting upon the symphony as a whole, says among other things, "There is no programme, although there is an expression of moods and emotions which I think reflects something of the feelings that we have all been through during the stress of the few last years * * * the point of view is subjective and human rather than impersonal and epic."

The announcement of Fritz Kreisler's name as soloist at this concert undoubtedly account in a measure for the audience of large numbers—an audience that filled to capacity the opera house of the Academy of Music, and this, too, despite blizzard weather, with a resultant paralysis of traffic. Mr. Kreisler played the solo part of Beethoven's only violin concerto, adding to its measures his own two remarkable cadenzas, both of which are truly in kinship with the music of Beethoven's concerto and almost an integral part of that work. They indicate Mr. Kreisler's deep insight and masterly grasp of the work, his entire conception being one of profound dignity, sublime devotion and fundamental spiritual digestion. But for a few details of advanced violinistic technique, these cadenzas might have been written by Beethoven. Mr. Kriesler's performance of this classic places him in the rank of the supreme living masters of violin playing in classical style. Perhaps there is no other violinist before the public to-day who could excel the Kreisler interpretation of this particular masterpiece. Mr. Monteux's accompaniment was very fine, the individual players also bringing a devotion to their tasks which placed them en rapport with the soloist. Tumultuous applause prevailed at the close of the concluding jovial rondo movement, and the soloist was obliged to acknowledge this protracted tribute with many, many bows. A highly enjoyable evening terminated with Rimsky-Korsakoff's colorful "The Russian Easter" overture.

joy a long life, though it had engaging traits. He has also written chamber music and orchestral works. His first symphony, written when he was a Harvard student, was played under Gericke as long ago as 1890. The new symphony was composed last year; it is intended, in the words of Mr. Converse, to "reflect something of the feelings we have all been through during the stress of the last few years." This may help explain the turbulent character of the final movement with its triumphant suggestions of armistice and victory. It would have been well if Mr. Converse had personally triumphed, in writing this score over the Teutonic ideal that duration, in symphonic works, is more important than inspiration. His themes are not sufficiently original or pregnant to bear so much elaboration. The same material, condensed into a symphonic poem of the Liszt (not the Strauss) type would have made a more successful bid for a long life.

From STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Symphonies by American composers are creeping over and anon upon programmes nowadays. But a few weeks past Walter Damrosch vouchsafed musical New York a hearing of John Alden Carpenter's interesting "Sermons in Stone" symphony, and on Friday evening last Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, brought to this borough a first hearing of Frederick Shepherd Converse's C minor symphony at the last but one of Brooklyn's five annual concerts by the Boston players. Mr. Monteux, whose tastes and accomplishments as a musician are both catholic and versatile, had evidently given much study to Mr. Converse's score (the first of that composer's essays in symphonic form), and also displayed obvious pleasure in its direction. Mr. Con-

EAGLE
[illegible]ess Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 7 1920

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

An Ovation for Kreisler and a Symphony by Converse.

Fritz Kreisler had a remarkable ovation last night at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy, his second appearance in Brooklyn since the war. The applause was unusually hearty and prolonged on his entry to play the Beethoven Concerto and at the close of an inspired performance of that great work the recalls were so many as to escape record. If there are violins as well as harps in heaven they will be played as Kreisler played last night, with an ecstatic absorption in the beauty of their message under which technical difficulties fade away and are as if they did not exist. Beethoven's Concerto, great as it is, is long and filled with repetitions which tend in an ordinary performance to become wearisome. Last night every bar of it held the audience tense and the performance raised the violinists on the stage to a high pitch of enthusiasm.

Next to Kreisler and Beethoven—the names are put in that order because without Kreisler there would have been no such Beethoven as was heard last night—the interest centered in a new symphony by Frederick S. Converse of Boston, a work inspired by our participation in the war and the effect of it upon our youth. It is a well made and interesting composition with moments of appealing beauty, creditable to Mr. Converse and to American music, but by no means a work for which audiences will clamor as they did, for instance, for the "New World" symphony of Dvorak when that was produced here. The genius of Mr. Converse is reflective rather than dramatic and he is at his happiest in the expression of serene and quiet beauty rather than in his effort to portray the triumphant homecoming of the troops and the rapturous emotions springing from it. His second movement, a nocturne which seems to have little to do with the war, is melodious and appealing, but his close, which essays to picture the tumultuous emotion of a year and a half ago, would be better if it had a little touch of Sousa in it. It is fine and all right so far as it goes, but it isn't big enough for the thing the composer is trying to say. However, if it were, Mr. Converse would be Beethoven and there is only one of him.

For the close Mr. Monteux, the conductor, had his innings with a picturesque and spirited "Russian Easter" by Rimsky-Korsakoff. On his score the composer prints part of the LXVII Psalm and a Gospel account of the Resurrection, but his orchestra often reminds one of his own beautiful but unreligious "Coq D'Or." However, that is the man's individual style which stamps all his work and makes it always worth hearing. Perhaps he is less so in this Eastern music than in some other compositions, but it made a spirited and attractive close to an admirable and admirably played program.

EVENING GLOBE
New York City
FEB 6 1920 E

Music.

The Boston Symphony Concert Draws Large Audience.

In spite of all the rigors of the weather, a large audience attended the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening, though some empty seats, it is true, were visible. The programme followed the lines of the programme of the local Thursday night concert of the Boston organization immediately preceding—first a symphony, d'Indy's in B flat major instead of Brahms's in C minor; then Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture instead of Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," the prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan und Isolde" instead of the "Parsifal" prelude, and Liszt's "Les Préludes" instead of his "Mephisto Waltz." The basis of selection and arrangement in such a programme, I confess, baffles me. But doubtless Mr. Monteux understands it, and last month public and press seemed to be delighted. So why not repeat?

The B flat symphony of d'Indy was once rather the property of the Boston orchestra. The Boston men under Mr. Gericke introduced it to New York fifteen years ago. The following year d'Indy himself, appearing as guest with the Bostonians, led it here. Then Dr. Muck let it alone; Dr. Muck did not conduct music by d'Indy in America. Naturally enough Mr. Monteux revives it, for indisputably it is one of the most important of French symphonies and Mr. Monteux is a Frenchman.

A great deal of water has swept under a great many bridges in the last fifteen years. When the symphony came to us first, Richard Strauss was still writing "music of the future"; Debussy and Max Reger were deemed dangerous anarchs of art—Reger dangerous chiefly to himself, for to-day people scarcely remember him even by name; along with these d'Indy was ultra-modern. Just fancy that! People fussed so much about his being a cerebral" and dealing in the mathematics of music with the enthusiasm of some dread sorcerer stirring a particularly insidious brew.

And why not? Fifteen years ago Stravinsky was a docile pupil of Rimsky-Korsakoff. Schönberg was just out of the Ueberbrettl, Leo Ornstein was a little boy in knickerbockers playing the Liszt concertos, Scriabine was ignorant of the light machine, the Italian futurists had not been heard of even by themselves, Erik Satie was still to discover an orchestral instrument in the typewriter. To-day the B flat symphony of d'Indy has none of the interest of a stranger or a freak. You take it or leave it as an expression of genius, as a work of art.

This symphony has been praised extravagantly. It has been rated above the symphony of César Franck, on a par with the greatest of the Beethoven symphonies. Personally, let me say in all modesty, I have always found it a hard nut to crack. In yesterday's blizzard I found it a little harder than usual. That it is "cerebral" music matters not a jot to me. Music has as much right to be "cerebral" as to be anything else. Thought itself, in the fine phrase of Arthur Symons, can take fire and become a sort of passion.

But in spite of d'Indy's sumptuous scoring, I have never got very far into this symphony. In each of the four movements there are superb moments, particularly, it seemed to me last night, in the first movement and in the finale. The audience, however, seemed impressed by it all. There was close attention, there was hearty applause, at the end enough applause to justify Mr. Monteux in calling on his men to rise. At any rate, the work was performed admirably under the guidance of Mr. Monteux.

The overture to "The Magic Flute" was given with technical brilliance, with accent, with vivacity. There was magic in the performance as well as in the name. The "Tristan" excerpts I have known Mr. Monteux to lead with a more overwhelming eloquence, though the band itself was not so good, when he was conductor of the Civic Concerts. Still, there was much to commend in the performance last night and the audience applauded it enthusiastically. For one listener the concert was complete without Liszt's hackneyed tone poem.

PITTS SANBORN.

EVENING JOURNAL
New York City
ess FEB 9 1920 E

MATTERS symphonic.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Orchestra, brought to a first New York hearing on Saturday, at Carnegie Hall, Frederick S. Converse's contribution to the impotencies of artistic expression superinduced by the war. This was a symphony in C minor (hallowed signature) stodily of the New England school, in which the composer's reaction to the conflict, as he tells one, is "subjective and human, rather than impersonal and epic." Surely the adjectives need rearrangement—"subjective and impersonal, rather than human and epic" tricks out description much better.

Walter Damrosch, for the concert

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 6 1920 D

the vitality and

The Boston Symphony [illegible] main section of its program last ev ning in Carnegie Hall to the expo tion of Mr. Monteux's ideas regardi D'Indy's Second Symphony. The oth numbers included Liszt's "Les Pr ludes," the prelude to "Tristan an Isolde," and the overture to Mozart "Magic Flute." The orchestra is Brooklyn this evening.—W. B. M.

From WORLD,
New York City
FEB 8 1920

AMERICAN COMPOSITION BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Converse's Work Deals With Trying Times of War—At the Operas.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, introduced a new symphony by an American composer, Frederick Converse. The composition was suggested by the events of the last five years and in it the composer attempted to portray something of the feelings and experiences of the young women and men of America in those times of stress. A big orchestra is required and some of the writing is highly intricate and involved and ranges from a light scherzo to the victorious return home of the soldiers.

The symphony is well made and is interesting to listen to, but at times seems diffuse.

Schubert's simple and calm "Unfinished Symphony" followed it. The band was in fine playing trim and there was much spirit and dash in its performance.

EVENING GLOBE
New York City

Music.

Boston and New York Orchestras —Other Music.

A new symphony in C minor by Frederick Shepherd Converse was introduced to New York Saturday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Converse is a Boston, or at any rate a Massachusetts, composer. The fact that he used to write very much in the manner of Richard Strauss might make pertinent the inquiry, "What is a Boston composer?" The symphony in question is a symphony of the Great War. Query second: "Why must a Boston composer forsake Richard Strauss because he hymns the victory of Boston over the kaiser?"

The subject is as fertile as a garden of weeds. But symphonies of the Great War so far bewray a weedy tendency. We have heard the cloistered d'Indy's "De Bello Gallico." Mr. Converse is a much younger man than M. d'Indy. He composed his work farther from the battle front, as far away as the shores of Lake Sunapee, New Hampshire. In a somewhat longish explanation of the purpose of the symphony he declares that he has in mind the experiences of the young men and the young women of our land during the trials of the war." Hence a male theme and a female theme move through the work like characters in a drama.

The finale is martial, suggesting both the din of battle and the jubilation of victory. And yet the adagio, in the mood and manner of a nocturne, and the brief and joyous scherzo pleased most the large audience on Saturday. After the new work Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter" overture continued and completed the programme. The performance of Schubert's symphony was pulsating with life, and at the same time euphonious, elegant, and marked by an appreciation of the peculiar tenderness of Schubert. Of course, Mr. Monteux gave an impressive reading of the overture, which closed the concert in superb sonorities of Russian ceremonial and oriental color.

The Symphony Society of New York, in Aeolian Hall yesterday afternoon, presented a well-selected and arranged programme, consisting of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, d'Indy's "Istar" variations, and Saint-Saëns's C minor piano concerto. The soloist was Alfred Cortot, who played the piano part of the concerto in masterly fashion to a well-nigh ideal accompaniment conducted by Walter Damrosch. An appreciative audience filled the hall.

PITTS SANBORN.

From TRIBUNE
dress New York City
ate FEB 8 1920

New Symphony by Converse Is Given At Carnegie Hall

Piece "Reflects Something of the Feelings We Have All Been Through in Last Few Years," Says Composer

By H. E. Krehbiel

Mr. Monteux, at the fourth afternoon concert in Carnegie Hall, gave us a new symphony by Mr. Frederick Converse, the much-beloved symphonic torso in B minor by Schubert and Rimsky-Korsakoff's overtrue on liturgic themes from the Greek Church, entitled "La Grande Paque Russe."

Mr. Converse's symphony, the other pieces being familiar, was the most arresting feature, because it was new and the work of an experienced American composer who does not seem to have difficulty in gaining a hearing in all manner of dignified concerts. His latest work, Mr. Hale tells us, was written in the summer and fall of last year and is the first symphony composed by Mr. Converse outside of one composed when he was a student at Harvard University, which Mr. Gericke brought forward at a concert in Boston in January, 1890. Supplementary to this information we have the composer's statement that though not programmatic in the ordinary sense of the term, it is yet designed to be expressive of "moods and emotions" which he thinks "reflect something of the feelings we have all been through during the stress of the last few years."

In other words, it is, in a way, a "war symphony," and as such may be looked upon as a companion to "Sinfonia de Bello Gallico" by Vincent d'Indy, with which Mr. Walter Damrosch favored us earlier in the present season. Its martial character, however, seems to us to be confined to its last movement, in which there is a delineation of combatant elements, of triumph and jubilation.

In a sense all great symphonies are programmatic, the finest illustration of the truth being found in Beethoven's Fifth, where, however, we are estopped from all thought of physical combat and invited to observe the struggle between the human and divine elements in our own souls. The conflict indicated by the contrasting character of the first and second themes, which we find in the classics as well as in Mr. Converse's work, is a musical conflict inherent in the conventional conception of the sonata form—major and minor, doing and suffering, masculine and feminine, as we used to phrase it when man was looked upon as the vigorous animal and woman as the gentle.

Mr. Converse's symphony is good music. There are signs of labor in it, but the striving is not in vain. It yields results which charm the senses (especially in the second movement, with its peaceful nocturnal mood), excite the fancy and stir the emotions. As performed there were some crudenesses in the color scheme, in the combination of instruments, it seemed to us, but perhaps some of them did not sound in the mind of the composer as they came to the ears of the hearers. But the composer of to-day seems unable to dissociate conflict from noise and victory from din.

NEW YORK
ABLISHED 1881
om
VENING POST,

Music

Henry T. Finck

A New American Symphony

The programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday included a Bostonian novelty in the form of a new symphony by Frederick Converse. It is in the venerable key of C minor and there is nothing in it to offend the ears of conservatives. It will be remembered that an opera by this composer, "The Pipe of Desire," after winning a prize, was performed at the Metropolitan. It did not enjoy a long life, though it had engaging traits. He has also written chamber music and orchestral works. His first symphony, written when he was a Harvard student, was played under Gericke as long ago as 1890. The new symphony was composed last year; it is intended, in the words of Mr. Converse, to "reflect something of the feelings we have all been through during the stress of the last few years." This may help explain the turbulent character of the final movement with its triumphant suggestions of armistice and victory. It would have been well if Mr. Converse had personally triumphed, in writing this score over the Teutonic ideal that duration, in symphonic works, is more important than inspiration. His themes are not sufficiently original or pregnant to bear so much elaboration. The same material, condensed into a symphonic poem of the Liszt (not the Strauss) type would have made a more successful bid for a long life.

verse, be it recalled, is a Boston composer whose opera, "The Pipe of Desire," was featured at the Metropolitan Opera House some ten years ago. His symphony, as heard on Friday evening, unquestionably has distinction, even if lacking in those marked traits of Americanism that are anxiously being sought in the serious native music of to-day. Mr. Converse (like Mr. Carpenter) has modern French and Russian leanings. In his music is heard the impressionistic tendencies of those two schools. The symphony is in four movements, the first of which adheres rather strictly to the conventional form wherein there is a presentation, working out and repetition of prominent thematic material. The themes in this movement are of an original character, original by reason of their peculiar intervalic makeup. Unexpected leaps there are, and the effect created by their appearance us unusual. The second movement, in slow tempo, is the weakest of the four. A quiet and tranquil nocturne, this section, with the composer seemingly not attaining high inspiration, or at least perhaps falling short of what he had intended. The following "Allegro vivace scherzando" is imbued with spontaniety of mood, an expression of carefree youth and joy. "The best music is the joyful music," recently declared the blind pianist, John Meldrum. It is the keynote of courageous optimism that is felt in Mr. Converse's scherzando, and also a ruling sentiment that perhaps will underlie all great American music of the future.

But more attractive still, at least from the first hearing, is the finale of Mr. Converse's symphony, martial in spirit and highly dramatic in the scoring. The instrumentation is for a large modern orchestra and the manipulation exceedingly expert. The composer, commenting upon the symphony as a whole, says among other things, "There is no programme, although there is an expression of moods and emotions which I think reflects something of the feelings that we have all been through during the stress of the few last years * * * the point of view is subjective and human rather than impersonal and epic."

The announcement of Fritz Kreisler's name as soloist at this concert undoubtedly account in a measure for the audience of large numbers—an audience that filled to capacity the opera house of the Academy of Music, and this, too, despite blizzard weather, with a resultant paralysis of traffic. Mr. Kreisler played the solo part of Beethoven's only violin concerto, adding to its measures his own two remarkable cadenzas, both of which are truly in kinship with the music of Beethoven's concerto and almost an integral part of that work. They indicate Mr. Kreisler's deep insight and masterly grasp of the work, his entire conception being one of profound dignity, sublime devotion and fundamental spiritual digestion. But for a few details of advanced violinistic technique, these cadenzas might have been written by Beethoven. Mr. Kriesler's performance of this classic places him in the rank of the supreme living masters of violin playing in classical style. Perhaps there is no other violinist before the public to-day who could

From
STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Symphonies by American composers are creeping ever and anon upon programmes nowadays. But a few weeks past Walter Damrosch vouchsafed musical New York a hearing of John Alden Carpenter's interesting "Sermons in Stone" symphony, and on Friday evening last Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, brought to this borough a first hearing of Frederick Shepherd Converse's C minor symphony at the last but one of Brooklyn's five annual concerts by the Boston players. Mr. Monteux, whose tastes and accomplishments as a musician are both catholic and versatile, had evidently given much study to Mr. Converse's score (the first of that composer's essays in symphonic form), and also displayed obvious pleasure in its direction. Mr. Con-excel the Kreisler interpretation of this particular masterpiece. Mr. Monteux's accompaniment was very fine, the individual players also bringing a devotion to their tasks which placed them en rapport with the soloist. Tumultuous applause prevailed at the close of the concluding jovial rondo movement, and the soloist was obliged to acknowledge this protracted tribute with many, many bows. A highly enjoyable evening terminated with Rimsky-Korsakoff's colorful "The Russian Easter" overture.

EAGLE
ess Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 7 1920 D

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

An Ovation for Kreisler and a Symphony by Converse.

Fritz Kreisler had a remarkable ovation last night at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy, his second appearance in Brooklyn since the war. The applause was unusually hearty and prolonged on his entry to play the Beethoven Concerto and at the close of an inspired performance of that great work the recalls were so many as to escape record. If there are violins as well as harps in heaven they will be played as Kreisler played last night, with an ecstatic absorption in the beauty of their message under which technical difficulties fade away and are as if they did not exist. Beethoven's Concerto, great as it is, is long and filled with repetitions which tend in an ordinary performance to become wearisome. Last night every bar of it held the audience tense and the performance raised the violinists on the stage to a high pitch of enthusiasm.

Next to Kreisler and Beethoven—the names are put in that order because without Kreisler there would have been no such Beethoven as was heard last night—the interest centered in a new symphony by Frederick S. Converse of Boston, a work inspired by our participation in the war and the effect of it upon our youth. It is a well made and interesting composition with moments of appealing beauty, creditable to Mr. Converse and to American music, but by no means a work for which audiences will clamor as they did, for instance, for the "New World" symphony of Dvorak when that was produced here. The genius of Mr. Converse is reflective rather than dramatic and he is at his happiest in the expression of serene and quiet beauty rather than in his effort to portray the triumphant homecoming of the troops and the rapturous emotions springing from it. His second movement, a nocturne which seems to have little to do with the war, is melodious and appealing, but his close, which essays to picture the tumultuous emotion of a year and a half ago, would be better if it had a little touch of Sousa in it. It is fine and all right so far as it goes, but it isn't big enough for the thing the composer is trying to say. However, if it were, Mr. Converse would be Beethoven and there is only one of him.

For the close Mr. Monteux, the conductor, had his innings with a picturesque and spirited "Russian Easter" by Rimsky-Korsakoff. On his score the composer prints part of the LXVII Psalm and a Gospel account of the Resurrection, but his orchestra often reminds one of his own beautiful but unreligious "Coq D'Or." However, that is the man's individual style which stamps all his work and makes it always worth hearing. Perhaps he is less so in this Eastern music than in some other compositions, but it made a spirited and attractive close to an admirable and admirably played program.

EVENING GLOBE
New York City
FEB 6 1920 E

Music.

The Boston Symphony Concert Draws Large Audience.

In spite of all the rigors of the weather, a large audience attended the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening, though some empty seats, it is true, were visible. The programme followed the lines of the programme of the local Thursday night concert of the Boston organization immediately preceding—first a symphony, d'Indy's in B flat major instead of Brahms's in C minor; then Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture instead of Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," the prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan und Isolde" instead of the "Parsifal" prelude, and Liszt's "Les Préludes" instead of his "Mephisto Waltz." The basis of selection and arrangement in such a programme, I confess, baffles me. But doubtless Mr. Monteux understands it, and last month public and press seemed to be delighted. So why not repeat?

The B flat symphony of d'Indy was once rather the property of the Boston orchestra. The Boston men under Mr. Gericke introduced it to New York fifteen years ago. The following year d'Indy himself, appearing as guest with the Bostonians, led it here. Then Dr. Muck let it alone; Dr. Muck did not conduct music by d'Indy in America. Naturally enough Mr. Monteux revives it, for indisputably it is one of the most important of French symphonies and Mr. Monteux is a Frenchman.

A great deal of water has swept under a great many bridges in the last fifteen years. When the symphony came to us first, Richard Strauss was still writing "music of the future"; Debussy and Max Reger were deemed dangerous anarchs of art—Reger dangerous chiefly to himself, for to-day people scarcely remember him even by name; along with these d'Indy was ultra-modern. Just fancy that! People fussed so much about his being a cerebral" and dealing in the mathematics of music with the enthusiasm of some dread sorcerer stirring a particularly insidious brew.

And why not? Fifteen years ago Stravinsky was a docile pupil of Rimsky-Korsakoff. Schönberg was just out of the Ueberbrettl, Leo Ornstein was a little boy in knickerbockers playing the Liszt concertos, Scriabine was ignorant of the light machine, the Italian futurists had not been heard of even by themselves, Erik Satie was still to discover an orchestral instrument in the typewriter. To-day the B flat symphony of d'Indy has none of the interest of a stranger or a freak. You take it or leave it as an expression of genius, as a work of art.

This symphony has been praised extravagantly. It has been rated above the symphony of César Franck, on a par with the greatest of the Beethoven symphonies. Personally, let me say in all modesty, I have always found it a hard nut to crack. In yesterday's blizzard I found it a little harder than usual. That it is "cerebral" music matters not a jot to me. Music has as much right to be "cerebral" as to be anything else. Thought itself, in the fine phrase of Arthur Symons, can take fire and become a sort of passion.

But in spite of d'Indy's sumptuous scoring, I have never got very far into this symphony. In each of the four movements there are superb moments, particularly, it seemed to me last night, in the first movement and in the finale. The audience, however, seemed impressed by it all. There was close attention, there was hearty applause, at the end enough applause to justify Mr. Monteux in calling on his men to rise. At any rate, the work was performed admirably under the guidance of Mr. Monteux.

The overture to "The Magic Flute" was given with technical brilliance, with accent, with vivacity. There was magic in the performance as well as in the name. The "Tristan" excerpts I have known Mr. Monteux to lead with a more overwhelming eloquence, though the band itself was not so good, when he was conductor of the Civic Concerts. Still, there was much to commend in the performance last night and the audience applauded it enthusiastically. For one listener the concert was complete without Liszt's hackneyed tone poem.

PITTS SANBORN.

EVENING JOURNAL
New York City
ess FEB 9 1920 K

MATTERS SYMPHONIC.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Orchestra, brought to a first New York hearing on Saturday, at Carnegie Hall, Frederick S. Converse's contribution to the impotencies of artistic expression sup duced by the war. This was a phes phony in C minor (hallowed Aeol ture!) stodily of the New En avi school, in which the composer he action to the conflict, as he tel is "subjective and human, rather lels impersonal and epic." Surely berto jectives need rearrangement Cort jective and impersonal, rath than human and epic" tricks out cent tion much better.

Walter Damrosch, for the ike

EAGLE
Brooklyn, 1920 D
FEB 6

the vitality and

The Boston Symphony ... main section of its program last ev ning in Carnegie Hall to the expo tion of Mr. Monteux's ideas regardi D'Indy's Second Symphony. The oth numbers included Liszt's "Les Pr ludes," the prelude to "Tristan a Isolde," and the overture to Mozart "Magic Flute." The orchestra is Brooklyn this evening.—W. B. M.

From WORLD, New York City

AMERICAN COMPOSITION BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Converse's Work Deals With Trying Times of War—At the Operas.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, introduced a new symphony by an American composer, Frederick Converse. The composition was suggested by the events of the last five years and in it the composer attempted to portray something of the feelings and experiences of the young women and men of America in those times of stress. A big orchestra is required and some of the writing is highly intricate and involved and ranges from a light scherzo to the victorious return home of the soldiers.

The symphony is well made and is interesting to listen to, but at times seems diffuse.

Schubert's simple and calm "Unfinished Symphony" followed it. The band was in fine playing trim and there was much spirit and dash in its performance.

EVENING GLOBE
New York City
ss:

Music.

Boston and New York Orchestras —Other Music.

A new symphony in C minor by Frederick Shepherd Converse was introduced to New York Saturday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Converse is a Boston, or at any rate a Massachusetts, composer. The fact that he used to write very much in the manner of Richard Strauss might make pertinent the inquiry, "What is a Boston composer?" The symphony in question is a symphony of the Great War. Query second: "Why must a Boston composer forsake Richard Strauss because he hymns the victory of Boston over the kaiser?"

The subject is as fertile as a garden of weeds. But symphonies of the Great War so far bewray a weedy tendency. We have heard the cloistered d'Indy's "De Bello Gallico." Mr. Converse is a much younger man than M. d'Indy. He composed his work farther from the battle front, as far away as the shores of Lake Sunapee, New Hampshire. In a somewhat longish explanation of the purpose of the symphony he declares that he has in mind "the experiences of the young men and the young women of our land during the trials of the war." Hence a male theme and a female theme move through the work like characters in a drama.

The finale is martial, suggesting both the din of battle and the jubilation of victory. And yet the adagio, in the mood and manner of a nocturne, and the brief and joyous scherzo pleased most the large audience on Saturday. After the new work Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter" overture continued and completed the programme. The performance of Schubert's symphony was pulsating with life, and at the same time euphonious, elegant, and marked by an appreciation of the peculiar tenderness of Schubert. Of course, Mr. Monteux gave an impressive reading of the overture, which closed the concert in superb sonorities of Russian ceremonial and oriental color.

The Symphony Society of New York, in Aeolian Hall yesterday afternoon, presented a well-selected and arranged programme, consisting of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, d'Indy's "Istar" variations, and Saint-Saëns's C minor piano concerto. The soloist was Alfred Cortot, who played the piano part of the concerto in masterly fashion to a well-nigh ideal accompaniment conducted by Walter Damrosch. An appreciative audience filled the hall.

PITTS SANBORN.

From WORLD, New York City
om TRIBUNE
ldress New York City
ate FEB 8 1920

New Symphony by Converse Is Given At Carnegie Hall

Piece "Reflects Something of the Feelings We Have All Been Through in Last Few Years," Says Composer

By H. E. Krehbiel

Mr. Monteux, at the fourth afternoon concert in Carnegie Hall, gave us a new symphony by Mr. Frederick Converse, the much-beloved symphonic torso in B minor by Schubert and Rimsky-Korsakoff's overtrue on liturgic themes from the Greek Church, entitled "La Grande Paque Russe."

Mr. Converse's symphony, the other pieces being familiar, was the most arresting feature, because it was new and the work of an experienced American composer who does not seem to have difficulty in gaining a hearing in all manner of dignified concerts. His latest work, Mr. Hale tells us, was written in the summer and fall of last year and is the first symphony composed by Mr. Converse outside of one composed when he was a student at Harvard University, which Mr. Gericke brought forward at a concert in Boston in January, 1890. Supplementary to this information we have the composer's statement that though not programmatic in the ordinary sense of the term, it is yet designed to be expressive of "moods and emotions" which he thinks "reflect something of the feelings we have all been through during the stress of the last few years."

In other words, it is, in a way, a "war symphony," and as such may be looked upon as a companion to "Sinfonia de Bello Gallico" by Vincent d'Indy, with which Mr. Walter Damrosch favored us earlier in the present season. Its martial character, however, seems to us to be confined to its last movement, in which there is a delineation of combatant elements, of triumph and jubilation.

In a sense all great symphonies are programmatic, the finest illustration of the truth being found in Beethoven's Fifth, where, however, we are estopped from all thought of physical combat and invited to observe the struggle between the human and divine elements in our own souls. The conflict indicated by the contrasting character of the first and second themes, which we find in the classics as well as in Mr. Converse's work, is a musical conflict inherent in the conventional conception of the sonata form—major and minor, doing and suffering, masculine and feminine, as we used to phrase it when man was looked upon as the vigorous animal and woman as the gentle.

Mr. Converse's symphony is good music. There are signs of labor in it, but the striving is not in vain. It yields results which charm the senses (especially in the second movement, with its peaceful nocturnal mood), excite the fancy and stir the emotions. As performed there were some crudenesses in the color scheme, in the combination of instruments, it seemed to us, but perhaps some of them did not sound in the mind of the composer as they came to the ears of the hearers. But the composer of to-day seems unable to dissociate conflict from noise and victory from din.

NEW YORK
ABLISHED 1881
om
VENING POST,

Music

Henry T. Finck

New American Symphony

Programme of the Boston Sym- Orchestra on Saturday includ- stonian novelty in the form symphony by Frederick Con- is in the venerable key of and there is nothing in it he ears of conservatives. It embered that an opera by r, "The Pipe of Desire," a prize, was performed ropolitan. It did not en-

From STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Symphonies by American composers are creeping ever and anon upon programmes nowadays. But a few weeks past Walter Damrosch vouchsafed musical New York a hearing of John Alden Carpenter's interesting "Sermons in Stone" symphony, and on Friday evening last Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, brought to this borough a first hearing of Frederick Shepherd Converse's C minor symphony at the last but one of Brooklyn's five annual concerts by the Boston players. Mr. Monteux, whose tastes and accomplishments as a musician are both catholic and versatile, had evidently given much study to Mr. Converse's score (the first of that composer's essays in symphonic form), and also displayed obvious pleasure in its direction. Mr. Converse, be it recalled, is a Boston composer whose opera, "The Pipe of Desire," was featured at the Metropolitan Opera House some ten years ago. His symphony, as heard on Friday evening, unquestionably has distinction, even if lacking in those marked traits of Americanism that are anxiously being sought in the serious native music of to-day. Mr. Converse (like Mr. Carpenter) has modern French and Russian leanings. In his music is heard the impressionistic tendencies of those two schools. The symphony is in four movements, the first of which adheres rather strictly to the conventional form wherein there is a presentation, working out and repetition of prominent thematic material. The themes in this movement are of an original character, original by reason of their peculiar intervalic makeup. Unexpected leaps there are, and the effect created by their appearance us unusual. The second movement, in slow tempo, is the weakest of the four. A quiet and tranquil nocturne, this section, with the composer seemingly not attaining high inspiration, or at least perhaps falling short of what he had intended. The following "Allegro vivace scherzando" is imbued with spontaniety of mood, an expression of carefree youth and joy. "The best music is the joyful music," recently declared the blind pianist, John Meldrum. It is the keynote of courageous optimism that is felt in Mr. Converse's scherzando, and also a ruling sentiment that perhaps will underlie all great American music of the future.

But more attractive still, at least from the first hearing, is the finale of Mr. Converse's symphony, martial in spirit and highly dramatic in the scoring. The instrumentation is for a large modern orchestra and the manipulation exceedingly expert. The composer, commenting upon the symphony as a whole, says among other things, "There is no programme, although there is an expression of moods and emotions which I think reflects something of the feelings that we have all been through during the stress of the few last years * * * the point of view is subjective and human rather than impersonal and epic."

The announcement of Fritz Kreisler's name as soloist at this concert undoubtedly account in a measure for the audience of large numbers—an audience that filled to capacity the opera house of the Academy of Music, and this, too, despite blizzard weather, with a resultant paralysis of traffic. Mr. Kreisler played the solo part of Beethoven's only violin concerto, adding to its measures his own two remarkable cadenzas, both of which are truly in kinship with the music of Beethoven's concerto and almost an integral part of that work. They indicate Mr. Kreisler's deep insight and masterly grasp of the work, his entire conception being one of profound dignity, sublime devotion and fundamental spiritual digestion. But for a few details of advanced violinistic technique, these cadenzas might have been written by Beethoven. Mr. Kriesler's performance of this classic places him in the rank of the supreme living masters of violin playing in classical style. Perhaps there is no other violinist before the public to-day who could excel the Kreisler interpretation of this particular masterpiece. Mr. Monteux's accompaniment was very fine, the individual players also bringing a devotion to their tasks which placed them en rapport with the soloist. Tumultuous applause prevailed at the close of the concluding jovial rondo movement, and the soloist was obliged to acknowledge this protracted tribute with many, many bows. A highly enjoyable evening terminated with Rimsky-Korsakoff's colorful "The Russian Easter" overture.

EAGLE
ess Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 7 1920 D

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

An Ovation for Kreisler and a Symphony by Converse.

Fritz Kreisler had a remarkable ovation last night at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy, his second appearance in Brooklyn since the war. The applause was unusually hearty and prolonged on his entry to play the Beethoven Concerto and at the close of an inspired performance of that great work the recalls were so many as to escape record. If there are violins as well as harps in heaven they will be played as Kreisler played last night, with an ecstatic absorption in the beauty of their message under which technical difficulties fade away and are as if they did not exist. Beethoven's Concerto, great as it is, is long and filled with repetitions which tend in an ordinary performance to become wearisome. Last night every bar of it held the audience tense and the performance raised the violinists on the stage to a high pitch of enthusiasm.

Next to Kreisler and Beethoven—the names are put in that order because without Kreisler there would have been no such Beethoven as was heard last night—the interest centered in a new symphony by Frederick S. Converse of Boston, a work inspired by our participation in the war and the effect of it upon our youth. It is a well made and interesting composition with moments of appealing beauty, creditable to Mr. Converse and to American music, but by no means a work for which audiences will clamor as they did, for instance, for the "New World" symphony of Dvorak when that was produced here. The genius of Mr. Converse is reflective rather than dramatic and he is at his happiest in the expression of serene and quiet beauty rather than in his effort to portray the triumphant homecoming of the troops and the rapturous emotions springing from it. His second movement, a nocturne which seems to have little to do with the war, is melodious and appealing, but his close, which essays to picture the tumultuous emotion of a year and a half ago, would be better if it had a little touch of Sousa in it. It is fine and all right so far as it goes, but it isn't big enough for the thing the composer is trying to say. However, if it were, Mr. Converse would be Beethoven and there is only one of him.

For the close Mr. Monteux, the conductor, had his innings with a picturesque and spirited "Russian Easter" by Rimsky-Korsakoff. On his score the composer prints part of the LXVII Psalm and a Gospel account of the Resurrection, but his orchestra often reminds one of his own beautiful but unreligious "Coq D'Or." However, that is the man's individual style which stamps all his work and makes it always worth hearing. Perhaps he is less so in this Eastern music than in some other compositions, but it made a spirited and attractive close to an admirable and admirably played program.

joy a long life, though it had engaging traits. He has also written chamber music and orchestral works. His first symphony, written when he was a Harvard student, was played under Gericke as long ago as 1890. The new symphony was composed last year; it is intended, in the words of Mr. Converse, to "reflect something of the feelings we have all been through during the stress of the last few years." This may help explain the turbulent character of the final movement with its triumphant suggestions of armistice and victory. It would have been well if Mr. Converse had personally triumphed, in writing this score over the Teutonic ideal that duration, in symphonic works, is more important than inspiration. His themes are not sufficiently original or pregnant to bear so much elaboration. The same material, condensed into a symphonic poem of the Liszt (not the Strauss) type would have made a more successful bid for a long life.

EVENING GLOBE
New York City
FEB 6 1920 E

Music.

The Boston Symphony Concert Draws Large Audience.

In spite of all the rigors of the weather, a large audience attended the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening, though some empty seats, it is true, were visible. The programme followed the lines of the programme of the local Thursday night concert of the Boston organization immediately preceding—first a symphony, d'Indy's in B flat major instead of Brahms's in C minor; then Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture instead of Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," the prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan und Isolde" instead of the "Parsifal" prelude, and Liszt's "Les Préludes" instead of his "Mephisto Waltz." The basis of selection and arrangement in such a programme, I confess, baffles me. But doubtless Mr. Monteux understands it, and last month public and press seemed to be delighted. So why not repeat?

The B flat symphony of d'Indy was once rather the property of the Boston orchestra. The Boston men under Mr. Gericke introduced it to New York fifteen years ago. The following year d'Indy himself, appearing as guest with the Bostonians, led it here. Then Dr. Muck let it alone; Dr. Muck did not conduct music by d'Indy in America. Naturally enough Mr. Monteux revives it, for indisputably it is one of the most important of French symphonies and Mr. Monteux is a Frenchman.

A great deal of water has swept under a great many bridges in the last fifteen years. When the symphony came to us first, Richard Strauss was still writing "music of the future"; Debussy and Max Reger were deemed dangerous anarchs of art—Reger dangerous chiefly to himself, for to-day people scarcely remember him even by name; along with these d'Indy was ultra-modern. Just fancy that! People fussed so much about his being a cerebral" and dealing in the mathematics of music with the enthusiasm of some dread sorcerer stirring a particularly insidious brew.

And why not? Fifteen years ago Stravinsky was a docile pupil of Rimsky-Korsakoff. Schönberg was just out of the Ueberbrettl, Leo Ornstein was a little boy in knickerbockers playing the Liszt concertos, Scriabine was ignorant of the light machine, the Italian futurists had not been heard of even by themselves, Erik Satie was still to discover an orchestral instrument in the typewriter. To-day the B flat symphony of d'Indy has none of the interest of a stranger or a freak. You take it or leave it as an expression of genius, as a work of art.

This symphony has been praised extravagantly. It has been rated above the symphony of César Franck, on a par with the greatest of the Beethoven symphonies. Personally, let me say in all modesty, I have always found it a hard nut to crack. In yesterday's blizzard I found it a little harder than usual. That it is "cerebral" music matters not a jot to me. Music has as much right to be "cerebral" as to be anything else. Thought itself, in the fine phrase of Arthur Symons, can take fire and become a sort of passion.

But in spite of d'Indy's sumptuous scoring, I have never got very far into this symphony. In each of the four movements there are superb moments, particularly, it seemed to me last night, in the first movement and in the finale. The audience, however, seemed impressed by it all. There was close attention, there was hearty applause, at the end enough applause to justify Mr. Monteux in calling on his men to rise. At any rate, the work was performed admirably under the guidance of Mr. Monteux.

The overture to "The Magic Flute" was given with technical brilliance, with accent, with vivacity. There was magic in the performance as well as in the name. The "Tristan" excerpts I have known Mr. Monteux to lead with a more overwhelming eloquence, though the band itself was not so good, when he was conductor of the Civic Concerts. Still, there was much to commend in the performance last night and the audience applauded it enthusiastically. For one listener the concert was complete without Liszt's hackneyed tone poem.

PITTS SANBORN.

EVENING JOURNAL
New York City
ess FEB 9 1920 K

MATTERS SYMPHONIC.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Orchestra, brought to a first New York hearing on Saturday, at Carnegie Hall, Frederick S. Converse's contribution to the impotencies of artistic expression superinduced by the war. This was a symphony in C minor (hallowed signature!) stodily of the New England school, in which the composer's reaction to the conflict, as he tells one, is "subjective and human, rather than impersonal and epic." Surely the adjectives need rearrangement—"subjective and impersonal, rather than human and epic" tricks out description much better.

Walter Damrosch, for the concert

EAGLE
Brooklyn, 1920 D
FEB 6

the vitality and

The Boston Symphony [illegible] the main section of its program last evening in Carnegie Hall to the exposition of Mr. Monteux's ideas regarding D'Indy's Second Symphony. The other numbers included Liszt's "Les Préludes," the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," and the overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute." The orchestra is in Brooklyn this evening.—W. B. M.

From WORLD, New York City
FEB 8 1920

AMERICAN COMPOSITION BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Converse's Work Deals With Trying Times of War—At the Operas.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, introduced a new symphony by an American composer, Frederick Converse. The composition was suggested by the events of the last five years and in it the composer attempted to portray something of the feelings and experiences of the young women and men of America in those times of stress. A big orchestra is required and some of the writing is highly intricate and involved and ranges from a light scherzo to the victorious return home of the soldiers.

The symphony is well made and is interesting to listen to, but at times seems diffuse.

Schubert's simple and calm "Unfinished Symphony" followed it. The band was in fine playing trim and there was much spirit and dash in its performance.

EVENING GLOBE
New York City
ess:

Music.

Boston and New York Orchestras —Other Music.

A new symphony in C minor by Frederick Shepherd Converse was introduced to New York Saturday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Converse is a Boston, or at any rate a Massachusetts, composer. The fact that he used to write very much in the manner of Richard Strauss might make pertinent the inquiry, "What is a Boston composer?" The symphony in question is a symphony of the Great War. Query second: "Why must a Boston composer forsake Richard Strauss because he hymns the victory of Boston over the kaiser?"

The subject is as fertile as a garden of weeds. But symphonies of the Great War so far bewray a weedy tendency. We have heard the cloistered d'Indy's "De Bello Gallico." Mr. Converse is a much younger man than M. d'Indy. He composed his work farther from the battle front, as far away as the shores of Lake Sunapee, New Hampshire. In a somewhat longish explanation of the purpose of the symphony he declares that he has in mind the experiences of the young men and the young women of our land during the trials of the war." Hence a male theme and a female theme move through the work like characters in a drama.

The finale is martial, suggesting both the din of battle and the jubilation of victory. And yet the adagio, in the mood and manner of a nocturne, and the brief and joyous scherzo pleased most the large audience on Saturday. After the new work Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter" overture continued and completed the programme. The performance of Schubert's symphony was pulsating with life, and at the same time euphonic, elegant, and marked by an appreciation of the peculiar tenderness of Schubert. Of course, Mr. Monteux gave an impressive reading of the overture, which closed the concert, the superb sonorities of Russian festival and oriental color.

The Symphony Society of New York in Aeolian Hall yesterday afternoon had a well-selected and arranged programme, consisting of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, d'Indy's "Istar" variations, and Saint-Saëns's violoncello concerto. The soloist, Hans Kindler, who played the Saint-Saëns concerto in masterly fashion, with high ideal accompaniment by Walter Damrosch and the [illegible] audience filled

PITTS SANBORN.

From TRIBUNE
WORLD, New York City
Address
FEB 8 1920

New Symphony by Converse Is Given At Carnegie Hall

Piece "Reflects Something of the Feelings We Have All Been Through in Last Few Years," Says Composer

By H. E. Krehbiel

Mr. Monteux, at the fourth afternoon concert in Carnegie Hall, gave us a new symphony by Mr. Frederick Converse, the much-beloved symphonic torso in B minor by Schubert and Rimsky-Korsakoff's overtrue on liturgic themes from the Greek Church, entitled "La Grande Paque Russe."

Mr. Converse's symphony, the other pieces being familiar, was the most arresting feature, because it was new and the work of an experienced American composer who does not seem to have difficulty in gaining a hearing in all manner of dignified concerts. His latest work, Mr. Hale tells us, was written in the summer and fall of last year and is the first symphony composed by Mr. Converse outside of one composed when he was a student at Harvard University, which Mr. Gericke brought forward at a concert in Boston in January, 1890. Supplementary to this information we have the composer's statement that though not programmatic in the ordinary sense of the term, it is yet designed to be expressive of "moods and emotions" which he thinks "reflect something of the feelings we have all been through during the stress of the last few years."

In other words, it is, in a way, a "war symphony," and as such may be looked upon as a companion to "Sinfonia de Bello Gallico" by Vincent d'Indy, with which Mr. Walter Damrosch favored us earlier in the present season. Its martial character, however, seems to us to be confined to its last movement, in which there is a delineation of combatant elements, of triumph and jubilation.

In a sense all great symphonies are programmatic, the finest illustration of the truth being found in Beethoven's Fifth, where, however, we are estopped from all thought of physical combat and invited to observe the struggle between the human and divine elements in our own souls. The conflict indicated by the contrasting character of the first and second themes, which we find in the classics as well as in Mr. Converse's work, is a musical conflict inherent in the conventional conception of the sonata form—major and minor, doing and suffering, masculine and feminine, as we used to phrase it when man was looked upon as the vigorous animal and woman as the gentle.

Mr. Converse's symphony is good music. There are signs of labor in it, but the striving is not in vain. It yields results which charm the senses (especially in the second movement, with its peaceful nocturnal mood), excite the fancy and stir the emotions. As performed there were some crudenesses in the color scheme, in the combination of instruments, it seemed to us, but perhaps some of them did not sound in the mind of the composer as they came to the ears of the hearers. But the composer of to-day seems unable to dissociate conflict from noise and victory from din.

NEW YORK
ABLISHED 1801
om
VENING POST,

Music

Henry T. Finck

A New American Symphony

The programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday included a Bostonian novelty in the form of a new symphony by Frederick Converse. It is in the venerable key of C minor and there is nothing in it to offend the ears of conservatives. It will be remembered that an opera by this composer, "The Pipe of Desire," after winning a prize, was performed at the Metropolitan. It did not enjoy a long life, though it had engaging traits. He has also written chamber music and orchestral works. His first symphony, written when he was a Harvard student, was played under Gericke as long ago as 1890. The new symphony was composed last year; it is intended, in the words of Mr. Converse, to "reflect something of the feelings we have all been through during the stress of the last few years." This may help explain the turbulent character of the final movement with its triumphant suggestions of armistice and victory. It would have been well if Mr. Converse had personally triumphed, in writing this score over the Teutonic ideal that duration, in symphonic works, is more important than inspiration. His themes are not sufficiently original or pregnant to bear so much elaboration. The same material, condensed into a symphonic poem of the Liszt (not the Strauss) type would have made a more successful bid for a long life.

verse, be it recalled, is a Boston composer whose opera, "The Pipe of Desire," was featured at the Metropolitan Opera House some ten years ago. His symphony, as heard on Friday evening, unquestionably has distinction, even if lacking in those marked traits of Americanism that are anxiously being sought in the serious native music of to-day. Mr. Converse (like Mr. Carpenter) has modern French and Russian leanings. In his music is heard the impressionistic tendencies of those two schools. The symphony is in four movements, the first of which adheres rather strictly to the conventional form wherein there is a presentation, working out and repetition of prominent thematic material. The themes in this movement are of an original character, original by reason of their peculiar intervalic makeup. Unexpected leaps there are, and the effect created by their appearance us unusual. The second movement, in slow tempo, is the weakest of the four. A quiet and tranquil nocturne, this section, with the composer seemingly not attaining high inspiration, or at least perhaps falling short of what he had intended. The following "Allegro vivace scherzando" is imbued with spontaniety of mood, an expression of carefree youth and joy. "The best music is the joyful music," recently declared the blind pianist, John Meldrum. It is the keynote of courageous optimism that is felt in Mr. Converse's scherzando, and also a ruling sentiment that perhaps will underlie all great American music of the future.

But more attractive still, at least from the first hearing, is the finale of Mr. Converse's symphony, martial in spirit and highly dramatic in the scoring. The instrumentation is for a large modern orchestra and the manipulation exceedingly expert. The composer, commenting upon the symphony as a whole, says among other things, "There is no programme, although there is an expression of moods and emotions which I think reflects something of the feelings that we have all been through during the stress of the few last years * * * the point of view is subjective and human rather than impersonal and epic."

The announcement of Fritz Kreisler's name as soloist at this concert undoubtedly account in a measure for the audience of large numbers—an audience that filled to capacity the opera house of the Academy of Music, and this, too, despite blizzard weather, with a resultant paralysis of traffic. Mr. Kreisler played the solo part of Beethoven's only violin concerto, adding to its measures his own two remarkable cadenzas, both of which are truly in kinship with the music of Beethoven's concerto and almost an integral part of that work. They indicate Mr. Kreisler's deep insight and masterly grasp of the work, his entire conception being one of profound dignity, sublime devotion and fundamental spiritual digestion. But for a few details of advanced violinistic technique, these cadenzas might have been written by Beethoven. Mr. Kriesler's performance of this classic places him in the rank of the supreme living masters of violin playing in classical style. Perhaps there is no other violinist before the public to-day who could excel the Kreisler interpretation of this particular masterpiece. Mr. Monteux's accompaniment was very fine, the individual players also bringing a devotion to their tasks which placed them en rapport with the soloist. Tumultuous applause prevailed at the close of the concluding jovial rondo movement, and the soloist was obliged to acknowledge this protracted tribute with many, many bows. A highly enjoyable evening terminated with Rimsky-Korsakoff's colorful "The Russian Easter" overture.

From STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Symphonies by American composers are creeping ever and anon upon programmes nowadays. But a few weeks past Walter Damrosch vouchsafed musical New York a hearing of John Alden Carpenter's interesting "Sermons in Stone" symphony, and on Friday evening last Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, brought to this borough a first hearing of Frederick Shepherd Converse's C minor symphony at the last but one of Brooklyn's five annual concerts by the Boston players. Mr. Monteux, whose tastes and accomplishments as a musician are both catholic and versatile, had evidently given much study to Mr. Converse's score (the first of that composer's essays in symphonic form), and also displayed obvious pleasure in its direction. Mr. Con-

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
ess
FEB 7 1920 D

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

An Ovation for Kreisler and a Symphony by Converse.

Fritz Kreisler had a remarkable ovation last night at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy, his second appearance in Brooklyn since the war. The applause was unusually hearty and prolonged on his entry to play the Beethoven Concerto and at the close of an inspired performance of that great work the recalls were so many as to escape record. If there are violins as well as harps in heaven they will be played as Kreisler played last night, with an ecstatic absorption in the beauty of their message under which technical difficulties fade away and are as if they did not exist. Beethoven's Concerto, great as it is, is long and filled with repetitions which tend in an ordinary performance to become wearisome. Last night every bar of it held the audience tense and the performance raised the violinists on the stage to a high pitch of enthusiasm.

Next to Kreisler and Beethoven—the names are put in that order because without Kreisler there would have been no such Beethoven as was heard last night—the interest centered in a new symphony by Frederick S. Converse of Boston, a work inspired by our participation in the war and the effect of it upon our youth. It is a well made and interesting composition with moments of appealing beauty, creditable to Mr. Converse and to American music, but by no means a work for which audiences will clamor as they did, for instance, for the "New World" symphony of Dvorak when that was produced here. The genius of Mr. Converse is reflective rather than dramatic and he is at his happiest in the expression of serene and quiet beauty rather than in his effort to portray the triumphant homecoming of the troops and the rapturous emotions springing from it. His second movement, a nocturne which seems to have little to do with the war, is melodious and appealing, but his close, which essays to picture the tumultuous emotion of a year and a half ago, would be better if it had a little touch of Sousa in it. It is fine and all right so far as it goes, but it isn't big enough for the thing the composer is trying to say. However, if it were, Mr. Converse would be Beethoven and there is only one of him.

For the close Mr. Monteux, the conductor, had his innings with a picturesque and spirited "Russian Easter" by Rimsky-Korsakoff. On his score the composer prints part of the LXVII Psalm and a Gospel account of the Resurrection, but his orchestra often reminds one of his own beautiful but unreligious "Coq D'Or." However, that is the man's individual style which stamps all his work and makes it always worth hearing. Perhaps he is less so in this Eastern music than in some other compositions, but it made a spirited and attractive close to an admirable and admirably played program.

From North American
Philadelphia, Pa.

KREISLER MAGNET OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Plays Viotti Concerto Virtually Rewritten by Himself

Fritz Kreisler was the magnet which drew the largest audience of the Boston Symphony's season, thus far, at its fourth concert in the Academy last night. Kreisler played like a god and Monteux excelled himself in his conducting of the two orchestral numbers. Vincent D'Indy's Second Symphony was played first. According to the program notes, this work has not been heard in Philadelphia since 1904. It is puzzling to understand why this is the case, for the work is indubitably one of the highest points of French symphonic music. Of course, the fact that D'Indy does ont hang out his emotional wash before the public detracts to a certain extent from the work's popular appeal, and only after repeated hearings are fully revealed the beauties of this solid three-quarters of an hour of compact, complex score.

Monteux led his men thru the intricacies of the music with enthusiasm. The performance reached its climax in the impressive and dramatic finale. As usual, the solo work of these players was of superlative quality, except in the third movement, when the French horn curdled a bit. It is almost a pity to mention that lapse, because all thru the evening Mr. Wendler, the first horn player, gave a superb performance of exceedingly difficult music.

After scaling the rugged peaks of Beethoven and Brahms at previous appearances, Kreisler led the audience across the verdant slopes of classicism in the Viotti Violin Concerto, number 22. One of the things to be grateful for these days is this artist's understanding of, and sympathy with, classics ill-used by pitiless time. With the intellect of a scholar and the understanding of genius, he gathers up discarded works containing the kernel of inspiration and reverently refurbishes them into glowing vitality.

Kreisler has virtually rewritten this particular concerto, but left its pure spirit intact. How great is his accomplishment was more apparent last evening with full orchestral background than when he played the work at his recital last fall with only a piano accompaniment. The cadenza was of Kreisler's invention solely, and it maintained the unity of the work perfectly.

Of Kreisler's performance nothing is left to be said at this late date. The poetry and exquisite feeling put into the adagio transcend the vocabulary of journalistic criticism. Only Shakespeare in his tender moments could evoke the spirit of the thing in words.

Apparently nothing less than blistered palms ended the applause of the excited audience.

Liszt's time-defying symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," played with thrilling effect, ended the concert and aroused the audience to further torrents of applause.

STAR
Baltimore, Md.
FEB 5 - 1920

PRESENTS PERFECT PROGRAM AT LYRIC

Boston Symphony Production Also Superb; Kreisler Is Especially Good.

Presenting a perfectly arranged program, magnificently produced, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, gave the fourth concert of its Baltimore season's series in the Lyric Theater last night. Fritz Kreisler, violinist and composer, was special soloist. Approximately the audience filled about three-quarters of the theater. Beginning of the concert was deferred more than 15 minutes to meet the emergency of a slowly assembling audience caused by the severe progressing sleet storm. Obviously determined, unusually prolonged applause from both audience and orchestra, generally, was accorded Mr. Kreisler, both upon his appearance upon the stage and after the completion of his part of the program.

D'Indy's second symphony, Opus 57, in B flat major; Viotti's concerto in A minor, No. 22, for solo violin and orchestra, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "La Grande Paque Russe" ("The Russian Easter"), an "Overture on Themes of the Russian Church," Opus 36, constituted the ample program.

Playing of the orchestra was truly superb, and its tonal finish was a combination of richness with brilliance infrequent with any orchestra. As the program was other than an exhibition of extinct volcanoes (not even barring the Viotti concerto), it had live interest. Mr. Kreisler appeared to better advantage than for many years.

J. N. H.

iladelphia, Pa. E

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Fritz Kreisler's Appearance the Feature of Its Last Night's Concer

It may not be as complimentary to the Boston Symphony Orchestra as one could wish, but if this is to be a truthful chronicle, record must be made of the fact that the appearance of Mr. Fritz Kreisler as the assisting artist of the occasion was the most notable and popular feature of the concert given by the organization which Mr. Pierre Monteux conducted with so much skill and zeal at the Academy of Music last evening. It was because of the appearance of Kreisler's name upon the programme that every part of the auditorium was crowded to its capacity and when the artist, who must unquestionably be recognized as the greatest living violinist, stepped upon the stage, the esteem and admiration in which he is held by the concert-going public was attested by the heartiness of his welcome.

The great house burst at once into a roar of applause and for several moments he was kept bowing in acknowledgements of a wonderful reception in which the musicians on the stage as earnestly as the spectators joined. One could have wished after such a beginning that something better was coming than the Viotti concerto, which although it contains some ingratiating passages and notably an extremely melodious slow movement, is essentially a meretricious piec of work written rather to show of the technical skill of the performer than to express any thoughts of the composer's that were bursting for utterance; but Kreisler can't be playing B flat chms of Beethoven all the time and the Viotti music at least enabled him to display his lovely tone and his marvelous technique. It need hardly be said that its conclusion was the signal for another tremendous ovation, and the audience would have gladly heard more had it been permissible.

Of the purely orchestral numbers the most important was the second symphony in B flat of Vincent D'Indy, which is known to amateurs not only as that composer's masterpiece, but as one of the finest symphonic creations of late years. There are those to whom it does not appeal so much as some other of the same composer's works on account of the prevailing sombreness of its tone, but that is one of those matters of taste, which are beyond the range of discussion. It is a noble thing, lofty in its sentiment, transcendent in its range, and one of whose least merits is the consumate science which its complicated and elaborate score exemplifies. It was admirably rendered, with power and breadth and vitality and an intelligently sensitive appreciation of its significance.

RECORD
ess Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 3 1920 E

KREISLER ACCLAIMED

Superb Playing of Little Known Concerto by Viotti.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music last night with Fritz Kriesler as an attraction additional to the orchestra played to an enthusiastic and house-filling audience. The program offered was interesting as far as the symphony was concerned, if the sort of thing Vincent d'Indy writes is enjoyed. It is entirely probable that the majority of persons gave up all hope of the interminable B flat major symphony having an end, and yet the scholarly handling of the themes, the unobtrusive and often unusual orchestration and the admirable way in which the orchestra did the tedious work were all points of interest and after a fashion furnished entertainment.

The entrance of Kreisler was to great applause that was augmented at the conclusion of his remarkable performance of the Viotti concerto No, 22 in A minor. It was a wonderful piece of playing, the simplicity of the themes and the rhythmic beauty of the work, particularly of the last movement, being admirably suited to the player's style. The program concluded with the symphonic poem "Les Preludes" of Liszt.

ESTABLISHED 1861 FEB 22 192
From Morning Telegraph
New Y

Music in Washington, D. C.

The Boston Symphony, Pierre Monteux, conductor, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson Greene, was heard in its fourth concert of the season, with Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as soloist. Pierre Monteux gave a most artistic performance of the Schubert "Unfinished" Symphony. Mischa Elman thrilled a large audience on February 6, offering a varied program which gave ample opportunity for a display of brilliancy, masterly technic and tone coloring.

RECORD
ss Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 1 1920 E

—Viotti's delightful concerto in A minor, which has long been a special favorite with Fritz Kreisler's audiences, will be the music of the evening when that violinist plays as soloist at the Boston Symphony concert to be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow. Pierre Monteux, who has just been re-engaged as permanent conductor of the orchestra, will make this concert an event of twofold interest by reviving d'Indy's master work, the second symphony in B flat. The closing offering will be Liszt's "The Preludes."

From
Brooklyn Life
New York City

The Fourth Boston Symphony Evening.

Monteux paid this country a compliment when he included in the program of the fourth Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Academy of Music, last week Friday evening, the new Symphony in C minor by Frederick S. Converse. The only symphony of this gifted American composer, it is expressive of "the experiences of the young men and young women of our land during the trials of the war." If it does not give such expression with absolute clarity, it at least will appear to many that as a wartime picture it is better than d'Indy's "De Bello Gallico." There is a fine, slow movement, which was very much liked at the Metropolitan, and there is impressiveness in the last one—suggestive of both the struggle of war and the joy over victory. This symphony was finely played, as was also the very effective "Russian Easter" of Rimsky-Korsakoff. But the evening's greatest enthusiasm was for the soloist, Fritz Kreisler, who gave a wonderful performance of the Beethoven concerto, holding the audience fairly spellbound. His playing alone made the evening really memorable.

TOWN TOPICS

ess New York City

Boston sent us its orchestra, but New York no longer turns its eyes skyward when the players from the Hub treat us to symphonic delights. Our own Philharmonic has changed all that. The Bostonians were rather dry and academic in a D'Indy work and even in some "Tristan and Isolde" music—which is decidedly a "wet" score. London, 1881; New York 1884

FEB 3 1920 E
From
~~Evening~~ Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

KREISLER PLAYS WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Usual Enthusiastic Greeting for the Great Violinist in Viotti Concerto

PROGRAM

Symphony No. 2 ..... d'Indy
Concerto No. 22 ..... Viotti
"Les Preludes" ..... Liszt

Fritz Kreisler was the outstanding feature of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy last night. His performance of Viotti's A minor concerto, No. 22, was a miracle of tone, technique, temperament and all else that goes to the making of great violin music. It made the d'Indy Symphony No. 2 that preceded seem a stilted and mannered mechanism, and soon the Liszt music that followed seemed the mere bombast of "pomp and circumstance" by comparison.

Not that the Viotti concerto in itself is a wonderful composition. In other hands it might seem old and dry and threadbare; but Kreisler put the breath of life into it. The bland, warm tone was balm to the ear after d'Indy's resoundnig dissonances and meanderings, Viotti's old-fashioned formality, embroidered like a paper-lace valentine, was the more endearing by contrast. The cadenzas (of Kreisler's making) were of exceeding loveliness. The slow movement—with all strings, and the solo instrument muted—was all of it pure song, with its birdlike twitterings and burblings, and the gallivanting jollity of the last was an invitation to the dance.

As on earlier occasions this season, the master violinist was long applauded when he entered, and recalled many times after he ended.

The d'Indy symphony was very hard to play and rather hard to hear, and it was questionably worth while to performers or listeners. The applause was of polite recognition, not of conviction. The real enthusiasm was waiting for Kreisler. The audience reverently bent their brows to d'Indy's meandering muse, his made effects, his mathematical science and his frequent lyric outbursts diffused into eloquent aimlessness. The second movement was always on the verge of communicating some important message from the spirit world, but what issued was more technical than soulful. The viola was loquacious at the start of theethird movement; a broad choral effect at the close of the entire work was the most cohesive and impressive portion.

Pierri Monteaux achieved his happiest results in the rousing sonorities and stirring climax of the brasses in Liszt's "Les Preludes." The accompaniment for Mr. Kreisler was expertly handled.

STAR
ess: Baltimore, Md.
JAN 31 1920

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The last but one of the Boston Symphony concerts of the season to be given at the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, February 4, will be an occasion memorable in two respects: First, in the reappearance of Fritz Kreisler as soloist with the orchestra, playing Viotti's delightful Concerto in A minor, and, second, in the revival by Pierre Monteux (who has just been made permanent conductor of the orchestra) of Vincent d'Indy's large-voiced and eloquent Second Symphony in B flat. The power of the music and the brilliance of its performance under the baton of the composer's compatriot made a marked impression upon the audiences at the Boston concerts last week. The final number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Russian Easter," built upon Russian Church themes.

From
~~Evening~~ Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony

Fourth Concert of Season With Fritz Kreisler as Soloist

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra returned for its fourth concert of the season, at the Academy of Music last evening, and had the assistance of Fritz Kreisler, as soloist, the audience being, as was to be expected with so potent a double attraction as that which combined the famous band of musicians with one of the most distinguished of violinists, of "capacity" proportions.

The program, while consisting of only three numbers, was out of the beaten track, with the Symphony in B-flat major, No. 2, Op. 57, of Vincent d'Indy as something of an orchestral novelty, and Kreisler playing a concerto by Viotti instead of one of the violin compositions so often heard. At the end, with a sort of spectacular flourish that gave a colorful wind-up to the occasion, came "Les Preludes" of Liszt, a familiar composition, to be sure, but not always played with such fine and stirring effect.

The d'Indy symphony is a work of big scope, somewhat imbued with the modern spirit and conceived and executed with the skill of a master. It cannot be said that it possesses great charm for the casual listener, however, as it has not the direct appeal that characterizes the greatest works of its class. But there are some beautifully melodious moments, notably a fine choral passage at the end, and as played by the Boston musicians, under Pierre Monteux's wholly comprehensive and sympathetic guidance, it could scarcely fail to make an impression.

It was to Kreisler, however, that the audience—as large as the house could hold, with many persons turned away—looked for its real treat of the evening. At any rate, it was he who gave it. When he appeared, the applause, if not so prolonged as that which greeted him when he was heard here recently with both the New York and Philadelphia symphony orchestras, was spontaneous and cordial, and his playing of the Viotti concerto was such as to bring him a real ovation at its close.

The composition is not one of the greatest for violin. It is rather old-fashioned and lacking in vitality—at least it would do so, played by an ordinary musician. But Kreisler seems able to imbue any work with the spark of genius and to set it aflame, and this old work of Viotti after all' proved electrifying as it flowed from his b The simplicity of the piece is its gr est charm, and it was poetry indee unfolded by Kreisler, who gave t also, particularly in the last movem a musical significance that lifted above its own level merely as a c position.

Inquirer
Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 4 1920

SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Viotti's delightful Concerto in A minor, which has long been a special favorite with Fritz Kreisler's audiences, will be the music of the evening when the master violinist plays as soloist at the Boston Symphony Concert to be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. Pierre Monteux, who has just been re-engaged as permanent conductor of the orchestra, will make this concert an event of twofold interest by reviving d'Indy's master work, the Second Symphony in B flat.

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

THE CRITIC TALKS TO MUSIC LOVERS

Weekly Comment on Things Musical in Discriminating Philadelphia

THE writer of this column wishes to acknowledge hereby the receipt of a large number of letters calling attention to a slip, which occurred in the notice of the Boston Symphony concert in last Tuesday afternoon's paper. The protesting readers are every one of them right. The Vincent d'Indy symphony was played here for the first time in the United States by the Philadelphia Orchestra, and not by the Boston Symphony, as stated in the article. If an apology can make any amends for an erroneous statement which was made from memory and not looked up, as it should have been, said apology is hereby made.

Kreisler has shown to us in Philadelphia is his orchestration of the Viotti A minor concerto in which he shows ability as an orchestrator almost equal to his work as a violinist. By this use of the orchestra and some modernization of the harmonies in certain important places, Mr. Kreisler has put this composition in the front rank of violin concertos, whereas it had been for years relegated to the classroom. And he has done it as he has done all the others, without sacrificing the musical ideas of the original composer. The soul of the work is still Viotti's; only the dress is new.

But there is one musician, and, strange to say, his chief claim to fame lies at least thus far, along interpretative and not creative lines, who has made a number of transcriptions, every one of which is a distinct artistic gain for the original composition. This is Fritz Kreisler, whose transcriptions have vivified and modernized many works of the older Italian violin composers, and have given them a beauty which surely they never possessed in their original form.

The latest piece of work which Mr

From
Bulletin
Philadelphia, Pa.
JAN 31

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth concert of the season at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, playing Vincent d'Indy's Symphony in B-flat major, No. 2, Op. 57, as the first number, and Liszt's "Les Preludes" at the end of the program. In between, Fritz Kreisler will be heard as soloist, in Concerto in A minor, No. 22, for violin and orchestra, by Viotti.

From
Sun
Baltimore, Md.
FEB 1 1920

Kreisler Here On Wednesday

VIOTTI'S delightful concerto in A minor, which has been a favorite with Fritz Kreisler's audiences, will be the music when the violinist plays as soloist at the Boston Symphony Concert to be given in the Lyric Theatre next Wednesday.

Pierre Monteux, who has just been engaged as the permanent conductor of the orchestra, will make this concert further memorable by reviving Vincent d'Indy's master work, the Second Symphony in B flat. The closing number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Russian Easter," built upon themes of the Russian Church.

From North American
Philadelphia, Pa

Opera and Concert

Viotti's Concerto in A Minor, which has long been a special favorite with Fritz Kreisler's audiences, will be the music of the evening when the master violinist plays as soloist at the Boston Symphony concert in the Academy tomorrow evening. Pierre Monteux, who has just been re-engaged as permanent conductor of the orchestra, will revive what is considered by many as Vincent d'Indy's master work, the Second Symphony in B Flat. The closing number will be Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Preludes."

From North American
Philadelphia, Pa.

KREISLER MAGNET OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Plays Viotti Concerto Virtually Rewritten by Himself

Fritz Kreisler was the magnet which drew the largest audience of the Boston Symphony's season, thus far, at its fourth concert in the Academy last night. Kreisler played like a god and Monteux excelled himself in his conducting of the two orchestral numbers.

Vincent D'Indy's Second Symphony was played first. According to the program notes, this work has not been heard in Philadelphia since 1904. It is puzzling to understand why this is the case, for the work is indubitably one of the highest points of French symphonic music. Of course, the fact that D'Indy does ont hang out his emotional wash before the public detracts to a certain extent from the work's popular appeal, and only after repeated hearings are fully revealed the beauties of this solid three-quarters of an hour of compact, complex score.

Monteux led his men thru the intricacies of the music with enthusiasm. The performance reached its climax in the impressive and dramatic finale. As usual, the solo work of these players was of superlative quality, except in the third movement, when the French horn curdled a bit. It is almost a pity to mention that lapse, because all thru the evening Mr. Wendler, the first horn player, gave a superb performance of exceedingly difficult music.

After scaling the rugged peaks of Beethoven and Brahms at previous appearances, Kreisler led the audience across the verdant slopes of classicism in the Viotti Violin Concerto, number 22. One of the things to be grateful for these days is this artist's understanding of, and sympathy with, classics ill-used by pitiless time. With the intellect of a scholar and the understanding of genius, he gathers up discarded works containing the kernel of inspiration and reverently refurbishes them into glowing vitality.

Kreisler has virtually rewritten this particular concerto, but left its pure spirit intact. How great is his accomplishment was more apparent last evening with full orchestral background than when he played the work at his recital last fall with only a piano accompaniment. The cadenza was of Kreisler's invention solely, and it maintained the unity of the work perfectly.

Of Kreisler's performance nothing is left to be said at this late date. The poetry and exquisite feeling put into the adagio transcend the vocabulary of journalistic criticism. Only Shakespeare in his tender moments could evoke the spirit of the thing in words.

Apparently nothing less than blistered palms ended the applause of the excited audience.

Liszt's time-defying symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," played with thrilling effect, ended the concert and aroused the audience to further torrents of applause.

STAR
: Baltimore, Md.

PRESENTS PERFECT PROGRAM AT LYRIC

Boston Symphony Production Also Superb; Kreisler Is Especially Good.

Presenting a perfectly arranged program, magnificently produced, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, gave the fourth concert of its Baltimore season's series in the Lyric Theater last night. Fritz Kreisler, violinist and composer, was special soloist. Approximately the audience filled about three-quarters of the theater. Beginning of the concert was deferred more than 15 minutes to meet the emergency of a slowly assembling audience caused by the severe progressing sleet storm. Obviously determined, unusually prolonged applause from both audience and orchestra, generally, was accorded Mr. Kreisler, both upon his appearance upon the stage and after the completion of his part of the program.

D'Indy's second symphony, Opus 57, in B flat major; Viotti's concerto in A minor, No. 22, for solo violin and orchestra, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "La Grande Paque Russe" ("The Russian Easter"), an "Overture on Themes of the Russian Church," Opus 36, constituted the ample program.

Playing of the orchestra was truly superb, and its tonal finish was a combination of richness with brilliance infrequent with any orchestra. As the program was other than an exhibition of extinct volcanoes (not even barring the Viotti concerto), it had live interest. Mr. Kreisler appeared to better advantage than for many years.

J. N. H.

iladelphia, Pa.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Fritz Kreisler's Appearance the Feature of Its Last Night's Concer

It may not be as complimentary to the Boston Symphony Orchestra as one could wish, but if this is to be a truthful chronicle, record must be made of the fact that the appearance of Mr. Fritz Kreisler as the assisting artist of the occasion was the most notable and popular feature of the concert given by the organization which Mr. Pierre Monteux conducted with so much skill and zeal at the Academy of Music last evening. It was because of the appearance of Kreisler's name upon the programme that every part of the auditorium was crowded to its capacity and when the artist, who must unquestionably be recognized as the greatest living violinist, stepped upon the stage, the esteem and admiration in which he is held by the concert-going public was attested by the heartiness of his welcome.

The great house burst at once into a roar of applause and for several moments he was kept bowing in acknowledgements of a wonderful reception in which the musicians on the stage as earnestly as the spectators joined. One could have wished after such a beginning that something better was coming than the Viotti concerto, which although it contains some ingratiating passages and notably an extremely melodious slow movement, is essentially a meretricious piec of work written rather to show of the technical skill of the performer than to express any thoughts of the composer's that were bursting for utterance; but Kreisler can't be playing Brahms or Beethoven all the time and the Viotti music at least enabled him to display his lovely tone and his marvelous technique. It need hardly be said that its conclusion was the signal for another tremendous ovation, and the audience would have gladly heard more had it been permissible.

Of the purely orchestral numbers the most important was the second symphony in B flat of Vincent D'Indy, which is known to amateurs not only as that composer's masterpiece, but as one of the finest symphonic creations of late years. There are those to whom it does not appeal so much as some other of the same composer's works on account of the prevailing sombreness of its tone, but that is one of those matters of taste, which are beyond the range of discussion. It is a noble thing, lofty in its sentiment, transcendent in its range, and one of whose least merits is the consumate science which its complicated and elaborate score exemplifies. It was admirably rendered, with power and breadth and vitality and an intelligently sensitive appreciation of its significance.

RECORD
ess Philadelphia, Pa.

KREISLER ACCLAIMED

Superb Playing of Little Known Concerto by Viotti.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music last night with Fritz Kriesler as an attraction additional to the orchestra played to an enthusiastic and house-filling audience. The program offered was interesting as far as the symphony was concerned, if the sort of thing Vincent d'Indy writes is enjoyed. It is entirely probable that the majority of persons gave up all hope of the interminable B flat major symphony having an end, and yet the scholarly handling of the themes, the unobtrusive and often unusual orchestration and the admirable way in which the orchestra did the tedious work were all points of interest and after a fashion furnished entertainment.

The entrance of Kreisler was to great applause that was augmented at the conclusion of his remarkable performance of the Viotti concerto No. 22 in A minor. It was a wonderful piece of playing, the simplicity of the themes and the rhythmic beauty of the work, particularly of the last movement, being admirably suited to the player's style. The program concluded with the symphonic poem "Les Preludes" of Liszt.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Morning Telegraph
New Y

Music in Washington, D. C.

The Boston Symphony, Pierre Monteux, conductor, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson Greene, was heard in its fourth concert of the season, with Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as soloist. Pierre Monteux gave a most artistic performance of the Schubert "Unfinished" Symphony. Mischa Elman thrilled a large audience on February 6, offering a varied program which gave ample opportunity for a display of brilliancy, masterly technic and tone coloring.

RECORD
ss Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 1 1920

—Viotti's delightful concerto in A minor, which has long been a special favorite with Fritz Kreisler's audiences, will be the music of the evening when that violinist plays as soloist at the Boston Symphony concert to be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow. Pierre Monteux, who has just been re-engaged as permanent conductor of the orchestra, will make this concert an event of twofold interest by reviving d'Indy's master work, the second symphony in B flat. The closing offering will be Liszt's "The Preludes."

From
Brooklyn Life
New York City

The Fourth Boston Symphony Evening.

Monteux paid this country a compliment when he included in the program of the fourth Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Academy of Music, last week Friday evening, the new Symphony in C minor by Frederick S. Converse. The only symphony of this gifted American composer, it is expressive of "the experiences of the young men and young women of our land during the trials of the war.' If it does not give such expression with absolute clarity, it at least will appear to many that as a wartime picture it is better than d'Indy's "De Bello Gallico." There is a fine, slow movement, which was very much liked at the Metropolitan, and there is impressiveness in the last one—suggestive of both the struggle of war and the joy over victory. This symphony was finely played, as was also the very effective "Russian Easter" of Rimsky-Korsakoff. But the evening's greatest enthusiasm was for the soloist, Fritz Kreisler, who gave a wonderful performance of the Beethoven concerto, holding the audience fairly spellbound. His playing alone made the evening really memorable.

TOWN TOPICS
ess New York City

Boston sent us its orchestra, but New York no longer turns its eyes skyward when the players from the Hub treat us to symphonic delights. Our own Philharmonic has changed all that. The Bostonians were rather dry and academic in a D'Indy work and even in some "Tristan and Isolde" music—which is decidedly a "wet" score. London, 1881; New York 1884

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

KREISLER PLAYS WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Usual Enthusiastic Greeting for the Great Violinist in Viotti Concerto

PROGRAM

Symphony No. 2 ..... d'Indy
Concerto No. 22 ..... Viotti
"Les Preludes" ..... Liszt

Fritz Kreisler was the outstanding feature of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy last night. His performance of Viotti's A minor concerto, No. 22, was a miracle of tone, technique, temperament and all else that goes to the making of great violin music. It made the d'Indy Symphony No. 2 that preceded seem a stilted and mannered mechanism, and soon the Liszt music that followed seemed the mere bombast of "pomp and circumstance" by comparison.

Not that the Viotti concerto in itself is a wonderful composition. In other hands it might seem old and dry and threadbare; but Kreisler put the breath of life into it. The bland, warm tone was balm to the ear after d'Indy's resoundnig dissonances and meanderings, Viotti's old-fashioned formality, embroidered like a paper-lace valentine, was the more endearing by contrast. The cadenzas (of Kreisler's making) were of exceeding loveliness. The slow movement—with all strings, and the solo instrument muted—was all of it pure song, with its birdlike twitterings and burblings, and the gallivanting jollity of the last was an invitation to the dance.

As on earlier occasions this season, the master violinist was long applauded when he entered, and recalled many times after he ended.

The d'Indy symphony was very hard to play and rather hard to hear, and it was questionably worth while to performers or listeners. The applause was of polite recognition, not of conviction. The real enthusiasm was waiting for Kreisler. The audience reverently bent their brows to d'Indy's meandering muse, his made effects, his mathematical science and his frequent lyric outbursts diffused into eloquent aimlessness. The second movement was always on the verge of communicating some important message from the spirit world, but what issued was more technical than soulful. The viola was loquacious at the start of theethird movement; a broad choral effect at the close of the entire work was the most cohesive and impressive portion.

Pierri Monteaux achieved his happiest results in the rousing sonorities and stirring climax of the brasses in Liszt's "Les Preludes." The accompaniment for Mr. Kreisler was expertly handled.

STAR
ess: Baltimore, Md.
JAN 31 1920

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The last but one of the Boston Symphony concerts of the season to be given at the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, February 4, will be an occasion memorable in two respects: First, in the reappearance of Fritz Kreisler as soloist with the orchestra, playing Viotti's delightful Concerto in A minor, and, second, in the revival by Pierre Monteux (who has just been made permanent conductor of the orchestra) of Vincent d'Indy's large-voiced and eloquent Second Symphony in B flat. The power of the music and the brilliance of its performance under the baton of the composer's compatriot made a marked impression upon the audiences at the Boston concerts last week. The final number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Russian Easter," built upon Russian Church themes.

From
Bulletin
Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony

Fourth Concert of Season With Fritz Kreisler as Soloist

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra returned for its fourth concert of the season, at the Academy of Music last evening, and had the assistance of Fritz Kreisler, as soloist, the audience being, as was to be expected with so potent a double attraction as that which combined the famous band of musicians with one of the most distinguished of violinists, of "capacity" proportions.

The program, while consisting of only three numbers, was out of the beaten track, with the Symphony in B-flat major, No. 2, Op. 57, of Vincent d'Indy as something of an orchestral novelty, and Kreisler playing a concerto by Viotti instead of one of the violin compositions so often heard. At the end, with a sort of spectacular flourish that gave a colorful wind-up to the occasion, came "Les Preludes" of Liszt, a familiar composition, to be sure, but not always played with such fine and stirring effect.

The d'Indy symphony is a work of big scope, somewhat imbued with the modern spirit and conceived and executed with the skill of a master. It cannot be said that it possesses great charm for the casual listener, however, as it has not the direct appeal that characterizes the greatest works of its class. But there are some beautifully melodious moments, notably a fine choral passage at the end, and as played by the Boston musicians, under Pierre Monteux's wholly comprehensive and sympathetic guidance, it could scarcely fail to make an impression.

It was to Kreisler, however, that the audience—as large as the house could hold, with many persons turned away—looked for its real treat of the evening. At any rate, it was he who gave it. When he appeared, the applause, if not so prolonged as that which greeted him when he was heard here recently with both the New York and Philadelphia symphony orchestras, was spontaneous and cordial, and his playing of the Viotti concerto was such as to bring him a real ovation at its close.

The composition is not one of the greatest for violin. It is rather old-fashioned and lacking in vitality—at least it would do so, played by an ordinary musician. But Kreisler seems able to imbue any work with the spark of genius and to set it aflame, and this old work of Viotti after all proved electrifying as it flowed from his bow. The simplicity of the piece is its greatest charm, and it was poetry indeed as unfolded by Kreisler, who gave to it also, particularly in the last movement, a musical significance that lifted it above its own level merely as a composition.

Inquirer
Philadelphia, Pa.

SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Viotti's delightful Concerto in A minor, which has long been a special favorite with Fritz Kreisler's audiences, will be the music of the evening when the master violinist plays as soloist at the Boston Symphony Concert to be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. Pierre Monteux, who has just been re-engaged as permanent conductor of the orchestra, will make this concert an event of twofold interest by reviving d'Indy's master work, the Second Symphony in B flat.

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

THE CRITIC TALKS TO MUSIC LOVERS

Weekly Comment on Things Musical in Discrminaitng Philadelphia

THE writer of this column wishes to acknowledge hereby the receipt of a large number of letters calling attention to a slip, which occurred in the notice of the Boston Symphony concert in last Tuesday afternoon's paper. The protesting readers are every one of them right. The Vincent d'Indy symphony was played here for the first time in the United States by the Philadelphia Orchestra, and not by the Boston Symphony, as stated in the article. If an apology can make any amends for an erroneous statement which was made from memory and not looked up, as it should have been, said apology is hereby made.

Kreisler has shown to us in Philadelphia is his orchestration of the Viotti A minor concerto in which he shows ability as an orchestrator almost equal to his work as a violinist. By this use of the orchestra and some modernization of the harmonies in certain important places, Mr. Kreisler has put this composition in the front rank of violin concertos, whereas it had been for years relegated to the classroom. And he has done it as he has done all the others, without sacrificing the musical ideas of the original composer. The soul of the work is still Viotti's; only the dress is new.

But there is one musician, and, strange to say, his chief claim to fame lies at least thus far, along interpretative and not creative lines, who has made a number of transcriptions, every one of which is a distinct artistic gain for the original composition. This is Fritz Kreisler, whose transcriptions have vivified and modernized many works of the older Italian violin composers, and have given them a beauty which surely they never possessed in their original form.

The latest piece of work which Mr

From
Bulletin
Philadelphia, Pa.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth concert of the season at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, playing Vincent d'Indy's Symphony in B-flat major, No. 2, Op. 57, as the first number, and Liszt's "Les Preludes" at the end of the program. In between, Fritz Kreisler will be heard as soloist, in Concerto in A minor, No. 22, for violin and orchestra, by Viotti.

From
Sun
Baltimore, Md.

Kreisler Here On Wednesday

VIOTTI'S delightful concerto in A minor, which has been a favorite with Fritz Kreisler's audiences, will be the music when the violinist plays as soloist at the Boston Symphony Concert to be given in the Lyric Theatre next Wednesday.

Pierre Monteux, who has just been engaged as the permanent conductor of the orchestra, will make this concert further memorable by reviving Vincent d'Indy's master work, the Second Symphony in B flat. The closing number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture "The Russian Easter," built upon themes of the Russian Church.

From North American
Philadelphia, Pa

Opera and Concert

Viotti's Concerto in A Minor, which has long been a special favorite with Fritz Kreisler's audiences, will be the music of the evening when the master violinist plays as soloist at the Boston Symphony concert in the Academy tomorrow evening. Pierre Monteux, who has just been re-engaged as permanent conductor of the orchestra, will revive what is considered by many as Vincent d'Indy's master work, the Second Symphony in B Flat. The closing number will be Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Preludes."

From North American
Philadelphia, Pa.

KREISLER MAGNET OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Plays Viotti Concerto Virtually Rewritten by Himself

Fritz Kreisler was the magnet which drew the largest audience of the Boston Symphony's season, thus far, at its fourth concert in the Academy last night. Kreisler played like a god and Monteux excelled himself in his conducting of the two orchestral numbers. Vincent D'Indy's Second Symphony was played first. According to the program notes, this work has not been heard in Philadelphia since 1904. It is puzzling to understand why this is the case, for the work is indubitably one of the highest points of French symphonic music. Of course, the fact that D'Indy does ont hang out his emotional wash before the public detracts to a certain extent from the work's popular appeal, and only after repeated hearings are fully revealed the beauties of this solid three-quarters of an hour of compact, complex score.

Monteux led his men thru the intricacies of the music with enthusiasm. The performance reached its climax in the impressive and dramatic finale. As usual, the solo work of these players was of superlative quality, except in the third movement, when the French horn curdled a bit. It is almost a pity to mention that lapse, because all thru the evening Mr. Wendler, the first horn player, gave a superb performance of exceedingly difficult music.

After scaling the rugged peaks of Beethoven and Brahms at previous appearances, Kreisler led the audience across the verdant slopes of classicism in the Viotti Violin Concerto, number 22. One of the things to be grateful for these days is this artist's understanding of, and sympathy with, classics ill-used by pitiless time. With the intellect of a scholar and the understanding of genius, he gathers up discarded works containing the kernel of inspiration and reverently refurbishes them into glowing vitality.

Kreisler has virtually rewritten this particular concerto, but left its pure spirit intact. How great is his accomplishment was more apparent last evening with full orchestral background than when he played the work at his recital last fall with only a piano accompaniment. The cadenza was of Kreisler's invention solely, and it maintained the unity of the work perfectly.

Of Kreisler's performance nothing is left to be said at this late date. The poetry and exquisite feeling put into the adagio transcend the vocabulary of journalistic criticism. Only Shakespeare in his tender moments could evoke the spirit of the thing in words.

Apparently nothing less than blistered palms ended the applause of the excited audience.

Liszt's time-defying symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," played with thrilling effect, ended the concert and aroused the audience to further torrents of applause.

STAR
: Baltimore, Md.

PRESENTS PERFECT PROGRAM AT LYRIC

Boston Symphony Production Also Superb; Kreisler Is Especially Good.

Presenting a perfectly arranged program, magnificently produced, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, gave the fourth concert of its Baltimore season's series in the Lyric Theater last night. Fritz Kreisler, violinist and composer, was special soloist. Approximately the audience filled about three-quarters of the theater. Beginning of the concert was deferred more than 15 minutes to meet the emergency of a slowly assembling audience caused by the severe progressing sleet storm. Obviously determined, unusually prolonged applause from both audience and orchestra, generally, was accorded Mr. Kreisler, both upon his appearance upon the stage and after the completion of his part of the program.

D'Indy's second symphony, Opus 57, in B flat major; Viotti's concerto in A minor, No. 22, for solo violin and orchestra, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "La Grande Paque Russe" ("The Russian Easter"), an "Overture on Themes of the Russian Church," Opus 36, constituted the ample program.

Playing of the orchestra was truly superb, and its tonal finish was a combination of richness with brilliance infrequent with any orchestra. As the program was other than an exhibition of extinct volcanoes (not even barring the Viotti concerto), it had live interest. Mr. Kreisler appeared to better advantage than for many years.

J. N. H.

iladelphia, Pa.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Fritz Kreisler's Appearance the Feature of Its Last Night's Concer

It may not be as complimentary to the Boston Symphony Orchestra as one could wish, but if this is to be a truthful chronicle, record must be made of the fact that the appearance of Mr. Fritz Kreisler as the assisting artist of the occasion was the most notable and popular feature of the concert given by the organization which Mr. Pierre Monteux conducted with so much skill and zeal at the Academy of Music last evening. It was because of the appearance of Kreisler's name upon the programme that every part of the auditorium was crowded to its capacity and when the artist, who must unquestionably be recognized as the greatest living violinist, stepped upon the stage, the esteem and admiration in which he is held by the concert-going public was attested by the heartiness of his welcome.

The great house burst at once into a roar of applause and for several moments he was kept bowing in acknowledgements of a wonderful reception in which the musicians on the stage as earnestly as the spectators joined. One could have wished after such a beginning that something better was coming than the Viotti concerto, which although it contains some ingratiating passages and notably an extremely melodious slow movement, is essentially a meretricious piec of work written rather to show of the technical skill of the performer than to express any thoughts of the composer's that were bursting for utterance; but Kreisler can't be playing Brahms or Beethoven all the time and the Viotti music at least enabled him to display his lovely tone and his marvelous technique. It need hardly be said that its conclusion was the signal for another tremendous ovation, and the audience would have gladly heard more had it been permissible.

Of the purely orchestral numbers the most important was the second symphony in B flat of Vincent D'Indy, which is known to amateurs not only as that composer's masterpiece, but as one of the finest symphonic creations of late years. There are those to whom it does not appeal so much as some other of the same composer's works on account of the prevailing sombreness of its tone, but that is one of those matters of taste, which are beyond the range of discussion. It is a noble thing, lofty in its sentiment, transcendent in its range, and one of whose least merits is the consumate science which its complicated and elaborate score exemplifies. It was admirably rendered, with power and breadth and vitality and an intelligently sensitive appreciation of its significance.

RECORD
ess Philadelphia, Pa.

FEB 2 1920 E

KREISLER ACCLAIMED

Superb Playing of Little Known Concerto by Viotti.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music last night with Fritz Kriesler as an attraction additional to the orchestra played to an enthusiastic and house-filling audience. The program offered was interesting as far as the symphony was concerned, if the sort of thing Vincent d'Indy writes is enjoyed. It is entirely probable that the majority of persons gave up all hope of the interminable B flat major symphony having an end, and yet the scholarly handling of the themes, the unobtrusive and often unusual orchestration and the admirable way in which the orchestra did the tedious work were all points of interest and after a fashion furnished entertainment.

The entrance of Kreisler was to great applause that was augmented at the conclusion of his remarkable performance of the Viotti concerto No. 22 in A minor. It was a wonderful piece of playing, the simplicity of the themes and the rhythmic beauty of the work, particularly of the last movement, being admirably suited to the player's style. The program concluded with the symphonic poem "Les Preludes" of Liszt.

ESTABLISHED 1881

FEB 3 1920

From Morning Telegraph
New Y[illegible]

Music in Washington, D. C.

The Boston Symphony, Pierre Monteux, conductor, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson Greene, was heard in its fourth concert of the season, with Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as soloist. Pierre Monteux gave a most artistic performance of the Schubert "Unfinished" Symphony. Mischa Elman thrilled a large audience on February 6, offering a varied program which gave ample opportunity for a display of brilliancy, masterly technic and tone coloring.

RECORD
ss Philadelphia, Pa.

FEB 1 1920 E

—Viotti's delightful concerto in A minor, which has long been a special favorite with Fritz Kreisler's audiences, will be the music of the evening when that violinist plays as soloist at the Boston Symphony concert to be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow. Pierre Monteux, who has just been re-engaged as permanent conductor of the orchestra, will make this concert an event of twofold interest by reviving d'Indy's master work, the second symphony in B flat. The closing offering will be Liszt's "The Preludes."

From
Brooklyn Life
New York City

The Fourth Boston Symphony Evening.

Monteux paid this country a compliment when he included in the program of the fourth Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Academy of Music, last week Friday evening, the new Symphony in C minor by Frederick S. Converse. The only symphony of this gifted American composer, it is expressive of "the experiences of the young men and young women of our land during the trials of the war.' If it does not give such expression with absolute clarity, it at least will appear to many that as a wartime picture it is better than d'Indy's "De Bello Gallico." There is a fine, slow movement, which was very much liked at the Metropolitan, and there is impressiveness in the last one—suggestive of both the struggle of war and the joy over victory. This symphony was finely played, as was also the very effective "Russian Easter" of Rimsky-Korsakoff. But the evening's greatest enthusiasm was for the soloist, Fritz Kreisler, who gave a wonderful performance of the Beethoven concerto, holding the audience fairly spellbound. His playing alone made the evening really memorable.

TOWN TOPICS
ess New York City

Boston sent us its orchestra, but New York no longer turns its eyes skyward when the players from the Hub treat us to symphonic delights. Our own Philharmonic has changed all that. The Bostonians were rather dry and academic in a D'Indy work and even in some "Tristan and Isolde" music—which is decidedly a "wet" core. London, 1881; New York 1884

From
~~Evening~~ Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

FEB 3

KREISLER PLAYS WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Usual Enthusiastic Greeting for the Great Violinist in Viotti Concerto

PROGRAM

Symphony No. 2.....d'Indy
Concerto No. 22.....Viotti
"Les Preludes".....Liszt

Fritz Kreisler was the outstanding feature of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy last night. His performance of Viotti's A minor concerto, No. 22, was a miracle of tone, technique, temperament and all else that goes to the making of great violin music. It made the d'Indy Symphony No. 2 that preceded seem a stilted and mannered mechanism, and soon the Liszt music that followed seemed the mere bombast of "pomp and circumstance" by comparison.

Not that the Viotti concerto in itself is a wonderful composition. In other hands it might seem old and dry and threadbare; but Kreisler put the breath of life into it. The bland, warm tone was balm to the ear after d'Indy's resoundnig dissonances and meanderings, Viotti's old-fashioned formality, embroidered like a paper-lace valentine, was the more endearing by contrast. The cadenzas (of Kreisler's making) were of exceeding loveliness. The slow movement—with all strings, and the solo instrument muted—was all of it pure song, with its birdlike twitterings and burblings, and the gallivanting jollity of the last was an invitation to the dance.

As on earlier occasions this season, the master violinist was long applauded when he entered, and recalled many times after he ended.

The d'Indy symphony was very hard to play and rather hard to hear, and it was questionably worth while to performers or listeners. The applause was of polite recognition, not of conviction. The real enthusiasm was waiting for Kreisler. The audience reverently bent their brows to d'Indy's meandering muse, his made effects, his mathematical science and his frequent lyric outbursts diffused into eloquent aimlessness. The second movement was always on the verge of communicating some important message from the spirit world, but what issued was more technical than soulful. The viola was loquacious at the start of theethird movement; a broad choral effect at the close of the entire work was the most cohesive and impressive portion.

Pierri Monteaux achieved his happiest results in the rousing sonorities and stirring climax of the brasses in Liszt's "Les Preludes." The accompaniment for Mr. Kreisler was expertly handled.

STAR
ess: Baltimore, Md.

JAN 31 1920

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The last but one of the Boston Symphony concerts of the season to be given at the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, February 4, will be an occasion memorable in two respects: First, in the reappearance of Fritz Kreisler as soloist with the orchestra, playing Viotti's delightful Concerto in A minor, and, second, in the revival by Pierre Monteux (who has just been made permanent conductor of the orchestra) of Vincent d'Indy's large-voiced and eloquent Second Symphony in B flat. The power of the music and the brilliance of its performance under the baton of the composer's compatriot made a marked impression upon the audiences at the Boston concerts last week. The final number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Russian Easter," built upon Russian Church themes.

From
Bulletin
Philadelphia, Pa.

FEB 3 - 1920 E

Boston Symphony

Fourth Concert of Season With Fritz Kreisler as Soloist

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra returned for its fourth concert of the season, at the Academy of Music last evening, and had the assistance of Fritz Kreisler, as soloist, the audience being, as was to be expected with so potent a double attraction as that which combined the famous band of musicians with one of the most distinguished of violinists, of "capacity" proportions.

The program, while consisting of only three numbers, was out of the beaten track, with the Symphony in B-flat major, No. 2, Op. 57, of Vincent d'Indy as something of an orchestral novelty, and Kreisler playing a concerto by Viotti instead of one of the violin compositions so often heard. At the end, with a sort of spectacular flourish that gave a colorful wind-up to the occasion, came "Les Preludes" of Liszt, a familiar composition, to be sure, but not always played with such fine and stirring effect.

The d'Indy symphony is a work of big scope, somewhat imbued with the modern spirit and conceived and executed with the skill of a master. It cannot be said that it possesses great charm for the casual listener, however, as it has not the direct appeal that characterizes the greatest works of its class. But there are some beautifully melodious moments, notably a fine choral passage at the end, and as played by the Boston musicians, under Pierre Monteux's wholly comprehensive and sympathetic guidance, it could scarcely fail to make an impression.

It was to Kreisler, however, that the audience—as large as the house could hold, with many persons turned away—looked for its real treat of the evening. At any rate, it was he who gave it. When he appeared, the applause, if not so prolonged as that which greeted him when he was heard here recently with both the New York and Philadelphia symphony orchestras, was spontaneous and cordial, and his playing of the Viotti concerto was such as to bring him a real ovation at its close.

The composition is not one of the greatest for violin. It is rather old-fashioned and lacking in vitality—at least it would do so, played by an ordinary musician. But Kreisler seems able to imbue any work with the spark of genius and to set it aflame, and this old work of Viotti after all proved electrifying as it flowed from his bow. The simplicity of the piece is its greatest charm, and it was poetry indeed as unfolded by Kreisler, who gave to it also, particularly in the last movement, a musical significance that lifted it above its own level merely as a composition.

nquirer
Philadelphia, Pa.

SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Viotti's delightful Concerto in A minor, which has long been a special favorite with Fritz Kreisler's audiences, will be the music of the evening when the master violinist plays as soloist at the Boston Symphony Concert to be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. Pierre Monteux, who has just been re-engaged as permanent conductor of the orchestra, will make this concert an event of twofold interest by reviving d'Indy's master work, the Second Symphony in B flat.

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

THE CRITIC TALKS TO MUSIC LOVERS

Weekly Comment on Things Musical in Discrminaitng Philadelphia

THE writer of this column wishes to acknowledge hereby the receipt of a large number of letters calling attention to a slip, which occurred in the notice of the Boston Symphony concert in last Tuesday afternoon's paper. The protesting readers are every one of them right. The Vincent d'Indy symphony was played here for the first time in the United States by the Philadelphia Orchestra, and not by the Boston Symphony, as stated in the article. If an apology can make any amends for an erroneous statement which was made from memory and not looked up, as it should have been, said apology is hereby made.

Kreisler has shown to us in Philadelphia is his orchestration of the Viotti A minor concerto in which he shows ability as an orchestrator almost equal to his work as a violinist. By this use of the orchestra and some modernization of the harmonies in certain important places, Mr. Kreisler has put this composition in the front rank of violin concertos, whereas it had been for years relegated to the classroom. And he has done it as he has done all the others, without sacrificing the musical ideas of the original composer. The soul of the work is still Viotti's; only the dress is new.

But there is one musician, and, strange to say, his chief claim to fame lies at least thus far, along interpretative and not creative lines, who has made a number of transcriptions, every one of which is a distinct artistic gain for the original composition. This is Fritz Kreisler, whose transcriptions have vivified and modernized many works of the older Italian violin composers, and have given them a beauty which surely they never possessed in their original form.

The latest piece of work which Mr.

From
Bulletin
Philadelphia, Pa.

ton Symphony Orchestra will I su urth concert of the season at my of Music next Monday aying Vincent d'Indy's Symflat major, No. 2, Op. 57, as mber, and Liszt's "Les Pre-he end of the program. In its Kreisler will be heard as
BY oncerto in A minor, No. 22, uly orchestra, by Viotti.
Mas

From
Sun
Baltimore, Md.

Kreisler Here On Wednesday

VIOTTI'S delightful concerto in A minor, which has been a favorite with Fritz Kreisler's audiences, will be the music when the violinist plays as soloist at the Boston Symphony Concert to be given in the Lyric Theatre next Wednesday.

Pierre Monteux, who has just been engaged as the permanent conductor of the orchestra, will make this concert further memorable by reviving Vincent d'Indy's master work, the Second Symphony in B flat. The closing number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Russian Easter," built upon themes of the Russian Church.

m North American
Philadelphia, Pa

Opera and Concert

Viotti's Concerto in A Minor, which has long been a special favorite with Fritz Kreisler's audiences, will be the music of the evening when the master violinist plays as soloist at the Boston Symphony concert in the Academy tomorrow evening. Pierre Monteux, who has just been re-engaged as permanent conductor of the orchestra, will revive what is considered by many as Vincent d'Indy's master work, the Second Symphony in B Flat. The closing number will be Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Preludes."

SYMPHONY GIVES 14TH CONCERT

Introduces Pianist Schmitz, Who Plays Carpenter's Concertino

Herald — Feb 14

ORCHESTRA'S MUSIC STIRS VIVID IMAGERY

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, gave its 14th concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schumann, symphony, E flat major, No. 3; Carpenter, concertino for piano and orchestra (first time in Boston); Goldmark, overture to "Sakuntala." Mr. E. Robert Schmitz, the pianist, played for the first time in this city.

This was an unusually interesting concert. Although the symphony and the overture have been heard here many times, the nature of the performance gave new life to the former, while Goldmark's overture, now over a half-century old, is as fresh and modern as if it were dated 1919.

To us the symphony known as the "Rhenish" is not so romantically beautiful and dramatic as the one in D minor, not so essentially peculiar to Schumann, yet in the "Rhenish" there is the third movement, which reminds one of Schumann, the composer of the piano pieces, the songs, and pages of the piano concerto; and there is the sturdy, vigorous first movement. Perhaps Mr. Apthorp was right in finding the scherzo's chief theme a version of a Rhine wine song of which the tune and the words are well suited to the "ponderous joviality" of the drinkers; but neither the scherzo nor the so-called "cathedral" movement, nor the finale are of the greater Schumann, who, when fully inspired and most poetic, was a dreamer of miniature works for the piano and of music that is worthy of Heine's verses; that is, with the exception already noted, the D minor symphony; in this he is most appealing when he is least symphonic.

There has been a mass of so-called oriental music written since Goldmark's overture was first performed, but the majority of the composers give one the impression of writing in an idiom not natural to them; as if they had said: "Come now, see how Oriental I can be!" As French writers after Galland introduced "The Thousand Nights and a Night," wrote countless Arabian and Persian tales which are dull reading, Felicien David and Rimsky-Korsakoff wrote music as if they were of the East. There is the suggestion of the Orient in Rubinstein's "Feramors" ballet music, and in some of his songs. But Goldmark in this overture and in his opera, "The Queen of Sheba," caught and held the spirit of the East, the sensuousness, the gorgeousness, and in the Prelude to "The Queen of Sheba," he revealed to us the mystery and the monotony of the Desert as well as the splendor of Balkis, from whom Menelik of Abyssinia, boasted descent by reason of her visit to King Solomon. In the "Sakuntala" overture there is the thought of tropic heat, lush vegetation about calm pools and bubbling springs, swooning sensuousness, the barbaric chase. The overture was superbly played. No wonder that for once there was no mad rush for the doors during the closing measures. No wonder that appreciation was shown in enthusiastic, prolonged applause.

It was the original plan to have both Cesar Franck's "Djinns" and Mr. Carpenter's Concertino on the program to introduce Mr. Schmitz, the pianist. It was found that thus the concert would be too long. Mr. Schmitz, a pianist of the first rank, is a modest man as he is a most accomplished musician and virtuoso. The Concertino is not a work that an arrogant pianist, eager for applause, would choose, for the piano is used by Mr. Carpenter as an orchestral instrument. Nevertheless, there was opportunity for Mr. Schmitz to display a singularly beautiful and liquid touch, a strength that is in contrast with his delicate, sensitive appearance, compelling brilliance and exquisite phrasing.

The Concertino itself is a highly fantastical composition, abounding in surprises that come chiefly from unusual employment and combinations of instruments; with melodic ideas that are now charming and now exciting; with exotic coloring; with dance tunes that narrowly escape being commonplace, but are saved by rythmic piquancy and unexpected orchestration. The work as a whole is episodic, but not the less entertaining for that. Mr. Carpenter's devotion to pulsatile instruments is well known here. Never shall we forget the curved bodies of the busy, energetic xylophone players in the "Adventures of a Perambulator." In the Concertino there is, Mirabile Dictu! no xylophone, but drums, cymbals, tambourine, castanets, Glockenspiel. In his next orchestral work Mr. Carpenter should experiment with the marimba, and other African instruments so dear to our Percy Grainger.

The composer, Mr. Schmitz, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra—the performance was a dazzling one—were loudly applauded. Mr. Carpenter's ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta," will be performed here by the Chicago Opera Association with "The Elixir of Love" on Saturday, March 6.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: [illegible] Symphony in G minor; Lalo, Symphony for violin (Mr. Fradkin); H. F. Gilbert, "The Dance in the Congo"; Symphonic poem [illegible] of baleit based [illegible] performed here by [illegible]

CARPENTER'S MUSIC ON SYMPHONY LIST

New Concertino Given With Mr Schmitz at the Piano

Schumann and Goldmark Also Figure in the Program

Globe — Feb 14

E. Robert Schmidt, the Parisian pianist of Alsatian lineage, now resident in New York, made his first appearance in Boston yesterday afternoon as soloist at the Symphony concert. He played the piano part in John Alden Carpenter's new concertino and shared the applause with the composer. Mr Schmitz is at present giving a course of lecture recitals in New York, with the purpose of comparing modern music with both classical and romantic music. He might make use of Carpenter's concertino in such a comparison of the work of the 18th, 19th and 20th centuries. It has the restless rhythm, the piquant harmonies and the enlarged and subdivided orchestra which are characteristic of the music of the last 20 years. It lacks the graceful artifices of Mozart and the luscious melodies of Schumann.

This concertino, however, is based upon American popular music to a considerable extent. The first movement gets its syncopated rhythms from ragtime, but subtilises and interweaves them. The slow movement derives melodically from negro folk music. There are scattered through the whole work reminders of old-fashioned waltz tunes, of the "Blues," and, in short, of the whole range of American popular music.

If we are ever to have an American school of serious music it must thus bridge the gap which has separated "high-brow" and "popular" compositions here. All really great compositions in the past have had distinctly traceable, if often apparently remote, connections with the popular music of their country.

Even the austere masses of Palestrina are the culmination of a tendency which started from medieval street songs. Mr Carpenter is not trying to be austere, but he may be initiating a tradition that will lead to future works in the "grand manner." Meanwhile we can be thankful for a very agreeable and original composition in lighter vein. Mr Schmitz plays with remarkable technical skill and with feeling for the spirit of the music. He will be heard again with pleasure.

The Schumann "Rhenish" Symphony was given an unusually fine performance. Mr Monteux excels his predecessors with Schumann, largely because he makes the symphonies take on a lyric grace, despite their turgid ochestration.

Goldmark's "Sakuntala" is one of the few major works achieved by a comparatively minor composer. Despite some banal harmonies, it wears better than much of Beethoven and Wagner, though it is of course far below their best work. It, too, was eloquently played and gladly listened to.

Post — Feb 14

RISTIAN SCIENCE MON

MUSIC

The Music of Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert of February 13 played for the first time in Boston, John Alden Carpenter's concertino for pianoforte and orchestra. Nobody hearing this music need despair of American composition. It has been pointed out before in these columns that Mr. Carpenter stands indisputably in the first rank of American writers of music, and a hearing of this latest composition only strengthens this opinion. In addition to knowing how to say what he wants, a faculty shared with many another, he has something to say, which distinguishes him from many. The concertino is not a big work, the large orchestra is employed for the sake of color rather than volume, and the piano is treated as one of the orchestral instruments. Thus it differs from a concerto. The ideas set forth are clever and at times brilliant. In handling his instruments Mr. Carpenter seeks for oddity of expression sometimes, but never exceeds the bounds of good taste or descends to the bizarre. He quite apparently thinks in terms of orchestral color, and this color depends largely on the percussion instruments. The composition is distinctly American, for it portrays the restless, lively, progressive and joyous traits supposed to be the resultant of the many factors of the country's life. The audience took most kindly to Mr. Carpenter's work and gave the composer many recalls. The piano part was played by E. Robert Schmitz, a Frenchman now living in New York, who thoroughly effaced himself and kept an eye always on the conductor. His tone is of great beauty and his playing indicated the true artist. For the rest of the program Mr. Monteux led his men through Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony and Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture.

Feb 14

NEW PIANO CONCERTO FANTASTIC

Carpenter's Work by the Symphony—Schmitz Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

A novel and very interesting feature of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was the first performance in this city of John Alden Carpenter's "Concertino for piano and orchestra," with E. Robert Schmitz, the French pianist, who then made his Boston debut as soloist with the orchestra.

The audience gave this music an extremely enthusiastic reception and the composer, with conductor and pianist, bowed from the stage.

FANTASTIC AND WHIMSICAL

This "Concerto" has no explanation or programme, but is evidently a very personal expression with the composer. It might be called, instead of a small concerto, a much magnified Humoresque for piano and orchestra. The music is fantastic, humorous, whimsical, full of temperament and very poetic in the mood of the second movement, and in other episodes. One would say that Mr. Carpenter had thought without making talk about it, of treating in his own way themes of Negro origin or derivation. But there are no themes taken bodily from Negro sources, though the mystical song of the second movement is strongly in the manner of a Negro spiritual.

It is a strange work. The most impressive melodic material is the song in the slow movement, introduced with a dark chord as prelude, and having a mood singularly meditative and melancholy. Then there is the very effective cadence at the end of the phrase—a simple, major cadence of a haunting simplicity and eloquence. The first movement is in the manner of a scherzo, although entirely unconventional in effect, and probably also in form, its structure not being easy to grasp at a first hearing because of the constant rythmical surprises, the flashing orchestration and the novel treatment the composer gave his ideas. But the humor, vigor and flexibility, if the word may be used, of mood is a keynote to much of the composition.

Audacious and Electrifying

It was refreshing, and more, it was very exhilarating, to listen to an American who has absorbed Mr. Carpenter's amazing knowledge of musical technic without becoming pedantic, without taking himself too seriously. The nervous, electrical character of the opening movement and finale, the audacity, the flash of the instrumentation, the freedom and sureness of the writing and the manner in which formalism is thrown to the winds make this score, to our mind, one of the most interesting and individual Mr. Carpenter has produced. One would rather wait for better acquaintance with the music before weighing the inherent worth of its thematic material, but the handling of this material is electrifying.

The last movement of the "concertino," a title the composer must have bestowed with a tongue in his cheek, is fully as capricious, and more fantastical, headlong in its energy, its abrupt explosions of force and wild, whirling rhythms than the first part. All of the music, as we have said, is very evidently in accordance with certain things imagined by the composer, who has given us no explanation of his imaginings. As a result there is no logical musical explanation of such a wanton silliness as the tinkling waltz tune which appears in this last movement—the one episode which seems hard to accept, whether intended as humorous, sardonic or anything else. The effect yesterday was that of a rather flat joke. But the composition as a whole is gripping in its virtuosity, its swiftness and certainty of workmanship, its spontaneity of manner.

Mr. Schmitz's Virtuosity

As much more could be written of t performance, which was one of breat taking mastery, Mr. Schmitz prov himself a super-pianist in mastering a and all difficulties, in showing his co plete orchestral understanding of t music, in expressing himself on t piano with a virtuosity as unbridled a yet under control as certain as virtuosity of the composer.

Nor must the extremely difficult t of Mr. Monteux be forgotten. Indeed is hard to think what would have be come of that composition, without the conductor, without the pianist, without such an orchestra. And one complete rehearsal had done the business.

AY, FEBRUARY 14,

Schumann's Rhenish Symphony

Mr. Monteux's conception of Schumann's Rhenish Symphony was extremely sympathetic to the thought of the composer, save that the orchestra used yesterday is too big for this intimate and romantic music. Double wind and brass do not go with Schumann, even the Schumann of lusty, pulsing youth of the first movement of the Rhenish Symphony. The symphony is of unequal value. The movements which tell today are the first; the second—the "Landler," and the fourth the cathedral scene. The slow movement, misleadingly given in one place the Italian designation of "Allegro non troppo," which is not the equivalent of the German "Nicht schnell," given in the programme notes, is tame and sugar-sweet today, and the finale conventional. This is the weakest of the Schumann symphonies, though interesting.

But the Goldmark overture, "Sakuntala," is a bewitching fairy tale in music. It was given all of its gorgeous coloring, its oriental languor, its triumphal the apotheosis of faithful love, by Mr. Monteux.

Adv. Feb 15

American Work in Symphony Concert

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

Schumann. Third Symphony, E flat.
Carpenter. Concertino. Piano and orchestra. Soloist, E. Robert Schmitz.
Goldmark. "Sakuntala" overture.

IF we are to have Schumann's Rhenish Symphony on our programs we might as well let down the bars to all German music, for there is no symphonic work so thoroughly Teutonic as this outcome of Schumann's dwelling in the beautiful Rhineland. It is a graphic picture of phases of the Rhine folk-life, and one cannot but rejoice with these last rays of sunlight which shone upon the life that was so soon to go down in darkness and mental alienation.

If we do not find that M. Monteux interpreted everything that lay in this symphony we hasten to add that we do not believe that any one but a Rhinelander could portray all the "Innigkeit" and "Gemuethlichkeit" that is in this composition. The first movement is the exultant Schumann, and no one could be more triumphant than he upon occasion. A little less of tumult and more of breadth could have been exhibited here. The second movmnt might hav been a brsong (and of dcidedly more than one-half-of-one-per-cent.) such simple jollity does it exhibit. The fourth movement (an extra one added to the regular symphonic four) was very well read. Here we get the pomp and majesty of a religious service in Cologn cathedral, and although Schumann was not generally effective in orchestral scoring he does manage to get trombone effects that are masterly, giving the sembdance of great diapason pipes of the organ. He has done equilly well with trombones at the end of the Larghetto of his first symphony. M. Monteux also made much of the contrast between this and the finale, and in the last movement one could hear the gossiping, chattering crowd pouring out of the church and filling the square with the generality that once existed there, a geniality that Prusia never knew. We are heartily glad that M. Monteux senses the glory that is in Schumann, even if he is not to the manner born. The symphony is as German as "Liberty Cabbage!"

* * *

Then came Carpentier's new Concertino. We have become distrustful of modern composers when they use diminutives. Ravel gives us a Sonatina longer than some Beethoven sonatas, and Korngold writes a Sinfonietta for tremendous orchestra and at tremendous length. But here the composer keeps his promise. Although he writes for a very large orchestra, with contrabassoon, trombones and tuba, and with cymbals, bass drum, tambourine, castagnettes and all the blacksmith shop, yet the movements are in the simplest forms with some homogeneity obtained by bringing back the first theme as coda at the end.

There is much antiphonal work between the piano and the orchestra which is interestingly developed. The composer himself defines it as a conversation between the piano and orchestra. The gradual interwining of the two forces is done in a masterly manner. There is real geniality in the work, nothing crabbed, ascetic or strained, which is unusual in an American work in the classic forms. Some touches of orchestration are beautiful, notably the violoncello and other string passages of the second movement.

The work is pigment from beginning to end, and its finals work up to a fiery climax with piccio shrieks and much percussive work.

There is a great amount of chord and active work (wrist and forearm action) for the pianist, and Mr. Schmitz gave this with excellent effect. Altogether the work received and artistic reading from pianist conductor and orchestra. the bravonia of the finale being especially effective. We found the first movement the best written part of the concertine, but the entire composition was worthy of its enthusiastic reception. Mr. Schnietz, M. Monteux and Mr. Carpenter were all called forth and greatly applauded.

* * *

Goldmark's sensuous overture o "Sakuntala" ended the concert with much effect. Here M. Monteux and the orchestra shone forth at their best and there was a melodic and harmonic beauty that was all the more delightful from the fact that we so seldom get these qualities in the works of moderns. We cannot help longing for a few more Goldmarks in spite of the fact that this composer cannot be ranked with the uncomfortably great modern masters

URDAY, FEBRUARY 1

SYMPHONY GIVES 14TH CONCERT

Introduces Pianist Schmitz, Who Plays Carpenter's Concertino

Herald — Feb 14

ORCHESTRA'S MUSIC STIRS VIVID IMAGERY

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, gave its 14th concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schumann, symphony, E flat major, No. 3; Carpenter, concertino for piano and orchestra (first time in Boston); Goldmark, overture to "Sakuntala." Mr. E. Robert Schmitz, the pianist, played for the first time in this city.

This was an unusually interesting concert. Although the symphony and the overture have been heard here many times, the nature of the performance gave new life to the former, while Goldmark's overture, now over a half-century old, is as fresh and modern as if it were dated 1919.

To us the symphony known as the "Rhenish" is not so romantically beautiful and dramatic as the one in D minor, not so essentially peculiar to Schumann, yet in the "Rhenish" there is the third movement, which reminds one of Schumann, the composer of the piano pieces, the songs, and pages of the piano concerto; and there is the sturdy, vigorous first movement. Perhaps Mr. Apthorp was right in finding the scherzo's chief theme a version of a Rhine wine song of which the tune and the words are well suited to the "ponderous joviality" of the drinkers; but neither the scherzo nor the so-called "cathedral" movement, nor the finale are of the greater Schumann, who, when fully inspired and most poetic, was a dreamer of miniature works for the piano and of music that is worthy of Heine's verses; that is, with the exception already noted, the D minor symphony; in this he is most appealing when he is least symphonic.

There has been a mass of so-called oriental music written since Goldmark's overture was first performed, but the majority of the composers give one the impression of writing in an idiom not natural to them; as if they had said: "Come now, see how Oriental I can be!" As French writers after Galland introduced "The Thousand Nights and a Night," wrote countless Arabian and Persian tales which are dull reading. Felicien David and Rimsky-Korsakoff wrote music as if they were of the East. There is the suggestion of the Orient in Rubinstein's "Feramors" ballet music, and in some of his songs. But Goldmark in this overture and in his opera, "The Queen of Sheba," caught and held the spirit of the East, the sensuousness, the gorgeousness, and in the Prelude to "The Queen of Sheba," he revealed to us the mystery and the monotony of the Desert as well as the splendor of Balkis, from whom Menelik of Abyssinia, boasted descent by reason of her visit to King Solomon. In the "Sakuntala" overture there is the thought of tropic heat, lush vegetation about calm pools and bubbling springs, swooning sensuousness, the barbaric chase. The overture was superbly played. No wonder that for once there was no mad rush for the doors during the closing measures. No wonder that appreciation was shown in enthusiastic, prolonged applause.

It was the original plan to have both Cesar Franck's "Djinns" and Mr. Carpenter's Concertino on the program to introduce Mr. Schmitz, the pianist. It was found that thus the concert would be too long. Mr. Schmitz, a pianist of the first rank, is a modest man as he is a most accomplished musician and virtuoso. The Concertino is not a work that an arrogant pianist, eager for applause, would choose, for the piano is used by Mr. Carpenter as an orchestral instrument. Nevertheless, there was opportunity for Mr. Schmitz to display a singularly beautiful and liquid touch, a strength that is in contrast with his delicate, sensitive appearance, compelling brilliance and exquisite phrasing.

The Concertino itself is a highly fantastical composition, abounding in surprises that come chiefly from unusual employment and combinations of instruments; with melodic ideas that are now charming and now exciting; with exotic coloring; with dance tunes that narrowly escape being commonplace, but are saved by rythmic piquancy and unexpected orchestration. The work as a whole is episodic, but not the less entertaining for that. Mr. Carpenter's devotion to pulsatile instruments is well known here. Never shall we forget the curved bodies of the busy, energetic xylophone players in the "Adventures of a Perambulator." In the Concertino there is, Mirabile Dictu! no xylophone, but drums, cymbals, tambourine, castanets, Glockenspiel. In his next orchestral work Mr. Carpenter should experiment with the marimba, and other African instruments so dear to our Percy Grainger.

The composer, Mr. Schmitz, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra—the performance was a dazzling one—were loudly applauded. Mr. Carpenter's ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta," will be performed here by the Chicago Opera Association with "The Elixir of Love" on Saturday, March 6.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Mozart, Symphony in G minor; Lalo, Spanish Symphony for violin (Mr. Fradkin, violinist); H. F. Gilbert, "The Dance in Place Congo"; Symphonic poem (after George W. Cable) of ballet based [illegible] was performed here by the Opera Company.

CARPENTER'S MUSIC ON SYMPHONY LIST

New Concertino Given With Mr Schmitz at the Piano

Schumann and Goldmark Also Figure in the Program

Globe — Feb 14

E. Robert Schmidt, the Parisian pianist of Alsatian lineage, now resident in New York, made his first appearance in Boston yesterday afternoon as soloist at the Symphony concert. He played the piano part in John Alden Carpenter's new concertino and shared the applause with the composer. Mr Schmitz is at present giving a course of lecture recitals in New York, with the purpose of comparing modern music with both classical and romantic music. He might make use of Carpenter's concertino in such a comparison of the work of the 18th, 19th and 20th centuries. It has the restless rhythm, the piquant harmonies and the enlarged and subdivided orchestra which are characteristic of the music of the last 20 years. It lacks the graceful artifices of Mozart and the luscious melodies of Schumann.

This concertino, however, is based upon American popular music to a considerable extent. The first movement gets its syncopated rhythms from ragtime, but subtilises and interweaves them. The slow movement derives melodically from negro folk music. There are scattered through the whole work reminders of old-fashioned waltz tunes, of the "Blues," and, in short, of the whole range of American popular music.

If we are ever to have an American school of serious music it must thus bridge the gap which has separated "high-brow" and "popular" compositions here. All really great compositions in the past have had distinctly traceable, if often apparently remote, connections with the popular music of their country.

Even the austere masses of Palestrina are the culmination of a tendency which started from medieval street songs. Mr Carpenter is not trying to be austere, but he may be initiating a tradition that will lead to future works in the "grand manner." Meanwhile we can be thankful for a very agreeable and original composition in lighter vein. Mr Schmitz plays with remarkable technical skill and with feeling for the spirit of the music. He will be heard again with pleasure.

The Schumann "Rhenish" Symphony was given an unusually fine performance. Mr Monteux excels his predecessors with Schumann, largely because he makes the symphonies take on a lyric grace, despite their turgid ochestration.

Goldmark's "Sakuntala" is one of the few major works achieved by a comparatively minor composer. Despite some banal harmonies, it wears better than much of Beethoven and Wagner, though it is of course far below their best work. It, too, was eloquently played and gladly listened to.

Buck - Feb 14

RISTIAN SCIENCE MON

MUSIC

The Music of Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert of February 13 played for the first time in Boston, John Alden Carpenter's concertino for pianoforte and orchestra. Nobody hearing this music need despair of American composition. It has been pointed out before in these columns that Mr. Carpenter stands indisputably in the first rank of American writers of music, and a hearing of this latest composition only strengthens this opinion. In addition to knowing how to say what he wants, a faculty shared with many another, he has something to say, which distinguishes him from many. The concertino is not a big work, the large orchestra is employed for the sake of color rather than volume, and the piano is treated as one of the orchestral instruments. Thus it differs from a concerto. The ideas set forth are clever and at times brilliant. In handling his instruments Mr. Carpenter seeks for oddity of expression sometimes, but never exceeds the bounds of good taste or descends to the bizarre. He quite apparently thinks in terms of orchestral color, and this color depends largely on the percussion instruments. The composition is distinctly American, for it portrays the restless, lively, progressive and joyous traits supposed to be the resultant of the many factors of the country's life. The audience took most kindly to Mr. Carpenter's work and gave the composer many recalls. The piano part was played by E. Robert Schmitz, a Frenchman now living in New York, who thoroughly effaced himself and kept an eye always on the conductor. His tone is of great beauty and his playing indicated the true artist. For the rest of the program Mr. Monteux led his men through Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony and Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture.

TON POST, SATUR

Feb 14

NEW PIANO CONCERTO FANTASTIC

Carpenter's Work by the Symphony—Schmitz Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

A novel and very interesting feature of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was the first performance in this city of John Alden Carpenter's "Concertino for piano and orchestra," with E. Robert Schmitz, the French pianist, who then made his Boston debut as soloist with the orchestra.

The audience gave this music an extremely enthusiastic reception and the composer, with conductor and pianist, bowed from the stage.

FANTASTIC AND WHIMSICAL

This "Concerto" has no explanation or programme, but is evidently a very personal expression with the composer. It might be called, instead of a small concerto, a much magnified Humoresque for piano and orchestra. The music is fantastic, humorous, whimsical, full of temperament and very poetic in the mood of the second movement, and in other episodes. One would say that Mr. Carpenter had thought without making talk about it, of treating in his own way themes of Negro origin or derivation. But there are no themes taken bodily from Negro sources, though the mystical song of the second movement is strongly in the manner of a Negro spiritual.

It is a strange work. The most impressive melodic material is the song in the slow movement, introduced with a dark chord as prelude, and having a mood singularly meditative and melancholy. Then there is the very effective cadence at the end of the phrase—a simple, major cadence of a haunting simplicity and eloquence. The first movement is in the manner of a scherzo, although entirely unconventional in effect, and probably also in form, its structure not being easy to grasp at a first hearing because of the constant rythmical surprises, the flashing orchestration and the novel treatment the composer gave his ideas. But the humor, vigor and flexibility, if the word may be used, of mood is a keynote to much of the composition.

Audacious and Electrifying

It was refreshing, and more, it was very exhilarating, to listen to an American who has absorbed Mr. Carpenter's amazing knowledge of musical technic without becoming pedantic, without taking himself too seriously. The nervous, electrical character of the opening movement and finale, the audacity, the flash of the instrumentation, the freedom and sureness of the writing and the manner in which formalism is thrown to the winds make this score, to our mind, one of the most interesting and individual Mr. Carpenter has produced. One would rather wait for better acquaintance with the music before weighing the inherent worth of its thematic material, but the handling of this material is electrifying.

The last movement of the "concertino," a title the composer must have bestowed with a tongue in his cheek, is fully as capricious, and more fantastical, headlong in its energy, its abrupt explosions of force and wild, whirling rhythms than the first part. All of the music, as we have said, is very evidently in accordance with certain things imagined by the composer, who has given us no explanation of his imaginings. As a result there is no logical musical explanation of such a wanton silliness as the tinkling waltz tune which appears in this last movement—the one episode which seems hard to accept, whether intended as humorous, sardonic or anything else. The effect yesterday was that of a rather flat joke. But the composition as a whole is gripping in its virtuosity, its swiftness and certainty of workmanship, its spontaneity of manner.

AY, FEBRUARY 14,

Mr. Schmitz's Virtuosity

As much more could be written of t performance, which was one of breat taking mastery, Mr. Schmitz prov himself a super-pianist in mastering a and all difficulties, in showing his co plete orchestral understanding of t music, in expressing himself on t piano with a virtuosity as unbridled a yet under control as certain as virtuosity of the composer.

Nor must the extremely difficult ta of Mr. Monteux be forgotten. Indeed is hard to think what would have be come of that composition, without the conductor, without the pianist, without such an orchestra. And one complete rehearsal had done the business.

Schumann's Rhenish Symphony

Mr. Monteux's conception of Schumann's Rhenish Symphony was extremely sympathetic to the thought of the composer, save that the orchestra used yesterday is too big for this intimate and romantic music. Double wind and brass do not go with Schumann, even the Schumann of lusty, pulsing youth of the first movement of the Rhenish Symphony. The symphony is of unequal value. The movements which tell today are the first; the second—the "Landler," and the fourth the cathedral scene. The slow movement, misleadingly given in one place the Italian designation of "Allegro non troppo," which is not the equivalent of the German "Nicht schnell," given in the programme notes, is tame and sugar-sweet today, and the finale conventional. This is the weakest of the Schumann symphonies, though interesting.

But the Goldmark overture, "Sakuntala," is a bewitching fairy tale in music. It was given all of its gorgeous coloring, its oriental languor, its triumphal the apotheosis of faithful love, by Mr. Monteux.

Globe. Feb 15

American Work in Symphony Concert

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

Schumann. Third Symphony. E flat.
Carpenter. Concertino. Piano and orchestra. Soloist, E. Robert Schmitz.
Goldmark. "Sakuntala" overture.

IF we are to have Schumann's Rhenish Symphony on our programs we might as well let down the bars to all German music, for there is no symphonic work so thoroughly Teutonic as this outcome of Schumann's dwelling in the beautiful Rhineland. It is a graphic picture of phases of the Rhine folk-life, and one cannot but rejoice with these last rays of sunlight which shone upon the life that was so soon to go down in darkness and mental alienation.

If we do not find that M. Monteux interpreted everything that lay in this symphony we hasten to add that we do not believe that any one but a Rhinelander could portray all the "Innigkeit" and "Gemuethlichkeit" that is in this composition. The first movement is the exultant Schumann, and no one could be more triumphant than he upon occasion. A little less of tumult and more of breadth could have been exhibited here. The second movmnt might hav been a brsong (and of dcidedly more than one-half-of-one-per-cent.) such simplo jollity does it exhibit. The fourth movement (an extra one added to the regular symphonic four) was very well read. Here we get the pomp and majesty of a religious service in Cologn cathedral, and although Schumann was not generally effective in orchestral scoring he does manage to get trombone effects that are masterly, giving the sembdance of great diapason pipes of the organ. He has done equilly well with trombones at the end of the Larghetto of his first symphony. M. Monteux also made much of the contrast between this and the finale, and in the last movement one could hear the gossiping, chattering crowd pouring out of the church and filling the square with the generality that once existed there, a geniality that Prusia never knew. We are heartily glad that M. Monteux senses the glory that is in Schumann, even if he is not to the manner born. The symphony is as German as "Liberty Cabbage!"

* * *

Then came Carpentier's new Concertino. We have become distrustful of modern composers when they use diminutives. Ravel gives us a Sonatina longer than some Beethoven sonatas, and Korngold writes a Sinfonietta for tremendous orchestra and at tremendous length. But here the composer keeps his promise. Although he writes for a very large orchestra, with contrabassoon, trombones and tuba, and with cymbals, bass drum, tambourine, castagnettes and all the blacksmith shop, yet the movements are in the simplest forms with some homogeneity obtained by bringing back the first theme as coda at the end.

There is much antiphonal work between the piano and the orchestra which is interestingly developed. The composer himself defines it as a conversation between the piano and orchestra. The gradual interwining of the two forces is done in a masterly manner. There is real geniality in the work, nothing crabbed, ascetic or strained, which is unusual in an American work in the classic forms. Some touches of orchestration are beautiful, notably the violoncello and other string passages of the second movement.

The work is pigment from beginning to end, and its finals work up to a fiery climax with piccio shrieks and much percussive work.

There is a great amount of chor and active work (wrist and forearm iction) for the pianist, and Mr Schmitz gave this with excellent effect. Altogether the work received and artistic reading from pianist conductor and orchestra. the brav onia of the finale being especially effective. We found the first move ment the best written part of the concertine, but the entire composition was worthy of its enthusiasti reception. Mr. Schnietz, M. Monteux and Mr. Carpenter were all called forth and greatly applauded.

* * *

Goldmark's sensuous overture o "Sakuntala" ended the concert with much effect. Here M. Monteux and the orchestra shone forth at their best and there was a melodic and harmonic beauty that was all the more delightful from the fact that we so seldom get these qualities in the works of moderns. We cannot help longing for a few more Goldmarks in spite of the fact that this composer cannot be ranked with the uncomfortably great modern masters

URDAY, FEBRUARY 1

SYMPHONY GIVES 14TH CONCERT

Introduces Pianist Schmitz, Who Plays Carpenter's Concertino

Herald Feb 14

ORCHESTRA'S MUSIC STIRS VIVID IMAGERY

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, gave its 14th concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schumann, symphony, E flat major, No. 3; Carpenter, concertino for piano and orchestra (first time in Boston); Goldmark, overture to "Sakuntala." Mr. E. Robert Schmitz, the pianist, played for the first time in this city.

This was an unusually interesting concert. Although the symphony and the overture have been heard here many times, the nature of the performance gave new life to the former, while Goldmark's overture, now over a half-century old, is as fresh and modern as if it were dated 1919.

To us the symphony known as the "Rhenish" is not so romantically beautiful and dramatic as the one in D minor, not so essentially peculiar to Schumann. yet in the "Rhenish" there is the third movement, which reminds one of Schumann, the composer of the piano pieces, the songs, and pages of the piano concerto; and there is the sturdy, vigorous first movement. Perhaps Mr. Apthorp was right in finding the scherzo's chief theme a version of a Rhine wine song of which the tune and the words are well suited to the "ponderous joviality" of the drinkers; but neither the scherzo nor the so-called "cathedral" movement, nor the finale are of the greater Schumann, who, when fully inspired and most poetic, was a dreamer of miniature works for the piano and of music that is worthy of Heine's verses; that is, with the exception already noted, the D minor symphony; in this he is most appealing when he is least symphonic.

There has been a mass of so-called oriental music written since Goldmark's overture was first performed, but the majority of the composers give one the impression of writing in an idiom not natural to them; as if they had said: "Come now, see how Oriental I can be!" As French writers after Galland introduced "The Thousand Nights and a Night," wrote countless Arabian and Persian tales which are dull reading. Felicien David and Rimsky-Korsakoff wrote music as if they were of the East. There is the suggestion of the Orient in Rubinstein's "Feramors" ballet music, and in some of his songs. But Goldmark in this overture and in his opera, "The Queen of Sheba," caught and held the spirit of the East, the sensuousness, the gorgeousness, and in the Prelude to "The Queen of Sheba," he revealed to us the mystery and the monotony of the Desert as well as the splendor of Balkis, from whom Menelik of Abyssinia, boasted descent by reason of her visit to King Solomon. In the "Sakuntala" overture there is the thought of tropic heat, lush vegetation about calm pools and bubbling springs, swooning sensuousness, the barbaric chase. The overture was superbly played. No wonder that for once there was no mad rush for the doors during the closing measures. No wonder that appreciation was shown in enthusiastic, prolonged applause.

It was the original plan to have both Cesar Franck's "Djinns" and Mr. Carpenter's Concertino on the program to introduce Mr. Schmitz, the pianist. It was found that thus the concert would be too long. Mr. Schmitz, a pianist of the first rank, is a modest man as he is a most accomplished musician and virtuoso. The Concertino is not a work that an arrogant pianist, eager for applause, would choose, for the piano is used by Mr. Carpenter as an orchestral instrument. Nevertheless, there was opportunity for Mr. Schmitz to display a singularly beautiful and liquid touch, a strength that is in contrast with his delicate, sensitive appearance, compelling brilliance and exquisite phrasing.

The Concertino itself is a highly fantastical composition, abounding in surprises that come chiefly from unusual employment and combinations of instruments; with melodic ideas that are now charming and now exciting; with exotic coloring; with dance tunes that narrowly escape being commonplace, but are saved by rythmic piquancy and unexpected orchestration. The work as a whole is episodic, but not the less entertaining for that. Mr. Carpenter's devotion to pulsatile instruments is well known here. Never shall we forget the curved bodies of the busy, energetic xylophone players in the "Adventures of a Perambulator." In the Concertino there is, Mirabile Dictu! no xylophone, but drums, cymbals, tambourine, castanets, Glockenspiel. In his next orchestral work Mr. Carpenter should experiment with the marimba, and other African instruments so dear to our Percy Grainger.

The composer, Mr. Schmitz, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra—the performance was a dazzling one—were loudly applauded. Mr. Carpenter's ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta," will be performed here by the Chicago Opera Association with "The Elixir of Love" on Saturday, March 6.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Mozart, Symphony in G minor; Lalo, Spanish Symphony for violin (Mr. Fradkin, violinist); H. F. Gilbert, "The Dance in Place Congo"; Symphonic poem (after George W. Cable) of ballet based [illegible] was performed here by [illegible] Opera Company.

CARPENTER'S MUSIC ON SYMPHONY LIST

New Concertino Given With Mr Schmitz at the Piano

Schumann and Goldmark Also Figure in the Program

Globe Feb 14

E. Robert Schmidt, the Parisian pianist of Alsatian lineage, now resident in New York, made his first appearance in Boston yesterday afternoon as soloist at the Symphony concert. He played the piano part in John Alden Carpenter's new concertino and shared the applause with the composer. Mr Schmitz is at present giving a course of lecture recitals in New York, with the purpose of comparing modern music with both classical and romantic music. He might make use of Carpenter's concertino in such a comparison of the work of the 18th, 19th and 20th centuries. It has the restless rhythm, the piquant harmonies and the enlarged and subdivided orchestra which are characteristic of the music of the last 20 years. It lacks the graceful artifices of Mozart and the luscious melodies of Schumann.

This concertino, however, is based upon American popular music to a considerable extent. The first movement gets its syncopated rhythms from ragtime, but subtilises and interweaves them. The slow movement derives melodically from negro folk music. There are scattered through the whole work reminders of old-fashioned waltz tunes, of the "Blues," and, in short, of the whole range of American popular music.

If we are ever to have an American school of serious music it must thus bridge the gap which has separated "high-brow" and "popular" compositions here. All really great compositions in the past have had distinctly traceable, if often apparently remote, connections with the popular music of their country.

Even the austere masses of Palestrina are the culmination of a tendency which started from medieval street songs. Mr Carpenter is not trying to be austere, but he may be initiating a tradition that will lead to future works in the "grand manner." Meanwhile we can be thankful for a very agreeable and original composition in lighter vein. Mr Schmitz plays with remarkable technical skill and with feeling for the spirit of the music. He will be heard again with pleasure.

The Schumann "Rhenish" Symphony was given an unusually fine performance. Mr Monteux excels his predecessors with Schumann, largely because he makes the symphonies take on a lyric grace, despite their turgid ochestration.

Goldmark's "Sakuntala" is one of the few major works achieved by a comparatively minor composer. Despite some banal harmonies, it wears better than much of Beethoven and Wagner, though it is of course far below their best work. It, too, was eloquently played and gladly listened to.

Boston - Feb 14

RISTIAN SCIENCE MON

MUSIC

The Music of Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert of February 13 played for the first time in Boston, John Alden Carpenter's concertino for pianoforte and orchestra. Nobody hearing this music need despair of American composition. It has been pointed out before in these columns that Mr. Carpenter stands indisputably in the first rank of American writers of music, and a hearing of this latest composition only strengthens this opinion. In addition to knowing how to say what he wants, a faculty shared with many another, he has something to say, which distinguishes him from many. The concertino is not a big work, the large orchestra is employed for the sake of color rather than volume, and the piano is treated as one of the orchestral instruments. Thus it differs from a concerto. The ideas set forth are clever and at times brilliant. In handling his instruments Mr. Carpenter seeks for oddity of expression sometimes, but never exceeds the bounds of good taste or descends to the bizarre. He quite apparently thinks in terms of orchestral color, and this color depends largely on the percussion instruments. The composition is distinctly American, for it portrays the restless, lively, progressive and joyous traits supposed to be the resultant of the many factors of the country's life. The audience took most kindly to Mr. Carpenter's work and gave the composer many recalls. The piano part was played by E. Robert Schmitz, a Frenchman now living in New York, who thoroughly effaced himself and kept an eye always on the conductor. His tone is of great beauty and his playing indicated the true artist. For the rest of the program Mr. Monteux led his men through Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony and Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture.

TON POST, SATUR

Feb 17

NEW PIANO CONCERTO FANTASTIC

Carpenter's Work by the Symphony—Schmitz Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

A novel and very interesting feature of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was the first performance in this city of John Alden Carpenter's "Concertino for piano and orchestra," with E. Robert Schmitz, the French pianist, who then made his Boston debut as soloist with the orchestra.

The audience gave this music an extremely enthusiastic reception and the composer, with conductor and pianist, bowed from the stage.

FANTASTIC AND WHIMSICAL

This "Concerto" has no explanation or programme, but is evidently a very personal expression with the composer. It might be called, instead of a small concerto, a much magnified Humoresque for piano and orchestra. The music is fantastic, humorous, whimsical, full of temperament and very poetic in the mood of the second movement, and in other episodes. One would say that Mr. Carpenter had thought without making talk about it, of treating in his own way themes of Negro origin or derivation. But there are no themes taken bodily from Negro sources, though the mystical song of the second movement is strongly in the manner of a Negro spiritual.

It is a strange work. The most impressive melodic material is the song in the slow movement, introduced with a dark chord as prelude, and having a mood singularly meditative and melancholy. Then there is the very effective cadence at the end of the phrase—a simple, major cadence of a haunting simplicity and eloquence. The first movement is in the manner of a scherzo, although entirely unconventional in effect, and probably also in form, its structure not being easy to grasp at a first hearing because of the constant rythmical surprises, the flashing orchestration and the novel treatment the composer gave his ideas. But the humor, vigor and flexibility, if the word may be used, of mood is a keynote to much of the composition.

Audacious and Electrifying

It was refreshing, and more, it was very exhilarating, to listen to an American who has absorbed Mr. Carpenter's amazing knowledge of musical technic without becoming pedantic, without taking himself too seriously. The nervous, electrical character of the opening movement and finale, the audacity, the flash of the instrumentation, the freedom and sureness of the writing and the manner in which formalism is thrown to the winds make this score, to our mind, one of the most interesting and individual Mr. Carpenter has produced. One would rather wait for better acquaintance with the music before weighing the inherent worth of its thematic material, but the handling of this material is electrifying.

The last movement of the "concertino," a title the composer must have

AY, FEBRUARY 14,

bestowed with a tongue in his cheek, is fully as capricious, and more fantastical, headlong in its energy, its abrupt explosions of force and wild, whirling rhythms than the first part. All of the music, as we have said, is very evidently in accordance with certain things imagined by the composer, who has given us no explanation of his imaginings. As a result there is no logical musical explanation of such a wanton silliness as the tinkling waltz tune which appears in this last movement—the one episode which seems hard to accept, whether intended as humorous, sardonic or anything else. The effect yesterday was that of a rather flat joke. But the composition as a whole is gripping in its virtuosity, its swiftness and certainty of workmanship, its spontaneity of manner.

Mr. Schmitz's Virtuosity

As much more could be written of the performance, which was one of breathtaking mastery, Mr. Schmitz proved himself a super-pianist in mastering any and all difficulties, in showing his complete orchestral understanding of the music, in expressing himself on the piano with a virtuosity as unbridled and yet under control as certain as the virtuosity of the composer.

Nor must the extremely difficult task of Mr. Monteux be forgotten. Indeed, it is hard to think what would have become of that composition, without the conductor, without the pianist, without such an orchestra. And one complete rehearsal had done the business.

Schumann's Rhenish Symphony

Mr. Monteux's conception of Schumann's Rhenish Symphony was extremely sympathetic to the thought of the composer, save that the orchestra used yesterday is too big for this intimate and romantic music. Double wind and brass do not go with Schumann, even the Schumann of lusty, pulsing youth of the first movement of the Rhenish Symphony. The symphony is of unequal value. The movements which tell today are the first; the second—the "Landler," and the fourth the cathedral scene. The slow movement, misleadingly given in one place the Italian designation of "Allegro non troppo," which is not the equivalent of the German "Nicht schnell," given in the programme notes, is tame and sugar-sweet today, and the finale conventional. This is the weakest of the Schumann symphonies, though interesting.

But the Goldmark overture, "Sakuntala," is a bewitching fairy tale in music. It was given all of its gorgeous coloring, its oriental languor, its triumphal the apotheosis of faithful love, by Mr. Monteux.

Adv. Feb 15

American Work in Symphony Concert

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

Schumann. Third Symphony, E flat.
Carpenter. Concertino. Piano and orchestra. Soloist, E. Robert Schmitz.
Goldmark. "Sakuntala" overture.

IF we are to have Schumann's Rhenish Symphony on our programs we might as well let down the bars to all German music, for there is no symphonic work so thoroughly Teutonic as this outcome of Schumann's dwelling in the beautiful Rhineland. It is a graphic picture of phases of the Rhine folk-life, and one cannot but rejoice with these last rays of sunlight which shone upon the life that was so soon to go down in darkness and mental alienation.

If we do not find that M. Monteux interpreted everything that lay in this symphony we hasten to add that we do not believe that any one but a Rhinelander could portray all the "Innigkeit" and "Gemuethlichkeit" that is in this composition. The first movement is the exultant Schumann, and no one could be more triumphant than he upon occasion. A little less of tumult and more of breadth could have been exhibited here. The second movmnt might hav been a br-song (and of decidedly more than one-half-of-one-per-cent.) such simple jollity does it exhibit. The fourth movement (an extra one added to the regular symphonic four) was very well read. Here we get the pomp and majesty of a religious service in Cologn cathedral, and although Schumann was not generally effective in orchestral scoring he does manage to get trombone effects that are masterly, giving the sembdance of great diapason pipes of the organ. He has done equilly well with trombones at the end of the Larghetto of his first symphony. M. Monteux also made much of the contrast between this and the finale, and in the last movement one could hear the gossiping, chattering crowd pouring out of the church and filling the square with the generality that once existed there, a geniality that Prusia never knew. We are heartily glad that M. Monteux senses the glory that is in Schumann, even if he is not to the manner born. The symphony is as German as "Liberty Cabbage!"

* * *

Then came Carpentier's new Concertino. We have become distrustful of modern composers when they use diminutives. Ravel gives us a Sonatina longer than some Beethoven sonatas, and Korngold writes a Sinfonietta for tremendous orchestra and at tremendous length. But here the composer keeps his promise. Although he writes for a very large orchestra, with contrabassoon, trombones and tuba, and with cymbals, bass drum, tambourine, castagnettes and all the blacksmith shop, yet the movements are in the simplest forms with some homogeneity obtained by bringing back the first theme as coda at the end.

There is much antiphonal work be[illegible]n the piano and the orchestra [illegible] is interestingly developed. The [illegible]er himself defines it as a con[illegible]n between the piano and or[illegible] The gradual interwining of [illegible]rces is done in a masterly [illegible]here is real geniality in [illegible]thing crabbed, ascetic or [illegible] is unusual in an Amer[illegible]e classic forms. Some [illegible]stration are beauti[illegible]oloncello and other [illegible] the second move[illegible]

[illegible]ent from begin[illegible]its finals work up [illegible] with piccio shriek[illegible] cussive work.

There is a great amount of chor[illegible] and active work (wrist and forearm [illegible]iction) for the pianist, and Mr Schmitz gave this with excellent effect. Altogether the work received and artistic reading from pianist conductor and orchestra. the bravonia of the finale being especially effective. We found the first movement the best written part of the concertine, but the entire composition was worthy of its enthusiastic reception. Mr. Schnietz, M. Monteux and Mr. Carpenter were all called forth and greatly applauded.

* * *

Goldmark's sensuous overture o "Sakuntala" ended the concert with much effect. Here M. Monteux and the orchestra shone forth at their best and there was a melodic and harmonic beauty that was all the more delightful from the fact that we so seldom get these qualities in the works of moderns. We cannot help longing for a few more Goldmarks in spite of the fact that this composer cannot be ranked with the uncomfortably great modern masters

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Trans. Feb 15

BOSTON EVENING T

CONCERTS AND OPERA

New Pieces and Old at the Symphony Concert—Musicians to Be Heard in Boston Next Week and in Weeks to Come—Their Programmes—Operas and Singers from Chicago

The fourteenth Symphony Concert of the current season took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, where it will be repeated this evening. Mr. Monteux conducted, still showing the effects of a passing illness that earlier in the week nearly disabled him. Inclement weather slightly reduced the usual numbers of the audience, which, throughout the afternoon, gave many signs of pleasure. It warmly recalled the conductor at the end of Schumann's Rhenish Symphony and lingered at the close of the concert to applaud Goldmark's overture to the ancient Hindu play, "Sakuntala," pleased, with reason, by both music and performance. In particular, however, Mr. Carpenter's Concertino for pianoforte and orchestra stirred the listening company. Twice and thrice after it had heard the music it summoned him to the stage, sometimes with, sometimes without, the assisting pianist, a newcomer, Mr. Schmitz. (His light, bright touch suited the music; he had been sensitive to its caprice of rhythm, modulation, mood and course.) It is hard to remember when a composer has been so eagerly and insistently applauded at the Symphony Concerts. The symphony, which began the concert, and the overture, which ended it, are, of course, repertory pieces of long standing, of which the present shortage of paper forbids more than record. Suffice it that after nearly seventy years Schumann's music still keeps songful warmth; while Goldmark's, so fresh does it sound, might date from 1915 instead of 1865. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra achieved hardly more than a faithful and literal performance of the symphony. From the overture they conveyed the richness of tonal beauty, the ardor of dramatic narrative that Goldmark with equal imagination and resource joined together.

Mr. Carpenter's Concertino is shorter than most concertos, classic or modern; it eschews the more academic prescriptions of the chosen form; it is often music of light touch and playful fancy. Therefore, perhaps, he designated it by the diminutive. None the less, it is no trifle. The Concertino runs in the three orthodox movements—Allegro, slow division, Allegro again—and the composer is ingenious in the interweaving and the recalling of motives to maintain continuity and unity. He uses, besides, a full orchestra of these days and, again in the fashion of the time, joins the piano to it much often than he sets the solo instrument apart as a semi-isolated voice. Needless, almost, to say with Mr. Carpenter's other symphonic music in mind, the Concertino abounds in vivid harmonic and instrumental color, usually light, shimmering, sportive; now and then fuller-bodied but still glamorous, rarely shadowed and darkling. His symphony, as became the graver purpose, was rich in harmonic and instrumental imagination; the Concertino, of intimate mood and playful progress, is bright with instrumental and harmonic fancy—the gayety, the fantasy of the composing spirit, rather than the delineative humor of the suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator." Piquant, in particular are some of the accenting touches of the instruments of percussion upon the notes of the piano, while there is keen tang in some of its euphonies with choirs or isolated voices of the orchestra. Again, needless almost to say, the Concertino is an exceedingly supple and variable music—not with the modulation that is restlessness, but with the modulation that is impulsiveness of mood and liveliness of fancy.

Above all, the spirit of playful fantasy, in which Mr. Carpenter seemingly conceived and wrote the music, expresses itself in the frequent shiftings of the rhythm. There, above all else, is the music variable, now as American as syncopation may make it; again lightly oriental; and yet again fanciful with Mr. Carpenter's own rhythmic invention. Throughout, the Concertino is capricious, even volatile; yet there is no mistaking the fantastical high spirits of the first movement; the gentler vein of more intimate and deeper confidences in the second; the return to bright fervors in the finale. Concertos for piano and orchestra may be many things as many composers have written them, as many listeners hear them. Some are plodding and dull; others orthodox and routine; others still ornate and displayful; and others yet again of sober beauty and manifold power. Here at last is a Concertino content to be light, fanciful, gay, sportive. An American has written it in American high spirits.

From JOURNAL

Address Providence, R. I.

Date FEB 1 1920

The emphatic approval with which the audience greeted Rachmaninoff when he played his own concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Tuesday evening should multiply the interest in his appearance in a recital to-day. Never had he been heard here before to better advantage than as composer-performer, the concerto revealing itself under his touch and the direction of Mr. Monteux as a notable addition to musical literature for the perfection of blending of piano and orchestra which it achieves. It was very obvious that the audience would have welcomed more of his playing, and to-day's concert will appropriately serve as the "encore" to [illegible] former appearance. The programme, which was published in this column last week, includes one composition of his own, and promises a performance of high interest.

RADKIN SYMPHONY

At the Boston Symphony concerts ext Friday and Saturday, Fredric radkin, the much-admired concert aster of the orchestra, will be heard s soloist in Lalo's "Spanish Symhony." An event of notable interest the same concerts will be the first oncert performances of Henry F. ilbert's "Dance in Place Congo," hich raises the American negro's haracteristic syncopated dances to he fullest symphonic eloquence.

Trans. Feb. 13

MUSIC AND PLAYS

rent Concerts—Items About Musicians, Playwrights and Players

he concert of the Symphony Orchestra Sanders Theatre at Cambridge last ning began with Mr. Converse's new phony and ended with Goldmark's faar overture to the ancient Hindu play, kuntala." The symphony renewed the pression of previous hearings as already orded in this place; the overture pleased e more by lush harmonies, vivid instrutal color and romantic warmth. Beeen these two numbers Miss Martha ird played fluently and aptly the piano rt in Saint-Saëns's concerto in F major. is a rarely heard piece, but the shortage paper forbids any description of it.

Herald Feb 15

FREDRIC FRADKIN

JOURNAL

Providence, R. I.

FEB 1 1920

A new American symphony by Frederick S. Converse was given its first public performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Friday's concert in Symphony Hall. Mr. Converse, whose previous compositions have been of varied form and who was the first American composer to have an opera produced by the Metropolitan Company, has here written his first symphony. It was done, he explains in a programme note, not because he had any particular desire to create a conventional symphony, but because the music was in him and the symphonic form seemed to suit his need of expression. And this may explain why, in some respects, the work falls short of complete symphonic unity.

It is a war creation, seeking to "reflect something of the feelings we have all been through during the stress of the last few years," Mr. Converse declares. It is subjective, emotionally descriptive and restrained to a degree. Its chief poetic beauties are found in the soft melodies of the second movement and the spirited scherzo, which would seem to have little to do with war reactions unless the composer had thus labelled them. The first movement is a compelling exposition of the moods of war, the enveloping bewilderment followed by firm resolve and the advance to action as America followed its destiny. The final movement is the most martial, with contrasts of fervent solemnity and victorious jubilance that make it the most frankly descriptive portion of the work.

Throughout the symphony there is found a curious and interesting blend of classic and modern form. By general agreement Mr. Converse has achieved a composition that furnishes a distinct, though not at all sensational, contribution to American music, and the symphony is likely to have a wide hearing through the country. The orchestra's performance of it was brilliant and sympathetic, and Mr. Monteux was recalled many times at its conclusion.

In the past week, also the Boston orchestra gave its first "children's concert," for which tickets were sold through the schools, and Symphony Hall was filled with a most unusual and spiritedly responsive audience of youngsters. The event was frankly experimental, but was successful enough to win promise of a similar concert soon.

Fredric Fradkin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and soloist at the next pair of concerts in Symphony Hall.

Globe Feb 15

FRADKIN TO BE NEXT SOLOIST

Fredric Fradkin, the excellent concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist at the Symphony concerts this week. He will play Lalo's "Spanish" Symphony, one of the most delightful concertos in the literature of the violin. Mr. Fradkin has given pleasure by his performance of incidental solos in orchestral works during concerts of the last two years. Lalo's "Symphony" is peculiarly suited to his indisputable talent as a virtuoso.

Globe Feb 15

Friday, at 2.30, and Saturday, at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra. Fifteenth program. Symphony in G minor, Mozart; Spanish Symphony, for violin and orchestra, Lalo; "The Dance in the Place Congo," Gilbert. Soloist, Fredric Fradkin.

Fri[illegible] 2.15 Ballet [illegible]

Events and Comments

Like all of the music of Henry F. Gilbert, the noted Cambridge composer, his "Dance in Place Congo," which is to have its first concert performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is touched with the folk spirit. And like most of his music, negro themes and rhythms are its subject and inspiration. This score, like the "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes," which was played at these concerts some seasons ago, raises the American negro's characteristically syncopated dance and his plaintive melodies to the full eloquence of symphonic treatment.

Although it has been staged and danced as a ballet by the Metropolitan Opera Company, and thus performed here, this work was composed as a symphonic poem to be heard in a concert hall without additions and distractions. The "Place Congo" is a square in the slum section of New Orleans, where in the ante-bellum days the slaves would gather at night and indulge in the wildest orgies of dance and song. The "bamboula" and "juba" dances used in the score are actual relics of this negro quarter.

will be April 25.

Post

"PLACE CONGO" AT SYMPHONY

Henry F. Gilbert's latest symphonic poem, "The Dance in Place Congo," which, although produced by the Metropolitan Opera Company as a ballet, was written and intended for symphonic use, will have its first concert performance at the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday. The music was inspired by George W. Cable's description of the public square in New Orleans, where the slaves of pre-war days would gather and dance themselves into a frenzy with the "bamboula" dance—the rhythm of which Mr. Gilbert has faithfully used in his score.

The soloist at these concerts will be Frederic Fradkin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, who will be heard in Lalo's "Spanish Symphony." The first music by Mozart to be heard at the Symphony concerts this season will be the great symphony in G minor, which completes this programme.

Globe Feb 16

SYMPHONY'S PROGRAM FOR YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERT

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, has arranged the following light and attractive program for the second Young People's concert by the orchestra in Symphony Hall at 4 p m. Feb 26: Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz"; Andante from Beethoven's First Symphony in C major; Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite (I, Morning Mood; II, Ase's Death; III, Anitra's Dance; IV, In the Hall of the Mountain King), Scherzo from Medelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Berlioz's Rakoczy March.

Since all tickets for this concert have been distributed through the heads of the schools of Greater Boston, no more are available. Considering the success of the first "Young People's Concert" in January, it is a matter of regret that the full schedule of the orchestra will permit no more this season.

Advertiser Feb 15

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

At the Symphony concert next Friday and Saturday, Fredric Fradkin, the concert master, will play Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" with the orchestra. Mozart's great G minor symphony is also on this program. The concluding number will be Henry F. Gilbert's "Dance in Place Congo."

"SA[illegible]

Herald Feb. 15

FRADKIN SOLOIST

At the Symphony concerts to be given next Friday and Saturday, Feb. 20 and 21, Fredric Fradkin, the concert master, will play Lalo's Spanish Symphony with the orchestra. Contrary to the usual custom, Mr. Fradkin will play the Scherzando which, often omitted, is the most characteristically Spanish part of this favorite among concertos. Mozart's G minor Symphony is played on this program. The concluding number of more than ordinary interest will be Henry F. Gilbert's "The Dance in Place Congo," built upon Negro dances gleaned from the celebrated square in New Orleans.

From THE MORNING TELE[illegible]

Address New York City

Date MAR 28 1920

He's Started Three.

Sir George Henschel, as the first conductor of the Boston Symphony is now known, has been offered the chair of music at the University of Johannesburg, South Africa, which would involve also the organizing of an orchestra. Should the distinguished conductor, now in his seventieth year, accept the offer he would found his fourth orchestra, for in addition to the Boston organization in 1881 he brought into being also the London Symphony in 18[illegible] and in 1893 the Scottish Orchestra.

Welli[illegible]
CERTIFIED
INDUST[illegible]

nce.
WANTED
is no room
the orchestr[illegible]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Trans. Feb 14

BOSTON EVENING T

CONCERTS AND OPERA

New Pieces and Old at the Symphony Concert—Musicians to Be Heard in Boston Next Week and in Weeks to Come—Their Programmes—Operas and Singers from Chicago

The fourteenth Symphony Concert of the current season took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, where it will be repeated this evening. Mr. Monteux conducted, still showing the effects of a passing illness that earlier in the week nearly disabled him. Inclement weather slightly reduced the usual numbers of the audience, which, throughout the afternoon, gave many signs of pleasure. It warmly recalled the conductor at the end of Schumann's Rhenish Symphony and lingered at the close of the concert to applaud Goldmark's overture to the ancient Hindu play, "Sakuntala," pleased, with reason, by both music and performance. In particular, however, Mr. Carpenter's Concertino for pianoforte and orchestra stirred the listening company. Twice and thrice after it had heard the music it summoned him to the stage, sometimes with, sometimes without, the assisting pianist, a newcomer, Mr. Schmitz. (His light, bright touch suited the music; he had been sensitive to its caprice of rhythm, modulation, mood and course.) It is hard to remember when a composer has been so eagerly and insistently applauded at the Symphony Concerts. The symphony, which began the concert, and the overture, which ended it, are, of course, repertory pieces of long standing, of which the present shortage of paper forbids more than record. Suffice it that after nearly seventy years Schumann's music still keeps songful warmth; while Goldmark's, so fresh does it sound, might date from 1915 instead of 1865. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra achieved hardly more than a faithful and literal performance of the symphony. From the overture they conveyed the richness of tonal beauty, the ardor of dramatic narrative that Goldmark with equal imagination and resource joined together.

Mr. Carpenter's Concertino is shorter than most concertos, classic or modern; it eschews the more academic prescriptions of the chosen form; it is often music of light touch and playful fancy. Therefore, perhaps, he designated it by the diminutive. None the less, it is no trifle. The Concertino runs in the three orthodox movements—Allegro, slow division, Allegro again—and the composer is ingenious in the interweaving and the recalling of motives to maintain continuity and unity. He uses, besides, a full orchestra of these days and, again in the fashion of the time, joins the piano to it much often than he sets the solo instrument apart as a semi-isolated voice. Needless, almost, to say with Mr. Carpenter's other symphonic music in mind, the Concertino abounds in vivid harmonic and instrumental color, usually light, shimmering, sportive; now and then fuller-bodied but still glamorous, rarely shadowed and darkling. His symphony, as became the graver purpose, was rich in harmonic and instrumental imagination; the Concertino, of intimate mood and playful progress, is bright with instrumental and harmonic fancy—the gayety, the fantasy of the composing spirit, rather than the delineative humor of the suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator." Piquant, in particular are some of the accenting touches of the instruments of percussion upon the notes of the piano, while there is keen tang in some of its euphonies with choirs or isolated voices of the orchestra. Again, needless almost to say, the Concertino is an exceedingly supple and variable music—not with the modulation that is restlessness, but with the modulation that is impulsiveness of mood and liveliness of fancy.

Above all, the spirit of playful fantasy, in which Mr. Carpenter seemingly conceived and wrote the music, expresses itself in the frequent shiftings of the rhythm. There, above all else, is the music variable, now as American as syncopation may make it; again lightly oriental; and yet again fanciful with Mr. Carpenter's own rhythmic invention. Throughout, the Concertino is capricious, even volatile; yet there is no mistaking the fantastical high spirits of the first movement; the gentler vein of more intimate and deeper confidences in the second; the return to bright fervors in the finale. Concertos for piano and orchestra may be many things as many composers have written them, as many listeners hear them. Some are plodding and dull; others orthodox and routine; others still ornate and displayful; and others yet again of sober beauty and manifold power. Here at last is a Concertino content to be light, fanciful, gay, sportive. An American has written it in American high spirits.

From JOURNAL
Address Providence, R. I.
Date [illegible] 1920

The emphatic approval with which the audience greeted Rachmaninoff when he played his own concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Tuesday evening should multiply the interest in his appearance in a recital to-day. Never had he been heard here before to better advantage than as composer-performer, the concerto revealing itself under his touch and the direction of Mr. Monteux as a notable addition to musical literature for the perfection of blending of piano and orchestra which it achieves. It was very obvious that the audience would have welcomed more of his playing, and to-day's concert will appropriately serve as the "encore" to [illegible] former appearance. The programme, which was published in this column last week, includes one composition of his own, and promises a performance of high interest.

[illegible] playing.

RADKIN SYMPHONY

At the Boston Symphony concerts ext Friday and Saturday, Fredric radkin, the much-admired concert aster of the orchestra, will be heard s soloist in Lalo's "Spanish Symhony." An event of notable interest t the same concerts will be the first oncert performances of Henry F. ilbert's "Dance in Place Congo," hich raises the American negro's haracteristic syncopated dances to he fullest symphonic eloquence.

Trans. Feb. 13

MUSIC AND PLAYS

rrent Concerts—Items About Musicians, Playwrights and Players

he concert of the Symphony Orchestra Sanders Theatre at Cambridge last ening began with Mr. Converse's new mphony and ended with Goldmark's faliar overture to the ancient Hindu play, akuntala." The symphony renewed the pression of previous hearings as already orded in this place; the overture pleased be more by lush harmonies, vivid instruental color and romantic warmth. Betеen these two numbers Miss Martha ird played fluently and aptly the piano rt in Saint-Saëns's concerto in F major. is a rarely heard piece, but the shortage paper forbids any description of it.

Herald Feb 13

FREDRIC FRADKIN

JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.

A new American symphony by Frederick S. Converse was given its first public performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Friday's concert in Symphony Hall. Mr. Converse, whose previous compositions have been of varied form and who was the first American composer to have an opera produced by the Metropolitan Company, has here written his first symphony. It was done, he explains in a programme note, not because he had any particular desire to create a conventional symphony, but because the music was in him and the symphonic form seemed to suit his need of expression. And this may explain why, in some respects, the work falls short of complete symphonic unity.

It is a war creation, seeking to "reflect something of the feelings we have all been through during the stress of the last few years," Mr. Converse declares. It is subjective, emotionally descriptive and restrained to a degree. Its chief poetic beauties are found in the soft melodies of the second movement and the spirited scherzo, which would seem to have little to do with war reactions unless the composer had thus labelled them. The first movement is a compelling exposition of the moods of war, the enveloping bewilderment followed by firm resolve and the advance to action as America followed its destiny. The final movement is the most martial, with contrasts of fervent solemnity and victorious jubilance that make it the most frankly descriptive portion of the work.

Throughout the symphony there is found a curious and interesting blend of classic and modern form. By general agreement Mr. Converse has achieved a composition that furnishes a distinct, though not at all sensational, contribution to American music, and the symphony is likely to have a wide hearing through the country. The orchestra's performance of it was brilliant and sympathetic, and Mr. Monteux was recalled many times at its conclusion.

In the past week, also the Boston orchestra gave its first "children's concert," for which tickets were sold through the schools, and Symphony Hall was filled with a most unusual and spiritedly responsive audience of youngsters. The event was frankly experimental, but was successful enough to win promise of a similar concert soon.

Fredric Fradkin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and soloist at the next pair of concerts in Symphony Hall.

FRADKIN TO BE NEXT SOLOIST

Fredric Fradkin, the excellent concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist at the Symphony concerts this week. He will play Lalo's "Spanish" Symphony, one of the most delightful concertos in the literature of the violin. Mr. Fradkin has given pleasure by his performance of incidental solos in orchestral works during concerts of the last two years. Lalo's "Symphony" is peculiarly suited to his indisputable talent as a virtuoso.

Globe Feb 15

Friday, at 2.30, and Saturday, at 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra. Fifteenth program. Symphony in G minor, Mozart; Spanish Symphony, for violin and orchestra, Lalo; "The Dance in the Place Congo," Gilbert. Soloist, Fredric Fradkin.

Fri... 2:15 Ballet ...

Events and Comments

Like all of the music of Henry F. Gilbert, the noted Cambridge composer his "Dance in Place Congo," which h to have its first concert performance b the Boston Symphony Orchestra, i touched with the folk spirit. And lik most of his music, negro themes and rhythms are its subject and inspiration. This score, like the "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes," which was played at these concerts some seasons ago, raises the American negro's characteristically syncopated dance and his plaintive melodies to the full eloquence of symphonic treatment.

Although it has been staged and danced as a ballet by the Metropolitan Opera Company, and thus performed here, this work was composed as a symphonic poem to be heard in a concert hall without additions and distractions. The "Place Congo" is a square in the slum section of New Orleans, where in the ante-bellum days the slaves would gather at night and indulge in the wildest orgies of dance and song. The "bamboula" and "juba" dances used in the score are actual relics of this negro quarter.

will be April 25.

Post

"PLACE CONGO" AT SYMPHONY

Henry F. Gilbert's latest symphonic poem, "The Dance in Place Congo," which, although produced by the Metropolitan Opera Company as a ballet, was written and intended for symphonic use, will have its first concert performance at the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday. The music was inspired by George W. Cable's description of the public square in New Orleans, where the slaves of pre-war days would gather and dance themselves into a frenzy with the "bamboula" dance—the rhythm of which Mr. Gilbert has faithfully used in his score.

The soloist at these concerts will be Frederic Fradkin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, who will be heard in Lalo's "Spanish Symphony." The first music by Mozart to be heard at the Symphony concerts this season will be the great symphony in G minor, which completes this programme.

Globe Feb 16

SYMPHONY'S PROGRAM FOR YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERT

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, has arranged the following light and attractive program for the second Young People's concert by the orchestra in Symphony Hall at 4 p m, Feb 26: Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz"; Andante from Beethoven's First Symphony in C major; Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite (I, Morning Mood; II, Ase's Death; III, Anitra's Dance; IV, In the Hall of the Mountain King), Scherzo from Medelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Berlioz's Rakoczy March.

Since all tickets for this concert have been distributed through the heads of the schools of Greater Boston, no more are available. Considering the success of the first "Young People's Concert" in January, it is a matter of regret that the full schedule of the orchestra will permit no more this season.

Advertiser Feb 15

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

At the Symphony concert next Friday and Saturday, Fredric Fradkin, the concert master, will play Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" with the orchestra. Mozart's great G minor symphony is also on this program. The concluding number will be Henry F. Gilbert's "Dance in Place Congo."

"SA...

Herald Feb. 15

FRADKIN SOLOIST

At the Symphony concerts to be given next Friday and Saturday, Feb. 20 and 21, Frederic Fradkin, the concert master, will play Lalo's Spanish Symphony with the orchestra. Contrary to the usual custom, Mr. Fradkin will play the Scherzando which, often omitted, is the most characteristically Spanish part of this favorite among concertos. Mozart's G minor Symphony is played on this program. The concluding number of more than ordinary interest will be Henry F. Gilbert's "The Dance in Place Congo," built upon Negro dances gleaned from the celebrated square in New Orleans.

From [illegible]
Address New York City
Date MAR 28 1920

He's Started Three.

Sir George Henschel, as the first conductor of the Boston Symphony is now known, has been offered the chair of music at the University of Johannesburg, South Africa, which would involve also the organizing of an orchestra. Should the distinguished conductor, now in his seventieth year, accept the offer he would found his fourth orchestra, for in addition to the Boston organization in 1881 he brought into being also the London Symphony in 1885 and in 1893 the Scottish Orchestra.

[illegible] WANTE... is no room ... the orchest...

Welli... ERTIFIED ... INDUST...

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Trans. Feb 14

BOSTON EVENING T

CONCERTS AND OPERA

New Pieces and Old at the Symphony Concert—Musicians to Be Heard in Boston Next Week and in Weeks to Come—Their Programmes—Operas and Singers from Chicago

The fourteenth Symphony Concert of the current season took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, where it will be repeated this evening. Mr. Monteux conducted, still showing the effects of a passing illness that earlier in the week nearly disabled him. Inclement weather slightly reduced the usual numbers of the audience, which, throughout the afternoon, gave many signs of pleasure. It warmly recalled the conductor at the end of Schumann's Rhenish Symphony and lingered at the close of the concert to applaud Goldmark's overture to the ancient Hindu play, "Sakuntala," pleased, with reason, by both music and performance. In particular, however, Mr. Carpenter's Concertino for pianoforte and orchestra stirred the listening company. Twice and thrice after it had heard the music it summoned him to the stage, sometimes with, sometimes without, the assisting pianist, a newcomer, Mr. Schmitz. (His light, bright touch suited the music; he had been sensitive to its caprice of rhythm, modulation, mood and course.) It is hard to remember when a composer has been so eagerly and insistently applauded at the Symphony Concerts. The symphony, which began the concert, and the overture, which ended it, are, of course, repertory pieces of long standing, of which the present shortage of paper forbids more than record. Suffice it that after nearly seventy years Schumann's music still keeps songful warmth; while Goldmark's, so fresh does it sound, might date from 1915 instead of 1865. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra achieved hardly more than a faithful and literal performance of the symphony. From the overture they conveyed the richness of tonal beauty, the ardor of dramatic narrative that Goldmark with equal imagination and resource joined together.

Mr. Carpenter's Concertino is shorter than most concertos, classic or modern; it eschews the more academic prescriptions of the chosen form; it is often music of light touch and playful fancy. Therefore, perhaps, he designated it by the diminutive. None the less, it is no trifle. The Concertino runs in the three orthodox movements—Allegro, slow division, Allegro again—and the composer is ingenious in the interweaving and the recalling of motives to maintain continuity and unity. He uses, besides, a full orchestra of these days and, again in the fashion of the time, joins the piano to it much often than he sets the solo instrument apart as a semi-isolated voice. Needless, almost, to say with Mr. Carpenter's other symphonic music in mind, the Concertino abounds in vivid harmonic and instrumental color, usually light, shimmering, sportive; now and then fuller-bodied but still glamorous, rarely shadowed and darkling. His symphony, as became the graver purpose, was rich in harmonic and instrumental imagination; the Concertino, of intimate mood and playful progress, is bright with instrumental and harmonic fancy—the gayety, the fantasy of the composing spirit, rather than the delineative humor of the suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator." Piquant, in particular are some of the accenting touches of the instruments of percussion upon the notes of the piano, while there is keen tang in some of its euphonies with choirs or isolated voices of the orchestra. Again, needless almost to say, the Concertino is an exceedingly supple and variable music—not with the modulation that is restlessness, but with the modulation that is impulsiveness of mood and liveliness of fancy.

Above all, the spirit of playful fantasy, in which Mr. Carpenter seemingly conceived and wrote the music, expresses itself in the frequent shiftings of the rhythm. There, above all else, is the music variable, now as American as syncopation may make it; again lightly oriental; and yet again fanciful with Mr. Carpenter's own rhythmic invention. Throughout, the Concertino is capricious, even volatile; yet there is no mistaking the fantastical high spirits of the first movement; the gentler vein of more intimate and deeper confidences in the second; the return to bright fervors in the finale. Concertos for piano and orchestra may be many things as many composers have written them, as many listeners hear them. Some are plodding and dull; others orthodox and routine; others still ornate and displayful; and others yet again of sober beauty and manifold power. Here at last is a Concertino content to be light, fanciful, gay, sportive. An American has written it in American high spirits.

rom JOURNAL

ddress Providence, R. I.

ate

The [illegible] approval with which the audience greeted Rachmaninoff when he played his own concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Tuesday evening should [illegible] the interest in his appearance in a recital to-day. Never had he been [illegible] here before to better advantage as [illegible] composer-performer. his touch and [illegible] itself under [illegible] direction of Mr. Monteux as a notable addition to musical literature for the perfection of blending of piano and orchestra which it achieves. It was very obvious that the audience would have welcomed more of his playing, and to-day's concert will appropriately serve as the "encore" to [illegible] former appearance. The programme, which was published in this column last week, includes one composition of his own, and promises a performance of high interest.

FRADKIN SYMPHONY

At the Boston Symphony concerts next Friday and Saturday, Fredric Fradkin, the much-admired concert master of the orchestra, will be heard as soloist in Lalo's "Spanish Symphony." An event of notable interest at the same concerts will be the first concert performances of Henry F. Gilbert's "Dance in Place Congo," which raises the American negro's characteristic syncopated dances to the fullest symphonic eloquence.

Trans. Feb. 13

MUSIC AND PLAYS

Current Concerts—Items About Musicians, Playwrights and Players

The concert of the Symphony Orchestra Sanders Theatre at Cambridge last evening began with Mr. Converse's new symphony and ended with Goldmark's familiar overture to the ancient Hindu play, Sakuntala." The symphony renewed the impression of previous hearings as already recorded in this place; the overture pleased once more by lush harmonies, vivid instrumental color and romantic warmth. Between these two numbers Miss Martha Baird played fluently and aptly the piano part in Saint-Saëns's concerto in F major. This is a rarely heard piece, but the shortage of paper forbids any description of it.

Herald Feb 15

FREDRIC FRADKIN

JOURNAL

Providence, R. I.

A new American symphony by Frederick S. Converse was given its first public performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Friday's concert in Symphony Hall. Mr. Converse, whose previous compositions have been of varied form and who was the first American composer to have an opera produced by the Metropolitan Company, has here written his first symphony. It was done, he explains in a programme note, not because he had any particular desire to create a conventional symphony, but because the music was in him and the symphonic form seemed to suit his need of expression. And this may explain why, in some respects, the work falls short of complete symphonic unity.

It is a war creation, seeking to reflect something of the feelings we have all been through during the stress of the last few years," Mr. Converse declares. It is subjective, emotionally descriptive and restrained to a degree. Its chief poetic beauties are found in the soft melodies of the second movement and the spirited scherzo, which would seem to have little to do with war reactions unless the composer had thus labelled them. The first movement is a compelling exposition of the moods of war, the enveloping bewilderment followed by firm resolve and the advance to action as America followed its destiny. The final movement is the most martial, with contrasts of fervent solemnity and victorious jubilance that make it the most frankly descriptive portion of the work.

Throughout the symphony there is found a curious and interesting blend of classic and modern form. By general agreement Mr. Converse has achieved a composition that furnishes a distinct, though not at all sensational, contribution to American music, and the symphony is likely to have a wide hearing through the country. The orchestra's performance of it was brilliant and sympathetic, and Mr. Monteux was recalled many times at its conclusion.

In the past week, also the Boston orchestra gave its first "children's concert," for which tickets were sold through the schools, and Symphony Hall was filled with a most unusual and spiritedly responsive audience of youngsters. The event was frankly experimental, but was successful enough to win promise of a similar concert soon.

Fredric Fradkin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and soloist at the next pair of concerts in Symphony Hall.

FRADKIN TO BE NEXT SOLOIST

Fredric Fradkin, the excellent concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist at the Symphony concerts this week. He will play Lalo's "Spanish" Symphony, one of the most delightful concertos in the literature of the violin. Mr. Fradkin has given pleasure by his performance of incidental solos in orchestral works during concerts of the last two years. Lalo's "Symphony" is peculiarly suited to his indisputable talent as a virtuoso

Globe Feb 15

Friday, at 2.30, and Saturday, at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra. Fifteenth program. Symphony in G minor, Mozart; Spanish Symphony, for violin and orchestra, Lalo; "The Dance in the Place Congo," Gilbert. Soloist, Fredric Fradkin.

Fri[illegible] 2.15. Ballet music

Events and Comments

Like all of the music of Henry F. Gilbert, the noted Cambridge composer his "Dance in Place Congo," which is to have its first concert performance b the Boston Symphony Orchestra, i touched with the folk spirit. And lik most of his music, negro themes and rhythms are its subject and inspiration This score, like the "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes," which was played at these concerts some seasons ago, raises the American negro's characteristically syncopated dance and his plaintive melodies to the full eloquence of symphonic treatment.

Although it has been staged and danced as a ballet by the Metropolitan Opera Company, and thus performed here, this work was composed as a symphonic poem to be heard in a concert hall without additions and distractions. The "Place Congo" is a square in the slum section of New Orleans, where in the ante-bellum days the slaves would gather at night and indulge in the wildest orgies of dance and song. The "bamboula" and "juba" dances used in the score are actual relics of this negro quarter.

will be April 25.

Post

"PLACE CONGO" AT SYMPHONY

Henry F. Gilbert's latest symphonic poem, "The Dance in Place Congo," which, although produced by the Metropolitan Opera Company as a ballet, was written and intended for symphonic use, will have its first concert performance at the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday. The music was inspired by George W. Cable's description of the public square in New Orleans, where the slaves of pre-war days would gather and dance themselves into a frenzy with the "bamboula" dance—the rhythm of which Mr. Gilbert has faithfully used in his score.

The soloist at these concerts will be Frederic Fradkin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, who will be heard in Lalo's "Spanish Symphony." The first music by Mozart to be heard at the Symphony concerts this season will be the great symphony in G minor, which completes this programme.

Globe Feb 16

SYMPHONY'S PROGRAM FOR YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERT

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, has arranged the following light and attractive program for the second Young People's concert by the orchestra in Symphony Hall at 4 p.m. Feb 26: Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz"; Andante from Beethoven's First Symphony in C major; Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite (I. Morning Mood; II. Ase's Death; III. Anitra's Dance; IV. In the Hall of the Mountain King), Scherzo from Medelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Berlioz's RaKoczy March.

Since all tickets for this concert have been distributed through the heads of the schools of Greater Boston, no more are available. Considering the success of the first "Young People's Concert" in January, it is a matter of regret that the full schedule of the orchestra will permit no more this season.

Advertiser Feb 15

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

At the Symphony concert next Friday and Saturday, Fredric Fradkin, the concert master, will play Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" with the orchestra. Mozart's great G minor symphony is also on this program. The concluding number will be Henry F. Gilbert's "Dance in Place Congo."

"SA[illegible]

Herald Feb. 15

FRADKIN SOLOIST

At the Symphony concerts to be given next Friday and Saturday, Feb. 20 and 21, Fredric Fradkin, the concert master, will play Lalo's Spanish Symphony for, with the orchestra. Contrary to the usual custom, Mr. Fradkin will play the Scherzando, which, often omitted, is the most characteristically Spanish part of this favorite among concertos. Mozart's G minor Symphony is played on this program. The concluding number of more than ordinary interest will be Henry F. Gilbert's "The Dance in Place Congo," built upon Negro dances cleaned from the celebrated square in New Orleans.

rom.....

ddress New York City

ate.....

He's Started Three.

Sir George Henschel, as the first conductor of the Boston Symphony is now known, has been offered the chair of music at the University of Johannesburg, South Africa, which would involve also the organizing of an orchestra. Should the distinguished conductor, now in his seventieth year, accept the offer he would found his fourth orchestra, for in addition to the Boston organization in 1881 he brought into being also the London Symphony in 1885 and in 1893 the Scottish Orchestra.

fice.
WANTE[illegible]
is no room
f the orchest[illegible] more this

Welli[illegible]
ERTIFIED F[illegible]
INDUST[illegible]

GILBERT'S 'DANCE' BY SYMPHONY

Wildly Barbaric and Sensuous—Fradkin as Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Frederick Fradkin, concertmaster, was soloist at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The programme consisted of Mozart's G minor symphony, Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole," for violin and orchestra, and Henry F. Gilbert's "Dance in Place Congo," performed for the first time as a symphonic poem.

The same composition was performed in New York and in Boston as a ballet by the Metropolitan Opera Company, March 23 and April 26, 1918.

BETTER IN CONCERT FORM

When this music was performed as ballet the stage spectacle was not congruous with Mr. Gilbert's original conception of the music. Moreover, an operatic orchestra in a theatre pit does not sound as a symphony orchestra on the stage. Most important of all, the better the music the more likely it is to gain and not lose if each hearer is allowed to imagine its meanings for himself. For these reasons, the ballet was far less impressive than the symphonic poem, unhampered by any stage scene, played yesterday.

The music as heard yesterday made a fresh and a very deep impression. It is wildly imaginative, barbaric, vulgar, tropical, sensuous. The last pages surpass the music of any other American we know in originality and imagination. Nietzsche would have called them "Mediterranean." The music is here strangely eerie and fateful. The slaves in New Orleans of the '40s have danced their wildest; they leap and fall to the ground with foaming lips; they exult or strive furiously for the favors of the women; and at last, like the knell of fate itself, their frenzy is interrupted by the tolling of the 9 o'clock bell to quarters, the reminder of another day of pain and toil. And there are sounds in the orchestra like the shuffling of feet, and mournful echoes of motives derived from actual songs and yells of the Creoles of a day past; there is the shudder of the night in the music, there is an orchestral cry of inarticulate rage and despair.

Work of Ten Years

This symphonic poem was not composed in one single period of the composer's development. Its composition covered roughly a period of 10 years. Measures which Mr. Gilbert wrote in for practical exigencies of the ballet have happily been eliminated, but anyone who has carefully and thoughtfully watched his style will be interested to observe the difference in thought, manner, harmonic texture, between the opening and the superb pages at the end.

But the work has enormous energy and continuity of thought throughout. The orchestration, it is true, still impresses one as being thick, over-heavy. Yet this does not serve to conceal the great originality of many instrumental effects, the power and breadth of the brush strokes with which strong, sometimes harsh, sometimes very beautiful colors are put on the canvas. The recklessness of mood does not distract the composer from true principles of symphonic development. There are uneven passages, there are passages experimental, or unconsciously imitative—even in this score by an American bent on discarding outworn musical formulas of Europe—of music of other and older schools. We think especially of the fugal manner in which the dance theme is developed after the love music. The contrast between this rather old-fashioned and conventional start with the reckless abandon, the wanton barbarousness of pages, which quickly follow, is naive, yet it makes its mark, because of its imperious energy of the composer's imagination, which holds complete sway from the first note to the last, and evokes from Creole folk-tunes, a score which stands alone in its color, its romantic and emotional qualities, among American compositions.

"In Triumphant Vulgarity"

It goes without saying that some were shocked by the theme of the Bamboula—we quote Mr. Gilbert's note in the programme book—"ripped out in all its triumphant vulgarity by the full orchestra"; by the unrefined humor of the glockenspiel in the witty theme that follows, by the drunken song of trumpets in fifths as the revel works up to its climax. But we think many will agree with us, that despite instrumentation undoubtedly inclining to be thick and heavy, and because of its surge of elemental human impulse, its mighty songs of the soil, this work is the most significant, the most triumphant vindication of his talent and his artistic attitude that Mr. Gilbert has yet achieved.

Furthermore, while it is easy to realize the orchestral heaviness in many places, it is also easy to recall superbly dramatic and gorgeous effects. Think of the use of the harps, of certain percussion instruments. There are audacious and savagely brilliant combinations not found in the textbooks. The orchestration needs, in our opinion, some clarification, and partly because it is almost too full of good ideas. There are too many effects at the same time. They frequently muddle the sound and get in each other's way. There are strokes of instrumental genius by a composer with a native imagination if not invariably a native skill in the employment of orchestral instruments.

At the end of this performance the audience, loth to leave the hall, kept applauding until Mr. Gilbert appeared on the stage.

Mr. Fradkin's Playing

Mr. Fradkin played a concerto which is charming and original from beginning to end with technical exuberance and with fine taste, polish, feeling for the style of the music. After all, are there many better violin concertos? This music is piquant to the last detail; melodious, transparent and fascinating in its rhythms. Had the music been duller, such a performance as Mr. Fradkin's would have stirred the audience to well-merited applause.

Last, but not least, in reversing the order of discussion from the order of the items of the programme, let it be said that Mr. Monteux's performance of the Mozart symphony was of the highest artistic quality, admirable in phrasing, in the transparency of the orchestral tone; above all, in the prodigious spirit and glow of Mozart's wondrous music.

Shipping

SYMPHONY PLAYS G MINOR MOZART

By J. V. CLARK

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week proceeds in rather routine fashion. For the symphony Mr. Monteux has chosen the G minor Mozart, which he gives a performance of beautiful clarity and proportion. There is no perfunctory approach to the performance of the familiar work.

As soloist, Mr. Frederick Fradkin of the orchestra plays the familiar Spanish symphony for violin and orchestra by Lalo. The work is a "sure fire" success. It would be as hard for any violinist to miss success with this tuneful, fascinating work as it would be for an emotional actress to fail with "Camille." Mr. Fradkin's playing is familiar. He has elegance, fleetness, a polished technique, which are just what the Lalo symphony requires.

An emotional appeal and great sensuousness of tone are not absolutely necessary to a great performance of the work, although more sensuousness of tone than Mr. Fradkin commands would not have been amiss.

For the final number, Mr. Monteux plays Gilbert's "The Dance in the Place Congo," previously given here as a ballet. Although in more fitting surroundings in Symphony Hall than in an opera house, the work retains its previous impression.

"It is "raw" music, rough, splendidly vulgar. Certain sections, as that in which Gilbert uses the Bamboula theme, are striking. The work lacks in polish. When Mr. Gilbert's most ardent admirers cannot fail to see the "overwriting" in the orchestration. The use of too many instruments, the muddiness of orchestral color and the corners not always easily turned, is apparent. Certainly, Mr. Gilbert, like other American composers, cannot complain of having been denied a hearing at Symphony Hall.

SYMPHONY GIVES 15TH CONCERT

Fradkin Brilliant Violin Soloist for Lalo's Spanish Symphony

ORCHESTRA PLAYS PIECE BY GILBERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, gave its 15th concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Fradkin was the solo violinist. The program was as follows: Mozart, Symphony in G minor; Lalo, Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra; Gilbert, "The Dance in Place Congo" (first time at these concerts).

The performance of Mozart's symphony was a beautiful one; beautiful in its clarity, its euphony, its unfailing regard for proportion. Some years ago, a prominent writer about music, a wild-eyed worshipper of Liszt and Wagner, published the statement that this symphony is interesting only in a historical sense. His idols would have been the first to laugh at him. There are few things in art that are perfect. The G minor symphony is one of them. Its apparent simplicity is an adorable triumph of supreme art.

Too often this music is played in a perfunctory manner, as if the conductor had said to himself: "We should play at least one symphony by Mozart each season. Let's see—what did we play last year? The one in E flat major. O yes. Well, we'll play the one in G minor. You all know it but we'll run through it for form's sake," and he yawns during the rehearsal, impatient to put some thunderous modern work on his rack, so that he can show the audience what he can do. The French have long been famous for their interpretation of music by Mozart and Haydn, as Habeneck's performance of Beethoven's 9th symphony excited the wonder and praise of Wagner when he heard the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory.

Mr. Fradkin gave a brilliant interpretation of Lalo's fascinating "Spanish" Symphony, a performance that was also sensuous. Furthermore there was the capriciousness, the elegance demanded by the music. Technically and aesthetically, the interpretation was a fine one. It was thoroughly appreciated by the great audience. Applause in this instance was not perfunctory, courteous, respectful; it was enthusiastic.

Mr. Gilbert, inspired by a magazine article of George W. Cable, wrote a symphonic poem, "The Dance in Place Congo," over 12 years ago. Discouraged by indifferent or ignorant conductors, he used this music for a ballet, which was produced at the Metropolitan Opera House in March, 1918, and performed here by the Metropolitan company in April. The music was heard yesterday as the composer wished it to be heard; but yesterday, as two years ago, he was unfortunate in this respect: his composition when played here as a ballet followed Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Cog d'Or," yesterday it followed music by Lalo. Now, the Russian and the Frenchman were masters of orchestration. Mr. Gilbert, indisputable as his native talent is, has yet to learn the value of economy of means. The orchestration of "Dance in Place Congo" is thick. The temptation to use all the instruments at his command was not always resisted by him. For this reason, and possibly for other reasons, the poem, although it made a more marked impression than when it served the purposes of a ballet, did not firmly hold the attention throughout. The opening episode is powerful; there is the true tragic note with the thought of barbaric feeling. The Bamboula theme is announced with the splendid and fitting vulgarity. The lyrical episode has charming measures, but from here until the dramatic ending there are pages that are of comparative little significance. It is easy to say that this or that composition is too long. Sometimes the mental and physical state of the hearer prompts the reproach; but as a rule the fault is in the composer's unwillingness or inability to say much in a few pages. Overelaboration is always ruinous. Garrulity is tiresome in art as in life. The desire to be explicit, circumstantial in narration, often lessens the immediate effect and forbids remembrance.

Mr. Monteux is to be thanked for putting this symphonic poem on the program. Music does not deserve to be heard at a Symphony concert, simply because it was written by an American. If the music has importance, it should be heard even if the composer happens to be an American. What Mr. Gilbert writes is certainly worthy of serious consideration.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Gluck, Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Haydn, Symphony in G. major (B. & H. No. 13); Debusy, "The Blessed Damozel" (Ethel Frank, soprano; Claramond Thompson, contralto; female chorus trained by Mr. Townsend); Charpentier, "Impressions of Italy."

The modern Russians, in using folk music as the melodic basis of their works, usually eschews anything which savors of the development sections of classic symphonies, because many folk tunes can only be "developed" by main strength.

In the introductory section, which returns at the close of the symphonic poem, however, Mr Gilbert has struck a truer balance between civilized and primitive music, and written some very moving and eloquent pages. His treatment of the "Bamboula," when he announced it as a theme, is equally commendable. But it is always a mistake to try to paint the lily, or to introduce modern improvements into primitive folk tunes.

Mr Fradkin, concert master of the orchestra, was very successful as soloist in Lalo's familiar "Spanish Symphony." His tone and technic show steady improvement. He is not content with being a good orchestra player, but vies with some success with many much-exploited virtuosos.

The first movement of Mozart's G minor Symphony is unquestionably "allegro molto," and was so played yesterday. Dr Muck used to make it an allegretto, with an artistic success, which warranted the liberty taken. It can, moreover, be argued that Mozart meant by "allegro" to indicate the mood rather than the speed of the music.

The other three movements came nearer the superb standard set by Muck in this music, but paradoxically enough it was the Teutonic version which used to be delicate and graceful where the Gallic version seemed clumsy and heavy handed. The gradations of accent lacked subtlety yesterday. In playing Mozart, "toujours le nuance" is one's best motto.

and horns played with delicacy and grace particularly in the trio of the minuet. In short, the symphony was beautifully played, a fact fortunately realized by the audience, which gave evident signs of delight and pleasure. Mr. Fradkin gave unexpected proof of virtuosity. His performance of Mendelssohns' concerto last season, while well enough in a negative way, was hardly one to excite enthusiasm. His playing of the Lalo symphony, however, revealed a virtuoso of the first rank. It was full of style, fanciful without becoming sentimental, impassioned in the true Spanish manner. His tone was rich and full, his passage-work clear and brilliant. The orchestra accompanied with great flexibility.

Henry Gilbert is America's most "national" composer. His music is as distinctively American as that of Rimsky-Korsakow is distinctively Russian. We may not admire Mr. Gilbert's music but we must admit that it is sincere that it is the consistent expression o

GILBERT'S POEM BY THE SYMPHONY

"Dance in the Place Congo" Found Interesting

Concert Master Fradkin Scores as Soloist in Lalo's Music

"The Dance in the Place Congo," by Henry F. Gilbert of Cambridge, was the most interesting item on the program of yesterday's Symphony concert. It was suggested by an article in an old number of a magazine, by George W. Cable, which Mr Gilbert discovered when casting about for a distinctively American subject for a symphonic poem. The Place Congo is an open square in the outskirts of New Orleans, where the slaves used to gather to dance and sing on Sunday afternoons.

Mr. Gilbert's music was first heard in Boston at a ballet performance by the Metropolitan Opera Company in April, 1918. In his opinion, and in that of many others, the Metropolitan forces, with excellent intentions, did not altogether do the work justice. Mr Monteux, who conducted the Metropolitan performances, showed again yesterday that he is not the ideal leader for such music. All the outbursts sounded calculated. It was like an academically trained musician trying to play ragtime in a dance hall and unable to play it spontaneously, as though Schumann and Debussy had never lived.

This regrettable sophistication is, however, not confined to Mr Monteux. Mr. Gilbert himself has made the error of introducing a free fantasia on two dominant motives derived from the folk dance, the "Bamboula," something obviously derived from the practices of classic composers and not inherent in the nature of the negro folk tunes he is using as his themes.

RY 21, 1920

MUSIC

The Music of Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The fifteenth symphony concert was given on February 20. The program was as follow::

Mozart. Symphony in G minor.

Lalo. Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra, Fredric Fradkin, soloist.

Gilbert. "The Dance in Place Congo." (First time at these concerts.)

This program covered a wide range of emotions and style. The distance between the grace and refinement of Mozart's Symphony and the rough and tumble symphonic poem by Gilbert is far and Lalo's Spanish Symphony hardly served as an adequate connecting link. The program, however, was an excellent medium for a display of versatility on the part of Mr. Monteux, who conducted throughout the afternoon with unusual authority. Each piece, widely differing from its neighbors on the program, was given its proper atmosphere and coloring. Three distinct styles were represented and admirably contrasted. This ability to differentiate sharply between various styles and schools of composition is one of Mr. Monteux's most outstanding characteristics. It has given the symphony concerts of this season a varied and interesting character. In former times every piece was given a Teutonic tinge. This was tiresome. We now hear the music of many schools played in as many different ways. Mozart is difficult to play well. The slightest uncertainty of ensemble is immediately apparent. The strings played with exceptiona beauty of tone. The phrases of the Andante were sung by the first violins as by one player. The wood-wind his devotion to an ideal, a devotion which has never wavered throughout his long career. "The Dance in Place Congo" is a good example of his art. It contains his qualities and defects in profusion. The crude, though brilliant, orchestral coloring, the tiresome repetitions, the needless barbarities, the technical shortcomings are all present. But we also hear the poet, trying to make himself heard above the din of the bass drum, the imaginative, fanciful musician attempting to express his emotions, albeit with limited technical resources. To be more specific, the plan of this symphonic poem is poetically conceived. The details are in many cases weakly carried out. For example, the phrase representing the "tragic and poignant cry of rage and revolt of an entire race against the restraining bonds of slavery" can hardly be said to be arresting. The "Bamboula" theme, occurring for the first time with a realistic orchestration quite necessary to the general scheme of the composition, need hardly have been repeated with so little change. The lyric episode seems too long, its repetitions are fatiguing. Yet it must be admitted that the work as a whole produces a brilliant effect. There is much that rings true, much that is distinctive.

GILBERT'S 'DANCE IN PLACE CONGO' GIVES PLEASURE

Mr. Monteux's exceptionally fine reading of the Mozart symphony, G minor; Mr. Fradkin's brilliant interpretation of Lalo's Spanish symphony, and Mr. Gilbert's "The Dance in Place Congo," were all features in the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon.

It would have been better for the Gil-

MOZART PLAYED AT SYMPHONY

Reduced by Boston Banks Yesterday; Orpheum Will Be Taken from Curb

Of unusual interest to music lovers was the distinctive program offered yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conducting. Mozart's "Symphony in G minor," well known to many from frequent performances in Boston, was received enthusiastically.

A symphony for violin and orchestra by the Spanish composer, Edouard Lalo, gave full scope for the notable playing of Fredric Fradkin, concertmaster of the orchestra. The composition is rich in fanciful, rhythmic movements and in phrases which require delicacy and firmnes of tone. Mr. Fradkin displayed a technique which mastered the most intricate and bewildering passages, and his sympathetic interpretation of the charm and languorous grace of the symphony was keenly appreciated by the audience. Mr. Fradkin was recalled many times.

The third number was in many ways the feature of the program. "The Dance in Place Congo" is a modern American composition by Henry F. P. Gilbert, a symphonic poem founded on a description by George W. Cable of a Louisiana slave-revel. It is distinctively American music, in that it is based upon a primitive and barbaric, although essentially native expression of the art of the negro races in the South. The music has a wild, syncopated rhythm, startlingly akin to the "jazz" of modern dances, with an elusive and haunting melody which rises insistently above the clash and din of the louder instruments.

The unrestrained frenzy of the "Bamboula," a barbaric negro slave-dance, gives way to interludes of more harmonious passages, chanted with the swing of an old revivalist hymn, and then rises again in chaotic and blaring measures.

The audience showed a keen interest in the music, after the first shock of the inroads of "jazz" into a Friday afternoon concert. They applauded a bit breathlessly after particularly spectacular and discordant finale, and recalled Mr. Monteux several times.

GILBERT'S 'DANCE' BY SYMPHONY

Wildly Barbaric and Sensuous—Fradkin as Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Frederick Fradkin, concertmaster, was soloist at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The programme consisted of Mozart's G minor symphony, Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole," for violin and orchestra, and Henry F. Gilbert's "Dance in Place Congo," performed for the first time as a symphonic poem.

The same composition was performed in New York and in Boston as a ballet by the Metropolitan Opera Company, March 23 and April 26, 1918.

BETTER IN CONCERT FORM

When this music was performed as ballet the stage spectacle was not congruous with Mr. Gilbert's original conception of the music. Moreover, an operatic orchestra in a theatre pit does not sound as a symphony orchestra on the stage. Most important of all, the better the music the more likely it is to gain and not lose if each hearer is allowed to imagine its meanings for himself. For these reasons, the ballet was far less impressive than the symphonic poem, unhampered by any stage scene, played yesterday.

The music as heard yesterday made a fresh and a very deep impression. It is wildly imaginative, barbaric, vulgar, tropical, sensuous. The last pages surpass the music of any other American we know in originality and imagination. Nietzsche would have called them "Mediterranean." The music is here strangely eerie and fateful. The slaves in New Orleans of the '40s have danced their wildest; they leap and fall to the ground with foaming lips; they exult or strive furiously for the favors of the women; and at last, like the knell of fate itself, their frenzy is interrupted by the tolling of the 9 o'clock bell to quarters, the reminder of another day of pain and toil. And there are sounds in the orchestra like the shuffling of feet, and mournful echoes of motives derived from actual songs and yells of the Creoles of a day past; there is the shudder of the night in the music, there is an orchestral cry of inarticulate rage and despair.

Work of Ten Years

This symphonic poem was not composed in one single period of the composer's development. Its composition covered roughly a period of 10 years. Measures which Mr. Gilbert wrote in for practical exigencies of the ballet have happily been eliminated, but anyone who has carefully and thoughtfully watched his style will be interested to observe the difference in thought, manner, harmonic texture, between the opening and the superb pages at the end.

But the work has enormous energy and continuity of thought throughout. The orchestration, it is true, still impresses one as being thick, over-heavy. Yet this does ont serve to conceal the great originality of many instrumental effects, the power and breadth of the brush strokes with which strong, sometimes harsh, sometimes very beautiful colors are put on the canvas. The recklessness of mood does not distract the composer from true principles of symphonic development. There are uneven passages, there are passages experimental, or unconsciously imitative—even in this score by an American bent on discarding outworn musical formulas of Europe—of music of other and older schools. We think especially of the fugal manner in which the dance theme is developed after the love music. The contrast between this rather old-fashioned and conventional start with the reckless abandon, the wanton barbarousness of pages, which quickly follow, is naive, yet it makes its mark, because of its imperious energy of the composer's imagination, which holds complete sway from the first note to the last, and evokes from Creole folk-tunes, a score which stands alone in its color, its romantic and emotional qualities, among American compositions.

"In Triumphant Vulgarity"

It goes without saying that some were shocked by the theme of the Bamboula—we quote Mr. Gilbert's note in the programme book—"ripped out in all its triumphant vulgarity by the full orchestra"; by the unrefined humor of the glockenspiel in the witty theme that follows, by the drunken song of trumpets in fifths as the revel works up to its climax. But we think many will agree with us, that despite instrumentation undoubtedly inclining to be thick and heavy, and because of its surge of elemental human impulse, its mighty songs of the soil, this work is the most significant, the most triumphant vindication of his talent and his artistic attitude that Mr. Gilbert has yet achieved.

Furthermore, while it is easy to realize the orchestral heaviness in many places, it is also easy to recall superbly dramatic and gorgeous effects. Think of the use of the harps, of certain percussion instruments. There are audacious and savagely brilliant combinations not found in the textbooks. The orchestration needs, in our opinion, some clarification, and partly because it is almost too full of good ideas. There are too many effects at the same time. They frequently muddle the sound and get in each other's way. There are strokes of instrumental genius by a composer with a native imagination if not invariably a native skill in the employment of orchestral instruments.

At the end of this performance the audience, loth to leave the hall, kept applauding until Mr. Gilbert appeared on the stage.

Mr. Fradkin's Playing

Mr. Fradkin played a concerto which is charming and original from beginning to end with technical exuberance and with fine taste, polish, feeling for the style of the music. After all, are there many better violin concertos?

This music is piquant to the last detail; melodious, transparent and fascinating in its rhythms. Had the music been duller, such a performance as Mr. Fradkin's would have stirred the audience to well-merited applause.

Last, but not least, in reversing the order of discussion from the order of the items of the programme, let it be said that Mr. Monteux's performance of the Mozart symphony was of the highest artistic quality, admirable in phrasing, in the transparency of the orchestral tone; above all, in the prodigious spirit and glow of Mozart's wondrous music.

Shipping

SYMPHONY PLAYS G MINOR MOZART

By J. V. CLARK

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week proceeds in rather routine fashion. For the symphony Mr. Monteux has chosen the G minor Mozart, which he gives a performance of beautiful clarity and proportion. There is no perfunctory approach to the performance of the familiar work.

As soloist, Mr. Frederick Fradkin of the orchestra plays the familiar Spanish symphony for violin and orchestra by Lalo. The work is a "sure fire" success. It would be as hard for any violinist to miss success with this tuneful, fascinating work as it would be for an emotional actress to fail with "Camille." Mr. Fradkin's playing is familiar. He has elegance, fleetness, a polished technique, which are just what the Lalo symphony requires.

An emotional appeal and great sensuousness of tone are not absolutely necessary to a great performance of the work, although more sensuousness of tone than Mr. Fradkin commands would not have been amiss.

For the final number, Mr. Monteux plays Gilbert's "The Dance in the Place Congo," previously given here as a ballet. Although in more fitting surroundings in Symphony Hall than in an opera house, the work retains its previous impression.

"It is "raw" music, rough, splendidly vulgar. Certain sections, as that in which Gilbert uses the Bamboula theme, are striking. The work lacks in polish. When Mr. Gilbert's most ardent admirers cannot fail to see the "overwriting" in the orchestration. The use of too many instruments, the muddiness of orchestral color and the corners not always easily turned, is apparent. Certainly, Mr. Gilbert, like other American composers, cannot complain of having been denied a hearing at Symphony Hall.

SYMPHONY GIVES 15TH CONCERT

Fradkin Brilliant Violin Soloist for Lalo's Spanish Symphony

ORCHESTRA PLAYS PIECE BY GILBERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, gave its 15th concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Fradkin was the solo violinist. The program was as follows: Mozart, Symphony in G minor; Lalo, Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra; Gilbert, "The Dance in Place Congo" (first time at these concerts).

The performance of Mozart's symphony was a beautiful one; beautiful in its clarity, its euphony, its unfailing regard for proportion. Some years ago, a prominent writer about music, a wild-eyed worshipper of Liszt and Wagner, published the statement that this symphony is interesting only in a historical sense. His idols would have been the first to laugh at him. There are few things in art that are perfect. The G minor symphony is one of them. Its apparent simplicity is an adorable triumph of supreme art.

Too often this music is played in a perfunctory manner, as if the conductor had said to himself: "We should play at least one symphony by Mozart each season. Let's see—what did we play last year? The one in E flat major. O yes. Well, we'll play the one in G minor. You all know it but we'll run through it for form's sake," and he yawns during the rehearsal, impatient to put some thunderous modern work on his rack, so that he can show the audience what he can do. The French have long been famous for their interpretation of music by Mozart and Haydn, as Habeneck's performance of Beethoven's 9th symphony excited the wonder and praise of Wagner when he heard the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory.

Mr. Fradkin gave a brilliant interpretation of Lalo's fascinating "Spanish" Symphony, a performance that was also sensuous. Furthermore there was the capriciousness, the elegance demanded by the music. Technically and aesthetically, the interpretation was a fine one. It was thoroughly appreciated by the great audience. Applause in this instance was not perfunctory, courteous, respectful; it was enthusiastic.

Mr. Gilbert, inspired by a magazine article of George W. Cable, wrote a symphonic poem, "The Dance in Place Congo," over 12 years ago. Discouraged by indifferent or ignorant conductors, he used this music for a ballet, which was produced at the Metropolitan Opera House in March, 1918, and performed here by the Metropolitan company in April. The music was heard yesterday as the composer wished it to be heard; but yesterday, as two years ago, he was unfortunate in this respect: his composition when played here as a ballet followed Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Coq d'Or," yesterday it followed music by Lalo. Now, the Russian and the Frenchman were masters of orchestration. Mr. Gilbert, indisputable as his native talent is, has yet to learn the value of economy of means. The orchestration of "Dance in Place Congo" is thick. The temptation to use all the instruments at his disposal was not always resisted by him. For this reason, and possibly for other reasons, the poem, although it made a more marked impression than when it served the purposes of a ballet, did not firmly hold the attention throughout. The opening episode is powerful; there is the true tragic note with the thought of barbaric feeling. The Bamboula theme is announced with the splendid and fitting vulgarity. The lyrical episode has charming measures, but from here until the dramatic ending there are pages that are of comparative little significance. It is easy to say that this or that composition is too long. Sometimes the mental and physical state of the hearer prompts the reproach; but as a rule the fault is in the composer's unwillingness or inability to say much in a few pages. Overelaboration is always ruinous. Garrulity is tiresome in art as in life. The desire to be explicit, circumstantial in narration, often lessens the immediate effect and forbids remembrance.

Mr. Monteux is to be thanked for putting this symphonic poem on the program. Music does not deserve to be heard at a Symphony concert, simply because it was written by an American. If the music has importance, it should be heard even if the composer happens to be an American. What Mr. Gilbert writes is certainly worthy of serious consideration.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Gluck, Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Haydn, Symphony in G. major (B. & H. No. 13); Debusy, "The Blessed Damozel" (Ethel Frank, soprano; Claramond Thompson, contralto; female chorus trained by Mr. Townsend); Charpentier, "Impressions of Italy."

GILBERT'S POEM BY THE SYMPHONY

"Dance in the Place Congo" Found Interesting

Concert Master Fradkin Scores as Soloist in Lalo's Music

"The Dance in the Place Congo," by Henry F. Gilbert of Cambridge, was the most interesting item on the program of yesterday's Symphony concert. It was suggested by an article in an old number of a magazine, by George W. Cable, which Mr Gilbert discovered when casting about for a distinctively American subject for a symphonic poem. The Place Congo is an open square in the outskirts of New Orleans, where the slaves used to gather to dance and sing on Sunday afternoons.

Mr. Gilbert's music was first heard in Boston at a ballet performance by the Metropolitan Opera Company in April, 1918. In his opinion, and in that of many others, the Metropolitan forces, with excellent intentions, did not altogether do the work justice. Mr Monteux, who conducted the Metropolitan performances, showed again yesterday that he is not the ideal leader for such music. All the outbursts sounded calculated. It was like an academically trained musician trying to play ragtime in a dance hall and unable to play it spontaneously, as though Schumann and Debussy had never lived.

This regrettable sophistication is, however, not confined to Mr Monteux. Mr Gilbert himself has made the error of introducing a free fantasia on two dominant motives derived from the folk dance, the "Bamboula," something obviously derived from the practices of classic composers and not inherent in the nature of the negro folk tunes he is using as his themes.

The modern Russians, in using folk music as the melodic basis of their works, usually eschews anything which savors of the development sections of classic symphonies, because many folk tunes can only be "developed" by main strength.

In the introductory section, which returns at the close of the symphonic poem, however, Mr Gilbert has struck a truer balance between civilized and primitive music, and written some very moving and eloquent pages. His treatment of the "Bamboula," when he announced it as a theme, is equally commendable. But it is always a mistake to try to paint the lily, or to introduce modern improvements into primitive folk tunes.

Mr Fradkin, concert master of the orchestra, was very successful as soloist in Lalo's familiar "Spanish Symphony." His tone and technic show steady improvement. He is not content with being a good orchestra player, but vies with some success with many much-exploited virtuosos.

The first movement of Mozart's G minor Symphony is unquestionably "allegro molto," and was so played yesterday. Dr Muck used to make it an allegretto, with an artistic success, which warranted the liberty taken. It can, moreover, be argued that Mozart meant by "allegro" to indicate the mood rather than the speed of the music.

The other three movements came nearer the superb standard set by Muck in this music, but paradoxically enough it was the Teutonic version which used to be delicate and graceful where the Gallic version seemed clumsy and heavy handed. The gradations of accent lacked subtlety yesterday. In playing Mozart, "toujours le nuance" is one's best motto.

RY 21, 1920

MUSIC

The Music of Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The fifteenth symphony concert was given on February 20. The program was as follow::

Mozart. Symphony in G minor.

Lalo. Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra, Fredric Fradkin, soloist.

Gilbert. "The Dance in Place Congo," (First time at these concerts.)

This program covered a wide range of emotions and style. The distance between the grace and refinement of Mozart's Symphony and the rough and tumble symphonic poem by Gilbert is far and Lalo's Spanish Symphony hardly served as an adequate connecting link. The program, however, was an excellent medium for a display of versatility on the part of Mr. Monteux, who conducted throughout the afternoon with unusual authority. Each piece, widely differing from its neighbors on the program, was given its proper atmosphere and coloring. Three distinct styles were represented and admirably contrasted. This ability to differentiate sharply between various styles and schools of composition is one of Mr. Monteux's most outstanding characteristics. It has given the symphony concerts of this season a varied and interesting character. In former times every piece was given a Teutonic tinge. This was tiresome. We now hear the music of many schools played in as many different ways. Mozart is difficult to play well. The slightest uncertainty of ensemble is immediately apparent. The strings played with exceptional beauty of tone. The phrases of the Andante were sung by the first violins as by one player. The wood-wind and horns played with delicacy and grace particularly in the trio of the minuet. In short, the symphony was beautifully played, a fact fortunately realized by the audience, which gave evident signs of delight and pleasure. Mr. Fradkin gave unexpected proof of virtuosity. His performance of Mendelssohns' concerto last season, while well enough in a negative way, was hardly one to excite enthusiasm. His playing of the Lalo symphony, however, revealed a virtuoso of the first rank. It was full of style, fanciful without becoming sentimental, impassioned in the true Spanish manner. His tone was rich and full, his passage-work clear and brilliant. The orchestra accompanied with great flexibility.

Henry Gilbert is America's most "national" composer. His music is as distinctively American as that of Rimsky-Korsakow is distinctively Russian. We may not admire Mr. Gilbert's music but we must admit that it is sincere that it is the consistent expression o his devotion to an ideal, a devotion which has never wavered throughout his long career. "The Dance in Place Congo" is a good example of his art. It contains his qualities and defects in profusion. The crude, though brilliant, orchestral coloring, the tiresome repetitions, the needless barbarities, the technical shortcomings are all present. But we also hear the poet, trying to make himself heard above the din of the bass drum, the imaginative, fanciful musician attempting to express his emotions, albeit with limited technical resources. To be more specific, the plan of this symphonic poem is poetically conceived. The details are in many cases weakly carried out. For example, the phrase representing the "tragic and poignant cry of rage and revolt of an entire race against the restraining bonds of slavery" can hardly be said to be arresting. The "Bamboula" theme, occurring for the first time with a realistic orchestration quite necessary to the general scheme of the composition, need hardly have been repeated with so little change. The lyric episode seems too long, its repetitions are fatiguing. Yet it must be admitted that the work as a whole produces a brilliant effect. There is much that rings true, much that is distinctive.

GILBERT'S 'DANCE IN PLACE CONGO' GIVES PLEASURE

Mr. Monteux's exceptionally fine reading of the Mozart symphony, G minor; Mr. Fradkin's brilliant interpretation of Lalo's Spanish symphony, and Mr. Gilbert's "The Dance in Place Congo," were all features in the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon.

It would have been better for the Gil-

MOZART PLAYED AT SYMPHONY

Reduced by Boston Banks Yesterday; Orpheum Will Be Taken from Curb

Of unusual interest to music lovers was the distinctive program offered yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conducting. Mozart's "Symphony in G minor," well known to many from frequent performances in Boston, was received enthusiastically.

A symphony for violin and orchestra by the Spanish composer, Edouard Lalo, gave full scope for the notable playing of Fredric Fradkin, concertmaster of the orchestra. The composition is rich in fanciful, rhythmic movements and in phrases which require delicacy and firmnes of tone. Mr. Fradkin displayed a technique which mastered the most intricate and bewildering passages, and his sympathetic interpretation of the charm and languorous grace of the symphony was keenly appreciated by the audience. Mr. Fradkin was recalled many times.

The third number, was in many ways the feature of the program. "The Dance in Place Congo" is a modern American composition by Henry F. P. Gilbert, a symphonic poem founded on a description by George W. Cable of a Louisiana slave-revel. It is distinctively American music, in that it is based upon a primitive and barbaric, although essentially native expression of the art of the negro races in the South. The music has a wild, syncopated rhythm, startlingly akin to the "jazz" of modern dances, with an elusive and haunting melody which rises insistently above the clash and din of the louder instruments.

The unrestrained frenzy of the "Bamboula," a barbaric negro slave-dance, gives way to interludes of more harmonious passages, chanted with the swing of an old revivalist hymn, and then rises again in chaotic and blaring measures.

The audience showed a keen interest in the music, after the first shock of the inroads of "jazz" into a Friday afternoon concert. They applauded a bit breathlessly after a particularly spectacular and discordant finale, and recalled Mr. Monteux several times.

GILBERT'S 'DANCE' BY SYMPHONY

Wildly Barbaric and Sensuous—Fradkin as Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Frederick Fradkin, concertmaster, was soloist at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The programme consisted of Mozart's G minor symphony, Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole," for violin and orchestra, and Henry F. Gilbert's "Dance in Place Congo," performed for the first time as a symphonic poem.

The same composition was performed in New York and in Boston as a ballet by the Metropolitan Opera Company, March 23 and April 26, 1918.

BETTER IN CONCERT FORM

When this music was performed as ballet the stage spectacle was not congruous with Mr. Gilbert's original conception of the music. Moreover, an operatic orchestra in a theatre pit does not sound as a symphony orchestra on the stage. Most important of all, the better the music the more likely it is to gain and not lose if each hearer is allowed to imagine its meanings for himself. For these reasons, the ballet was far less impressive than the symphonic poem, unhampered by any stage scene, played yesterday.

The music as heard yesterday made a fresh and a very deep impression. It is wildly imaginative, barbaric, vulgar, tropical, sensuous. The last pages surpass the music of any other American we know in originality and imagination. Nietzsche would have called them "Mediterranean." The music is here strangely eerie and fateful. The slaves in New Orleans of the '40s have danced their wildest; they leap and fall to the ground with foaming lips; they exult or strive furiously for the favors of the women; and at last, like the knell of fate itself, their frenzy is interrupted by the tolling of the 9 o'clock bell to quarters, the reminder of another day of pain and toil. And there are sounds in the orchestra like the shuffling of feet, and mournful echoes of motives derived from actual songs and yells of the Creoles of a day past; there is the shudder of the night in the music, there is an orchestral cry of inarticulate rage and despair.

Work of Ten Years

This symphonic poem was not composed in one single period of the composer's development. Its composition covered roughly a period of 10 years. Measures which Mr. Gilbert wrote in for practical exigencies of the ballet have happily been eliminated, but anyone who has carefully and thoughtfully watched his style will be interested to observe the difference in thought, manner, harmonic texture, between the opening and the superb pages at the end.

But the work has enormous energy and continuity of thought throughout. The orchestration, it is true, still impresses one as being thick, over-heavy. Yet this does ont serve to conceal the great originality of many instrumental effects, the power and breadth of the brush strokes with which strong, sometimes harsh, sometimes very beautiful colors are put on the canvas. The recklessness of mood does not distract the composer from true principles of symphonic development. There are uneven passages, there are passages experimental, or unconsciously imitative—even in this score by an American bent on discarding outworn musical formulas of Europe—of music of other and older schools. We think especially of the fugal manner in which the dance theme is developed after the love music. The contrast between this rather old-fashioned and conventional start with the reckless abandon, the wanton barbarousness of pages, which quickly follow, is naive, yet it makes its mark, because of its imperious energy of the composer's imagination, which holds complete sway from the first note to the last, and evokes from Creole folk-tunes, a score which stands alone in its color, its romantic and emotional qualities, among American compositions.

"In Triumphant Vulgarity"

It goes without saying that some were shocked by the theme of the Bamboula—we quote Mr. Gilbert's note in the programme book—"ripped out in all its triumphant vulgarity by the full orchestra"; by the unrefined humor of the glockenspiel in the witty theme that follows, by the drunken song of trumpets in fifths as the revel works up to its climax. But we think many will agree with us, that despite instrumentation undoubtedly inclining to be thick and heavy, and because of its surge of elemental human impulse, its mighty songs of the soil, this work is the most significant, the most triumphant vindication of his talent and his artistic attitude that Mr. Gilbert has yet achieved.

Furthermore, while it is easy to realize the orchestral heaviness in many places, it is also easy to recall superbly dramatic and gorgeous effects. Think of the use of the harps, of certain percussion instruments. There are audacious and savagely brilliant combinations not found in the textbooks. The orchestration needs, in our opinion, some clarification, and partly because it is almost too full of good ideas. There are too many effects at the same time. They frequently muddle the sound and get in each other's way. There are strokes of instrumental genius by a composer with a native imagination if not invariably a native skill in the employment of orchestral instruments.

At the end of this performance the audience, loth to leave the hall, kept applauding until Mr. Gilbert appeared on the stage.

Mr. Fradkin's Playing

Mr. Fradkin played a concerto which is charming and original from beginning to end with technical exuberance and with fine taste, polish, feeling for the style of the music. After all, are there many better violin concertos? This music is piquant to the last detail; melodious, transparent and fascinating in its rhythms. Had the music been duller, such a performance as Mr. Fradkin's would have stirred the audience to well-merited applause.

Last, but not least, in reversing the order of discussion from the order of the items of the programme, let it be said that Mr. Monteux's performance of the Mozart symphony was of the highest artistic quality, admirable in phrasing, in the transparency of the orchestral tone; above all, in the prodigious spirit and glow of Mozart's wondrous music.

Shipping

SYMPHONY PLAYS G MINOR MOZART

By J. V. CLARK

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week proceeds in rather routine fashion. For the symphony Mr. Monteux has chosen the G minor Mozart, which he gives a performance of beautiful clarity and proportion. There is no perfunctory approach to the performance of the familiar work.

As soloist, Mr. Frederick Fradkin of the orchestra plays the familiar Spanish symphony for violin and orchestra by Lalo. The work is a "sure fire" success. It would be as hard for any violinist to miss success with this tuneful, fascinating work as it would be for an emotional actress to fail with "Camille." Mr. Fradkin's playing is familiar. He has elegance, fleetness, a polished technique, which are just what the Lalo symphony requires.

An emotional appeal and great sensuousness of tone are not absolutely necessary to a great performance of the work, although more sensuousness of tone than Mr. Fradkin commands would not have been amiss.

For the final number, Mr. Monteux plays Gilbert's "The Dance in the Place Congo," previously given here as a ballet. Although in more fitting surroundings in Symphony Hall than in an opera house, the work retains its previous impression.

"It is "raw" music, rough, splendidly vulgar. Certain sections, as that in which Gilbert uses the Bamboula theme, are striking. The work lacks in polish. When Mr. Gilbert's most ardent admirers cannot fail to see the "overwriting" in the orchestration. The use of too many instruments, the muddiness of orchestral color and the corners not always easily turned, is apparent. Certainly, Mr. Gilbert, like other American composers, cannot complain of having been denied a hearing at Symphony Hall.

SYMPHONY GIVES 15TH CONCERT

Fradkin Brilliant Violin Soloist for Lalo's Spanish Symphony

ORCHESTRA PLAYS PIECE BY GILBERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, gave its 15th concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Fradkin was the solo violinist. The program was as follows: Mozart, Symphony in G minor; Lalo, Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra; Gilbert, "The Dance in Place Congo" (first time at these concerts).

The performance of Mozart's symphony was a beautiful one; beautiful in its clarity, its euphony, its unfailing regard for proportion. Some years ago, a prominent writer about music, a wild-eyed worshipper of Liszt and Wagner, published the statement that this symphony is interesting only in a historical sense. His idols would have been the first to laugh at him. There are few things in art that are perfect. The G minor symphony is one of them. Its apparent simplicity is an adorable triumph of supreme art.

Too often this music is played in a perfunctory manner, as if the conductor had said to himself: "We should play at least one symphony by Mozart each season. Let's see—what did we play last year? The one in E flat major. O yes. Well, we'll play the one in G minor. You all know it but we'll run through it for form's sake," and he yawns during the rehearsal, impatient to put some thunderous modern work on his rack, so that he can show the audience what he can do. The French have long been famous for their interpretation of music by Mozart and Haydn, as Habeneck's performance of Beethoven's 9th symphony excited the wonder and praise of Wagner when he heard the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory.

Mr. Fradkin gave a brilliant interpretation of Lalo's fascinating "Spanish" Symphony, a performance that was also sensuous. Furthermore there was the capriciousness, the elegance demanded by the music. Technically and aesthetically, the interpretation was a fine one. It was thoroughly appreciated by the great audience. Applause in this instance was not perfunctory, courteous, respectful; it was enthusiastic.

Mr. Gilbert, inspired by a magazine article of George W. Cable, wrote a symphonic poem, "The Dance in Place Congo," over 12 years ago. Discouraged by indifferent or ignorant conductors, he used this music for a ballet, which was produced at the Metropolitan Opera House in March, 1918, and performed here by the Metropolitan company in April. The music was heard yesterday as the composer wished it to be heard; but yesterday, as two years ago, he was unfortunate in this respect: his composition when played here as a ballet followed Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Coq d'Or," yesterday it followed music by Lalo. Now, the Russian and the Frenchman were masters of orchestration. Mr. Gilbert, indisputable as his native talent is, has yet to learn the value of economy of means. The orchestration of "Dance in Place Congo" is thick. The temptation to use all the instruments at his disposal was not always resisted by him. For this reason, and possibly for [illegible] the poem, although it made a more marked impression than when it served the purposes of a ballet, did not firmly hold the attention throughout. The opening episode is powerful; there is the true tragic note with the thought of barbaric feeling. The Bamboula theme is announced with the splendid and fitting vulgarity. The lyrical episode has charming measures, but from here until the dramatic ending there are pages that are of comparative little significance. It is easy to say that this or that composition is too long. Sometimes the mental and physical state of the hearer prompts the reproach; but as a rule the fault is in the composer's unwillingness or inability to say much in a few pages. Overelaboration is always ruinous. Garrulity is tiresome in art as in life. The desire to be explicit, circumstantial in narration, often lessens the immediate effect and forbids remembrance.

Mr. Monteux is to be thanked for putting this symphonic poem on the program. Music does not deserve to be heard at a Symphony concert, simply because it was written by an American. If the music has importance, it should be heard even if the composer happens to be an American. What Mr. Gilbert writes is certainly worthy of serious consideration.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Gluck, Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Haydn, Symphony in G. major (B. & H. No. 13); Debusy, "The Blessed Damozel" (Ethel Frank, soprano; Claramond Thompson, contralto; female chorus trained by Mr. Townsend); Charpentier, "Impressions of Italy."

GILBERT'S POEM BY THE SYMPHONY

"Dance in the Place Congo" Found Interesting

Concert Master Fradkin Scores as Soloist in Lalo's Music

"The Dance in the Place Congo," by Henry F. Gilbert of Cambridge, was the most interesting item on the program of yesterday's Symphony concert. It was suggested by an article in an old number of a magazine, by George W. Cable, which Mr Gilbert discovered when casting about for a distinctively American subject for a symphonic poem. The Place Congo is an open square in the outskirts of New Orleans, where the slaves used to gather to dance and sing on Sunday afternoons.

Mr. Gilbert's music was first heard in Boston at a ballet performance by the Metropolitan Opera Company in April, 1918. In his opinion, and in that of many others, the Metropolitan forces, with excellent intentions, did not altogether do the work justice. Mr Monteux, who conducted the Metropolitan performances, showed again yesterday that he is not the ideal leader for such music. All the outbursts sounded calculated. It was like an academically trained musician trying to play ragtime in a dance hall and unable to play it spontaneously, as though Schumann and Debussy had never lived.

This regrettable sophistication is, however, not confined to Mr Monteux. Mr Gilbert himself has made the error of introducing a free fantasia on two dominant motives derived from the folk dance, the "Bamboula," something obviously derived from the practices of classic composers and not inherent in the nature of the negro folk tunes he is using as his themes.

The modern Russians, in using folk music as the melodic basis of their works, usually eschews anything which savors of the development sections of classic symphonies, because many folk tunes can only be "developed" by main strength.

In the introductory section, which returns at the close of the symphonic poem, however, Mr Gilbert has struck a truer balance between civilized and primitive music, and written some very moving and eloquent pages. His treatment of the "Bamboula," when he announced it as a theme, is equally commendable. But it is always a mistake to try to paint the lily, or to introduce modern improvements into primitive folk tunes.

Mr Fradkin, concert master of the orchestra, was very successful as soloist in Lalo's familiar "Spanish Symphony." His tone and technic show steady improvement. He is not content with being a good orchestra player, but vies with some success with many much-exploited virtuosos.

The first movement of Mozart's G minor Symphony is unquestionably "allegro molto," and was so played yesterday. Dr Muck used to make it an allegretto, with an artistic success, which warranted the liberty taken. It can, moreover, be argued that Mozart meant by "allegro" to indicate the mood rather than the speed of the music.

The other three movements came nearer the superb standard set by Muck in this music, but paradoxically enough it was the Teutonic version which used to be delicate and graceful where the Gallic version seemed clumsy and heavy handed. The gradations of accent lacked subtlety yesterday. In playing Mozart, "toujours le nuance" is one's best motto.

and horns played with delicacy and grace particularly in the trio of the minuet. In short, the symphony was beautifully played, a fact fortunately realized by the audience, which gave evident signs of delight and pleasure. Mr. Fradkin gave unexpected proof of virtuosity. His performance of Mendelssohns' concerto last season, while well enough in a negative way, was hardly one to excite enthusiasm. His playing of the Lalo symphony, however, revealed a virtuoso of the first rank. It was full of style, fanciful without becoming sentimental, impassioned in the true Spanish manner. His tone was rich and full, his passage-work clear and brilliant. The orchestra accompanied with great flexibility.

Henry Gilbert is America's most "national" composer. His music is as distinctively American as that of Rimsky-Korsakow is distinctively Russian. We may not admire Mr. Gilbert's music but we must admit that it is sincere, that it is the consistent expression of his devotion to an ideal, a devotion which has never wavered throughout his long career. "The Dance in Place Congo" is a good example of his art. It contains his qualities and defects in profusion. The crude, though brilliant, orchestral coloring, the tiresome repetitions, the needless barbarities, the technical shortcomings are all present. But we also hear the poet, trying to make himself heard above the din of the bass drum, the imaginative, fanciful musician attempting to express his emotions, albeit with limited technical resources. To be more specific, the plan of this symphonic poem is poetically conceived. The details are in many cases weakly carried out. For example, the phrase representing the "tragic and poignant cry of rage and revolt of an entire race against the restraining bonds of slavery" can hardly be said to be arresting. The "Bamboula" theme, occurring for the first time with a realistic orchestration quite necessary to the general scheme of the composition, need hardly have been repeated with so little change. The lyric episode seems too long, its repetitions are fatiguing. Yet it must be admitted that the work as a whole produces a brilliant effect. There is much that rings true, much that is distinctive.

RY 21, 1920

MUSIC

The Music of Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The fifteenth symphony concert was given on February 20. The program was as follow::

Mozart. Symphony in G minor.

Lalo. Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra, Fredric Fradkin, soloist.

Gilbert. "The Dance in Place Congo." (First time at these concerts.)

This program covered a wide range of emotions and style. The distance between the grace and refinement of Mozart's Symphony and the rough and tumble symphonic poem by Gilbert is far and Lalo's Spanish Symphony hardly served as an adequate connecting link. The program, however, was an excellent medium for a display of versatility on the part of Mr. Monteux who conducted throughout the afternoon with unusual authority. Each piece, widely differing from its neighbors on the program, was given its proper atmosphere and coloring. Three distinct styles were represented and admirably contrasted. This ability to differentiate sharply between various styles and schools of composition is one of Mr. Monteux's most outstanding characteristics. He has given the symphony concerts of this season a varied and interesting character. In former times every piece was given a Teutonic tinge. This was tiresome. We now hear the music of many schools played in as many different ways. Mozart is difficult to play well. The slightest uncertainty of ensemble is immediately apparent. The strings played with exceptional beauty of tone. The phrases of the Andante were sung by the first violins as by one player. The wood-wind proximity to the Lalo number. Mr. Gilbert overdoes it. He tries to say too much at once, would use too many instruments at the same time. But at that the work made a far more favorable impression than when heard here in its ballet adaptation. Although the final number on the program, its close was not marked by the usual rush for the exits. Instead, the audience waited until applause brought Mr. Gilbert forth to receive its approval.

MOZART PLAYED AT SYMPHONY

Reduced by Boston Banks Yesterday; Orpheum Will Be Taken from Curb

Of unusual interest to music lovers was the distinctive program offered yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conducting. Mozart's "Symphony in G minor," well known to many from frequent performances in Boston, was received enthusiastically.

A symphony for violin and orchestra by the Spanish composer, Edouard Lalo, gave full scope for the notable playing of Fredric Fradkin, concertmaster of the orchestra. The composition is rich in fanciful, rhythmic movements and in phrases which require delicacy and firmnes of tone. Mr. Fradkin displayed a technique which mastered the most intricate and bewildering passages, and his sympathetic interpretation of the charm and languorous grace of the symphony was keenly appreciated by the audience. Mr. Fradkin was recalled many times.

The third number, was in many ways the feature of the program. "The Dance in Place Congo" is a modern American composition by Henry F. P. Gilbert, a symphonic poem founded on a description by George W. Cable of a Louisiana slave-revel. It is distinctively American music, in that it is based upon a primitive and barbaric, although essentially native expression of the art of the negro races in the South. The music has a wild, syncopated rhythm, startlingly akin to the "jazz" of modern dances, with an elusive and haunting melody which rises insistently above the clash and din of the louder instruments.

The unrestrained frenzy of the "Bamboula," a barbaric negro slave-dance, gives way to interludes of more harmonious passages, chanted with the swing of an old revivalist hymn, and then rises again in chaotic and blaring measures.

The audience showed a keen interest in the music, after the first shock of the inroads of "jazz" into a Friday afternoon concert. They applauded a bit breathlessly after a particularly spectacular and discordant finale, and recalled Mr. Monteux several times.

REDUCTION RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Symphony Concert --- Plays, M

SYMPHONY CONCERT

AGAIN THE PROGRAMME RANGES WIDELY

From Mozart Classic to the Gilbert of "The Dance in Place Congo"—The American's Uneven Music—Mr. Monteux and Mozart—Between, Mr. Fradkin as Rare Violinist in Lalo's Spanish Symphony

DISSENSIONS and rumors of dissensions may disturb the inner peace of the Symphony Orchestra; but outwardly its concerts run tranquil course, as they will to the end of the current season and, doubtless, through many seasons more. After thirty-nine years it is an institution not readily shaken by spring storms, even though for the hour they blow somewhat more heavily than usual. The same band sat upon the stage of Symphony Hall as has sat there since the middle of last October; the same conductor led it; the same audience applauded them as they made way through a programme—classic symphony, modern concerto, novel miscellaneous piece—like to a hundred others in the annals of the orchestra. The playing of Mozart's symphony fell not much below and rose not much above reasonable expectations. Mr. Fradkin, in the solo part of the concert-master's annual concerto, disclosed anticipated qualities in Lalo's "Spanish Symphony." As usual with novel numbers on a Friday afternoon, the audience was uncertain whether to applaud heartily or only courteously Mr. Gilbert's tone-poem, "The Dance in Place Congo." Enough, however, persisted in its clapping to call the composer to the stage; while through the rest of the concert, and especially for the violinist, the applause had been uncommonly long and hearty. By every evidence that a concert may give, goodwill abounded from one end to the other of Symphony Hall. Blessed are institutions: they persist; they reassure the apprehensive.

Mr. Monteux's Mozart is no remarkable Mozart; but the audience was plainly pleased to listen to a composer whom it had not hitherto heard in the course of the season and in whom it found quick delight. With wisdom the conductor had somewhat reduced the number of the heavier and the darker strings, with discernment he had balanced string and wind choirs, so that here and there the music gained appreciably in Mozartian fluidity of movement and elasticity of accent. It would have gained more had Mr. Monteux's own hand been lighter and more supple. He kept the course of each movement quite clear, with each detail of modulation, emphasis, progress in becoming place. He missed none of the obvious shadings, the transparently contrasting moods—the bright energies of the first Allegro; the tremulous melancholy of the Andante; the shadows and lights of the Minuet; the fitfulness of the Finale. The orchestra gave him back warm, pliant, songful tone.

In a word, the listener heard Mozart's symphony in G minor played straightforwardly, lucidly, understandingly, pleasurably. He also heard that symphony played with little of the finer sensibility, the pervading elegance, the intuitive felicities that are the distinctions of a performance of Mozart's music. With the best will, the clearest head, the readiest hand a conductor may not attain them by the taking of thought and pains. Either he gains them by a sort of divination or they altogether evade him. If he possesses such divination, then the whole movement, from first to last, will run in endless undulation and play of light and shade; then does it sound most simple where it is most complex; then does it seem the perfection of fluidity and sensibility; while loveliness shimmers out of detail after detail and charm permeates and crowns the whole. Then also do the modulation of pace, the distribution of accent, the variations of rhythm seem like intuitions of the instant; while the orchestra is as deft as it is sure of stroke and as limpid as it is exquisite of tone. The spirit of Mozart sings, lives, illudes in such rare performance; the letter of Mozart still delights in performances that are no more than faithful, intelligent and dutiful. Into this second category falls Mr. Monteux's version of the symphony in G minor.

Mr. Gilbert's tone-poem better suited the abilities of the conductor, came nearer to unclouded and undiminished performance. It was written as a symphonic piece for the concert-hall; but before it had been played as such, the composer designed an action for the music and it was heard as ballet-pantomime at the hands of the Metropolitan Opera Company in New York and Boston in the spring of 1918. The action was laboriously devised; it was not too plausibly or pictorially brought to actual being on the stage; it seemed rather to obscure and obstruct the music than to be illumined and aped by it. The outcome clearly suggested that the music would make keener and deeper impression played by itself in the conditions for which the composer originally proposed it. Yesterday it was so played possibly for the first time in a concert-hall. It was more amply and vividly disclosed, but even so, it fell short of the other pieces of Mr. Gilbert heard at the Symphony Concerts—his "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes," his Prelude to Synge's tragedy of Irish fisher-folk, "Riders to the Sea." The overture flashed with lively rhythms, bubbled with animated motives as animatedly developed and contrasted. The prelude prevailed by illusion of sombre atmosphere, by dramatic force of utterance.

Now, in "The Dance in Place Congo," Mr. Gilbert would, as it were, alternate and in measure unite his two voices prompted by Mr. Cable's description (in a half-forgotten article in a magazine of the eighties) of the revels of slaves and half-casts on Sunday afternoons in an obscure corner of Creole New Orleans. The composer begins graphically and dramatically enough. He writes a rude, sombre, oppressed music gradually rising first into bitter wail, then into wild shriek of resentment and revolt. It is background. He tells his hearers in a lengthy and vivid programme note—background of slavery out of which the dance proper—or rather improper—shall rise. Into which it shall descend. It does so vanish at the sound of the booming bell that calls the slaves to quarters. The dance shivers itself away; the ensuing rhythms are as the patter of departing feet, irregular, more and more faint. The mood, the voice of brooding resentment and angry revolt return. Again Mr. Gilbert has written graphically, dramatically; again his musical invention, his musical means serve his imaginative ends. At beginning and at end of the tone-poem he gains the wildness, the rudeness, the fierceness of voice that he sought.

Between lie the dance and certain supplements to it and it is there, as it seemed two years ago in the Opera House, as it seemed yesterday in Symphony Hall, that Mr. Gilbert falls short of his design. In his programme-note he lavishes printed description upon this dance as has Mr. Cable before him. "Uncouth preluding" is to herald it. The orchestra then "rips it out in all its triumphant vulgarity." There should be "frantic leaps, frenzy, wild and terrible delights." It rises to "ecstasy," to "madness," to "fury." Unfortunately, however, the actual music fails to work any such illusion. In fact, Mr. Gilbert can make no more of this Bamboula than can many another composer of a monotonous, long drawn, distinctly ordinary dance of blacks. There is little wildness in it, as little sensual tang; no lascivious frenzy; no barbaric fury. He makes what play he may with rhythm; but he is dull and bare of harmonic and instrumental color. There are rhythmic vigor, rhythmic reiteration and no more. The ear and the imagination listen equally unilluded and unmoved. The workmanship seems even clumsy. It botters when there is gentler interlude as though some pair had cut away for a moment of quiet from the circle of dancers. The music is appropriate if not imaginative; warm, if it is opaque. There is rude force in the return of the Bamboula; but not until the bell booms is Mr. Gilbert the graphic, the dramatizing composer that he can be. His prelude and postlude thrill; all between merely sounds.

Mr. Gilbert would be the last to deny his own aggressive temperament. Yet is he not needlessly truculent in that same programme-note which he obviously designs as persuasion to his hearers? "Here was an American subject," he cries; "presented in vivid style by an American author; full of dramatic and colorful suggestion." And again: "I desired to present upon the stage of the opera house an authentic piece of American art, one having its origin in an American happening, its inspiration in the creation of an American author, its music by an American composer. . . ." It is quite true that "The Dance in Place Congo" is such an American music; but there is no very obvious reason why Mr. Cable's article might not have kindled an imaginative composer of any race, had he chanced upon it, to characterizing and vivid composition or why the Bamboula itself might not have laid spell upon him. In fact, it did upon Gottschalk in the forties, and he was half-English and half-Creole, and upon Coleridge-Taylor in our own time, in whom was mixed English and negro blood. Moreover, there is music as distinctively American as Mr. Gilbert's which has no such origins as he seems to believe essential. He has surely heard Mr. Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," and he could hardly have missed the intrinsically American humor and sentiment blended in the music. He may have heard Mr. Converse's recent symphony and noted the American quality pervading it. In the fantasy, the caprice, the brilliancy of Mr. Carpenter's Concertino at the symphony Concerts last week, it is easy to feel a distinctively American note. If Mr. Gilbert would only believe it, there is an American voice in symphonic music, an American spirit no less, which are not all dependent upon negro tunes or upon what he calls, apropos his American Dances, "the twists in use in popular music," American composers can look in their hearts, as well in Place Congo, and write.

Between symphony and symphonic poem, Mr. Fradkin had his inning. Once more, as in his concerto last year, as in many a solo passage in the ordinary course of the Symphony Concerts, he was violinist who has at finger tips every refinement of his instrument, who plays with an unfailing musical sensibility. His tone is silken, supple, lustrous. It bends to every modulation, every inflection of the piece in hand; it answers quickly to every beat of rhythm; it spins transition: it is artful in light, shade and gradient. It is warm in figures, plastic in ornament, penetrating in instrumental song. Mr. Fradkin respects the clear will of the composer; yet by the manner in which he paces, colors, emphasizes the music, displays a clear individuality of his own. His choice lighted upon a concert-piece that set these qualities in high relief and that deserved performance no less for its own deserts and for the satisfactions it yields. Not as often as it might does the public of the Symphony Concerts hear this "Spanish Symphony" of Lalo. Whenever it does it renews its pleasure in the light, bright flow of the music, the freshness with which it is invented, the skill with which it is conducted, the fancy and piquancy of the harmonic and instrumental dress, the unemphasized, unconventional yet pungent Spanish flavor that from the rhythms seems to infiltrate the whole. A miniature among concertos for violin—say beside Brahms's or Chaikovsky's—this "Spanish Symphony" may be, but it excels them all in exquisiteness of filagree and fantasy.

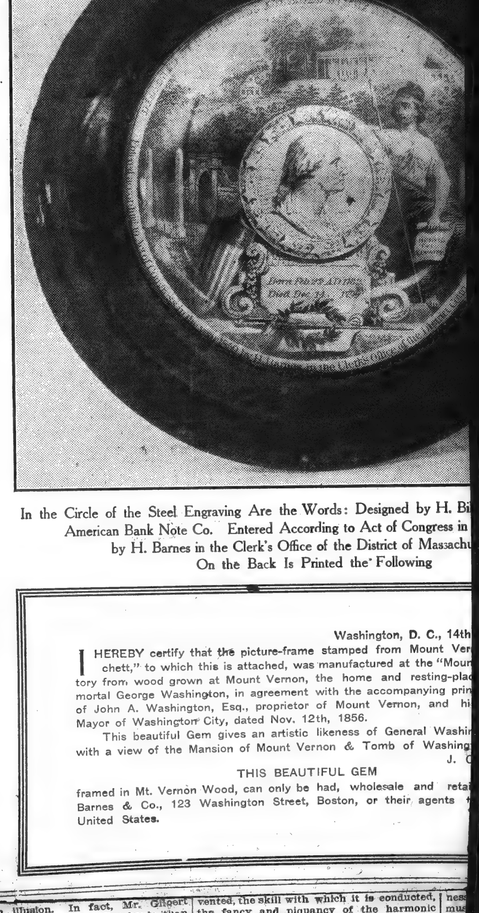
H. T. PARKER

FOR SALE

A MUSICAL COMPOSITION

Copyrighted but unpublished. Communicate with A.J.F., Transcript, Boston 8. (D):

A Souvenir Familiar in Bosto



In the Circle of the Steel Engraving Are the Words: Designed by H. Bi American Bank Note Co. Entered According to Act of Congress in by H. Barnes in the Clerk's Office of the District of Massachu
On the Back Is Printed the Following

Washington, D. C., 14th

I HEREBY certify that the picture-frame stamped from Mount Ver chett," to which this is attached, was manufactured at the "Mour tory from wood grown at Mount Vernon, the home and resting-plac mortal George Washington, in agreement with the accompanying prin of John A. Washington, Esq., proprietor of Mount Vernon, and hi
Mayor of Washington City, dated Nov. 12th, 1856.

This beautiful Gem gives an artistic likeness of General Washir with a view of the Mansion of Mount Vernon & Tomb of Washing
J. C

THIS BEAUTIFUL GEM

framed in Mt. Vernon Wood, can only be had, wholesale and reta Barnes & Co., 123 Washington Street, Boston, or their agents
United States.

CONTINUING PIECES

There Will Be a Holiday Matinee on Monday at Each of the Theatres Named Below.

Hollis—Bab

VARIOUS adventures, plentiful sayings and many an unintentional humor of Mrs. Rinehart's girl in her middle teens, "Bab, the Sub-Deb," woven ingeniously and amusingly into a light play about her notions of love and low-necked dresses, her ruses and meddlings, the results of them in her household and among sundry young men. She is acted in youthful high spirits and with more than youthful range of histrionic means and effect by the rising Helen Hayes. An excellent company assists her. The second week.

Wilbur—39 East

Miss Crothers's well-made comedy of humorous characterization as exhibited in a well-to-do boarding house in New York and of sentimental fable that follows the fortunes of a confused young girl come thither to make her way in the theatre. The two acts in the boarding house are amusing for contrasting personages and revealing chatter both pointed high for entertainment. The middle act serves its prettyfied ends. The personages of the boarding house are excellently acted. Henry Hull does well with the intervening youth; Constance Binney as the girl is more pleasing personality than skilful actress. The second week.

Colonial—The Royal Vagabond

"A Cohanized comic opera"—that is to say a romantic operetta of the familiar sort in which a prince woos below his station and plays the revolutionist, a barber disports himself comically, and other personages do their usual offices, all provided with humors and quips, all snapping through parts and piece and all "guying" themselves in the approved Cohanic manner. A peppery musical play running at top speed and with no small clatter. Amusing in kind and acted to the hilt by all concerned. The second week.

Opera House—Take It from Me

The well remembered and well liked musical play of last season, broadly comic in personages and incident, boisterous of progress, plentiful in hearty songs and lively dances. Good "rough stuff" vigorously acted. The final week.

Majestic—Charlotte Greenwood

The lanky and gawky entertainer of the musical plays in a nondescript piece, "Linger Longer, Letty," continuing her in the character in which she first gained place on the stage. Cheap and common stuff, it gives her opportunity for little more than the grotesque humors of awkwardness, contortion and grimace. These abundantly amuse her public. Between whiles come glimpses of a finer comic talent, could it find employment. The rest of the piece and of the cast comes—and goes. The final week.

Shubert—The Rose of China

Pleasing, playful and polite operetta of Chinese scene, many Chinese and a few American personages, pictorially set by Mr. Urban working with light and graceful hand; sprinkled with deft, piquant, fanciful music; agreeably sung and acted by all concerned; but not too well furnished with lively fable and merry humors. Good entertainment for those who prefer light-

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

TISER, FEBRUARY 22,

GILBERT'S WORK IN SYMPHONY

"Place Congo," Music for Connoisseur, Bewilders Audience

By E. F. HARKINS.

"America first!" might have served as the password at the Symphony concerts of last night and Friday afternoon.

An American composer, Henry Franklin Belknap Gilbert, born in Somerville and now living in Cambridge, gave the racy modern touch to a program led by one of the three immortal Mozart symphonies, the one in G minor. Mr. Gilbert was represented by a symphonic poem, "The Dance in Place Congo," suggested by George W. Cable's article of the same title, reminiscent of ante-bellum days in New Orleans. "The Place Congo was a no-'count open space at the fag-end of New Orleans," according to the composer. "The slaves were given liberty to meet there and enjoy themselves once a week, and it is one of their rude but picturesque gatherings which Cable tells of in his article." The composition was once submitted to Dr. Muck, who, according to report, "referred to it contemptuously as 'niggah music.'" So the composer took the music back and turned it into a ballet, which was performed here two years ago by the Metropolitan Opera Company dancers. It was a novelty, therefore, only to those who take their musical fare exclusively at the Symphony table.

The music is assuredly "rude and picturesque," with a strong flavor of the bamboula, a dance that came from the West Indies—brutal, bizarre music, that threw the slaves into a frenzy of excitement. New Orleans stopped the Place Congo dances long, long ago. Mr. Gilbert's work reflects his praiseworthy enthusiasm over American subjects; also his skill and imagination; but "Place Congo" is music for the connoisseur. The audience found it not only grotesque and bizarre, but exotic, bewildering. Place Congo and the levee are far removed from the old Suwanee plantation. The New Orleans of this tone picture is as strange a place as Timbuctoo. Mr. Monteux conducted con amore, and Mr. Gilbert came forth to bow to the fitful applause.

Frederic Fradkin, concert-master of the orchestra, and native American, played the solo part in the performance of Lalo's "Spanish Symphony." Of his artistry, Bostonians may well be proud. His full-fledged technic made light of bristling difficulties; his tone, though not large, was always round and pure, and after the first few nervous moments he played with the zest of the true virtuoso. He did well to shake hands with Mr. Monteux and thank him for the splendid assistance of the orchestra. The audience recalled him several times, paying warm tribute to his admirable efforts.

The crowning feature of the concert was the superb performance of Mozart's brilliant and beautiful symphony. It was worthy of the palmiest days of the orchestra. Truly Mozartian! Never was an ovation more richly deserved.

Herald Feb 22

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERT

Mr. Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has arranged the following light and pleasing program for the second young people's concert by the orchestra in Symphony Hall on Thursday afternoon, Feb. 26, at 4 o'clock: Weber, overture to "Der Freischuetz"; Beethoven, Andante from Symphony No. 1; Grieg's "Peer Gynt," suite No. 1; Mendelssohn, Scherzo from music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Berlioz, Rakoczy March. Since all tickets for this concert have been distributed through the heads of the schools of Greater Boston, no more are available. Applications for the first concert in January were so numerous as to cover the two concerts, although the audience at the second will be entirely different. Approximately two-thirds of the 50 schools represented at this pending concert will be high schools—whereas at the first the division between high schools and elementary schools was about even. Unfortunately, the full schedule of the orchestra will leave no time for further young people's concerts this season.

"BLESSED DAMOZEL"

A noteworthy feature of the pair of Boston Symphony concerts on next Friday and Saturday will be the first performance at these concerts of Debussy's setting of Rossetti's "The Blessed Damozel" ("La Damoiselle Elue"), in which the orchestra will be assisted by a female chorus trained by Stephen S. Townsend, and two soloists, Ethel Frank, soprano, and Claramond Thompson, contralto.

The rest of the program affords variety: Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Haydn's Symphony in G major (B. and H. No. 13), and Charpentier's sunny and sensuous "Impressions of Italy"—I, Serenade (with viola solo off the stage); II, At the Fountain; III,

SPIRIT OF GILBERT'S MUSIC

A further retrospect of the performance of Henry F. Gilbert's symphonic poem, "The Dance on Place Congo," played at the Symphony concerts of Friday afternoon and yesterday evening, makes this superbly imaginative and romantic composition assume a more and more significant relation to the development of music in this country. In yesterday's Post this writer's impressions of the work were narrated at some length, and they need not be repeated here. The music seems to us to represent the biggest and the most impressive orchestral canvas Mr. Gilbert has yet turned out. In no other composition of which we know is the peculiarly rich and romantic quality of his imagination and the astonishing creative energy which informs all of his music so apparent. He has written nothing more beautiful, more subtly and admirably developed from germinal motives of racial origins than the sensuous love music which forms the middle section of this poem, and the savage, eerie, nocturnal which brings the end. This music belongs to that kind of art which, when it appears, causes the listener immediately to realize a new treasure of beauty, a new spiritual experience always to be prized, cherished and resorted to with comfort in a bad hour. This "Dance on Place Congo" is too good, too original to get all of its deserts at a first hearing, despite the evident favor with which it has been received. But that is another matter, and the foregoing statement is a personal opinion and estimate which the writer believes will be fully vindicated by the judgment of time, the one infallible music critic.

Some "Barbaric Cacaphony'

What we started to speak of was the striking and suggestive, and at first thought apparently baffling significance of this score, as it appears in relation to other interesting American compositions which have been turned out of late. Speaking of the harmony alone, for example, Gilbert's music, barring some perfectly delicious examples of barbaric cacophony, fit to raise your hair at the proper moment for such a sensation, is old-fashioned. You find in it neither the pungent harmonies contained in Charles Griffes' symphonic poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," played at these concerts a few weeks before the performance of Gilbert's work, nor do you find anything like the orchestral ingenuity shown in the music both of Griffes and of another astonishing American composer, John Alden Carpenter, whose concertino for piano and orchestra had been heard at these concerts just a few weeks previous. Judging by the simple harmonic material, the musical texture, as you might say, of Gilbert's piece, it might have been written—indeed it was written, or conceived—years ago, while the works of Griffes and Carpenter could only have been written yesterday.

The musical idioms of the last two composers are far newer, and in this sense younger than Gilbert's. Their orchestration is incomparably more expert. These young Americans are certainly up to snuff. They have seized on the very latest ideas of foremost Europeans of the day. They have pocketed the thunder of contemporaneous masters and they use it as their own—not clumsily, or with palpably imitative spirit. Far otherwise! With a native ease and audacity as astonishing in music as were the accomplishments of American engineers in Europe in the World war. Theirs is the native facility and practical readiness in grasping and assimilating anything, which is so characteristically and advantageously American.

Coming Young Artists

Thus Carpenter and Griffes, both young men to be watched most carefully, and waited for, have real talent and all kinds of ideas, whether musical or otherwise. Gilbert's mental attitude appears in a way stiffer. We do not believe Gilbert could produce any such gorgeous and yet clear-sounding scores as Griffes and Carpenter, if he wanted to, and we are very sure he doesn't want to.

He turns his back rather intentionally and deliberately on musical tendencies of these kinds. One realizes that he has obstinately hung on to certain things and certain convictions, let the times go or the heavens fall where they may. In a certain technical way, and even as records current esthetic formulae, this work of Gilbert is, then, behind the times.

But we wonder if in a more fundamental way it isn't clean ahead of the times. As a matter of fact we are certain that it is! It is ahead of the times in this: its romantic perception of the beauty and the art quality of conditions present on American soil.

It often takes artists hundreds of years to feel a halo of beauty about a scene or an event. It is not easy, for example, to imagine the story of Rip Van Winkle penned by a Dutchman on the Hudson who lived in Rip Van Winkle's period. When many years have passed they bestow a certain golden, [illegible] in the imagination of poets of later generations, over almost all objects, however unattractive these objects may have appeared to contemporary sight. As we write today one of the most colossal dramas in the history of the world is going on. But to a majority the leading figures in this drama are ordinary men, obstinate, weak or conniving, and the circumstances terrible or tawdry and disillusionizing. Whereas to a future day the figure of the American President alone, whether he appear as the fearless hero of a new epoch or as a vacillating Hamlet of this one, will offer inexhaustible material to dramatic writers.

Ahead of the Times

What we mean when we say that Gilbert's music is in a fundamental respect far ahead of the time, is that Gilbert is already sufficiently advanced in his imagination to look at America poetically, dramatically, in a picturesque manner, as all of us now look at the America discovered by Columbus, as we will look at America in years to come, as the projector of the greatest vision and the noblest experiment of statesmanship.

We think this fundamental, poetic, racial vision, characteristic of no other American composer of whom we know, the true explanation of the astounding force of this "Dance on Place Congo." It makes every measure—the clumsiest, the heaviest, the most experimental—surge irresistibly forward. It makes the orchestra shout to the high gods the glory of the land and the inexhaustible passions of the race.

In other words, his music has its roots in the ground. While Mr. Griffes wrote fancifully and exotically of the fabled splendor of Kubla Khan, Mr. Gilbert was gripped and compelled to write savage, amorous, fateful music inspired by a dance of slaves in no 'count corner of New Orleans. Mr. Gilbert has always believed that music should be the fruit of the soil. He has clung to his belief, he has searched for its expression and fulfilment as Diogenes with his lantern searched for the honest man, he has held to his artistic faith through every artistic failure or success of his own, and this in the face of much criticism, some mockery and a great deal of misunderstanding. Even, at times, in the face of much unconscious self-misrepresentation.

Genius of America

And so it appears again, that in music as in any other field of creative thought, the spirit and not the letter of the law counts. Gilbert's music remains unlearned and unskilled in modern sophistications. It completely eschews that "latest thing" in composing which others strive so intensely to gain, hopeful of accomplishing something interesting by keeping tabs on the others, fearful of falling behind in the race if they are not in touch with this "latest thing." It is equally and exhilaratingly reckless of precedent, and is a hundred years younger in substance and in idiom than the music still being put out by our older and more academic composers of the past. It has, in fact, no relation to the music of any other group of composers, past or present, foreign or native born. It is often crude, inept, indecent, some would say, in its wanton overriding of musical traditions and proprieties. Some of it is ugly, and possibly in bad taste. But all of it is straight goods, all of it comes from a man with spirit, with imagination, with ideals, who really understands and vibrates to the genius of this mighty land.

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has arranged the following light and eventful programme for the second Young People's Concert to be given by the orchestra in Symphony Hall on Thursday afternoon, Feb. 26 at 4 o'clock: Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz"; Andante from Beethoven's first symphony in C major; Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite (I. morning mood; II. Aese's Death; III. Anitra's dance; IV. In the Hall of the Mountain King); Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and Berlioz's Rakoczy march. Since all tickets for this concert have been distributed through the heads of the schools of Greater Boston, no more are available. It is interesting to note that applications for the first concert in January were so numerous as to cover the two concerts, although the audience at the second will be entirely different. Approximately two-thirds of the 50 schools represented at this pending concert will be high schools, whereas at the first, the division between high schools and elementary schools was about even. Unfortunately, the full schedule of the orchestra will leave no time for further Young People's Concerts this season.

CHORAL "BLESSED DAMOZEL" BY SYMPHONY

A memorable feature of the pend pair of Boston Symphony concerts be given next Friday and Satur Feb. 27 and 28, will be the first perfo ance at these concerts of Debussy's ting of Rossetti's "The Blessed D zel" ("La Damoiselle Elue") in w the orchestra will be assisted female chorus trained by Steph Townsend, and two soloists, Miss Frank, soprano, and Miss Clara Thompson, contralto.

The rest of the programme a variety. Gluck's overture to "Iph in Aulis," Haydn's Symphony major (B. and H. No. 13) and C Charpentier's sunny and sensuous pressions of Italy" with movemen follows: I. Serenade; with viola so tite stage. II. At the Fountain. On muleback. IV. On the sun V. Naples.

Thursday at 4. Boston Symphony Orchestra, second concert for young people. Overture to "Der Freischutz"; Weber. Andante from First Symphony, Beethoven. Suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg. Scherzo from "Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn. Rackoczy March, Berlioz. All tickets for this concert have been distributed through the heads of schools in Greater Boston, without public sale.

Friday at 2:30, and Saturday at 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra. Sixteenth program. Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Gluck. Symphony in G major, No. 13 in the Breitkopf and Hartel edition, Haydn. "La Demoiselle Elue," Debussy, first time at these concerts. "Impressions of Italy," Charpentier. A female chorus, trained by Stephen Townsend, and two soloists, Ethel Frank, soprano, and Claramond Thompson, contralto, will assist in the Debussy number.

Friday at 8:15. The Harvard Glee Club.

The Symphony concerts bring the first performances here of Debussy's "La Demoiselle Elue," based on Rossetti's familiar poem, "The Blessed Damozel," and requiring a female chorus and soloists.

Otto Roth, the Boston Symphony violinist, recently received a message from Europe which brought tidings of William Gericke, the famous ex-conductor of the orchestra. Gericke, now 76 years old, is in excellent health, and resides in a suburb of Vienna with Mme Gericke. A part of last year was spent in Munich, while his daughter attended school, the communication to Mr Roth states. Apparently the veteran leader has escaped the privations which attended most of the people in famine-ridden, poverty-stricken Austria.

Globe Feb 22

Young Folks' Symphony

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has arranged the following light program for the second young people's concert to be given by the orchestra in Symphony Hall on Thursday afternoon, February 26, at 4 o'clock. Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz," the andante from Beethoven's first symphony in C major; Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite, the scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and Berlioz "Rakoczy" march. All the tickets have been distributed in the schools. There will be no more of these concerts this season.

Traveler Feb 22

WOMEN TO SING WITH SYMPHONY

At next week's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra a chorus of women, trained by Stephen Townsend, and Miss Ethel Frank, soprano, and Miss Claramond Thompson, contralto, will assist in Debussy's "The Blessed Damozel." The symphony will be Haydn's in G major. The other numbers on the program will be Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" and Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy."

SECOND CONCERT FOR CHILDREN

Next Thursday afternoon at 4 the Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will give its second concert for young people, tickets for which have all been taken. The program will be: Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz"; Andante from Beethoven's

BOYS AND GIRLS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Attentive Audience Greets Greig and Berlioz

Symphony Hall was crowded with boys and girls yesterday afternoon for the second concert for young people by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Symphony concerts in Boston have come to be regarded as designed chiefly for rich old ladies, and the management when it announced an experimental concert for young people last month was not prepared for the overwhelming demand from the schools and left many disappointed applicants. There was no public sale and no one who obtained tickets for the first concert, given last month, was allowed tickets for the second.

The average age of yesterday's audience was 14 to 15, and boys and girls were present in about equal proportions, with a few scattered grownups. One might have expected such an audience to be more interested in cutting monkey shines than in listening to Beethoven and Berlioz. But it proved the most attentive and thoughtful crowd the orchestra has played to in many a long year.

The hum and buzz of eager comment and gossip ceased as soon as Mr Monteux tapped his desk with his baton, and determined but futile endeavors were made after several number to secure an encore, something which is forbidden by long standing rule at Symphony concerts.

The youngsters, many of them, followed the excellent brief program notes written by Mr Burke of Symphony Hall during the performance. Individuals with pocket scores and handbooks on symphonic music, which they conned attentively, were scattered through the crowd.

The program was made up of a number of short and not too exacting pieces, among which Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite and Berlioz's stirring "Hungarian March" seemed to afford the most pleasure. The performance was dashing and vivid, though the rehearsals seemed to have been too few to permit the usual meticulous nuances.

More of these young people's concerts may be hoped for next season, although there is no room in the crowded schedule of the orchestra for any more this

Herald Feb 27

CHILDREN HEAR FINAL CONCERT

Highly Amused When Symphony Orchestra Plays "Peer Gynt" Suite

SERIES HAS BEEN VERY SUCCESSFUL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second and last Young People's Concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon—the last because on account of the orchestra's engagements it will not be possible to give another concert this season. The experiment has been highly successful. As at the first the seats throughout the hall were filled with interested children of all ages from the schools of Greater Boston. The audience was most attentive and evidently greatly interested.

The program included the overture to "Der Freischuetz," the Andante from Beethoven's first Symphony, Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite, the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and Berlioz's Rakoczy March. Mr. Monteux conducted. As was to be expected, the audience was greatly amused by Grieg's music for the scene in the Mountain King's home. In this respect they did not differ from hearers of maturer years whenever the Suite is played.

Some may question the advisability of performing excerpts from symphonies at these concerts. Surely the Andante from Beethoven's first is not beyond the comprehension of any child that has any ear for music. It is a good thing to acquaint the young with the names and music of great composers so that they do not sit awe-stricken when they are older. After all, Beethoven, Weber and Mendelssohn were mortals; they all wrote pot-boilers, perfunctory pieces in which only superstitious believers in plenary inspiration take pleasure. It is also a good thing for children to hear the good music of famous composers so that later they will not accept the poorer stuff simply because it is signed by a famous name.

It is to be hoped that these concerts will be a feature of every season; that, if possible, there will be more of them; so that as children grow up they will learn to look upon this orchestra as a civic institution, which it is; to realize that as a source of civic pride, one that gives pure and varied enjoyment, it should be supported by all, whatever their walk or condition in life may be.

Traveler Feb 27

LITTLE ONES ENJOY SYMPHONY

Some 2500 school children filled Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon for the second concert for little ones and were so carried away with the playing of the orchestra that they kept Mr. Monteux, the conductor, exceedingly busy acknowledging their applause. The program, Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture, the Andante from Beethoven's C major sympony; Greig's "Peer Gynt" Suite; the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and Berlioz's Rakoczy march, hit them just about right. Of course, the march number scored.

The marked success of these two trial concerts assures the making of these concerts for children an annual affair. One could scarcely think otherwise after witnessing the exceptional pleasure of the youngsters.

Traveler Feb 27

ITEMS ABOUT MUSIC

Mr. Monteux, profiting by the test of the first concert of the Symphony Orchestra for young people a month ago, has wisely set a programme of short pieces for the second which befalls on Thursday afternoon of next week. His list traverses Weber's overture to his opera, "Der Freischutz"; the slow movement from Beethoven's first symphony; the familiar suite from Grieg's music to Ibsen's play, "Peer Gynt"; the scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to Shakspeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream"; and the Rakoczy March from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." Such a programme sounds much more ingratiating than that for the first concert and more follows the ways of Mr. Stock in Chicago and Mr. Damrosch in New York with such ventures. With like wisdom, the dispensers of tickets for the second concert, both in the schools and at Symphony Hall, will provide an audience of young people in their teens rather than the children of tenderer years who were too numerous at the first concert. Most of these, as Mr. Monteux plausibly believes, were too young to appreciate either the music or the orchestra.

TISER, FEBRUARY 22,

GILBERT'S WORK IN SYMPHONY

"Place Congo," Music for Connoisseur, Bewilders Audience

By E. F. HARKINS.

"America first!" might have served as the password at the Symphony concerts of last night and Friday afternoon.

An American composer, Henry Franklin Belknap Gilbert, born in Somerville and now living in Cambridge, gave the racy modern touch to a program led by one of the three immortal Mozart symphonies, the one in G minor. Mr. Gilbert was represented by a symphonic poem, "The Dance in Place Congo," suggested by George W. Cable's article of the same title, reminiscent of ante-bellum days in New Orleans. "The Place Congo was a no-'count open space at the fag-end of New Orleans," according to the composer. "The slaves were given liberty to meet there and enjoy themselves once a week, and it is one of their rude but picturesque gatherings which Cable tells of in his article." The composition was once submitted to Dr. Muck, who, according to report, "referred to it contemptuously as 'niggah music.'" So the composer took the music back and turned it into a ballet, which was performed here two years ago by the Metropolitan Opera Company dancers. It was a novelty, therefore, only to those who take their musical fare exclusively at the Symphony table.

The music is assuredly "rude and picturesque," with a strong flavor of the bamboula, a dance that came from the West Indies—brutal, bizarre music, that threw the slaves into a frenzy of excitement. New Orleans stopped the Place Congo dances long, long ago. Mr. Gilbert's work reflects his praiseworthy enthusiasm over American subjects; also his skill and imagination; but "Place Congo" is music for the connoisseur. The audience found it not only grotesque and bizarre, but exotic, bewildering. Place Congo and the levee are far removed from the old Suwanee plantation. The New Orleans of this tone picture is as strange a place as Timbuctoo. Mr. Monteux conducted con amore, and Mr. Gilbert came forth to bow to the fitful applause.

Frederic Fradkin, concert-master of the orchestra, and native American, played the solo part in the performance of Lalo's "Spanish Symphony." Of his artistry, Bostonians may well be proud. His full-fledged technic made light of bristling difficulties; his tone, though not large, was always round and pure, and after the first few nervous moments he played with the zest of the true virtuoso. He did well to shake hands with Mr. Monteux and thank him for the splendid assistance of the orchestra. The audience recalled him several times, paying warm tribute to his admirable efforts.

The crowning feature of the concert was the superb performance of Mozart's brilliant and beautiful symphony. It was worthy of the palmiest days of the orchestra. Truly Mozartian! Never was an ovation more richly deserved.

Herald Feb 22

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERT

Mr. Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has arranged the following light and pleasing program for the second young people's concert by the orchestra in Symphony Hall on Thursday afternoon, Feb. 26, at 4 o'clock: Weber, overture to "Der Freischuetz"; Beethoven, Andante from Symphony No. 1; Grieg's "Peer Gynt," suite No. 1; Mendelssohn, Scherzo from music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Berlioz, Rakoczy March. Since all tickets for this concert have been distributed through the heads of the schools of Greater Boston, no more are available. Applications for the first concert in January were so numerous as to cover the two concerts, although the audience at the second will be entirely different. Approximately two-thirds of the 50 schools represented at this pending concert will be high schools—whereas at the first the division between high schools and elementary schools was about even. Unfortunately, the full schedule of the orchestra will leave no time for further young people's concerts this season.

"BLESSED DAMOZEL"

A noteworthy feature of the pair of Boston Symphony concerts on next Friday and Saturday will be the first performance at these concerts of Debussy's setting of Rossetti's "The Blessed Damozel" ("La Damoiselle Elue"), in which the orchestra will be assisted by a female chorus trained by Stephen S. Townsend, and two soloists, Ethel Frank, soprano, and Claramond Thompson, contralto.

The rest of the program affords variety: Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Haydn's Symphony in G major (B. and H. No. 13), and Charpentier's sunny and sensuous "Impressions of Italy"—I. Serenade (with viola solo off the stage); II. At the Fountain; III.

SPIRIT OF GILBERT'S MUSIC

A further retrospect of the performance of Henry F. Gilbert's symphonic poem, "The Dance on Place Congo," played at the Symphony concerts of Friday afternoon and yesterday evening, makes this superbly imaginative and romantic composition assume a more and more significant relation to the development of music in this country. In yesterday's Post this writer's impressions of the work were narrated at some length, and they need not be repeated here. The music seems to us to represent the biggest and the most impressive orchestral canvas Mr. Gilbert has yet turned out. In no other composition of which we know is the peculiarly rich and romantic quality of his imagination and the astonishing creative energy which informs all of his music so apparent. He has written nothing more beautiful, more subtly and admirably developed from germinal motives of racial origins than the sensuous love music which forms the middle section of this poem, and the savage, eeriee, nocturnal which brings the end. This music belongs to that kind of art which, when it appears, causes the listener immediately to realize a new treasure of beauty, a new spiritual experience always to be prized, cherished and resorted to with comfort in a bad hour. This "Dance on Place Congo" is too good, too original to get all of its deserts at a first hearing, despite the evident favor with which it has been received. But that is another matter, and the foregoing statement is a personal opinion and estimate which the writer believes will be fully vindicated by the judgment of time, the one infallible music critic.

Some "Barbaric Cacaphony'

What we started to speak of was the striking and suggestive, and at first thought apparently baffling significance of this score, as it appears in relation to other interesting American compositions which have been turned out of late. Speaking of the harmony alone, for example, Gilbert's music, barring some perfectly delicious examples of barbaric cacophony, fit to raise your hair at the proper moment for such a sensation, is old-fashioned. You find in it neither the pungent harmonies contained in Charles Griffes' symphonic poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," played at these concerts a few weeks before the performance of Gilbert's work, nor do you find anything like the orchestral ingenuity shown in the music both of Griffes and of another astonishing American composer, John Alden Carpenter, whose concertino for piano and orchestra had been heard at these concerts just a few weeks previous. Judging by the simple harmonic material, the musical texture, as you might say, of Gilbert's piece, it might have been written—indeed it was written, or conceived—years ago, while the works of Griffes and Carpenter could only have been written yesterday.

The musical idioms of the last two composers are far newer, and in this sense younger than Gilbert's. Their orchestration is incomparably more expert. These young Americans are certainly up to snuff. They have seized on the very latest ideas of foremost Europeans of the day. They have pocketed the thunder of contemporaneous masters and they use it as their own—not clumsily, or with palpably imitative spirit. Far otherwise! With a native ease and audacity as astonishing in music as were the accomplishments of American engineers in Europe in the World war. Theirs is the native facility and practical readiness in grasping and assimilating anything, which is so characteristically and advantageously American.

Coming Young Artists

Thus Carpenter and Griffes, both young men to be watched most carefully, and waited for, have real talent and all kinds of ideas, whether musical or otherwise. Gilbert's mental attitude appears in a way stiffer. We do not believe Gilbert could produce any such gorgeous and yet clear-sounding scores as Griffes and Carpenter, if he wanted to, and we are very sure he doesn't want to.

He turns his back rather intentionally and deliberately on musical tendencies of these kinds. One realizes that he has obstinately hung on to certain things and certain convictions, let the times go or the heavens fall where they may. In a certain technical way, and even as records current esthetic formulae, this work of Gilbert is, then, behind the times.

But we wonder if in a more fundamental way it isn't clean ahead of the times. As a matter of fact we are certain that it is. It is ahead of the times in this: its romantic perception of the beauty and the art quality of conditions present on American soil.

It often takes artists hundreds of years to feel a halo of beauty about a scene or an event. It is not easy, for example, to imagine the story of Rip Van Winkle penned by a Dutchman on the Hudson who lived in Rip Van Winkle's period. When many years have passed they bestow a certain golden, [illegible] in the imagination of poets of later generations, over almost all objects, however unattractive these objects may have appeared to contemporary sight. As we write today one of the most colossal dramas in the history of the world is going on. But to a majority the leading figures in this drama are ordinary men, obstinate, weak or conniving, and the circumstances terrible or tawdry and disillusfonizing. Whereas to a future day the figure of the American President alone, whether he appear as the fearless hero of a new epoch or as a vacillating Hamlet of this one, will offer inexhaustible material to dramatic writers.

Ahead of the Times

What we mean when we say that Gilbert's music is in a fundamental respect far ahead of the time, is that Gilbert is already sufficiently advanced in his imagination to look at America poetically, dramatically, in a picturesque manner, as all of us now look at the America discovered by Columbus, as we will look at America in years to come, as the projector of the greatest vision and the noblest experiment of statesmanship.

We think this fundamental, poetic, racial vision, characteristic of no other American composer of whom we know, the true explanation of the astounding force of this "Dance on Place Congo." It makes every measure—the clumsiest, the heaviest, the most experimental—surge irresistibly forward. It makes the orchestra shout to the high gods the glory of the land and the inexhaustible passions of the race.

In other words, his music has its roots in the ground. While Mr. Griffes wrote fancifully and exotically of the fabled splendor of Kubla Khan. Mr. Gilbert was gripped and compelled to write savage, amorous, fateful music inspired by a dance of slaves in no 'count corner of New Orleans. Mr. Gilbert has always believed that music should be the fruit of the soil. He has clung to his belief, he has searched for its expression and fulfilment as Diogenes with his lantern searched for the honest man, he has held to his artistic faith through every artistic failure or success of his own, and this in the face of much criticism, some mockery and a great deal of misunderstanding. Even, at times, in the face of much unconscious self-misrepresentation.

Genius of America

And so it appears again, that in music as in any other field of creative thought, the spirit and not the letter of the law counts. Gilbert's music remains unlearned and unskilled in modern sophistications. It completely eschews that "latest thing" in composing which others strive so intensely to gain, hopeful of accomplishing something interesting by keeping tabs on the others, fearful of falling behind in the race if they are not in touch with this "latest thing." It is equally and exhilaratingly reckless of precedent, and is a hundred years younger in substance and in idiom than the music still being put out by our older and more academic composers of the past. It has, in fact, no relation to the music of any other group of composers, past or present, foreign or native born. It is often crude, inept, indecent, some would say, in its wanton overriding of musical traditions and proprieties. Some of it is ugly, and possibly in bad taste. But all of it is straight goods, all of it comes from a man with spirit, with imagination, with ideals, who really understands and vibrates to the genius of this mighty land.

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has arranged the following light and eventful programme for the second Young People's Concert to be given by the orchestra in Symphony Hall on Thursday afternoon, Feb. 26 at 4 o'clock: Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz"; Andante from Beethoven's first symphony in C major; Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite (I. morning mood; II. Aese's Death; III. Anitra's dance; IV. In the Hall of the Mountain King); Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and Berlioz's Rakoczy march. Since all tickets for this concert have been distributed through the heads of the schools of Greater Boston no more are available. It is interesting to note that applications for the first concert in January were so numerous as to cover the two concerts, although the audience at the second will be entirely different. Approximately two-thirds of the 50 schools represented at this pending concert will be high schools, where as at the first, the division between high schools and elementary schools was about even. Unfortunately, the full schedule of the orchestra will leave no time for further Young People's Concerts this season.

CHORAL "BLESSED DAMOZEL" BY SYMPHONY

A memorable feature of the pend pair of Boston Symphony concerts be given next Friday and Saturd Feb. 27 and 28, will be the first perfo ance at these concerts of Debussy's ting of Rossetti's "The Blessed D zel" ("La Damoiselle Elue") in w the orchestra will be assisted female chorus trained by Stephe Townsend, and two soloists, Miss Frank, soprano, and Miss Clara Thompson, contralto.

The rest of the programme a variety. Gluck's overture to "Iphi in Aulis," Haydn's Symphony major (B. and H. No. 13) and G Charpentier's sunny and sensuous pressions of Italy" with movemen follows: I. Serenade, with viola so ffte stage. II. At the Fountain. 6th muleback. IV. On the sum V. Naples.

Globe Feb 22

"Thursday at 4. Boston Symphony Orchestra, second concert for young people. Overture to "Der Freischutz", Weber. Andante from First Symphony, Beethoven. Suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg. Scherzo from "Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn. Rackoczy March, Berlioz. All tickets for this concert have been distributed through the heads of schools in Greater Boston, without public sale.

Friday at 2:30, and Saturday at 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra. Sixteenth program. Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Gluck. Symphony in G major, No. 13 in the Breitkopf and Hartel edition, Haydn. "La Demoiselle Elue," Debussy, first time at these concerts. "Impressions of Italy," Charpentier. A female chorus, trained by Stephen Townsend, and two soloists, Ethel Frank, soprano, and Claramond Thompson, contralto, will assist in the Debussy number.

Friday at 8:15. The Harvard Glee Club, [illegible]

The Symphony concerts bring the first performances here of Debussy's "La Demoiselle Elue," based on Rossetti's familiar poem, "The Blessed Damozel," and requiring a female chorus and soloists.

Otto Roth, the Boston Symphony violinist, recently received a message from Europe which brought tidings of William Gericke, the famous ex-conductor of the orchestra. Gericke, now 76 years old, is in excellent health, and resides in a suburb of Vienna with Mme Gericke. A part of last year was spent in Munich, while his daughter attended school, the communication to Mr Roth states. Apparently the veteran leader has escaped the privations which attended most of the people in famine-ridden, poverty-stricken Austria.

[illegible] Feb 22

Young Folks' Symphony

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has arranged the following light program for the second young people's concert to be given by the orchestra in Symphony Hall on Thursday afternoon, February 26, at 4 o'clock. Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz," the andante from Beethoven's first symphony in C major; Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite, the scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and Berlioz' "Rakoczy" march. All the tickets have been distributed in the schools. There will be no more of these concerts this season.

Traveler Feb 22

WOMEN TO SING WITH SYMPHONY

At next week's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra a chorus of women, trained by Stephen Townsend, and Miss Ethel Frank, soprano, and Miss Claramond Thompson, contralto, will assist in Debussy's "The Blessed Damozel." The symphony will be Haydn's in G major. The other numbers on the program will be Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" and Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy."

SECOND CONCERT FOR CHILDREN

Next Thursday afternoon at 4 the Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will give its second concert for young people, tickets for which have all been taken. The program will be: Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz"; Andante from Beethoven's

BOYS AND GIRLS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Attentive Audience Greets Greig and Berlioz

Symphony Hall was crowded with boys and girls yesterday afternoon for the second concert for young people by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Symphony concerts in Boston have come to be regarded as designed chiefly for rich old ladies, and the management when it announced an experimental concert for young people last month was not prepared for the overwhelming demand from the schools and left many disappointed applicants. There was no public sale and no one who obtained tickets for the first concert, given last month, was allowed tickets for the second.

The average age of yesterday's audience was 14 to 15, and boys and girls were present in about equal proportions, with a few scattered grownups. One might have expected such an audience to be more interested in cutting monkey shines than in listening to Beethoven and Berlioz. But it proved the most attentive and thoughtful crowd the orchestra has played to in many a long year.

The hum and buzz of eager comment and gossip ceased as soon as Mr Monteux tapped his desk with his baton, and determined but futile endeavors were made after several number to secure an encore, something which is forbidden by long standing rule at Symphony concerts.

The youngsters, many of them, followed the excellent brief program notes written by Mr Burke of Symphony Hall during the performance. Individuals with pocket scores and handbooks on symphonic music, which they conned attentively, were scattered through the crowd.

The program was made up of a number of short and not too exacting pieces, among which Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite and Berlioz's stirring "Hungarian March" seemed to afford the most pleasure. The performance was dashing and vivid, though the rehearsals seemed to have been too few to permit the usual meticulous nuances.

More of these young people's concerts may be hoped for next season, although there is no room in the crowded schedule of the orchestra for any more this

Herald Feb 27

CHILDREN HEAR FINAL CONCERT

Highly Amused When Symphony Orchestra Plays "Peer Gynt" Suite

SERIES HAS BEEN VERY SUCCESSFUL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second and last Young People's Concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon—the last because on account of the orchestra's engagements it will not be possible to give another concert this season. The experiment has been highly successful. As at the first the seats throughout the hall were filled with interested children of all ages from the schools of Greater Boston. The audience was most attentive and evidently greatly interested.

The program included the overture to "Der Freischuetz," the Andante from Beethoven's first Symphony, Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite, the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and Berlioz's Rakoczy March. Mr. Monteux conducted. As was to be expected, the audience was greatly amused by Grieg's music for the scene in the Mountain King's home. In this respect they did not differ from hearers of maturer years whenever the Suite is played.

Some may question the advisability of performing excerpts from symphonies at these concerts. Surely the Andante from Beethoven's first is not beyond the comprehension of any child that has any ear for music. It is a good thing to acquaint the young with the names and music of great composers so that they do not sit awe-stricken when they are older. After all, Beethoven, Weber and Mendelssohn were mortals; they all wrote pot-boilers, perfunctory pieces in which only superstitious believers in plenary inspiration take pleasure. It is also a good thing for children to hear the good music of famous composers so that later they will not accept the poorer stuff simply because it is signed by a famous name.

It is to be hoped that these concerts will be a feature of every season; that, if possible, there will be more of them; so that as children grow up they will learn to look upon this orchestra as a civic institution, which it is; to realize that as a source of civic pride, one that gives pure and varied enjoyment, it should be supported by all, whatever their walk or condition in life may be.

[illegible]

Traveler Feb 27

LITTLE ONES ENJOY SYMPHONY

Some 2500 school children filled Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon for the second concert for little ones and were so carried away with the playing of the orchestra that they kept Mr. Monteux, the conductor, exceedingly busy acknowledging their applause. The program, Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture, the Andante from Beethoven's C major sympony; Greig's "Peer Gynt" Suite; the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and Berlioz's Rakoczy march, hit them just about right. Of course, the march number scored.

The marked success of these two trial concerts assures the making of these concerts for children an annual affair. One could scarcely think otherwise after witnessing the exceptional pleasure of the youngsters.

more.

ITEMS ABOUT MUSIC

Mr. Monteux, profiting by the test of the first concert of the Symphony Orchestra for young people a month ago, has wisely set a programme of short pieces for the second which befalls on Thursday afternoon of next week. His list traverses Weber's overture to his opera, "Der Freischutz"; the slow movement from Beethoven's first symphony; the familiar suite from Grieg's music to Ibsen's play, "Peer Gynt"; the scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to Shakspeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream"; and the Rakoczy March from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." Such a programme sounds much more ingratiating than that for the first concert and more follows the ways of Mr. Stock in Chicago and Mr. Damrosch in New York with such ventures. With like wisdom, the dispensers of tickets for the second concert, both in the schools and at Symphony Hall, will provide an audience of young people in their teens rather than the children of tenderer years who were too numerous at the first concert. Most of these, as Mr. Monteux plausibly believes, were too young to appreciate either the music or the orchestra.

TISER, FEBRUARY 22,

GILBERT'S WORK IN SYMPHONY

"Place Congo," Music for Connoisseur, Bewilders Audience

By E. F. HARKINS.

"America first!" might have served as the password at the Symphony concerts of last night and Friday afternoon.

An American composer, Henry Franklin Belknap Gilbert, born in Somerville and now living in Cambridge, gave the racy modern touch to a program led by one of the three immortal Mozart symphonies, the one in G minor. Mr. Gilbert was represented by a symphonic poem, "The Dance in Place Congo," suggested by George W. Cable's article of the same title, reminiscent of ante-bellum days in New Orleans. "The Place Congo was a no-'count open space at the fag-end of New Orleans," according to the composer. "The slaves were given liberty to meet there and enjoy themselves once a week, and it is one of their rude but picturesque gatherings which Cable tells of in his article." The composition was once submitted to Dr. Muck, who, according to report, "referred to it contemptuously as 'niggah music.'" So the composer took the music back and turned it into a ballet, which was performed here two years ago by the Metropolitan Opera Company dancers. It was a novelty, therefore, only to those who take their musical fare exclusively at the Symphony table.

The music is assuredly "rude and picturesque," with a strong flavor of the bamboula, a dance that came from the West Indies—brutal, bizarre music, that threw the slaves into a frenzy of excitement. New Orleans stopped the Place Congo dances long, long ago, Mr. Gilbert's work reflects his praiseworthy enthusiasm over American subjects; also his skill and imagination; but "Place Congo" is music for the connoisseur. The audience found it not only grotesque and bizarre, but exotic, bewildering. Place Congo and the levee are far removed from the old Suwanee plantation. The New Orleans of this tone picture is as strange a place as Timbuctoo. Mr. Monteux conducted con amore, and Mr. Gilbert came forth to bow to the fitful applause.

Frederic Fradkin, concert-master of the orchestra, and native American, played the solo part in the performance of Lalo's "Spanish Symphony." Of his artistry, Bostonians may well be proud. His full-fledged technic made light of bristling difficulties; his tone, though not large, was always round and pure, and after the first few nervous moments he played with the zest of the true virtuoso. He did well to shake hands with Mr. Monteux and thank him for the splendid assistance of the orchestra. The audience recalled him several times, paying warm tribute to his admirable efforts.

The crowning feature of the concert was the superb performance of Mozart's brilliant and beautiful symphony. It was worthy of the palmiest days of the orchestra. Truly Mozartian! Never was an ovation more richly deserved.

Herald Feb 22

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERT

Mr. Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has arranged the following light and pleasing program for the second young people's concert by the orchestra in Symphony Hall on Thursday afternoon, Feb. 26, at 4 o'clock: Weber, overture to "Der Freischuetz"; Beethoven, Andante from Symphony No. 1; Grieg's "Peer Gynt," suite No. 1; Mendelssohn, Scherzo from music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Berlioz, Rakoczy March. Since all tickets for this concert have been distributed through the heads of the schools of Greater Boston, no more are available. Applications for the first concert in January were so numerous as to cover the two concerts, although the audience at the second will be entirely different. Approximately two-thirds of the 50 schools represented at this pending concert will be high schools—whereas at the first the division between high schools and elementary schools was about even. Unfortunately, the full schedule of the orchestra will leave no time for further young people's concerts this season.

"BLESSED DAMOZEL"

A noteworthy feature of the pair of Boston Symphony concerts on next Friday and Saturday will be the first performance at these concerts of Debussy's setting of Rossetti's "The Blessed Damozel" ("La Damoiselle Elue"), in which the orchestra will be assisted by a female chorus trained by Stephen S. Townsend, and two soloists, Ethel Frank, soprano, and Claramond Thompson, contralto.

The rest of the program affords variety: Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Haydn's Symphony in G major (B. and H. No. 13), and Charpentier's sunny and sensuous "Impressions of Italy"—I, Serenade (with viola solo off the stage); II, At the Fountain; III,

SPIRIT OF GILBERT'S MUSIC

A further retrospect of the performance of Henry F. Gilbert's symphonic poem, "The Dance on Place Congo," played at the Symphony concerts of Friday afternoon and yesterday evening, makes this superbly imaginative and romantic composition assume a more and more significant relation to the development of music in this country. In yesterday's Post this writer's impressions of the work were narrated at some length, and they need not be repeated here. The music seems to us to represent the biggest and the most impressive orchestral canvas Mr. Gilbert has yet turned out. In no other composition of which we know is the peculiarly rich and romantic quality of his imagination and the astonishing creative energy which informs all of his music so apparent. He has written nothing more beautiful, more subtly and admirably developed from germinal motives of racial origins than the sensuous love music which forms the middle section of this poem, and the savage, eeriee, nocturnal which brings the end. This music belongs to that kind of art which, when it appears, causes the listener immediately to realize a new treasure of beauty, a new spiritual experience always to be prized, cherished and resorted to with comfort in a bad hour. This "Dance on Place Congo" is too good, too original to get all of its deserts at a first hearing, despite the evident favor with which it has been received. But that is another matter, and the foregoing statement is a personal opinion and estimate which the writer believes will be fully vindicated by the judgment of time, the one infallible music critic.

Some "Barbaric Cacaphony"

What we started to speak of was the striking and suggestive, and at first thought apparently baffling significance of this score, as it appears in relation to other interesting American compositions which have been turned out of late. Speaking of the harmony alone, for example, Gilbert's music, barring some perfectly delicious examples of barbaric cacophony, fit to raise your hair at the proper moment for such a sensation, is old-fashioned. You find in it neither the pungent harmonies contained in Charles Griffes' symphonic poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," played at these concerts a few weeks before the performance of Gilbert's work, nor do you find anything like the orchestral ingenuity shown in the music both of Griffes and of another astonishing American composer, John Alden Carpenter, whose concertino for piano and orchestra had been heard at these concerts just a few weeks previous. Judging by the simple harmonic material, the musical texture, as you might say, of Gilbert's piece, it might have been written—indeed it was written, or conceived—years ago, while the works of Griffes and Carpenter could only have been written yesterday.

The musical idioms of the last two composers are far newer, and in this sense younger than Gilbert's. Their orchestration is incomparably more expert. These young Americans are certainly up to snuff. They have seized on the very latest ideas of foremost Europeans of the day. They have pocketed the thunder of contemporaneous masters and they use it as their own—not clumsily, or with palpably imitative spirit. Far otherwise! With a native ease and audacity as astonishing in music as were the accomplishments of American engineers in Europe in the World war. Theirs is the native facility and practical readiness in grasping and assimilating anything, which is so characteristically and advantageously American.

Coming Young Artists

Thus Carpenter and Griffes, both young men to be watched most carefully, and waited for, have real talent and all kinds of ideas, whether musical or otherwise. Gilbert's mental attitude appears in a way stiffer. We do not believe Gilbert could produce any such gorgeous and yet clear-sounding scores as Griffes and Carpenter, if he wanted to, and we are very sure he doesn't want to.

He turns his back rather intentionally and deliberately on musical tendencies of these kinds. One realizes that he has obstinately hung on to certain things and certain convictions, let the times go or the heavens fall where they may. In a certain technical way, and even as records current esthetic formulae, this work of Gilbert is, then, behind the times.

But we wonder if in a more fundamental way it isn't clean ahead of the times. As a matter of fact we are certain that it is. It is ahead of the times in this: its romantic perception of the beauty and the art quality of conditions present on American soil.

It often takes artists hundreds of years to feel a halo of beauty about a scene or an event. It is not easy, for example, to imagine the story of Rip Van Winkle penned by a Dutchman on the Hudson who lived in Rip Van Winkle's period. When many years have passed they bestow a certain golden, [illegible] in the imagination of poets of later generations, over almost all objects, however unattractive these objects may have appeared to contemporary sight. As we write today one of the most colossal dramas in the history of the world is going on. But to a majority the leading figures in this drama are ordinary men, obstinate, weak or conniving, and the circumstances terrible or tawdry and disillusionizing. Whereas to a future day the figure of the American President alone, whether he appear as the fearless hero of a new epoch or as a vacillating Hamlet of this one, will offer inexhaustible material to dramatic writers.

Ahead of the Times

What we mean when we say that Gilbert's music is in a fundamental respect far ahead of the time, is that Gilbert is already sufficiently advanced in his imagination to look at America poetically, dramatically, in a picturesque manner, as all of us now look at the America discovered by Columbus, as we will look at America in years to come, as the projector of the greatest vision and the noblest experiment of statesmanship.

We think this fundamental, poetic, racial vision, characteristic of no other American composer of whom we know, the true explanation of the astounding force of this "Dance on Place Congo." It makes every measure—the clumsiest, the heaviest, the most experimental—surge irresistibly forward. It makes the orchestra shout to the high gods the glory of the land and the inexhaustible passions of the race.

In other words, his music has its roots in the ground. While Mr. Griffes wrote fancifully and exotically of the fabled splendor of Kubla Khan. Mr. Gilbert was gripped and compelled to write savage, amorous, fateful music inspired by a dance of slaves in no 'count corner of New Orleans. Mr. Gilbert has always believed that music should be the fruit of the soil. He has clung to his belief, he has searched for its expression and fulfilment as Diogenes with his lantern searched for the honest man, he has held to his artistic faith through every artistic failure or success of his own, and this in the face of much criticism, some mockery and a great deal of misunderstanding. Even, at times, in the face of much unconscious self-misrepresentation.

Genius of America

And so it appears again, that in music as in any other field of creative thought, the spirit and not the letter of the law counts. Gilbert's music remains unlearned and unskilled in modern sophistications. It completely eschews that "latest thing" in composing which others strive so intensely to gain, hopeful of accomplishing something interesting by keeping tabs on the others, fearful of falling behind in the race if they are not in touch with this "latest thing." It is equally and exhilaratingly reckless of precedent, and is a hundred years younger in substance and in idiom than the music still being put out by our older and more academic composers of the past. It has, in fact, no relation to the music of any other group of composers, past or present, foreign or native born. It is often crude, inept, indecent, some would say, in its wanton overriding of musical traditions and proprieties. Some of it is ugly, and possibly in bad taste. But all of it is straight goods, all of it comes from a man with spirit, with imagination, with ideals, who really understands and vibrates to the genius of this mighty land.

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has arranged the following light and eventful programme for the second Young People's Concert to be given by the orchestra in Symphony Hall on Thursday afternoon, Feb. 26 at 4 o'clock: Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz"; Andante from Beethoven's first symphony in C major; Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite (I. morning mood; II. Aese's Death; III. Anitra's dance; IV. In the Hall of the Mountain King); Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and Berlioz's Rakoczy march. Since all tickets for this concert have been distributed through the heads of the schools of Greater Boston no more are available. It is interesting to note that applications for the first concert in January were so numerous as to cover the two concerts, although the audience at the second will be entirely different. Approximately two-thirds of the 50 schools represented at this pending concert will be high schools, where as at the first, the division between high schools and elementary schools was about even. Unfortunately, the full schedule of the orchestra will leave no time for further Young People's Concerts this season.

CHORAL "BLESSED DAMOZEL" BY SYMPHONY

A memorable feature of the pending pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given next Friday and Saturday, Feb. 27 and 28, will be the first performance at these concerts of Debussy's setting of Rossetti's "The Blessed Damozel" ("La Damoiselle Elue") in which the orchestra will be assisted by a female chorus trained by Stephen S. Townsend, and two soloists, Miss Ethel Frank, soprano, and Miss Claramond Thompson, contralto.

The rest of the programme affords variety. Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Haydn's Symphony in G major (B. and H. No. 13) and Gustav Charpentier's sunny and sensuous "Impressions of Italy" with movements as follows: I. Serenade, with viola solo off the stage. II. At the Fountain. III. On muleback. IV. On the summits. V. Naples.

Globe Feb 22

Thursday at 4. Boston Symphony Orchestra, second concert for young people. Overture to "Der Freischutz": Weber. Andante from First Symphony, Beethoven. Suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg. Scherzo from "Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn. Rackoczy March, Berlioz. All tickets for this concert have been distributed through the heads of schools in Greater Boston, without public sale.

Friday at 2:30, and Saturday at 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra. Sixteenth program. Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Gluck. Symphony in G major, No. 13 in the Breitkopf and Hartel edition, Haydn. "La Demoiselle Elue," Debussy, first time at these concerts. "Impressions of Italy," Charpentier. A female chorus, trained by Stephen Townsend, and two soloists, Ethel Frank, soprano, and Claramond Thompson, contralto, will assist in the Debussy number.

Friday at 8:15. The Harvard Glee Club, [illegible]

The Symphony concerts bring the first performances here of Debussy's "La Demoiselle Elue," based on Rossetti's familiar poem, "The Blessed Damozel," and requiring a female chorus and soloists.

Otto Roth, the Boston Symphony violinist, recently received a message from Europe which brought tidings of William Gericke, the famous ex-conductor of the orchestra. Gericke, now 76 years old, is in excellent health, and resides in a suburb of Vienna with Mme Gericke. A part of last year was spent in Munich, while his daughter attended school, the communication to Mr Roth states. Apparently the veteran leader has escaped the privations which attended most of the people in famine-ridden, poverty-stricken Austria.

Globe Feb 22

Young Folks' Symphony

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has arranged the following light program for the second young people's concert to be given by the orchestra in Symphony Hall on Thursday afternoon, February 26, at 4 o'clock. Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz," the andante from Beethoven's first symphony in C major; Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite, the scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and Berlioz' "Rakoczy" march. All the tickets have been distributed in the schools. There will be no more of these concerts this season.

"Samson and Delilah"

Traveler Feb 22

WOMEN TO SING WITH SYMPHONY

At next week's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra a chorus of women, trained by Stephen Townsend, and Miss Ethel Frank, soprano, and Miss Claramond Thompson, contralto, will assist in Debussy's "The Blessed Damozel." The symphony will be Haydn's in G major. The other numbers on the program will be Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" and Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy."

SECOND CONCERT FOR CHILDREN

Next Thursday afternoon at 4 the Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will give its second concert for young people, tickets for which have all been taken. The program will be: Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz"; Andante from Beethoven's

BOYS AND GIRLS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Attentive Audience Greets Greig and Berlioz

Symphony Hall was crowded with boys and girls yesterday afternoon for the second concert for young people by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Symphony concerts in Boston have come to be regarded as designed chiefly for rich old ladies, and the management when it announced an experimental concert for young people last month was not prepared for the overwhelming demand from the schools and left many disappointed applicants. There was no public sale and no one who obtained tickets for the first concert, given last month, was allowed tickets for the second.

The average age of yesterday's audience was 14 to 15, and boys and girls were present in about equal proportions, with a few scattered grownups. One might have expected such an audience to be more interested in cutting monkey shines than in listening to Beethoven and Berlioz. But it proved the most attentive and thoughtful and the orchestra has played to in a long year.

The hum and buzz of eager comment and gossip ceased as soon as Mr Monteux rapped his desk with his baton, and refined but futile endeavors were made after several number to secure an encore, something which is forbidden by a standing rule at Symphony concerts.

The youngsters, many of them, followed excellent brief program notes by Mr Burke of Symphony Hall before each performance. Individuals had their scores and handbooks on the music, which they conned attentively, were scattered through the [illegible] was made up of a number not too exacting pieces, Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite and the stirring "Hungarian [illegible] afford the most pleasing. The performance was dashing and [illegible] rehearsals seemed to have been [illegible] to permit the usual [illegible] people's concerts [illegible] season, although [illegible] the crowded schedule of the orchestra for any more this

Herald Feb 27

LITTLE ONES ENJOY SYMPHONY

Some 2500 school children filled Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon for the second concert for little ones and were so carried away with the playing of the orchestra that they kept Mr. Monteux, the conductor, exceedingly busy acknowledging their applause. The program, Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture, the Andante from Beethoven's C major sympony; Greig's "Peer Gynt" Suite; the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and Berlioz's Rakoczy march, hit them just about right. Of course, the march number scored.

The marked success of these two trial concerts assures the making of these concerts for children an annual affair. One could scarcely think otherwise after witnessing the exceptional pleasure of the youngsters.

Traveler Feb 27

ITEMS ABOUT MUSIC

Mr. Monteux, profiting by the test of the first concert of the Symphony Orchestra for young people a month ago, has wisely set a programme of short pieces for the second which befalls on Thursday afternoon of next week. His list traverses Weber's overture to his opera, "Der Freischutz"; the slow movement from Beethoven's first symphony; the familiar suite from Grieg's music to Ibsen's play, "Peer Gynt"; the scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to Shakspeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream"; and the Rakoczy March from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." Such a programme sounds much more ingratiating than that for the first concert and more follows the ways of Mr. Stock in Chicago and Mr. Damrosch in New York with such ventures. With like wisdom, the dispensers of tickets for the second concert, both in the schools and at Symphony Hall, will provide an audience of young people in their teens rather than the children of tenderer years who were too numerous at the first concert. Most of these, as Mr. Monteux plausibly believes, were too young to appreciate either the music or the orchestra.

Herald Feb 27

CHILDREN HEAR FINAL CONCERT

Highly Amused When Symphony Orchestra Plays "Peer Gynt" Suite

SERIES HAS BEEN VERY SUCCESSFUL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second and last Young People's Concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon—the last because on account of the orchestra's engagements it will not be possible to give another concert this season. The experiment has been highly successful. As at the first the seats throughout the hall were filled with interested children of all ages from the schools of Greater Boston. The audience was most attentive and evidently greatly interested.

The program included the overture to "Der Freischuetz," the Andante from Beethoven's first Symphony, Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite, the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and Berlioz's Rakoczy March. Mr. Monteux conducted. As was to be expected, the audience was greatly amused by Grieg's music for the scene in the Mountain King's home. In this respect they did not differ from hearers of maturer years whenever the Suite is played.

Some may question the advisability of performing excerpts from symphonies at these concerts. Surely the Andante from Beethoven's first is not beyond the comprehension of any child that has any ear for music. It is a good thing to acquaint the young with the names and music of great composers so that they do not sit awe-stricken when they are older. After all, Beethoven, Weber and Mendelssohn were mortals; they all wrote pot-boilers, perfunctory pieces in which only superstitious believers in plenary inspiration take pleasure. It is also a good thing for children to hear the good music of famous composers so that later they will not accept the poorer stuff simply because it is signed by a famous name.

It is to be hoped that these concerts will be a feature of every season; that, if possible, there will be more of them; so that as children grow up they will learn to look upon this orchestra as a civic institution, which it is; to realize that as a source of civic pride, one that gives pure and varied enjoyment, it should be supported by all, whatever their walk or condition in life may be.

[illegible] SOLDIERS [illegible]

Traveler Feb 27

MUSIC AND THE DANCE

BETTERING THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

A Second Experiment with a Programm More Wisely Chosen and a Clearly Interested and Pleasured Audience—The Daily Chronicle of Symphonic Strife—Mr. Carpenter's Ballet Raises and Fulfils Expectations—Items and Prospects

FROM experience all concerned in the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for young people are learning wisdom, so that the second, which befell at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, clearly bettered the first. The music again filled only an hour—probably the limit of normal youthful interest and attention—but this time it consisted of five short pieces, or even of eight, if the listener chose to count each division of Grieg's music to the play, "Peer Gynt," as a separate number. There is reason to doubt whether a more or less untutored audience, in years hardly above the middle teens, is quite ready as yet to listen to Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and to Beethoven's overture to Goethe's tragedy of "Egmont" as it was asked to do at the first concert. In all probability it heard these pieces with more wonder and speculation than interest and understanding. Even adults variously measure their pleasure in them. In contrast, the young listeners of yesterday seemed to follow gladly and comprehendingly the mello periods or the warm flow of Weber's overture to "Der Freischütz"; the fairy-footed progress of Mendelssohn's Scherzo for the elves of Shakspeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream"; the surges of sound and the flashes of rhythm through Berlioz's "Rakoczy March." The audience of January often seemed restless and puzzled; the audience of February was plainly intent and pleasured. Not less eagerly than it heard the pieces aforesaid, did it listen also to the Andante from Beethoven's first symphony and to the suite of Grieg. Fortunate youth not to speculate upon Beethoven's gentle, transparent, undulating song as forerunner of deeper melodies and to hear Grieg's measures as so much music in itself and not as decoration to a seldom seen play. Enough for them that the Andante yielded the pleasure of simple and purling instrumental song; that the music of Ase's death sounded gently, the music of Anitra's dance brightly, the music of the trolls gaily, fantastically.

As it happened likewise, the young people heard these pieces of Grieg played with a delicacy of detail they have not received hereabouts in years; while the string and the wind choirs could hardly have been smoother or more songful than they were through Beethoven's Andante. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra do not spare pains upon these young people's concerts, even if the dewy shimmer, the tripping lightness of Mendelssohn's Scherzo did in measure evade them. Finally, the audience seemed better chosen than it was a month ago. Then, too many of the "young people" were no more than children for whom, unless they were uncommonly precocious, music and orchestra were but occasion for restless wonder. Yesterday some such children were discoverable; but on every side around them, in grateful numbers, interest and pleasure sat the youth in the teens whose curiosity it is the design of the concerts to waken, whose inclinations in music, pieces and performance are to form. Another year, after these two preliminary ventures, the Young People's Concerts of the Symphony Orchestra should fulfil their purpose and assemble the desired audiences. Perhaps they would gain in animation and be more a thing apart from routine did some adaptable speaker say the persuading and enlightening word about the several numbers that the programme-sheet now bears in print. Perhaps, also, as a cynic or two has ventured to hint, the youth of the private as well as the public schools might be advisedly included in the audiences. But who, except those same cynics would dare to suggest that their taste needs guidance? Have they not the musical plays?

NEXT SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the pair of Boston Symphony Concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 5 and 6, Pierre Monteux will conduct Berlioz's noted "Fantastic" Symphony, which describes romantic episodes of his love, including his own execution, "The Pauses of Silence" by the young Italian revolutionary composer, Malipiero, which puzzled many and also delighted many when played by the orchestra last season, will be repeated at this pair of concerts. The closing numbers will be Borodin's pictorial Russian Sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence" to Be Heard Again from the Symphony Orchestra—Berlioz and Wagner, Besides—Miss Tarasova and Russian Folk-Pieces—Chamber Music for Both String and Wind Choir

ONCE more Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra will have a pair of concerts to themselves, and the conductor can set for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, a programme of four numbers. It begins with Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," music of romantic imagery and passion that has withstood a whole century of changing voice and changing fashions. Dreams and passions ravage the artist of Berlioz's vision; he courts the pleasures of the dance; he soliloquizes solitary in the dawn; he sees himself led to execution; he beholds infernal regions. Widely the composer stretches his tonal canvas; vividly and characteristically he fills it. Next, Mr. Monteux will repeat the novel piece of last winter that stirred curiosity, resentment and praise above all the rest—"Pauses of Silence: Seven Symphonic Expressions" by the young Italian composer, Malipiero, music as fantastic in voice as it is singular of mood and image. With reason after Berlioz and Malipiero, two repertory pieces complete the programme—Borodin's concentrated tone-picture of Asian steppe and Wagner's overture to his opera, "The Flying Dutchman," his only music of the sea, except a few measures in the first scene of "Tristan," his first music of spiritual redemption.

Miss Tarasova Returns

[illegible] at the Sund[illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S NEXT PROGRAM

To open the 17th pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday and Saturday (March 5 and 6), Mr. Monteux will conduct Berlioz's famous "Fantastic" Symphony, in which the romance of the composer's love traverses episodes of a ball, a pastoral scene, a march to the scaffold and his own execution, finally an orgy of the witch's Sabbath. A noteworthy repetition will be "The Pauses of Silence," by the daring and revolutionary Italian composer, Malipiero. These "Seven Symphonic Expressions" attracted much attention and excited comment at the concerts of last season. The closing numbers will be Borodin's descriptive sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

E-flat major [illegible] strings.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

To open the seventeenth pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall Friday and Saturday (March 5 and 6), Pierre Monteux will conduct Berlioz's famous "Fantastic" symphony, "The Pauses of Silence," by the revolutionary young Italian composer, Malipero. Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman" will also be played.

MUSIC NOTES

Items and Announcements

Debussy's "Blessed Damozel," repeated at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening, is likely to be the only choral music undertaken this season by Mr. Monteux. Various circumstances have compelled him to abandon the performance projected last autumn of Franck's oratorio, "The Beatitudes," with the Symphony Orchestra and the Symphony Chorus reconstituted. Plans, however, are afoot—or were, until present controversies began—for three choral concerts next winter outside the regular course of the Symphony Concerts.

Word comes from Berlin to the newspaper, Musical America, that Dr. Muck has spent the winter at Graz in Austria, where Mrs. Muck's family has dwelt for many years. His only work in public has been the rehearsal and the conducting of a restudied "Tristan" at the municipal opera house. In the spring he will go to Vienna as conductor through a series of "special performances" of Wagner's music-dramas, and thence to Germany for various concerts. For the time, he prefers to make no long contract for either opera house or concert hall.

At the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge on Thursday evening, it will be heard in the first symphony of Brahms, Borodin's "sketch" of an Asian steppe, and Wagner's overture to his opera, "The Flying Dutchman." Mrs. Laura Littlefield will be the assisting singer in an air from Händel's oratorio, "Samson" and the "Hymn to the Sun" from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Golden Cockerel."

ITEMS ABOUT THE STAGE

[illegible] picture appropriate.

Items and Announcements

At the Symphony Concerts of next week there will again be no intruding "soloist," and Mr. Monteux can find room for four pieces on his programme. They are: Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony; Borodin's "sketch" in tones of Asian steppes; Wagner's overture to his opera, "The Flying Dutchman," and the Italian, Malipiero's, singular music, "The Pauses of Silence," first heard at the concerts last winter. They then interested and stirred two audiences beyond the usual fortune of "ultra-modern" numbers. Mr. Monteux does well to keep them in the active repertory.

[illegible] If the Symphony Orchestra remains intact through its monthly journey Southward next week, Mr. Monteux will include in one of his programmes at New York Mr. Carpenter's Concertino, as yet unheard there. Again Mr. Robert Schmitz will play the piano part. Upon the other of the two programmes, the conductor will set Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence," likewise new to the ears of New York.

BOSTON SYMPHONY GREETED BY BIG AUDIENCE HERE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra drew a large audience for the final concert of the season at Infantry Hall last night. Conductor Monteux presented a well arranged programme which brought considerable applause on several occasions.

Those who believed the recent labor troubles of the orchestra would result in a smaller number of players were surprised to see the orchestra fill the stage. Among the string instruments there was an absence of tonal volume but that may be remedied with little difficulty.

Albert Spaulding, American violinist, was soloist. The Dvorak Symphony, "From the New World" was presented in a timely fashion and Mr. Monteux read it with keen reference to every detail. It is the Bohemian composer's tribute to this country, in which he lived for some time. The negro melodies were given simply and beautifully and they made a strong appeal. The piece became con spirito to make it characteristically American. Mr. Spaulding played the Mendelssohn concerto with lively grace and he received much praise from the audience. The programme finished with Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

BOSTON SYMPHONY APPEARS IN FINAL CONCERT OF SEASON

Large Attendance Listen to Pleasing Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its final concert of the season here in Infantry Hall last evening. There was the usual large attendance and the pleasing programme arranged by Conductor Monteux met with much favor.

Doubtless there were many in the audience who expected a smaller orchestra than that which filled the stage. The organization's reduced membership consequent upon its recent troubles would scarcely have been noticed by one unfamiliar with the true state of affairs. A few vacancies among the strings and a slight lessening of tonal volume in that section gave the strongest hint of what, it is to be hoped, are only temporary difficulties. Albert Spaulding, American violinist, was the soloist. The programme follows:

Dvorak.. Symphony No. 5, in E-minor, "From the New World."
Adagio; Allegro molto.
Largo.
Scherzo
Allegro con fucco.
Mendelssohn—Concerto for violin in E-minor, Op. 64.
Allegro molto appassionato.
Andante.
Allegretto non troppo: Allegro molto vivace.
Weber.....Overture to "Der Freischutz"

The Dvorak symphony, "From the New World," was admirably adapted to the needs of the hour and Mr. Monteux read it in sympathetic mood. This work, so melodious and pleasing, is the Bohemian composer's legacy to this country, in which he lived for a time. Its plaintive themes, inspired by familiarity and close study of negro melodies, are treated simply and beautifully, and, to the average listener, the symphony makes strong appeal. In the first movement M. Monteux kept to a more rapid pace than has been the custom of some conductors who have presented it here. Perhaps this was owing to a belief that by such means the music became more characteristically American.

The somewhat sombre beauty of the Largo, the sprightly Scherzo and the brilliance of the finale were brought out in a manner that won several recalls, M. Monteux sharing the applause with his players.

Albert Spaulding played the Mendelssohn concerto in spirited style. The last movement was particularly brilliant and the audience gave him a flattering reception.

Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz" concluded an enjoyable programme.

[illegible] ELECTED

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The fifth and last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, was given in Infantry Hall, last evening, a large audience of musical and society people greeting the brilliant conductor with such enthusiastic applause at his every appearance as to mean really an ovation. The applause doubtless was an expression of recognition and appreciation of Mr. Monteux's wonderful efficiency not only as a conductor of the highest rank, but an organizer as well for despite the recent withdrawal from the orchestra of 30 of its men, Mr. Monteux has within a month filled most of the chairs left vacant by the recent secession from the orchestra, with men who are artists in their profession.

The result is a restored orchestra of "sufficiency and efficiency" whose magnificent playing of the Dvorak Symphony last evening left no doubt in the minds of all who heard it of the future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the hands of a conductor of the musical greatness of Mr. Monteux.

The soloist of the concert was Albert Spaulding, the famous American violinist and the program was as follows:

Symphony No. 5, in E-minor, "From the New World," Op. 95, Dvorak; Adagio; Allegro moto; Largo; Scherzo; Allegro con fuoco; Concerto for violin in E-minor, Op. 64, Mendelssohn; Allegro molto appassionate; Andante; Allegretto non troppo; Allegro molto vivace; Overture to "Der Freischutz," Weber.

The "New World Symphony" by the Czech composer, was given a masterly reading by the conductor and it was magnificently played by the orchestra. The symphony, which abounds in songful melodies and infectious rythms, has been the subject of much controversy as to its origin—whether it is Bohemian or its melodies derived from negro folk music. This much-mooted question aside, the symphony is full of beauty, varied and richly colored, especially in the exquisite "Largo."

Dvorak, however, is a Bohemian composer of the first rank and he turned the tide of Bohemian national music into the general current of European music, thereby enriching and coloring it.

The interpretation by the orchestra of this picturesque symphony was vital, vivid and musically beautiful. Mr. Spaulding's playing of the Mendelssohn concerto was distinguished by finished technique and notable brilliancy especially in the last movement of the concert. He was recalled five times at the close of the concerto.

Weber's beautiful overture, superbly played by the orchestra, ended the program.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1861
From [illegible] Journal
[illegible] R. I.
APR 4 1920 A

Final Symphony Concert

The final concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Tuesday night in Infantry Hall will be the chief musical event of the week. Already a series of five nights has been settled upon for next year. Mr. Monteux will continue as leader and Infantry Hall will be the place.

Those who may have feared that they would hear a group of players reduced to chamber music size, because of the strike, have had needless apprehensions. The string section, where the losses were greatest, has gradually built up a membership of 50 players. Before the strike there were 57 strings. The other choirs have likewise been reinforced by substitutions.

Albert Sp[illegible]
Soloist with Boston Symphony Orches[illegible]

Concerning the present stage of the rebuilding process, H. T. Parker, in a review of a recent concert in Boston, ays:

"Sundry young musicians, already tested and waiting opportunity to join the band, have increased the string choir; out of semi-retirement have come such a virtuoso of the trombone as Mr. Hamper and so expert a kettle drummer as Mr. Rettberger.

"The orchestra is quite large enough for a wide choice of pieces distributed through interesting programmes. The several choirs are better balanced than they were a fortnight ago, and there was little hint of diminished tone even in the divided violins of the prelude to Wagner's 'Lohengrin.'"

Albert Spalding, the soloist here, plays a Stradivarius, the prize of his collection. It was made in 1735. His next most valuable violin is one made in 1721 by Domenicus Montagna, a pupil of the master maker. Mr. Spalding's principal number will be Mendelssonn's concerto with orchestra. The orchestra will play Dvorak's "New World" symphony, and close with Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

ESTABLISHED 1891
From [illegible]
Providence, R. I.
APR 3 1920

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WILL APPEAR HERE NEXT SEASON

Excellent Programme Arranged for Concert Next Tuesday Evening.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that it has arranged to give five concerts on Tuesday evenings next season at Infantry Hall under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, the present director.

At the final concert this season, to be held at Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, the "New World" symphony, by Dvorak, will be the principal symphonic number. Whether its songful melodies and strong infectious rhythms are predominately Bohemian, or are actually derived from our negro folk music has been a subject for prolonged and rather fruitless controversy. About the popularity of this brilliantly orchestrated music with American audiences there can be no dispute.

The soloist of the evening will be Albert Spalding, the violin genius, who will play Mendelssohn's Concerto with the orchestra. The closing number will be Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date APR 4 1920 A

By N. B. Pettis

LAST BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The program which Pierre Monteux has chosen for the last Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, is the subject of an absorbing farewell. The "New World" Symphony by the Czech composer, Dvorak, will be the principal symphonic number. Whether its songful melodies and strong infectious rhythms are predominantly Bohemian or actually derived from our negro folk music has been a subject for prolonged and rather fruitless controversy. About the popularity of this brilliantly orchestrated music with American audiences there can be no dispute.

As the soloist of the evening, Albert Spalding, a foremost genius among the violinists of the day, will play Mendelssohn's Concerto with the orchestra. The closing number will be Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz."

From [illegible]
[illegible] 1920 A

Pierre Monteux and his Boston Symphony Orchestra held forth in Symphony last Monday evening, under the local management of Joseph A. Fiedman. The program included Weber's overture to "Der Freischuetz," Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia" tone poem, and Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyll," the prelude, the march of the apprentices and the homage to Hans Sachs from the "Meistersingers," and the Grieg Concerto in A minor for piano and orchestra, with Rudolph Ganz as soloist.

Mr. Monteux has had some heavy burdens to carry in recent weeks owing to the wholesale resignation from the orchestra of some thirty-five members. Some have been replaced, but only about seventy players were on the platform Monday night, and the renditions cannot be considered as truly representative of the orchestra's art as displayed under Dr. Muck's and Dr. Gericke's regime.

Mr. Monteux conducted the overture with a heavy hand, and the orchestra played it in a more or less perfunctory manner. Borodin's sketch was on a higher plane artistically.

In conducting Wagner Mr. Monteux showed his ability of understanding the great master's idiom, albeit the prelude has been played with greater authority and more stirring effect. The Siegfried Idyll, written by Wagner in November, 1870, was first performed by a small orchestra of sixteen players, who stood on the stairs in Wagner's home and played it in honor of Wagner's wife, Cosima, on the anniversary of her birth. Its themes are from the third act of "Siegfried." They are developed at great length, and are supplemented by a cradle song. The Idyll was played tenderly.

Rudolph Ganz is no sensational player, but rather a sterling artist who handles the work in hand in the spirit the composer intends. His technical equipment is flawless and he has poise. In the concerto he was overwhelmed several times by the orchestra, but when given an opportunity of being heard his fine playing won the approval of the audience. On the conclusion of the concerto the greatest enthusiasm of the evening was manifested, and Mr. Ganz was forced to return to the platform five times to make his acknowledgments.

Mr. Milligen's Lecture.

MUSIC AND THE DANCE

BETTERING THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

A Second Experiment with a Programm More Wisely Chosen and a Clearly In terested and Pleasured Audience—Th Daily Chronicle of Symphonic Strife— Mr. Carpenter's Ballet Raises and Ful fills Expectations—Items and Prospects

FROM experience all concerned in the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for young people are learning wisdom, so that the second, which befell at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, clearly bettered the first. The music again filled only an hour—probably the limit of normal youthful interest and attention—but this time it consisted of five short pieces, or even of eight, if the listener chose to count each division of Grieg's music to the play, "Peer Gynt," as a separate number. There is reason to doubt whether a more or less untutored audience, in years hardly above the middle teens, is quite ready as yet to listen to Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and to Beethoven's overture to Goethe's tragedy of "Egmont" as it was asked to do at the first concert. In all probability it heard these pieces with more wonder and speculation than interest and understanding. Even adults variously measure their pleasure in them. In contrast, the young listeners of yesterday seemed to follow gladly and comprehendingly the mellow periods or the warm flow of Weber's overture to "Der Freischütz"; the fairy-footed progress of Mendelssohn's Scherzo for the elves of Shakspeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream"; the surges of sound and the flashes of rhythm through Berlioz's "Rakoczy March." The audience of January often seemed restless and puzzled; the audience of February was plainly intent and pleasured. Not less eagerly than it heard the pieces aforesaid, did it listen also to the Andante from Beethoven's first symphony and to the suite of Grieg. Fortunate youth not to speculate upon Beethoven's gentle, transparent, undulating song as forerunner of deeper melodies and to hear Grieg's measures as so much music in itself and not as decoration to a seldom seen play. Enough for them that the Andante yielded the pleasure of simple and purling instrumental song; that the music of Ase's death sounded gently, the music of Anitra's dance brightly, the music of the trolls gaily, fantastically.

As it happened likewise, the young people heard these pieces of Grieg played with a delicacy of detail they have not received hereabouts in years; while the string and the wind choirs could hardly have been smoother or more songful than they were through Beethoven's Andante. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra do not spare pains upon these young people's concerts, even if the dewy shimmer, the tripping lightness of Mendelssohn's Scherzo did in measure evade them. Finally, the audience seemed better chosen than it was a month ago. Then, too many of the "young people" were no more than children for whom, unless they were uncommonly precocious, music and orchestra were but occasion for restless wonder. Yesterday some such children were discoverable; but on every side around them, in grateful numbers, interest and pleasure sat the youth in the teens whose curiosity it is the design of the concerts to waken, whose inclinations in music, pieces and performance are to form. Another year, after these two preliminary ventures, the Young People's Concerts of the Symphony Orchestra should fulfil their purpose and assemble the desired audiences. Perhaps they would gain in animation and be more a thing apart from routine did some adaptable speaker say the persuading and enlightening word about the several numbers that the programme-sheet now bears in print. Perhaps, also, as a cynic or two has ventured to hint, the youth of the private as well as the public schools might be advisedly included in the audiences. But who, except those same cynics would dare to suggest that their taste needs guidance? Have they not the musical plays?

NEXT SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the pair of Boston Symphony Concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 5 and 6, Pierre Monteux will conduct Berlioz's noted "Fantastic" Symphony, which describes romantic episodes of his love, including his own execution, "The Pauses of Silence" by the young Italian revolutionary composer, Malipiero, which puzzled many and also delighted many when played by the orchestra last season, will be repeated at this pair of concerts. The closing numbers will be Borodin's pictorial Russian Sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

[illegible] the 17th pair of Boston Symphony Concerts, in Symphony Hall next Friday and Saturday (March 5 and 6), Pierre Monteux will conduct Berlioz's famous "Fantastic" Symphony, in which the romance of the composer's love traverses episodes of a ball, a pastoral scene, a march to the scaffold and his own execution, finally an orgy of the Witch's Sabbath. A notable repetition will be "The Pauses of Silence," by the daring and revolutionary young Italian composer, Malipiero. These "Seven Symphonic Expressions" were the centre of much attention and comment at the concerts of last season. The closing numbers will be the Russian Borodin's descriptive sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's [illegible] Overture to "The Flying Dutch-

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence" to Be Heard Again from the Symphony Orchestra—Berlioz and Wagner, Besides—Miss Tarasova and Russian Folk-Pieces —Chamber Music for Both String and Wind Choir

ONCE more Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra will have a pair of concerts to themselves, and the conductor can set for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, a programme of four numbers. It begins with Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," music of romantic imagery and passion that has withstood a whole century of changing voice and changing fashions. Dreams and passions ravage the artist of Berlioz's vision; he courts the pleasures of the dance; he soliloquizes solitary in the dawn; he sees himself led to execution; he beholds infernal regions. Widely the composer stretches his tonal canvas; vividly and characteristically he fills it. Next, Mr. Monteux will repeat the novel piece of last winter that stirred curiosity, resentment and praise above all the rest—"Pauses of Silence: Seven Symphonic Expressions" by the young Italian composer, Malipiero, music as fantastic in voice as it is singular of mood and image. With reason, after Berlioz and Malipiero, two repertory pieces complete the programme—Borodin's concentrated tone-picture of Asian steppe and Wagner's overture to his opera, "The Flying Dutchman," his only music of the sea, except a few measures in the first scene of "Tristan," his first music of spiritual redemption.

Miss Tarasova Returns

[illegible] possible at the Sund

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S NEXT PROGRAM

To open the 17th pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday and Saturday (March 5 and 6), Mr. Monteux will conduct Berlioz's famous "Fantastic" Symphony, in which the romance of the composer's love traverses episodes of a ball, a pastoral scene, a march to the scaffold and his own execution, finally an orgy of the witch's Sabbath. A noteworthy repetition will be "The Pauses of Silence," by the daring and revolutionary Italian composer, Malipiero. These "Seven Symphonic Expressions" attracted much attention and excited comment at the concerts of last season. The closing numbers will be Borodin's descriptive sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

E-flat major [illegible] strings.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

To open the seventeenth pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall Friday and Saturday (March 5 and 6), Pierre Monteux will conduct Berlioz's famous "Fantastic" symphony, "The Pauses of Silence," by the revolutionary young Italian composer, Malipero. Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman" will also be played.

MUSIC NOTES

Items and Announcements

Debussy's "Blessed Damozel," repeated at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening, is likely to be the only choral music undertaken this season by Mr. Monteux. Various circumstances have compelled him to abandon the performance projected last autumn of Franck's oratorio, "The Beatitudes," with the Symphony Orchestra and the Symphony Chorus reconstituted. Plans, however, are afoot—or were, until present controversies began—for three choral concerts next winter outside the regular course of the Symphony Concerts.

Word comes from Berlin to the newspaper, Musical America, that Dr. Muck has spent the winter at Graz in Austria, where Mrs. Muck's family has dwelt for many years. His only work in public has been the rehearsal and the conducting of a restudied "Tristan" at the municipal opera house. In the spring he will go to Vienna as conductor through a series of "special performances" of Wagner's music-dramas, and thence to Germany for various concerts. For the time, he prefers to make no long contract for either opera house or concert hall.

At the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge on Thursday evening, it will be heard in the first symphony of Brahms, Borodin's "sketch" of an Asian steppe, and Wagner's overture to his opera, "The Flying Dutchman." Mrs. Laura Littlefield will be the assisting singer in an air from Händel's oratorio, "Samson" and the "Hymn to the Sun" from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Golden Cockerel."

ITEMS ABOUT THE STAGE

picture appropriate.

Items and Announcements

At the Symphony Concerts of next week there will again be no intruding "soloist," and Mr. Monteux can find room for four pieces on his programme. They are: Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony; Borodin's "sketch" in tones of Asian steppes; Wagner's overture to his opera, "The Flying Dutchman," and the Italian, Malipiero's, singular music, "The Pauses of Silence," first heard at the concerts last winter. They then interested and stirred two audiences beyond the usual fortune of "ultra-modern" numbers. Mr. Monteux does well to keep them in the active repertory.

[illegible] has

BOSTON SYMPHONY GREETED BY BIG AUDIENCE HERE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra drew a large audience for the final concert of the season at Infantry Hall last night. Conductor Monteux presented a well arranged programme which brought considerable applause on several occasions.

Those who believed the recent labor troubles of the orchestra would result in a smaller number of players were surprised to see the orchestra fill the stage. Among the string instruments there was an absence of tonal volume but that may be remedied with little difficulty.

Albert Spaulding, American violinist, was soloist. The Dvorak Symphony, "From the New World" was presented in a timely fashion and Mr. Monteux read it with keen [illegible]erence to every detail. It is the Bohemian composer's tribute to this country, in which he lived for some time. The negro melodies were given simply and beautifully and they made a strong appeal. The piece became con spirito to make it characteristically American. Mr. Spaulding played the Mendelssohn concerto with lively grace and he received much praise from the audience. The programme finished with Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

BOSTON SYMPHONY APPEARS IN FINAL CONCERT OF SEASON

Large Attendance Listen to Pleasing Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its final concert of the season here in Infantry Hall last evening. There was the usual large attendance and the pleasing programme arranged by Conductor Monteux met with much favor.

Doubtless there were many in the audience who expected a smaller orchestra than that which filled the stage. The organization's reduced membership consequent upon its recent troubles would scarcely have been noticed by one unfamiliar with the true state of affairs. A few vacancies among the strings and a slight lessening of tonal volume in that section gave the strongest hint o what, it is to be hoped, are only temporary difficulties. Albert Spaulding, American violinist, was the soloist. The programme follows:

Dvorak..Symphony No. 5, in E-minor, "From the New World."
Adagio; Allegro molto.
Largo.
Scherzo
Allegro con fuoco.
Mendelssohn—Concerto for violin in E-minor, Op. 64.
Allegro molto appassionato.
Andante.
Allegretto non troppo; Allegro molto vivace.
Weber.....Overture to "Der Freischutz"

The Dvorak symphony, "From the New World," was admirably adapted to the needs of the hour and Mr. Monteux read it in sympathetic mood. This work, so melodious and pleasing, is the Bohemian composer's legacy to this country, in which he lived for a time. Its plaintive themes, inspired by familiarity and close study of negro melodies, are treated simply and beautifully, and, to the average listener, the symphony makes strong appeal. In the first movement M. Monteux kept to a more rapid pace than has been the custom of some conductors who have presented it here. Perhaps this was owing to a belief that by such means the music became more characteristically American.

The somewhat sombre beauty of the Largo, the sprightly Scherzo and the brilliance of the finale were brought out in a manner that won several recalls. M. Monteux sharing the applause with his players.

Albert Spaulding played the Mendelssohn concerto in spirited style. The last movement was particularly brilliant and the audience gave him a flattering reception.

Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz" concluded an enjoyable programme.

[illegible]ECTED

If the Symphony Orchestra remains intact through its monthly journey Southward next week, Mr. Monteux will include in one of his programmes at New York Mr. Carpenter's Concertino, as yet unheard there. Again Mr. Robert Schmitz will play the piano part. Upon the other of the two programmes, the conductor will set Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence," likewise new to the ears of New York.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The fifth and last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, was given in Infantry Hall, last evening, a large audience of musical and society people greeting the brilliant conductor with such enthusiastic applause at his every appearance as to mean really an ovation. The applause doubtless was an expression of recognition and appreciation of Mr. Monteux's wonderful efficiency not only as a conductor of the highest rank, but an organizer as well for despite the recent withdrawal from the orchestra of 30 of its men, Mr. Monteux has within a month filled most of the chairs left vacant by the recent secession from the orchestra, with men who are artists in their profession.

The result is a restored orchestra of "sufficiency and efficiency" whose magnificent playing of the Dvorak Symphony last evening left no doubt in the mind of all who heard it of the future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the hands of a conductor of the musical greatness of Mr. Monteux.

The soloist of the concert was Albert Spaulding, the famous American violinist and the program was as follows:

Symphony No. 5, in E-minor, "From the New World," Op. 95, Dvorak; Adagio; Allegro moto; Largo; Scherzo; Allegro con fuoco; Concerto for violin in E-minor, Op. 64, Mendelssohn; Allegro molto appassionate; Andante; Allegretto non troppo; Allegro molto vivace; Overture to "Der Freischutz," Weber.

The "New World Symphony" by the Czech composer, was given a masterly reading by the conductor and it was magnificently played by the orchestra. The symphony, which abounds in songful melodies and infectious rythms, has been the subject of much controversy as to its origin—whether it is Bohemian or its melodies derived from negro folk music. This much-mooted question aside, the symphony is full of beauty, varied and richly colored, especially in the exquisite "Largo."

Dvorak, however, is a Bohemian composer of the first rank and he turned the tide of Bohemian national music into the general current of European music, thereby enriching and coloring it.

The interpretation by the orchestra of this picturesque symphony was vital, vivid and musically beautiful. Mr. Spaulding's playing of the Mendelssohn concerto was distinguished by finished technique and notable brilliancy especially in the last movement of the concert. He was recalled five times at the close of the concerto.

Weber's beautiful overture, superbly played by the orchestra, ended the program.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From

APR 4 - 192[illegible]

Final Symphony Concert.

The final concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Tuesday night in Infantry Hall will be the chief musical event of the week. Already a series of five nights has been settled upon for next year. Mr. Monteux will continue as leader and Infantry Hall will be the place.

Those who may have feared that they would hear a group of players reduced to chamber music size, because of the strike, have had needless apprehensions. The string section, where the losses were greatest, has gradually built up a membership of 50 players. Before the strike there were 57 strings. The other choirs have likewise been reinforced by substitutions.

Concerning the present stage of the rebuilding process, H. T. Parker, in a review of a recent concert in Boston, ays:

"Sundry young musicians, already tested and waiting opportunity to join the band, have increased the string choir; out of semi-retirement have come such a virtuoso of the trombone as Mr. Hamper and so expert a kettle drummer as Mr. Rettberger.

"The orchestra is quite large enough for a wide choice of pieces distributed through interesting programmes. The several choirs are better balanced than they were a fortnight ago, and there was little hint of diminished tone even in the divided violins of the prelude to Wagner's 'Lohengrin.'"

Albert Spalding, the soloist here, plays a Stradivarius, the prize of his collection. It was made in 1735. His next most valuable violin is one made in 1721 by Domenicus Montagna, a pupil of the master maker. Mr. Spalding's principal number will be Mendelssohn's concerto with orchestra. The orchestra will play Dvorak's "New World" symphony, and close with Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

Albert Sp

Soloist with Boston Symphony Orches

ESTABLISHED 1881

From

APR 3 1920

Providence, R.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WILL APPEAR HERE NEXT SEASON

Excellent Programme Arranged for Concert Next Tuesday Evening.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that it has arranged to give five concerts on Tuesday evenings next season at Infantry Hall under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, the present director.

At the final concert this season, to be held at Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, the "New World" symphony, by Dvorak, will be the principal symphonic number. Whether its songful melodies and strong infectious rhythms are predominately Bohemian, or are actualy derived from our negro folk music has been a subject for prolonged and rather fruitless controversy. About the popularity of this brilliantly orchestrated music with American audiences there can be no dispute.

The soloist of the evening will be Albert Spalding, the violin genius, who will play Mendelssohn's Concerto with the orchestra. The closing number will be Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

rom TRIBUNE

ddress: Providence, R. I.

ate [illegible] 1920

By N. B. Pettis

LAST BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The program which Pierre Monteux has chosen for the last Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, is the subject of an absorbing farewell. The "New World" Symphony by the Czech composer, Dvorak, will be the principal symphonic number. Whether its songful melodies and strong infectious rhythms are predominantly Bohemian or actually derived from our negro folk music has been a subject for prolonged and rather fruitless controversy. About the popularity of this brilliantly orchestrated music with American audiences there can be no dispute.

As the soloist of the evening, Albert Spalding, a foremost genius among the violinists of the day, will play Mendelssohn's Concerto with the orchestra. The closing number will be Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz."

From

Pierre Monteux and his Boston [illegible]phony Orchestra held forth in the [illegible]mory last Monday evening, under the local management of Joseph A. Fiss[illegible]man. The program included Weber's overture to "Der Freischuetz." Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia" [illegible]7), and Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyll," the prelude, the march of the apprentices and the homage to Hans Sachs from the "Meistersingers," and the Grieg Concerto in A minor for piano and orchestra, with Rudolph Ganz as soloist.

Mr. Monteux has had some heavy burdens to carry in recent weeks owing to the wholesale resignation from the orchestra of some thirty-five members. Some have been replaced, but only about seventy players were on the platform Monday night, and the renditions may not be considered as truly representative of the orchestra's art as displayed under Dr. Muck's and Dr. Gericke's regime.

Mr. Monteux conducted the overture with a heavy hand, and the orchestra played it in a more or less perfunctory manner. Borodin's sketch was on a higher plane artistically.

In conducting Wagner Mr. Monteux showed his ability of understanding the great master's idiom, albeit the prelude has been played with greater authority and more stirring effect. The Siegfried Idyll, written by Wagner in November, 1870, was first performed by a small orchestra of sixteen players, who stood on the stairs in Wagner's home and played it in honor of Wagner's wife, Cosima, on the anniversary of her birth. Its themes are from the third act of "Siegfried." They are developed at great length, and are supplemented by a cradle song. The Idyll was played tenderly.

Rudolph Ganz is no sensational player, but rather a sterling artist who handles the work in hand in the spirit the composer intends. His technical equipment is flawless and he has poise. In the concerto he was overwhelmed several times by the orchestra, but when given an opportunity of being heard his fine playing won the approval of the audience. On the conclusion of the concerto the greatest enthusiasm of the evening was manifested, and Mr. Ganz was forced to return to the platform five times to bow his acknowledgments.

Mr. Milligen's Lecture.

MUSIC AND THE DANCE

BETTERING THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

A Second Experiment with a Programm More Wisely Chosen and a Clearly In terested and Pleasured Audience—Th Daily Chronicle of Symphonic Strife— Mr. Carpenter's Ballet Raises and Ful fills Expectations—Items and Prospects

FROM experience all concerned in the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for young people are learning wisdom, so that the second, which befell at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, clearly bettered the first. The music again filled only an hour—probably the limit of normal youthful interest and attention—but this time it consisted of five short pieces, or even of eight, if the listener chose to count each division of Grieg's music to the play, "Peer Gynt," as a separate number. There is reason to doubt whether a more or less untutored audience, in years hardly above the middle teens, is quite ready as yet to listen to Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and to Beethoven's overture to Goethe's tragedy of "Egmont" as it was asked to do at the first concert. In all probability it heard these pieces with more wonder and speculation than interest and understanding. Even adults variously measure their pleasure in them. In contrast, the young listeners of yesterday seemed to follow gladly and comprehendingly the melio periods or the warm flow of Weber's overture to "Der Freischütz"; the fairy-footed progress of Mendelssohn's Scherzo for the elves of Shakspeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream"; the surges of sound and the flashes of rhythm through Berlioz's "Rakoczy March." The audience of January often seemed restless and puzzled; the audience of February was plainly intent and pleasured. Not less eagerly than it heard the pieces aforesaid, did it listen also to the Andante from Beethoven's first symphony and to the suite of Grieg. Fortunate youth not to speculate upon Beethoven's gentle, transparent, undulating song as forerunner of deeper melodies and to hear Grieg's measures as so much music in itself and not as decoration to a seldom seen play. Enough for them that the Andante yielded the pleasure of simple and purling instrumental song; that the music of Ase's death sounded gently, the music of Anitra's dance brightly, the music of the trolls gaily, fantastically.

As it happened likewise, the young people heard these pieces of Grieg played with a delicacy of detail they have not received hereabouts in years; while the string and the wind choirs could hardly have been smoother or more songful than they were through Beethoven's Andante. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra do not spare pains upon these young people's concerts, even if the dewy shimmer, the tripping lightness of Mendelssohn's Scherzo did in measure evade them. Finally, the audience seemed better chosen than it was a month ago. Ther, too many of the "young people" were no more than children for whom, unless they were uncommonly precocious, music and orchestra were but occasion for restless wonder. Yesterday some such children were discoverable; but on every side around them, in grateful numbers, interest and pleasure sat the youth in the teens whose curiosity it is the design of the concerts to waken, whose inclinations in music, pieces and performance are to form. Another year, after these two preliminary ventures, the Young People's Concerts of the Symphony Orchestra should fulfil their purpose and assemble the desired audiences. Perhaps they would gain in animation and be more a thing apart from routine did some adaptable speaker say the persuading and enlightening word about the several numbers that the programme-sheet now bears in print. Perhaps, also, as a cynic or two has ventured to hint, the youth of the private as well as the public schools might be advisedly included in the audiences. But who, except those same cynics would dare to suggest that their taste needs guidance? Have they not the musical plays?

NEXT SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the pair of Boston Symphony Concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 5 and 6, Pierre Monteux will conduct Berlioz's noted "Fantastic" Symphony, which describes romantic episodes of his love, including his own execution, "The Pauses of Silence" by the young Italian revolutionary composer, Malipiero, which puzzled many and also delighted many when played by the orchestra last season, will be repeated at this pair of concerts. The closing numbers will be Borodin's pictorial Russian Sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence" to Be Heard Again from the Symphony Orchestra—Berlioz and Wagner, Besides—Miss Tarasova and Russian Folk-Pieces —Chamber Music for Both String and Wind Choir

ONCE more Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra will have a pair of concerts to themselves, and the conductor can set for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, a programme of four numbers. It begins with Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," music of romantic imagery and passion that has withstood a whole century of changing voice and changing fashions. Dreams and passions ravage the artist of Berlioz's vision; he courts the pleasures of the dance; he soliloquizes solitary in the dawn; he sees himself led to execution; he beholds infernal regions. Widely the composer stretches his tonal canvas; vividly and characteristically he fills it. Next, Mr. Monteux will repeat the novel piece of last winter that stirred curiosity, resentment and praise above all the rest—"Pauses of Silence: Seven Symphonic Expressions" by the young Italian composer, Malipiero, music as fantastic in voice as is singular of mood and image. With reason, after Berlioz and Malipiero, two repertory pieces complete the programme—Borodin's concentrated tone-picture of Asian steppe and Wagner's overture to his opera, "The Flying Dutchman," his only music of the sea, except a few measures in the first scene of "Tristan," his first music of spiritual redemption.

Miss Tarasova Returns

...sible at the Sund...

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S NEXT PROGRAM

To open the 17th pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday and Saturday (March 5 and 6), Mr. Monteux will conduct Berlioz's famous "Fantastic" Symphony, in which the romance of the composer's love traverses episodes of a ball, a pastoral scene, a march to the scaffold and his own execution, finally an orgy of the witch's Sabbath. A noteworthy repetition will be "The Pauses of Silence," by the daring and revolutionary Italian composer, Malipiero. These "Seven Symphonic Expressions" attracted much attention and excited comment at the concerts of last season. The closing numbers will be Borodin's descriptive sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

E-flat major ... strings.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

To open the seventeenth pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall Friday and Saturday (March 5 and 6), Pierre Monteux will conduct Berlioz's famous "Fantastic" symphony, "The Pauses of Silence," by the revolutionary young Italian composer, Malipero. Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman" will also be played.

MUSIC NOTES

Items and Announcements

Debussy's "Blessed Damozel," repeated at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening, is likely to be the only choral music undertaken this season by Mr. Monteux. Various circumstances have compelled him to abandon the performance projected last autumn of Franck's oratorio, "The Beatitudes," with the Symphony Orchestra and the Symphony Chorus reconstituted. Plans, however, are afoot—or were, until present controversies began—for three choral concerts next winter outside the regular course of the Symphony Concerts.

Word comes from Berlin to the newspaper, Musical America, that Dr. Muck has spent the winter at Graz in Austria, where Mrs. Muck's family has dwelt for many years. His only work in public has been the rehearsal and the conducting of a restudied "Tristan" at the municipal opera house. In the spring he will go to Vienna as conductor through a series of "special performances" of Wagner's music-dramas, and thence to Germany for various concerts. For the time, he prefers to make no long contract for either opera house or concert hall.

At the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge on Thursday evening, it will be heard in the first symphony of Brahms, Borodin's "sketch" of an Asian steppe, and Wagner's overture to his opera, "The Flying Dutchman." Mrs. Laura Littlefield will be the assisting singer in an air from Händel's oratorio, "Samson" and the "Hymn to the Sun" from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Golden Cockerel."

ITEMS ABOUT THE STAGE

...en the 17th pair of Boston Sym... Concerts, in Symphony Hall next ...day and Saturday (March 5 and 6), ...erre Monteux will conduct Berlioz's famous "Fantastic" Symphony, in which the romance of the composer's love traverses episodes of a ball, a pastoral scene, a march to the scaffold and his own execution, finally an orgy of the Witch's Sabbath. A notable repetition will be "The Pauses of Silence," by the daring and revolutionary young Italian composer, Malipiero. These "Seven Symphonic Expressions" were the centre of much attention and comment at the concerts of last season. The ...ing numbers will be the Russian ...olin's descriptive sketch, "On the ... of Central Asia," and Wagner's ... overture to "The Flying Dutch-

BOSTON SYMPHONY GREETED BY BIG AUDIENCE HERE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra drew a large audience for the final concert of the season at Infantry Hall last night. Conductor Monteux presented a well arranged programme which brought considerable applause on several occasions.

Those who believed the recent labor troubles of the orchestra would result in a smaller number of players were surprised to see the orchestra fill the stage. Among the string instruments there was an absence of tonal volume but that may be remedied with little difficulty.

Albert Spaulding, American violinist, was soloist. The Dvorak Symphony, "From the New World" was presented in a timely fashion and Mr. Monteux read it with keen ...erence to every detail. It is the Bohemian composer's tribute to this country, in which he lived for some time. The negro melodies were given simply and beautifully and they made a strong appeal. The piece became con spirito to make it characteristically American. Mr. Spaulding played the Mendelssohn concerto with lively grace and he received much praise from the audience. The programme finished with Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

BOSTON SYMPHONY APPEARS IN FINAL CONCERT OF SEASON

Large Attendance Listen to Pleasing Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its final concert of the season here in Infantry Hall last evening. There was the usual large attendance and the pleasing programme arranged by Conductor Monteux met with much favor.

Doubtless there were many in the audience who expected a smaller orchestra than that which filled the stage. The organization's reduced membership consequent upon its recent troubles would scarcely have been noticed by one unfamiliar with the true state of affairs. A few vacancies among the strings and a slight lessening of tonal volume in that section gave the strongest hint of what, it is to be hoped, are only temporary difficulties. Albert Spaulding, American violinist, was the soloist. The programme follows:

Dvorak..Symphony No. 5, in E-minor, "From the New World."
Adagio; Allegro molto.
Largo.
Scherzo
Allegro con fucco.
Mendelssohn—Concerto for violin in E-minor. Op. 64.
Allegro molto appassionato.
Andante.
Allegretto non troppo: Allegro molto vivace.
Weber.....Overture to "Der Freischutz"

The Dvorak symphony, "From the New World," was admirably adapted to the needs of the hour and Mr. Monteux read it in sympathetic mood. This work, so melodious and pleasing, is the Bohemian composer's legacy to this country, in which he lived for a time. Its plaintive themes, inspired by familiarity and close study of negro melodies, are treated simply and beautifully, and, to the average listener, the symphony makes strong appeal. In the first movement M. Monteux kept to a more rapid pace than has been the custom of some conductors who have presented it here. Perhaps this was owing to a belief that by such means the music became more characteristically American.

The somewhat sombre beauty of the Largo, the sprightly Scherzo and the brilliance of the finale were brought out in a manner that won several recalls, M. Monteux sharing the applause with his players.

Albert Spaulding played the Mendelssohn concerto in spirited style. The last movement was particularly brilliant and the audience gave him a flattering reception.

Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz" concluded an enjoyable programme.

...ELECTED

If the Symphony Orchestra remains intact through its monthly journey Southward next week, Mr. Monteux will include in one of his programmes at New York Mr. Carpenter's Concertino, as yet unheard there. Again Mr. Robert Schmitz will play the piano part. Upon the other of the two programmes, the conductor will set Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence," likewise new to the ears of New York.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The fifth and last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, was given in Infantry Hall, last evening, a large audience of musical and society people greeting the brilliant conductor with such enthusiastic applause at his every appearance as to mean really an ovation. The applause doubtless was an expression of recognition and appreciation of Mr. Monteux's wonderful efficiency not only as a conductor of the highest rank, but an organizer as well for despite the recent withdrawal from the orchestra of 30 of its men, Mr. Monteux has within a month filled most of the chairs left vacant by the recent secession from the orchestra, with men who are artists in their profession.

The result is a restored orchestra of "sufficiency and efficiency" whose magnificent playing of the Dvorak Symphony last evening left no doubt in the mind of all who heard it of the future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the hands of a conductor of the musical greatness of Mr. Monteux.

The soloist of the concert was Albert Spaulding, the famous American violinist and the program was as follows:

Symphony No. 5, in E-minor, "From the New World," Op. 95, Dvorak; Adagio; Allegro moto; Largo; Scherzo; Allegro con fuoco; Concerto for violin in E-minor, Op. 64, Mendelssohn; Allegro molto appassionata; Andante; Allegretto non troppo; Allegro molto vivace; Overture to "Der Freischutz," Weber.

The "New World Symphony" by the Czech composer, was given a masterly reading by the conductor and it was magnificently played by the orchestra. The symphony, which abounds in songful melodies and infectious rythms, has been the subject of much controversy as to its origin—whether it is Bohemian or its melodies derived from negro folk music. This much-mooted question aside, the symphony is full of beauty, varied and richly colored, especially in the exquisite "Largo."

Dvorak, however, is a Bohemian composer of the first rank and he turned the tide of Bohemian national music into the general current of European music, thereby enriching and coloring it.

The interpretation by the orchestra of this picturesque symphony was vital, vivid and musically beautiful. Mr. Spaulding's playing of the Mendelssohn concerto was distinguished by finished technique and notable brilliancy especially in the last movement of the concert. He was recalled five times at the close of the concerto.

Weber's beautiful overture, superbly played by the orchestra, ended the program.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
Journal
From
APR 4 1920 A

Final Symphony Concert.

The final concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Tuesday night in Infantry Hall will be the chief musical event of the week. Already a series of five nights has been settled upon for next year. Mr. Monteux will continue as leader and Infantry Hall will be the place.

Those who may have feared that they would hear a group of players reduced to chamber music size, because of the strike, have had needless apprehensions. The string section, where the losses were greatest, has gradually built up a membership of 50 players. Before the strike there were 57 strings. The other choirs have likewise been reinforced by substitutions.

Concerning the present stage of the rebuilding process, H. T. Parker, in a review of a recent concert in Boston, says:

"Sundry young musicians, already tested and waiting opportunity to join the band, have increased the string choir; out of semi-retirement have come such a virtuoso of the trombone as Mr. Hamper and so expert a kettle drummer as Mr. Rettberger.

"The orchestra is quite large enough for a wide choice of pieces distributed through interesting programmes. The several choirs are better balanced than they were a fortnight ago, and there was little hint of diminished tone even in the divided violins of the prelude to Wagner's 'Lohengrin.'"

Albert Spalding, the soloist here, plays a Stradivarius, the prize of his collection. It was made in 1735. His next most valuable violin is one made in 1721 by Domenicus Montagna, a pupil of the master maker. Mr. Spalding's principal number will be Mendelssohn's concerto with orchestra. The orchestra will play Dvorak's "New World" symphony, and close with Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

ESTABLISHED 1891
From
APR 3 1920
Providence, R.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WILL APPEAR HERE NEXT SEASON

Excellent Programme Arranged for Concert Next Tuesday Evening.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that it has arranged to give five concerts on Tuesday evenings next season at Infantry Hall under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, the present director.

At the final concert this season, to be held at Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, the "New World" symphony, by Dvorak, will be the principal symphonic number. Whether its songful melodies and strong infectious rhythms are predominately Bohemian, or are actually derived from our negro folk music has been a subject for prolonged and rather fruitless controversy. About the popularity of this brilliantly orchestrated music with American audiences there can be no dispute.

The soloist of the evening will be Albert Spalding, the violin genius, who will play Mendelssohn's Concerto with the orchestra. The closing number will be Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date APR 4 1920 A

By N. B. Pettis

LAST BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The program which Pierre Monteux has chosen for the last Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, is the subject of an absorbing farewell. The "New World" Symphony by the Czech composer, Dvorak, will be the principal symphonic number. Whether its songful melodies and strong infectious rhythms are predominantly Bohemian or actually derived from our negro folk music has been a subject for prolonged and rather fruitless controversy. About the popularity of this brilliantly orches... meri...

Albert Spalding

Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall on Tuesday

MUSIC AND THE DANCE

BETTERING THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

A Second Experiment with a Programm More Wisely Chosen and a Clearly Interested and Pleasured Audience—The Daily Chronicle of Symphonic Strife—Mr. Carpenter's Ballet Raises and Fulfils Expectations—Items and Prospects

FROM experience all concerned in the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for young people are learning wisdom, so that the second, which befell at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, clearly bettered the first. The music again filled only an hour—probably the limit of normal youthful interest and attention—but this time it consisted of five short pieces, or even of eight, if the listener chose to count each division of Grieg's music to the play, "Peer Gynt," as a separate number. There is reason to doubt whether a more or less untutored audience, in years hardly above the middle teens, is quite ready as yet to listen to Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and to Beethoven's overture to Goethe's tragedy of "Egmont" as it was asked to do at the first concert. In all probability it heard these pieces with more wonder and speculation than interest and understanding. Even adults variously measure their pleasure in them. In contrast, the young listeners of yesterday seemed to follow gladly and comprehendingly the melodic periods or the warm flow of Weber's overture to "Der Freischütz"; the fairy-footed progress of Mendelssohn's Scherzo for the elves of Shakspeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream"; the surges of sound and the flashes of rhythm through Berlioz's "Rakoczy March." The audience of January often seemed restless and puzzled; the audience of February was plainly intent and pleasured. Not less eagerly than it heard the pieces aforesaid, did it listen also to the Andante from Beethoven's first symphony and to the suite of Grieg. Fortunate youth not to speculate upon Beethoven's gentle, transparent, undulating song as forerunner of deeper melodies and to hear Grieg's measures as so much music in itself and not as decoration to a seldom seen play. Enough for them that the Andante yielded the pleasure of simple and purling instrumental song; that the music of Ase's death sounded gently, the music of Anitra's dance brightly, the music of the trolls gaily, fantastically.

As it happened likewise, the young people heard these pieces of Grieg played with a delicacy of detail they have not received hereabouts in years; while the string and the wind choirs could hardly have been smoother or more songful than they were through Beethoven's Andante. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra do not spare pains upon these young people's concerts, even if the dewy shimmer, the tripping lightness of Mendelssohn's Scherzo did in measure evade them. Finally, the audience seemed better chosen than it was a month ago. Ther, too many of the "young people" were no more than children for whom, unless they were uncommonly precocious, music and orchestra were but occasion for restless wonder. Yesterday some such children were discoverable; but on every side around them, in grateful numbers, interest and pleasure sat the youth in the teens whose curiosity it is the design of the concerts to waken, whose inclinations in music, pieces and performance are to form. Another year, after these two preliminary ventures, the Young People's Concerts of the Symphony Orchestra should fulfil their purpose and assemble the desired audiences. Perhaps they would gain in animation and be more a thing apart from routine did some adaptable speaker say the persuading and enlightening word about the several numbers that the programme-sheet now bears in print. Perhaps, also, as a cynic or two has ventured to hint, the youth of the private as well as the public schools might be advisedly included in the audiences. But who, except those same cynics would dare to suggest that their taste needs guidance? Have they not the musical plays?

NEXT SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the pair of Boston Symphony Concerts, in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 5 and 6, Pierre Monteux will conduct Berlioz's noted "Fantastic" Symphony, which describes romantic episodes of his love, including his own execution, "The Pauses of Silence" by the young Italian revolutionary composer, Malipiero, which puzzled many and also delighted many when played by the orchestra last season, will be repeated at this pair of concerts. The closing numbers will be Borodin's pictorial Russian Sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence" to Be Heard Again from the Symphony Orchestra—Berlioz and Wagner, Besides—Miss Tarasova and Russian Folk-Pieces—Chamber Music for Both String and Wind Choir

ONCE more Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra will have a pair of concerts to themselves, and the conductor can set for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, a programme of four numbers. It begins with Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," music of romantic imagery and passion that has withstood a whole century of changing voice and changing fashions. Dreams and passions ravage the artist of Berlioz's vision; he courts the pleasures of the dance; he soliloquizes solitary in the dawn; he sees himself led to execution; he beholds infernal regions. Widely the composer stretches his tonal canvas; vividly and characteristically he fills it. Next, Mr. Monteux will repeat the novel piece of last winter that stirred curiosity, resentment and praise above all the rest—"Pauses of Silence: Seven Symphonic Expressions" by the young Italian composer, Malipiero, music as fantastic in voice as his singular of mood and image. With reason, after Berlioz and Malipiero, two repertory pieces complete the programme—Borodin's concentrated tone-picture of Asian steppe and Wagner's overture to his opera, "The Flying Dutchman," his only music of the sea, except a few measures in the first scene of "Tristan," his first music of spiritual redemption.

Miss Tarasova Returns

[illegible] at the Sun[illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S 29 NEXT PROGRAM

To open the 17th pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday and Saturday (March 5 and 6), Mr. Monteux will conduct Berlioz's famous "Fantastic" Symphony, in which the romance of the composer's love traverses episodes of a ball, a pastoral scene, a march to the scaffold and his own execution, finally an orgy of the witch's Sabbath. A noteworthy repetition will be "The Pauses of Silence," by the daring and revolutionary Italian composer, Malipiero. These "Seven Symphonic Expressions" attracted much attention and excited comment at the concerts of last season. The closing numbers will be Borodin's descriptive sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

E-flat major [illegible] strings.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

To open the seventeenth pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall Friday and Saturday (March 5 and 6), Pierre Monteux will conduct Berlioz's famous "Fantastic" symphony, "The Pauses of Silence," by the revolutionary young Italian composer, Malipiero. Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman" will also be played.

[illegible]

Items and Announcements

Debussy's "Blessed Damozel," repeated at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening, is likely to be the only choral music undertaken this season by Mr. Monteux. Various circumstances have compelled him to abandon the performance projected last autumn of Franck's oratorio, "The Beatitudes," with the Symphony Orchestra and the Symphony Chorus reconstituted. Plans, however, are afoot—or were, until present controversies began—for three choral concerts next winter outside the regular course of the Symphony Concerts.

Word comes from Berlin to the newspaper, Musical America, that Dr. Muck has spent the winter at Graz in Austria, where Mrs. Muck's family has dwelt for many years. His only work in public has been the rehearsal and the conducting of a restudied "Tristan" at the municipal opera house. In the spring he will go to Vienna as conductor through a series of "special performances" of Wagner's music-dramas, and thence to Germany for various concerts. For the time, he prefers to make no long contract for either opera house or concert hall.

At the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge on Thursday evening, it will be heard in the first symphony of Brahms, Borodin's "sketch" of an Asian steppe, and Wagner's overture to his opera, "The Flying Dutchman." Mrs. Laura Littlefield will be the assisting singer in an air from Händel's oratorio, "Samson" and the "Hymn to the Sun" from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Golden Cockerel."

ITEMS ABOUT THE STAGE

picture appropriate.

Items and Announcements

At the Symphony Concerts of next week there will again be no intruding "soloist," and Mr. Monteux can find room for four pieces on his programme. They are: Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony; Borodin's "sketch" in tones of Asian steppes; Wagner's overture to his opera, "The Flying Dutchman," and the Italian, Malipiero's, singular music, "The Pauses of Silence," first heard at the concerts last winter. They then interested and stirred two audiences beyond the usual fortune of "ultra-modern" numbers. Mr. Monteux does well to keep them in the active repertory.

[illegible] has

BOSTON SYMPHONY GREETED BY BIG AUDIENCE HERE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra drew a large audience for the final concert of the season at Infantry Hall last night. Conductor Monteux presented a well arranged programme which brought considerable applause on several occasions.

Those who believed the recent labor troubles of the orchestra would result in a smaller number of players were surprised to see the orchestra fill the stage. Among the string instruments there was an absence of tonal volume but that may be remedied with little difficulty.

Albert Spaulding, American violinist, was soloist. The Dvorak Symphony, "From the New World" was presented in a timely fashion and Mr. Monteux read it with keen [illegible] to every detail. It is the Bohemian composer's tribute to this country, in which he lived for some time. The negro melodies were given simply and beautifully and they made a strong appeal. The piece became con spirito to make it characteristically American. Mr. Spaulding played the Mendelssohn concerto with lively grace and he received much praise from the audience. The programme finished with Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

BOSTON SYMPHONY [illegible] IN FINAL CONCERT OF SEASON

Large Attendance Listen to Pleasing Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its final concert of the season [illegible] Infantry Hall last evening. There was the usual large attendance and the pleasing programme arranged by Conductor Monteux met with much favor.

Doubtless there were many in the audience who expected a smaller orchestra than that which filled the stage. The organization's reduced membership consequent upon its recent troubles would scarcely have been noticed by one unfamiliar with the true state of affairs. A few vacancies among the strings and a slight lessening of tonal volume at that section gave the strongest hint of what it is to be hoped are only temporary difficulties. Albert Spaulding, American violinist, was the soloist. The programme follows:

Dvorak...Symphony No. [illegible] in E-minor "From the New World"
- Adagio; Allegro molto
- Largo.
- Scherzo
- Allegro con fuoco

Mendelssohn...Concerto for violin in E-minor, Op. 64
- Allegro molto appassionato.
- Andante.
- Allegretto non troppo; Allegro molto vivace.

Weber.....Overture to "Der Freischutz"

The Dvorak symphony, "From the New World," was admirably adapted to the needs of the hour and Mr. Monteux read it in sympathetic mood. This work so melodious and pleasing is the Bohemian composer's legacy to this country, in which he lived for a time. Its plaintive themes, inspired by familiarity and close study of negro melodies, are treated simply and beautifully and, to the average listener, the symphony makes strong appeal. In the first movement M. Monteux kept to a more rapid pace than has been the custom of some conductors who have presented it here. Perhaps this was owing to a belief that by such means the music became more characteristically American.

The somewhat sombre beauty of the Largo, the sprightly Scherzo and the brilliance of the finale were brought out in a manner that won special praise for M. Monteux sharing the applause with his players.

Albert Spaulding played the Mendelssohn concerto in spirited style. The last movement was particularly brilliant and the audience gave him a flattering reception.

Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz" concluded an enjoyable programme.

[illegible] ELECTED

If the Symphony Orchestra remains intact through its monthly journey Southward next week, Mr. Monteux will include in one of his programmes at New York Mr. Carpenter's Concertino, as yet unheard there. Again Mr. Robert Schmitz will play the piano part. Upon the other of the two programmes, the conductor will set Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence," likewise new to the ears of New York.

[illegible]

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The fifth and last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, was given in Infantry Hall, last evening, a large audience of musical and society people greeting the brilliant conductor with such enthusiastic applause at his every appearance as to mean really an ovation. The applause doubtless was an expression of recognition and appreciation of Mr. Monteux's wonderful efficiency not only as a conductor of the highest rank, but an organizer as well for despite the recent withdrawal from the orchestra of 30 of its men, Mr. Monteux has within a month filled most of the chairs left vacant by the recent secession from the orchestra, with men who are artists in their profession.

The result is a restored orchestra of "sufficiency and efficiency" whose magnificent playing of the Dvorak Symphony last evening left no doubt in the min[illegible] of all who heard it of the future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the hands of a conductor of the musical greatness of Mr. Monteux.

The soloist of the concert was Albert Spaulding, the famous American violinist and the program was as follows:

Symphony No. 5, in E-minor, "From the New World," Op. 95, Dvorak; Adagio; Allegro moto; Largo; Scherzo; Allegro con fuoco; Concerto for violin in E-minor, Op. 64, Mendelssohn; Allegro molto appassionata; Andante; Allegretto non troppo; Allegro molto vivace; Overture to "Der Freischutz," Weber.

The "New World Symphony" by the Czech composer, was given a masterly reading by the conductor and it was magnificently played by the orchestra. The symphony, which abounds in songful melodies and infectious rythms, has been the subject of much controversy as to its origin—whether it is Bohemian or its melodies derived from negro folk music. This much-mooted question aside, the symphony is full of beauty, varied and richly colored, especially in the exquisite "Largo."

Dvorak, however, is a Bohemian composer of the first rank and he turned the tide of Bohemian national music into the general current of European music, thereby enriching and coloring it.

The interpretation by the orchestra of this picturesque symphony was vital, vivid and musically beautiful. Mr. Spaulding's playing of the Mendelssohn concerto was distinguished by finished technique and notable brilliancy especially in the last movement of the concert. He was recalled five times at the close of the concerto.

Weber's beautiful overture, superbly played by the orchestra, ended the program.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From [illegible]

Final Symphony Concert.

The final concert [illegible] Boston [illegible] Orchestra [illegible] Tuesday night in Infantry Hall was [illegible] the chief musical event of the week. Mr. Monteux's series of [illegible] has been [illegible] for next year, Mr. Monteux will [illegible] as leader and [illegible] Hall will be his place.

[illegible] that they could [illegible] group of players reduced to [illegible] because of the strike, [illegible] from the direst apprehensions. The [illegible] section, which [illegible] losses were greatest, has [illegible] built up a membership of [illegible] players. Before the strike there were 65 strings. The other choirs have likewise [illegible] by substitutions.

Concerning the present stage of the rebuilding process, H. T. Parker, in a review of a recent concert in Boston, says:

"Sundry young musicians, already tested and waiting opportunity to join the band, have increased the string choir; out of semi-retirement have come such a virtuoso of the trombone as Mr. Hamper and so expert a kettle drummer as Mr. Rettberger.

"The orchestra is quite large enough for a wide choice of pieces distributed through interesting programmes. The several choirs are better balanced than they were a fortnight ago, and there was little hint of diminished tone even in the divided violins of the prelude to Wagner's 'Lohengrin.'"

Albert Spalding, the soloist here, plays a Stradivarius, the prize of his collection. It was made in 1735. His next most valuable violin is one made in 1721 by Domenicus Montagna, a pupil of the master maker. Mr. Spalding's principal number will be Mendelssohn's concerto with orchestra. The orchestra will play Dvorak's "New World" symphony, and close with Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

ESTABLISHED 1881

From [illegible]

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WILL APPEAR HERE NEXT SEASON

Excellent Programme Arranged for Concert Next Tuesday Evening.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that it has arranged to give five concerts on Tuesday evenings next season at Infantry Hall under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, the present director.

At the final concert this season, to be held at Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, the "New World" symphony, by Dvorak, will be the principal symphonic number. Whether its songful melodies and strong infectious rhythms are predominately Bohemian, or are actualy derived from our negro folk music has been a subject for prolonged and rather fruitless controversy. About the popularity of this brilliantly orchestrated music with American audiences there can be no dispute.

The soloist of the evening will be Albert Spalding, the violin genius, who will play Mendelssohn's Concerto with the orchestra. The closing number will be Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

From TRIBUNE

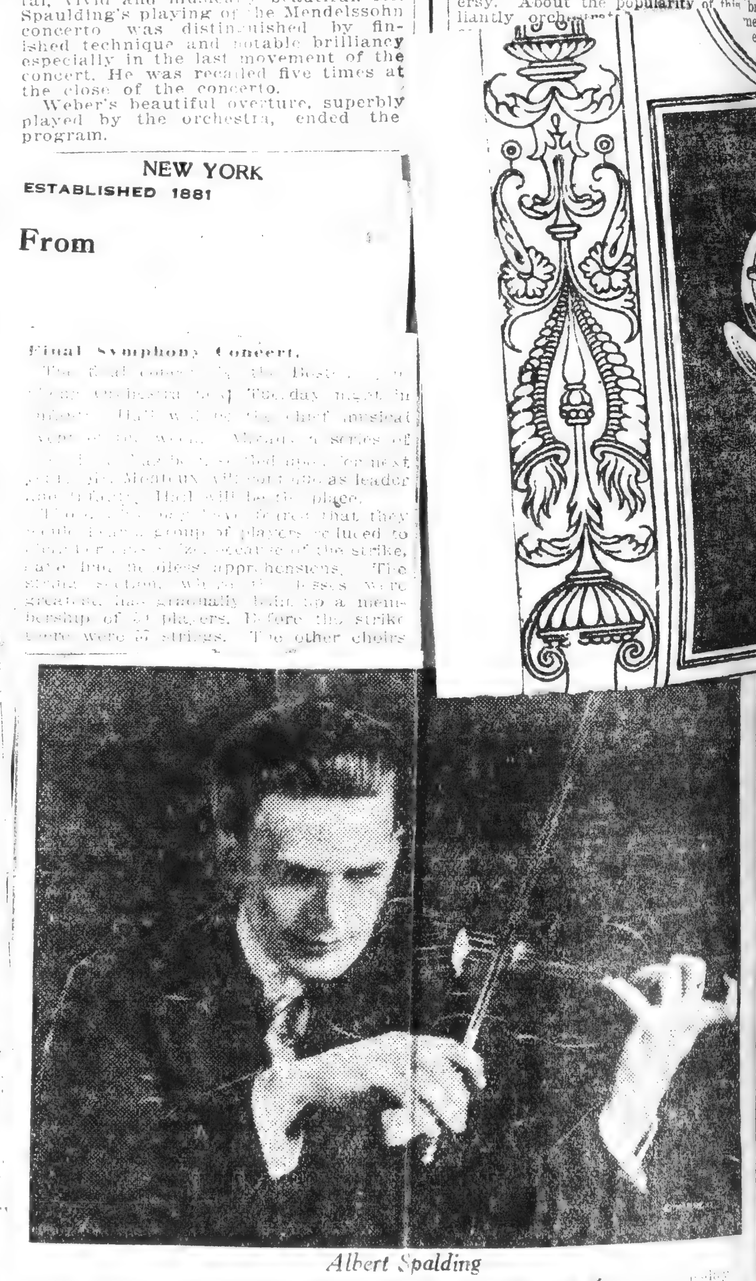
Address: Providence, R. I.

Date [illegible]

By N. B. Pettis

LAST BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The program which Pierre Monteux has chosen for the last Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, is the subject of an absorbing farewell. The "New World" Symphony by the Czech composer, Dvorak, will be the principal symphonic number. Whether its songful melodies and strong infectious rhythms are predominantly Bohemian or actually derived from our negro folk music has been a subject for prolonged and rather fruitless controversy. About the popularity of this brilliantly orchestrated [illegible]



Albert Spalding

Soloist [illegible] Symphony Orchestra at Infantry [illegible]

Eve. Express — Portland Eastern Argus — Daily Press — Feb 19 '20

WONDERFUL CONCERT BY BOSTON PLAYERS

Symphony Orchestra Led By New Conductor

One of the largest audiences in Portland's musical history assembled at City Hall last evening to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a notable program, the event being the third appearance of the organization before the Municipal Organ Course.

Older citizens well remember the earlier concerts by the orchestra in old City Hall in the musical courses, under the management of Ira Stockbridge. Mr. Stockbridge when seen on the street last evening after the concert, stated that the orchestra gave over 20 concerts under his management.

Perhaps some music lovers even remember the oft repeated encore, Loin de Bal upon which Portlanders insisted at each appearance. This was in the days when encores were allowed and the charming tempo, swing and rhythm of the alluring little waltz of the popular order was a wonderful thing as played by so notable a body of musicians.

Musical Event Important.

The concert was a most important event for Portland and for Maine. There was not a seat left in the house after 6 o'clock. The audience was brilliant and distinguished with visitors from all over the State.

The orchestra, which arrived by special train and departed immediately after the concert, was in its place on the state at 7.45. Mr. Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor, made his appearance at 8.30 and was warmly greeted.

The program given last evening was as follows: Overture to Goethe's Egmont, Op. 84, by Beethoven; Unfinished Symphony by Schubert; Stenka Razine by Glazounoff; Prelude to The Afternoon of a Faun, by Debussy; The Preludes, by Liszt.

Orchestral Characteristics.

The orchestra played with its accustomed polish and authority and it was not apparent that the new blood in the body of musicians—consequent upon the war upheaval—has in any way changed the ideal ensemble.

Refined tone, technical accuracy and musical dignity still are the outstanding virtues of the Boston players, and comment on its attainments seems superfluous.

The overture, composed by Beethoven in 1810, depicts the lamentation of the Netherlanders, the answer of Egmont to the cries of the people, the rejoicing at the final triumph. It of course was an inspiring and finished performance.

The Unfinished Symphony is a favorite in orchestral repertoire and it is believed that this symphony has been given in this City many times previously by the Boston organization. When this fact was stated to Mr. Monteux, he said, "I should know." Mr. Monteux speaks broken English.

New French Conductor.

Pierre Monteux is a forceful and magnetic conductor with a most attractive and genial personality. He is extremely dark, with twinkling black eyes. He has a nature born to guide and control, yet he has a rare smile of comradeship when conversing with the men as he did at intervals between the numbers. His attitude is most friendly and it is easy to see why he is the favorite he is.

The Unfinished Symphony called forth lengthy rounds of applause as did each work on the program. Mr. Monteaux was recalled several times and the entire orchestra rose to accept the appreciative tribute.

Then after a brief intermission, that marvel, Stenka Razine, by the Russian, Glazounoff.

This fantastic descriptive work is strange and bizarre, having tone poems suggestive of the song of the barge men on the River Volga, and many themes suggestive of the river; mythological themes, and then the appearance of the horrible Stenka and his savage band—all barbaric, but marvelously performed.

Debussy.

Nothing in the concert was more interesting—more entrancing in its effect—than the Debussy work, Afternoon of a Faun, which is featured by the orchestra as one of Debussy's most appealing writings. Here the wood winds and harp, especially, are employed to give the effect of the unreal world in which the faun disports himself of an afternoon and the development of the lovely themes was a delight.

Les Preludes by Liszt, closing the program shortly after 10, was a beautiful and satisfying rendition. It was a wonderful concert and a rare privilege. The elaborate program notes by Philip Hale were most helpful to a proper understanding of the music performed.

SYMPHONY IS DELIGHT TO BIG AUDIENCE

Plays Superbly at the Concert in City Hall

At its concert in the City hall last evening the Boston Symphony orchestra under the baton of its new conductor, Pierre Monteux, played superbly. The numbers were: Overture to Goetha's "Egmont," Op. 84, Beethoven; Unfinished Symphony in B minor, Schubert; "Stenka Razine," Symphonic Poem, Op. 13, Glauzounoff; Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," Debussy; "Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem, No. 3, Liszt.

That the evening was invested with unwonted significance is easily to be understood since Portland people do not often have an opportunity in their own city to hear an orchestral program. This concert was under the auspices of the music commission and there was a great audience present and one quite tropical in its expression of appreciation.

And well it might be.

Never has this unique musical aggregation been heard in truer splendor. Technically and aesthetically the orchestra is authoritative to the last word. It is sensitive to every wave of thought and emotion of the man who dominates it. The players have at their finger's end all the marvellous details that count for so much in ensemble work. The voices weave in and out of the tonal fabric with just the proportion of color and accent, making the whole so smooth and irresistible that it is all of matchless beautiy. All the art and power of the individual is placed at the command of the conductor. He it is who makes of the composition given, moving, living things, some of them poignant in their tragic import, others as delicately lovely as the glow of a summer sunset, with still others of such inspiring conten that they are immeasurable in their effect.

Continued on Page 6; Third Column

SYMPHONY IS A DELIGHT

Continued from Page One.

PIERRE MONTEAUX.

Pierre Monteaux, the conductor, has an interesting personality.

He has a dark, vivid face, black eyes, and a shock of black hair, carrying himself at all times with easy grace. When he takes his place before his men with stick in hand, one almost feels the force of his magnetic gaze.

In a trice they are with him, then off on their triumphant career.

In the opening number, Beethoven's "Egmont music," you were conscious of the lofty artistic height to which M. Monteaux could climb. He has boundless resources of mind and spirit. In his reading there was a beautiful balance, never an exageration of nuance or rhythm, and the keenest insight into the composer's thought. While his reading showed that he by no means had cut himself off from tradition there was always about it something of his own, an original interpretaion that was immensely appealing.

In the unfinished Symphony of Schubert there was magic. The first movement in its exquisite fluency and unbounded imagination, was of a sweetness unforgettable with the second approaching it nearly in its acuteness and variety of expression.

This work was the greatest of the evening and aroused unusual warmth of applause.

A novelty, that found many admirers, also, was the Debussy Prelude, so impressionistic and so disturbing in its unusual import. The Glazounoff work was splendidly virile and beautifully given, with "The Preludes" of Liszt for the closing number.

Few concerts have ever been given here with such matchless richness of feeling and technique.

It was from beginning to end a wondrously artistic presentment.

GREAT THRONG ENJOYS CONCERT IN CITY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra Holds Immense Audience Spellbound — The Attendance One Of Largest In The History Of Municipal Concerts.

Standing room was almost at a premium last evening, so great was the demand for admission at City Hall to enjoy the program rendered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Pierre Monteux. By three o'clock yesterday afternoon the last seat had been sold and before the program started well over a half thousand additional admissions had been sold, the purchasers fully realizing that a seat was out of the question. It was one of the largest audiences at any of the Municipal Concert courses since the inauguration of the series.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is too well known to require the use of adjectives. It is a musical organization of one hundred men second to none in this country and fully justifies the enviable reputation it has gained. Under the masterly control of its conductor, it responds as thoroughly and as completely to the desire and whim of the conductor as does the massive organ to the touch of the artist on the keys.

The program rendered included compositions representing various national peculiarities and were of the period of a century ago and of more recent dates, ranging from an overture composed by Beethoven in 1810 to a prelude by Debussy first rendered in 1894. The program follows:

Overture to Goethe's 'Egmont," Op. 84 .....Beethoven

Unfinished Symphony in B minor ..... Schubert

I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante con moto.

"Stenka Razine," Symphonic Poem, Op. 13.....Glazounoff

"Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune (Eglogue de S. Mallarme)" (Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun (Eclogue by S. Mallarme").....Debussy

"Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem No 3 (after Lamartine).....Liszt

The wide range covered by the program gives evidence of the ability of the orchestra and the wide and keen understandiig of the several composers on the part of the conductor and is best told by a short description of some of the compositions.

Overture to Goethe's "Egmont."

Long and curious commentaries have been written in explanation of this overture. As though the masterpiece needed an explanation! We remember one in which a subtle meaning was given to at least every half-dozen measures: the Netherlanders are under the crushing weight of Spanish oppression; Egmont is melancholy, his blood is stagnant. but at last he shakes off his melanchody (violins), answers the cries of his countrypeople, rouses himself for action; his death is portrayed by a descent of the violins from C to G; but his countrymen triumph. Spain is typified by the Sarabande movement; the heavy, recurring chords portray the lean-bodied, lean-visaged Duke of Alva; "The violin theme in D-flat, to which the clarinet brings the under-third. is a picture of Clarchen," etc. One might as well illustrate word for word the solemn ending of Thomas Fuller's life of Alva in 'The Profane State."

There are the voices of an aroused and angry people, and there is at last tumultuous rejoicing. The "Triumph Symphony" at the end of the play forms the end of the overture.

"Steneka Razine," Symphonic Poem.

"Stenka Razine" was composed at Petrograd in 1885. At first Glazounoff was given to fantastic, imaginative music. His suites and tone-poems told of carnivals, funerals, the voluptuous East, the forest with wood sprites, water nymphs, and will-of-the-wisps, the ocean, the Kremlin of Moscow with all its holy and dramatic associations. "Stenka Razine" is built on three themes: the first is the melancholy song of the barge-men of the Volga; the second theme, short, savage, bizarre, typifies the hero who gives his name to the piece; and the third, a seductive melody, pictures in tones the captive Persian princess. The chant of the barge-men is that which vitalizes the orchestral piece. It is forever appearing, transformed in a thousand ways. The river is personified.

Continued on Page Two

AT THRONG ENJOYS CONCERT IN CITY HALL

Continued From First Page.

This Razine was a Cossack, who long ago ruled the Volga, led an insurrection, took Astrakan, devastated provinces; at last, a prisoner, he was broken on the wheel in the reign of the Tsar Alexis, 1672.

The score contains an argument in Russian which was translated for the production in Boston in 1904. Following is Mr. Nathan Haskell Dole's translation of the folk-song:

"The Volga, immense and placid, For many years those along its banks had dwelt in peace when suddenly appeared the terrible hetman Stenka, who at the head of his savage band ran up and down the Volga, devastating and pillaging the villages and towns along its shores. As the folk-song has it:—

"Forth swiftly swam the light canoe,
The light canoe of the Ataman,
Of the Ataman, Stenka Razine.
The craft was everywhere adorned;
Seats it had for the Kazaki;
The sails were wove of silken cloth;
The sweeps were tipt with solid gold.
Amid the boat was a brocaded tent,
And in that brocaded tent there lay
Great barrels stuft with golden hoards.
On the treasure sat a beauteous maiden,
The mistress of the Ataman.
A Persian princess, taken captive by Stenka Razine.

"One day she grew pensive, and addressing herself to the comrades of her master, she told them of a dream she had once dreamt:

"'Listen to me, ye gallant braves;
When I was young, my sleep was light;
My sleep was light, but much I dreamed.
To me my dream seemed far from good:
I dreamed our chief was shot to death;
The Kazak oarsmen sat chained in prison;
And I—
I was drowned in Mother Volga.'

"The dream of the Princess came true. Stenka was surrounded by the soldiers of the Tsar. Seeing his ruin at hand, Stenka cried out:

"'Never, during all the thirty years of my going up and down Mother Volga, have I made her a gift. Today I shall give her what is in my eyes the most precious of eartly treasures.' Saying this, he threw the Princess into the Volga. The savage band began to sing the praise of their leader, and they all rushed upon the soldiers of the Tsar."

Mr. Montagu-Nathan finds "Stenka [illegible]" a "tribute to the music-historical method of nationalism." He [illegible] in 1916: "At the recent production in Russia of the ballet 'Stenka Razine,' in which Glazounoff's music was used it was complained that the symphonic movement did not coincide with the dramatic action. This s not, as might have been supposed, the fault of the composer, but of the producer ,the music having been written many years before the ballet was designed."

EDWARD LITTLE HIGH ORCHESTRA ATTENDS CONCERT

The members of the orchestra of the Edward Little high school of Auburn attended last night's symphony concert coming to the city on

ESTABLISHED 1868
From Morning Telegraph
New York

AS TO AMERICAN MUSIC ID ITS PROM

NIAS SALTASH.

The future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra daily becomes more problematic.

Of course, the highly estimable gentlemen who have taken the late Major Higginson's place as guarantors have great faith in themselves.

Are they not all typical Bostonians?

Do they not still cherish the delightful illusion that Boston is the hub of the universe?

They think they can continue to run their orchestra as a non-union organization.

But I don't.

And why should they if they are actuated by the spirit manifested by Mr. Cabot, an important member of the guarantor's committee.

When one of the oldest and most respected members of the orchestra called with two of his fellow artists to request an increase of salary he explained to Mr. Cabot:

"We can't live any more these days on the salary you pay us."

What do you suppose was Mr. Cabot's reply to the men who had devoted all their lives to their art?

"Well, gentlemen," he responded, "all I can say is that you had better change your profession."

[illegible] will [illegible] J. A.
[illegible] following
[illegible] y crews:
[illegible] d 1919 varsity
[illegible] 20, 1919 varsit
[illegible] 1919 varsity crew
[illegible] varsity, A. B. La
[illegible] y, A. W. Rammi
[illegible] ogers '20, 1917

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Ev. Express Portland Eastern Daily Press — Feb 19 '20

WONDERFUL CONCERT BY BOSTON PLAYERS

Symphony Orchestra Led By New Conductor

One of the largest audiences in Portland's musical history assembled at City Hall last evening to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a notable program, the event being the third appearance of the organization before the Municipal Organ Course.

Older citizens well remember the earlier concerts by the orchestra in old City Hall in the musical courses, under the management of Ira Stockbridge. Mr. Stockbridge when seen on the street last evening after the concert, stated that the orchestra gave over 20 concerts under his management.

Perhaps some music lovers even remember the oft repeated encore, Loin de Bal upon which Portlanders insisted at each appearance. This was in the days when encores were allowed and the charming tempo, swing and rhythm of the alluring little waltz of the popular order was a wonderful thing as played by so notable a body of musicians.

Musical Event Important.

The concert was a most important event for Portland and for Maine. There was not a seat left in the house after 6 o'clock. The audience was brilliant and distinguished with visitors from all over the State.

The orchestra, which arrived by special train and departed immediately after the concert, was in its place on the state at 7.45. Mr. Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor, made his appearance at 8.30 and was warmly greeted.

The program given last evening was as follows: Overture to Goethe's Egmont, Op. 84, by Beethoven; Unfinished Symphony by Schubert; Stenka Razine by Glazounoff; Prelude to The Afternoon of a Faun, by Debussy; The Preludes, by Liszt.

Orchestral Characteristics.

The orchestra played with its accustomed polish and authority and it was not apparent that the new blood in the body of musicians—consequent upon the war upheaval—has in any way changed the ideal ensemble.

Refined tone, technical accuracy and musical dignity still are the outstanding virtues of the Boston players, and comment on its attainments seems superfluous.

The overture, composed by Beethoven in 1810, depicts the lamentation of the Netherlanders, the answer of Egmont to the cries of the people, the rejoicing at the final triumph. It of course was an inspiring and finished performance.

The Unfinished Symphony is a favorite in orchestral repertoire and it is believed that this symphony has been given in this City many times previously by the Boston organization. When this fact was stated to Mr. Monteux, he said, "I should know." Mr. Monteux speaks broken English.

New French Conductor.

Pierre Monteux is a forceful and magnetic conductor with a most attractive and genial personality. He is extremely dark, with twinkling black eyes. He has a nature born to guide and control, yet he has a rare smile of comradeship when conversing with the men as he did at intervals between the numbers. His attitude is most friendly and it is easy to see why he is the favorite he is.

The Unfinished Symphony called forth lengthy rounds of applause as did each work on the program. Mr. Monteaux was recalled several times and the entire orchestra rose to accept the appreciative tribute.

Then after a brief intermission, that marvel, Stenka Razine, by the Russian, Glazounoff.

This fantastic descriptive work is strange and bizarre, having tone poems suggestive of the song of the barge men on the River Volga, and many themes suggestive of the river; mythological themes, and then the appearance of the horrible Stenka and his savage band—all barbaric, but marvelously performed.

Debussy.

Nothing in the concert was more interesting—more entrancing in its effect—than the Debussy work, Afternoon of a Faun, which is featured by the orchestra as one of Debussy's most appealing writings. Here the wood winds and harp, especially, are employed to give the effect of the unreal world in which the faun disports himself of an afternoon and the development of the lovely themes was a delight.

Les Preludes by Liszt, closing the program shortly after 10, was a beautiful and satisfying rendition. It was a wonderful concert and a rare privilege. The elaborate program notes by Philip Hale were most helpful to a proper understanding of the music performed.

SYMPHONY IS DELIGHT TO BIG AUDIENCE

Plays Superbly at the Concert in City Hall

At its concert in the City hall last evening the Boston Symphony orchestra under the baton of its new conductor, Pierre Monteux, played superbly. The numbers were: Overture to Goetha's "Egmont," Op. 84, Beethoven; Unfinished Symphony in B minor, Schubert; "Stenka Razine," Symphonic Poem, Op. 13, Glauzounoff; Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," Debussy; "Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem, No. 3, Liszt.

That the evening was invested with unwonted significance is easily to be understood since Portland people do not often have an opportunity in their own city to hear an orchestral program. This concert was under the auspices of the music commission and there was a great audience present and one quite tropical in its expression of appreciation.

And well it might be.

Never has this unique musical aggregation been heard in truer splendor. Technically and aesthetically the orchestra is authoritative to the last word. It is sensitive to every wave of thought and emotion of the man who dominates it. The players have at their finger's end all the marvellous details that count for so much in ensemble work. The voices weave in and out of the tonal fabric with just the proportion of color and accent, making the whole so smooth and irresistible that it is all of matchless beautiy. All the art and power of the individual is placed at the command of the conductor. He it is who makes of the composition given, moving, living things, some of them poignant in their tragic import, others as delicately lovely as the glow of a summer sunset, with still others of such inspiring conten that they are immeasurable in their effect.

Continued on Page 6; Third Column

SYMPHONY IS A DELIGHT

Continued from Page One.

PIERRE MONTEAUX.

Pierre Monteaux, the conductor, has an interesting personality.

He has a dark, vivid face, black eyes, and a shock of black hair, carrying himself at all times with easy grace. When he takes his place before his men with stick in hand, one almost feels the force of his magnetic gaze. In a trice they are with him, then off on their triumphant career.

In the opening number, Beethoven's "Egmont music," you were conscious of the lofty artistic height to which M. Monteaux could climb. He has boundless resources of mind and spirit. In his reading there was a beautiful balance, never an exageration of nuance or rhythm, and the keenest insight into the composer's thought. While his reading showed that he by no means had cut himself off from tradition there was always about it something of his own, an original interpretaion that was immensely appealing.

In the unfinished Symphony of Schubert there was magic. The first movement in its exquisite fluency and unbounded imagination, was of a sweetness unforgettable with the second approaching it nearly in its acuteness and variety of expression.

This work was the greatest of the evening and aroused unusual warmth of applause.

A novelty, that found many admirers, also, was the Debussy Prelude, so impressionistic and so disturbing in its unusual import. The Glazounoff work was splendidly virile and beautifully given, with "The Preludes" of Liszt for the closing number.

Few concerts have ever been given here with such matchless richness of feeling and technique.

It was from beginning to end a wondrously artistic presentment.

GREAT THRONG ENJOYS CONCERT IN CITY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra Holds Immense Audience Spellbound — The Attendance One Of Largest In The History Of Municipal Concerts.

Standing room was almost at a premium last evening, so great was the demand for admission at City Hall to enjoy the program rendered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Pierre Monteux. By three o'clock yesterday afternoon the last seat had been sold and before the program started well over a half thousand additional admissions had been sold, the purchasers fully realizing that a seat was out of the question. It was one of the largest audiences at any of the Municipal Concert courses since the inauguration of the series.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is too well known to require the use of adjectives. It is a musical organization of one hundred men second to none in this country and fully justifies the enviable reputation it has gained. Under the masterly control of its conductor, it responds as thoroughly and as completely to the desire and whim of the conductor as does the massive organ to the touch of the artist on the keys.

The program rendered included compositions representing various national peculiarities and were of the period of a century ago and of more recent dates, ranging from an overture composed by Beethoven in 1810 to a prelude by Debussy first rendered in 1894. The program follows:

Overture to Goethe's 'Egmont," Op. 84 .....Beethoven

Unfinished Symphony in B minor ..... Schubert

I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante con moto.

"Stenka Razine," Symphonic Poem, Op. 13.....Glazoumiff

"Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune (Eglogue de S. Mallarme)" (Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun (Eclogue by S. Mallarme").....Debussy

"Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem No 3 (after Lamartine).....Liszt

The wide range covered by the program gives evidence of the ability of the orchestra and the wide and keen understanding of the several composers on the part of the conductor and is best told by a short description of some of the compositions.

Overture to Goethe's "Egmont."

Long and curious commentaries have been written in explanation of this overture. As though the masterpiece needed an explanation! We remember one in which a subtle meaning was given to at least every half-dozen measures: the Netherlanders are under the crushing weight of Spanish oppression; Egmont is melancholy, his blood is stagnant, but at last he shakes off his melanchody (violins), answers the cries of his countrypeople, rouses himself for action; his death is portrayed by a descent of the violins from C to G; but his countrymen triumph. Spain is typified by the Sarabande movement; the heavy, recurring chords portray the lean-bodied, lean-visaged Duke of Alva; "The violin theme in D-flat, to which the clarinet brings the under-third, is a picture of Clarchen," etc. One might as well illustrate word for word the solemn ending of Thomas Fuller's life of Alva in 'The Profane State."

There are the voices of an aroused and angry people, and there is at last tumultuous rejoicing. The "Triumph Symphony" at the end of the play forms the end of the overture.

"Steneka Razine," Symphonic Poem.

"Stenka Razine" was composed at Petrograd in 1885. At first Glazounoff was given to fantastic, imaginative music. His suites and tone-poems told of carnivals, funerals, the voluptuous East, the forest with wood sprites, water nymphs, and will-o-the-wisps, the ocean, the Kremlin of Moscow with all its holy and dramatic associations. "Stenka Razine" is built on three themes: the first is the melancholy song of the barge-men of the Volga; the second theme, short, savage, bizarre, typifies the hero who gives his name to the piece; and the third, a seductive melody, pictures in tones the captive Persian princess. The chant of the barge-men is that which vitalizes the orchestral piece. It is forever appearing, transformed in a thousand ways. The river is personified.

Continued on Page Two

AT THRONG ENJOYS CONCERT IN CITY HALL

Continued From First Page.

This Razine was a Cossack, who long ago ruled the Volga, led an insurrection, took Astrakan, devastated provinces; at last, a prisoner, he was broken on the wheel in the reign of the Tsar Alexis, 1672.

The score contains an argument in Russian which was translated for the production in Boston in 1904. Following is Mr. Nathan Haskell Dole's translation of the folk-song:

"The Volga, immense and placid. For many years those along its banks had dwelt in peace when suddenly appeared the terrible hetman Stenka, who at the head of his savage band ran up and down the Volga, devastating and pillaging the villages and towns along its shores. As the folk-song has it:—

"Forth swiftly swam the light canoe,
The light canoe of the Ataman,
Of the Ataman, Stenka Razine.
The craft was everywhere adorned;
Seats it had for the Kazaki;
The sails were wove of silken cloth;
The sweeps were tipt with solid gold.
Amid the boat was a brocaded tent,
And in that brocaded tent there lay
Great barrels stuft with golden hoards.
On the treasure sat a beauteous maiden,
The mistress of the Ataman.
A Persian princess, taken captive by Stenka Razine.

"One day she grew pensive, and addressing herself to the comrades of her master, she told them of a dream she had once dreamt:

"'Listen to me, ye gallant braves;
When I was young, my sleep was light;
My sleep was light, but much I dreamed.
To me my dream seemed far from good:
I dreamed our chief was shot to death;
The Kazak oarsmen sat chained in prison;
And I—
I was drowned in Mother Volga.'

"The dream of the Princess came true. Stenka was surrounded by the soldiers of the Tsar. Seeing his ruin at hand, Stenka cried out:

"'Never, during all the thirty years of my going up and down Mother Volga, have I made her a gift. Today I shall give her what is in my eyes the most precious of eartly treasures.' Saying this, he threw the Princess into the Volga. The savage band began to sing the praise of their leader, and they all rushed upon the soldiers of the Tsar."

Mr. Montagu-Nathan finds "Stenka [illegible] a "tribute to the music-historical method of nationalism." He [illegible] in 1916: "At the recent production in Russia of the ballet 'Stenka Razine,' in which Glazounoff's music was used it was complained that the symphonic movement did not coincide with the dramatic action. This s not, as might have been supposed, the fault of the composer, but of the producer ,the music having been written many years before the ballet was designed."

EDWARD LITTLE HIGH ORCHESTRA ATTENDS CONCERT

The members of the orchestra of the Edward Little high school of Auburn attended last night's symphony concert in a body, coming to the city on a [illegible]cial car of the Interurban.

[illegible] members of the orchestra ob[illegible]d the funds for making the trip [illegible] gave. There were

AS TO AMERICAN MUSIC [illegible]D ITS PROM[illegible]

NIAS SALTASH.

The future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra daily becomes more problematic.

Of course, the highly estimable gentlemen who have taken the late Major Higginson's place as guarantors have great faith in themselves.

Are they not all typical Bostonians?

Do they not still cherish the delightful illusion that Boston is the hub of the universe?

They think they can continue to run their orchestra as a non-union organization.

But I don't.

And why should they if they are actuated by the spirit manifested by Mr. Cabot, an important member of the guarantor's committee.

When one of the oldest and most respected members of the orchestra called with two of his fellow artists to request an increase of salary he explained to Mr. Cabot:

"We can't live any more these days on the salary you pay us."

What do you suppose was Mr. Cabot's reply to the men who had devoted all their lives to their art?

"Well, gentlemen," he responded, "all I can say is that you had better change your profession."

[illegible]ation o[illegible] the best [illegible]. Fortu[illegible] the ac[illegible]

[illegible] will
J. A.
[illegible]ollowing
[illegible]y crews:
[illegible]d 1919 varsity
[illegible]20, 1919 varsit
[illegible]1919 varsity crew
[illegible]varsity, A. B. La[illegible]
[illegible]y, A. W. Ramm[illegible]
[illegible]ogers '20, 1917

Feb 28

16TH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Works by Gluck, Haydn, Debussy and Charpentier Comprise Program

CHORUS OF WOMEN IS WELL TRAINED

By PHILIP HALE

The 16th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Gluck, Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Haydn, Symphony, G major (B. & H. 13); Debussy, "The Blessed Damozel" (Female Chorus trained by Mr. Townsend; Ethel Frank, soprano; Claramond Thompson, contralto); Charpentier, "Impressions of Italy."

There is old music that defies time: as motets of Vittoria, airs of Purcell and Handel, piano pieces of Scarlatti, Couperin and Bach. Gluck's overture was first heard in Paris nearly 150 years ago, yet, even with an inevitable formula of its period, it is still nobly pathetic. We have seen and heard what Richard Strauss did with the story of Electra. One shudders at the thought of what he might do to Iphigenia. It is not necessary to label, as Wagner did, the themes of Gluck. The whole story is in the music: the title is enough; the overture is purely Grecian in its restrained passion, pathetic calm, the suggestion of inexorable Fate.

Haydn's symphony was written for Paris. It is one of his best. Whatever Haydn wrote is conspicuous for careful workmanship; but this symphony was composed with even more than his customary care. Played delightfully, it again made its appeal.

Mr. Monteux gave a very brilliant reading of Charpentier's "Impressions," the most brilliant we have heard; for never before in Boston have the last three movements had so much character. Some of the pages have already lost their freshness: for example, we could spare some in the "Serenade," also in "Naples"—this last movement is long-drawn-out—nor does "At the Fountain" hold firmly the attention; but on the whole, and in spite of the too great influence of Massenet heard here and there, and the occasional touch of vulgarity, the Suite is melodious, agreeable music, skilfully orchestrated, agreeable to the ear. "On the Summits," by reason of Mr. Monteux's interpretation, had a significance not given to it before.

Is the beauty of a famous poem enhanced by music? Mr. Bantock, greatly daring, has set music to the choruses of "Atalanta in Calydon," and there was an Englishman, we forget his highly respectable name, who turned nearly all of Shakespeare's sonnets into songs with piano accompaniment. No wonder that Debussy was fascinated by "The Blessed Damozel." If any one was to choose it for a cantata, he was the man. But does his music emphasize the inherent beauty of the verse? The introduction suggests the proper mood. Charles Lamb thought that Milton should be read after a hearing of organ music. Debussy's orchestral introduction prepares one for reading Rossetti's poem. The orchestral pages are more in the Rossettian mystically sensuous spirit than the measures to be sung; the words of the waiting and longing woman need no music. It is true that the solo singers yesterday were inadequate; but could any singers change the inherent and disappointing character of the music allotted them? One listened with delight to Debussy's orchestra; the chorus of women was heard with pleasure; but while the reciter and the Damozel were at work, there was consolation in the printed text.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows: Berlioz, "Fantastic" Symphony; Malipiero, "Pauses of Silence"; Borodin, "On the Steppes of Central Asia"; Wagner, Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

Feb MUSIC 28

The Music of Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its sixteenth concert of the present season on Feburary 27 with the following program:

Gluck—Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"
Haydn—Symphony in G major
Debussy—"La Damoiselle élue"
Charpentier—"Impressions of Italy"

A chorus of women's voices, Ethel Frank, and Claramond Thompson assisted in the Debussy piece. Frédéric Denayer played the viola solo in the first movement of Charpentier's suite.

This program might well have been entitled "Music of the past and present," although the Haydn symphony would have to be grouped with the music of the present and "La Damoiselle élue" with the music of the past. Debussy's setting of the Rossetti poem sounds strangely unlike the composer of "L'Après Midi d'un Faune," "La Mer" and "Pelléas." There seems not the faintest foreshadowing of later Debussy. Massenet, well displaying character of

CHORUS SINGS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe Feb 28

"Blessed Damozel" Given With Women's Voices

Gluck, Haydn and Charpentier Heard in the Program

The most interesting item in yesterday's Symphony concert was Debussy's setting for female voices and orchestra of Rossetti's familiar lyric poem, "The Blessed Damozel." Although it was performed for the first time at these concerts, it is not new to Boston, for the first performance here was in 1903, and there have been at least three others since then.

"La Demoiselle Elue," with French text by Gabriel Sarrazin, was composed in 1887 as one of the "envois," or duty pieces, expected of every winner of the famous "Prix de Rome." Although the judges looked rather askance at what then seemed its daringly ultra-modern qualities, it seems orthodox enough today, with its suggestions of Wagner's "Tristan," mingled with a tentative use of the type of harmony now associated with Debussy.

The piece is the work of a composer of great imaginative power and strongly marked individuality, who has not quite found himself and disentangled his genius from the influences that helped form it.

The performance was satisfactory and at times brilliant. Mr Townsend as usual had schooled chorus and solo voices with great care and skill, and Mr Monteux is always a sympathetic interpreter of Debussy. The solo parts sung by Ethel Frank and Claramond Thompson suffered somewhat from the nervousness inevitable to novices at Symphony concerts. Miss Frank is a capable singer who has pleased many recital audiences. Miss Thompson has a voice of beautiful quality which one would gladly hear under more favorable circumstances than the few thankless measures allotted her yesterday.

The finest of the other numbers was Gluck's somber and austerely tragic overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis." His music is too seldom heard nowadays. It has far more of the timeless quality of Bach and Beethoven than has Haydn's Symphony in G major, which followed it yesterday.

Mr Monteux too ofter makes 18th century music sound clumsy and flat footed by neglecting the delicate gradations of accent and of tone volume on which its essential grace and delicacy depend. Haydn and Gluck, as well as Mozart, are really immensely difficult to perform properly, though any amateur orchestra is capable of plodding through most of their works.

Charpentier's Italy, in his youthful orchestral "Impressions" of that country, reeks of the opera house. It is effective in a banal and rather cheap manner, but fades into insignificance beside such musical pictures as Berlioz' "Harold in Italy." The performance yesterday lent power to the music, and was largely responsible for the outburst of applause at the end.

From Times
New York City
MAR 21 1920

ORCHESTRAS AFIELD.

Henry F. Gilbert's "The Dance in Place Congo" was recently performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its home city. The music is based on Creole airs, the "Bamboola" and "One, Two, Three, Caroline."

The Chicago Orchestra has produced in the We[illegible] AND HITS—DIRECTION credited to [illegible] E WEEK

20, 1876, a[illegible]
the date a[illegible] "HAMLET" AT THE LYRIC.
Hofmann.

poser of the incomparable "Dance of Angels," were to set this poem! Even Debussy of the later years might have found more fitting harmonies and orchestral tints, although it is doubtful if the mysticism of the poem was of a kind with which his nature was entirely sympathetic. Yet it was pleasant to hear the composition, if only by way of comparison with his later style. "Papa" Haydn's symphony was as fresh as on the day when it was written. To be sure, it is comfortable, perhaps superficial music, but so genuine and sincere that although old-fashioned, it will never grow old. Mr. Monteux, an admirer of the modern school, never fails to interpret the music of the eighteenth century with grace and charm, as witness the playing of this symphony as well as that of Mozart's in G minor of last week's program. Charpentier's suite is an example of a poetic idea developed with masterly skill. There have been many compositions portraying Italian life and atmosphere more or less successfully, but few excite the imagination as does this suite, written by a Frenchman. The orchestration is so cleverly contrived and so tastefully varied, the melodic ideas are so fresh—and we might add that the several movements are so tactfully short—that each hearing brings new pleasure. We have always thought that the viola solo in the first number (played behind the scenes) was intended to be a distant echo of the opening theme of the violoncellos. As played yesterday, Mr. Denayer might almost as well have sat in his accustomed place in the orchestra.

Post Feb 28, BOST

DEBUSSY PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

Female Chorus Assists in His "Blessed Damoiselle"

BY OLIN DOWNES

Debussy's "Blessed Damoiselle," after the poem of Rossetti, was performed for the first time at the Boston Symphony concerts yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Mr. Monteux conducting, with Miss Ethel Frank and Miss Claramond Thompson as soprano and contralto soloists, and a female chorus prepared for this concert by Stephen Townsend.

The orchestral compositions were Gluck's superb overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Haydn's G major symphony (Breiotkopf and Hartel number 13), and Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy."

EXQUISITELY FRESH

Debussy's music keeps its exquisite freshness, its pre-Raphaelite beauty. It sounds today prodigiously simple, though it was only a few years ago—in 1905, to be exact—when it sounded very dangerous and strange, and many people hooted one interviewer, who farther-sighted than others, remarked that the day might come when Claude Debussy would seem more original a composer than Richard Strauss—15 years ago, to be exact, and that day has arrived. Debussy is indisputably the more original composer of the two, and there is this happy difference between the early music of Debussy and the early music of some other composers. Debussy's early music remains fresh, exquisitely made, supremely art in its perfection of line and color.

It is not the music of the late Debussy, but it is and will be for many years to come the ineffably beautiful music of a great genius—genius which recalls the line of Edgar Lee Masters: "Genius is wisdom and youth."

Not Well Balanced

Mr. Monteux interpreted this music sympathetically. The chorus had been well prepared, though the balance between voices and orchestra was not always perfect. The entire performance was a little stiff, as it seemed, and it must be confessed that neither of the soloists, intelligently as they performed, were particularly in the vein or over effective under the circumstances.

The feature of the concert, for the writer, was the performance of the noble and dramatic music of Gluck. Mr. Monteux made this music modern without distorting or abusing its classic spirit. He seemed to us to be singularly successful in thus understanding an 18th century composer and his period, yet in presenting this music to his hearers in a way that brought it home with the greatest force to the present generation.

Displays Gluck's Greatness

We have heard performances as respectful, but much colder; performances which left you calm, and saying to yourself, as Mr. Clemenceau is said to have said to himself of the League of Nations, "Now Georges Clemenceau, you do believe in the League of Nations"—so the young man, listening to this music, which his elders had told him was so great, said to himself, "Now George Smith, you do believe in the greatness of Gluck." Yesterday afternoon, he did not merely believe in it. He knew it and felt it in every fibre of his musical being.

The opening of the allegro was of prodigious portent, grand, austere, ominous of tragedy and of Fate that gods themselves might not disobey. The recall the tenderness, the noble melancholy, the melancholy that brings to mind the name of "Niobe," in the responses of strings and wind instruments in the passage which Wagner described as expressing "agonizing pity." It was fully apparent that neither Wagner nor Berlioz, in their day, overrated the genius of Gluck.

Haydn's Symphony

The playing of Haydn's symphony was spirited, robustious, if not as clear and transparent in tone qualities as other performances have been. The slow movement was beautifully sung, and the performance of the scherzo, with the humorously discordant notes in the trio, was delightful. In the playing of "Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy" there was occasion to admire the tone of Mr. Denayer, of Mr. Bedetti and other instrumentalists of the orchestra. Yet it must be said that this music, melodious, sincere, tuneful, vulgar with the refreshing vulgarity of the so-called "common people," is aging. The opening "Serenade," the movement "On Mule-back" and some pages of the finale were freshest to the writer's ear yesterday; but music has to be built of the most marvellously durable material to sound well in the ears of even two successive generations.

Romain Rolland expressed it happily when he said that of all the arts, mu-

Feb 28

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

SYMPHONY CONCERT, SYMPHON QUARREL

A Tranquil Yesterday with Debussy, Haydn, Gluck and Charpentier to Busy Conductor, Orchestra and Audience—A Perturbed Today with an Organized Union Ready to Confer with the Trustees — The Harvard Glee Club Puts Even Kreisler in Second Place

THOUGH nearly every tongue in Symphony Hall wagged yesterday afternoon with the controversy between the members and the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra, the concert itself betrayed not a hint of it. Mr. Monteux, holding wisely aloof from the whole quarrel, had prepared and practiced the programme as though all concerned were as tranquilly minded as he seemed. The men, as if to give individual and collective proof of their regard for the high standards of the band, played at the top of their bent. An assisting chorus of women added to interest and pleasure, chosen by Mr. Townsend with his usual flair for bright, clear, supple voices, trained by him to precision and plasticity, ease and understanding with the music in hand. Assisting solo-singers—Miss Frank and Miss Thompson—were less fortunately chosen, far less well prepared for their considerable task. In measure, perhaps, their awkward and expressionless song accounted for the cool applause that their hearers returned to Debussy's setting for orchestra and women's voices of Rossetti's poem, "The Blessed Damozel." Perhaps, again, it is not a piece advisedly included in a Symphony Concert.

Once the orchestra has made way through the prelude, it has only to weave the fine web of atmosphere and suggestion, detail by detail, above and through which should shimmer the singing voices. The chorus gained this luminosity and suavity, this soft glitter and delicate sensibility of tone. The solo-singers fell far short of such virtue, and theirs, after all, is the major part of the music. Heard, imagined apart from the chance circumstances of the day, it has the iridescent loveliness of a web of gauze spread over the poem, threaded into it. Yet the soft glow, the clear transparencies, the gentle progress, the finely chiselled detail, the whole atmosphere of remote and mystical scene, of idealized and semi-mystical emotion in tones are but reflections of Rossetti's animating and coloring verse. That verse strikes the human note. Recall the line that melts the heart; "All this is when he comes." Remember the gentle pride of the avowal to Mary, the warm petition to Christ the Lord. Debussy's music turns the Damozel to bright phantom, disembodies her vision and her longing. More than to the music the hearer makes answer to the poem and little does the music prompt him.

Before Debussy, contrasting ancients of music had their inning—Gluck with the overture to his opera, "Iphigenia in Aulis," Haydn with a little symphony in G major. Once more the overture proved that scant expressive means as we regard them nowadays, thin harmonic and instrumental dress as it seems in 1920, and eighteenth-century formulas in alternation of matter and mood, may still summon the passion and the illusion of the tragedy of Agamemnon's daughter. Enough that in the composer is the creative imagination and passion to compass them—and defy the years. In such music of the theatre Mr. Monteux is almost unfailingly eloquent; but in another vein he and the orchestra surpassed themselves. Not before in ventures into eighteenth-century symphonies have they gained the fleetness of pace, the lightness of accent, the flow of melodic line, the grace of ornament, the brightness of rhythm with which they set Haydn's music to singing, dancing, smiling and sporting anew. A feat in little, it is true, but a difficult feat and a feat well and truly done. Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy," big as they seem beside the little symphony, are twice as easy to set sounding. When they were newer than they are today, it was the custom to believe them graphic and imaginative tone-pictures—the twang of the midnight serenade, the rattle and blaze of Naples in fete, the tinkling mule-train ascending the mountain, the still girls by the fountain, the pulsing glow of talian landscape, pulsing also in the heart of the poet. Now not much is left but a thick and theatrical musical rhetoric, "effective" enough in the trite sense of the word. Long since the music-drama of "Louise" proved Charpentier man of the theatre. By the same token the Italy of his suite is the Italy that used to be painted on drop-curtains.

Chorus Assists at Symphony Concert

adv. Feb 29

By E. F. HARKINS.

Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis".....Gluck
Symphony in G major.....Haydn
"The Blessed Damozel," lyric poem...Debussy
Suite, "Impressions of Italy".....Charpentier

NO novelty on this sixteenth Symphony program—unless there were some present who are content with the odd conservatism governing Symphony programs and have consequently waited all these years to hear Debussy's setting of "The Blessed Damozel," the poem by Dante Gabriel Rossetti.

Inveterate concertgoers had heard his ethereal music long before—several times, in fact. Rosetti's picture of the fair lady who leaned out from the gold bar of Heaven, waiting for her lover—who did not come, or else passed her by—is a tone poem of itself. Its euphony and mystic imagery are well framed by Debussy.

The music, like the poem, is vapory until near the close; then it rises to emotional heights. Miss Ethel Frank, who sang the music of the lady of the seven-starred hair, missed the emotional climax, her voice being submerged in the great orchestral surge worked up by Mr. Monteux. Otherwise she sang acceptably.

Miss Claramond Thompson sang the part of the Narrator. A female chorus trained by Stephen S. Townsend also assisted, its efforts being worthy of comparison with those of the orchestra.

The audience rightly found this and all the other music on the program diverting but not exciting. The Gluck and Haydn selections, though both well interpreted, left the same impressions—grace with vigor, and then more of the same. The Charpentier suite, written, like the Debussy music, in the composer's budding days, is fuly of jejune traits.

A musical setting of a Cook's tour for the most part, the most individual note being that sounded in the lyric outburst, entitled "On the Summits," which conveys a suggestion of "Louise," the opera that came many years later. But the audience was left to depart as it came, quietly, still talking about the cold.

Advertisement.

[illegible] DAY
ESTABLISHED 1881
From

The Boston Symphony gives its last concert of the season here in Infantry Hall a week from next Tuesday. Albert Spalding, the violinist, will be the soloist. Mr. Monteux has arranged a programme that will be popular in character. The symphony will be Dvorak's interesting and unique achievement, "From the New World." It was inspired by American negro melodies which the Bohemian composer heard while on a visit to this country. The symphony is particularly famous for its English horn solo in the Largo. The closing number will be Weber's overture, "Der Freischutz."

Mr. Spalding will play Mendelssohn's melodious concerto. This young American violinist made his first public appearance with Patti 15 years ago, when he was just 15 years old. He continued studying for two years with Lefort in Paris, and then made several long concert tours in Italy, France, Germany and Russia. On Oct. 11, 1911, he made his American debut in Carnegie Hall, New York, and has since played in all parts of the world.

At the outbreak of the war he enlisted with the American forces in Italy, being assigned to the Aviation Corps. He served actively at the front for two years, being an observer and bomber in one of the monster Caproni planes. Subsequently he was decorated by the Italian Government, received by the king, and gave several concerts in Rome. He returned to the American concert stage this season.

URDAY, FEBRUARY 28

Herald

16TH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Works by Gluck, Haydn, Debussy and Charpentier Comprise Program

CHORUS OF WOMEN IS WELL TRAINED

By PHILIP HALE

The 16th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Gluck, Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Haydn, Symphony, G major (B. & H. 13); Debussy, "The Blessed Damozel" (Female Chorus trained by Mr. Townsend; Ethel Frank, soprano; Claramond Thompson, contralto); Charpentier, "Impressions of Italy."

There is old music that defies time: as motets of Vittoria, airs of Purcell and Handel, piano pieces of Scarlatti, Couperin and Bach. Gluck's overture was first heard in Paris nearly 150 years ago, yet, even with an inevitable formula of its period, it is still nobly pathetic. We have seen and heard what Richard Strauss did with the story of Electra. One shudders at the thought of what he might do to Iphigenia. It is not necessary to label, as Wagner did, the themes of Gluck. The whole story is in the music: the title is enough; the overture is purely Grecian in its restrained passion, pathetic calm, the suggestion of inexorable Fate.

Haydn's symphony was written for Paris. It is one of his best. Whatever Haydn wrote is conspicuous for careful workmanship; but this symphony was composed with even more than his customary care. Played delightfully, it again made its appeal.

Mr. Monteux gave a very brilliant reading of Charpentier's "Impressions," the most brilliant we have heard; for never before in Boston have the last three movements had so much character. Some of the pages have already lost their freshness: for example, we could spare some in the "Serenade," also in "Naples"—this last movement is long-drawn-out—nor does "At the Fountain" hold firmly the attention; but on the whole, and in spite of the too great influence of Massenet heard here and there, and the occasional touch of vulgarity, the Suite is melodious, agreeable music, skilfully orchestrated, agreeable to the ear. "On the Summits," by reason of Mr. Monteux's interpretation, had a significance not given to it before.

Is the beauty of a famous poem enhanced by music? Mr. Bantock, greatly daring, has set music to the choruses of "Atalanta in Calydon," and there was an Englishman, we forget his highly respectable name, who turned nearly all of Shakespeare's sonnets into songs with piano accompaniment. No wonder that Debussy was fascinated by "The Blessed Damozel." If any one was to choose it for a cantata, he was the man. But does his music emphasize the inherent beauty of the verse? The introduction suggests the proper mood. Charles Lamb thought that Milton should be read after a hearing of organ music. Debussy's orchestral introduction prepares one for reading Rossetti's poem. The orchestral pages are more in the Rossettian mystically sensuous spirit than the measures to be sung; the words of the waiting and longing woman need no music. It is true that the solo singers yesterday were inadequate; but could any singers change the inherent and disappointing character of the music allotted them? One listened with delight to Debussy's orchestra; the chorus of women was heard with pleasure; but while the reciter and the Damozel were at work, there was consolation in the printed text.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows: Berlioz, "Fantastic" Symphony; Malipiero, "Pauses of Silence"; Borodin, "On the Steppes of Central Asia"; Wagner, Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

Feb MUSIC 28

The Music of Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its sixteenth concert of the present season on Feburary 27 with the following program:

Gluck—Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"
Haydn—Symphony in G major
Debussy—"La Damoiselle élue"
Charpentier—"Impressions of Italy"

A chorus of women's voices, Ethel Frank, and Claramond Thompson assisted in the Debussy piece. Frédéric Denayer played the viola solo in the first movement of Charpentier's suite.

This program might well have been entitled "Music of the past and present," although the Haydn symphony would have to be grouped with the music of the present and "La Damoiselle élue" with the music of the past. Debussy's setting of the Rossetti poem sounds strangely unlike the composer of "L'Après Midi d'un Faune," "La Mer" and "Pelléas." There seems not to be the faintest foreshadowing of his later Debussy. Massenet, well di- is the prevailing character of

(Emily Wolf Ferra

CHORUS SINGS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe Feb 28

"Blessed Damozel" Given With Women's Voices

Gluck, Haydn and Charpentier Heard in the Program

The most interesting item in yesterday's Symphony concert was Debussy's setting for female voices and orchestra of Rossetti's familiar lyric poem, "The Blessed Damozel." Although it was performed for the first time at these concerts, it is not new to Boston, for the first performance here was in 1903, and there have been at least three others since then.

"La Demoiselle Elue," with French text by Gabriel Sarrazin, was composed in 1887 as one of the "envois," or duty pieces, expected of every winner of the famous "Prix de Rome." Although the judges looked rather askance at what then seemed its daringly ultra-modern qualities, it seems orthodox enough today, with its suggestions of Wagner's "Tristan," mingled with a tentative use of the type of harmony now associated with Debussy.

The piece is the work of a composer of great imaginative power and strongly marked individuality, who has not quite found himself and disentangled his genius from the influences that helped form it.

The performance was satisfactory and at times brilliant. Mr Townsend as usual had schooled chorus and solo voices with great care and skill, and Mr Monteux is always a sympathetic interpreter of Debussy. The solo parts sung by Ethel Frank and Claramond Thompson suffered somewhat from the nervousness inevitable to novices at Symphony concerts. Miss Frank is a capable singer who has pleased many recital audiences. Miss Thompson has a voice of beautiful quality which one would gladly hear under more favorable circumstances than the few thankless measures allotted her yesterday.

The finest of the other numbers was Gluck's somber and austerely tragic overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis." His music is too seldom heard nowadays. It has far more of the timeless quality of Bach and Beethoven than has Haydn's Symphony in G major, which followed it yesterday.

Mr Monteux too ofter makes 18th century music sound clumsy and flat footed by neglecting the delicate gradations of accent and of tone volume on which its essential grace and delicacy depend. Haydn and Gluck, as well as Mozart, are really immensely difficult to perform properly, though any amateur orchestra is capable of plodding through most of their works.

Charpentier's Italy, in his youthful orchestral "Impressions" of that country, reeks of the opera house. It is effective in a banal and rather cheap manner, but fades into insignificance beside such musical pictures as Berlioz' "Harold in Italy." The performance yesterday lent power to the music, and was largely responsible for the outburst of applause at the end.

From Times
New York City

ORCHESTRAS AFIELD.

Henry F. Gilbert's "The Dance in Place Congo" was recently performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its home city. The music is based on Creole airs, the "Bamboola" and "One, Two, Three, Caroline."

The Chicago Orchestra has produced in the We credited to 20, 1876, a

the date a
Hofmann.

AND HITS—DIRECTION
E WEEK—
"HAMLET" AT THE LYRIC.

poser of the incomparable "Dance of Angels," were to set this poem! Even Debussy of the later years might have found more fitting harmonies and orchestral tints, although it is doubtful if the mysticism of the poem was of a kind with which his nature was entirely sympathetic. Yet it was pleasant to hear the composition, if only by way of comparison with his later style. "Papa" Haydn's symphony was as fresh as on the day when it was written. To be sure, it is comfortable, perhaps superficial music, but so genuine and sincere that although old-fashioned, it will never grow old. Mr. Monteux, an admirer of the modern school, never fails to interpret the music of the eighteenth century with grace and charm, as witness the playing of this symphony as well as that of Mozart's in G minor of last week's program. Charpentier's suite is an example of a poetic idea developed with masterly skill. There have been many compositions portraying Italian life and atmosphere more or less successfully, but few excite the imagination as does this suite, written by a Frenchman. The orchestration is so cleverly contrived and so tastefully varied, the melodic ideas are so fresh—and we might add that the several movements are so tactfully short—that each hearing brings new pleasure. We have always thought that the viola solo in the first number (played behind the scenes) was intended to be a distant echo of the opening theme of the violoncellos. As played yesterday, Mr. Denayer might almost as well have sat in his accustomed place in the orchestra.

Post Feb 28 BOST

DEBUSSY PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

Female Chorus Assists in His "Blessed Damoiselle'

BY OLIN DOWNES

Debussy's "Blessed Damoiselle," after the poem of Rossetti, was performed for the first time at the Boston Symphony concerts yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Mr. Monteux conducting, with Miss Ethel Frank and Miss Claramond Thompson as soprano and contralto soloists, and a female chorus prepared for this concert by Stephen Townsend.

The orchestral compositions were Gluck's superb overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Haydn's G major symphony (Breiotkopf and Hartel number 13), and Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy."

EXQUISITELY FRESH

Debussy's music keeps its exquisite freshness, its pre-Raphaelite beauty. It sounds today prodigiously simple, though it was only a few years ago—in 1905, to be exact—when it sounded very dangerous and strange, and many people hooted one interviewer, who farther-sighted than others, remarked that the day might come when Claude Debussy would seem more original a composer than Richard Strauss—15 years ago, to be exact, and that day has arrived. Debussy is indisputably the more original composer of the two, and there is this happy difference between the early music of Debussy and the early music of some other composers. Debussy's early music remains fresh, exquisitely made, supremely art in its perfection of line and color.

It is not the music of the late Debussy, but it is and will be for many years to come the ineffably beautiful music of a great genius—genius which recalls the line of Edgar Lee Masters: "Genius is wisdom and youth."

Not Well Balanced

Mr. Monteux interpreted this music sympathetically. The chorus had been well prepared, though the balance between voices and orchestra was not always perfect. The entire performance was a little stiff, as it seemed, and it must be confessed that neither of the soloists, intelligently as they performed, were particularly in the vein or over effective under the circumstances.

The feature of the concert, for the writer, was the performance of the noble and dramatic music of Gluck. Mr. Monteux made this music modern without distorting or abusing its classic spirit. He seemed to us to be singularly successful in thus understanding an 18th century composer and his period, yet in presenting this music to his hearers in a way that brought it home with the greatest force to the present generation.

Displays Gluck's Greatness

We have heard performances as respectful, but much colder; performances which left you calm, and saying to yourself, as Mr. Clemenceau is said to have said to himself of the League of Nations, "Now Georges Clemenceau, you do believe in the League of Nations"—so the young man, listening to this music, which his elders had told him was so great, said to himself, "Now George Smith, you do believe in the greatness of Gluck." Yesterday afternoon, he did not merely believe in it. He knew it and felt it in every fibre of his musical being.

The opening of the allegro was of prodigious portent, grand, austere, ominous of tragedy and of Fate that gods themselves might not disobey. The recall the tenderness, the noble melancholy, the melancholy that brings to mind the name of "Niobe," in the responses of strings and wind instruments in the passage which Wagner described as expressing "agonizing pity." It was fully apparant that neither Wagner nor Berlioz, in their day, overrated the genius of Gluck.

Haydn's Symphony

The playing of Haydn's symphony was spirited, robustious, if not as clear and transparent in tone qualities as other performances have been. The slow movement was beautifully sung, and the performance of the scherzo, with the humorously discordant notes in the trio, was delightful. In the playing of "Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy" there was occasion to admire the tone of Mr. Denayer, of Mr. Bedetti and other instrumentalists of the orchestra. Yet it must be said that this music, melodious, sincere, tuneful, vulgar with the refreshing vulgarity of the so-called "common people," is aging. The opening "Serenade," the movement "On Mule-back" and some pages of the finale were freshest to the writer's ear yesterday; but music has to be built of the most marvellously durable material to sound well in the ears of even two successive generations.

Romain Rolland expressed it happily when he said that of all the arts, mu- the first to consume itself

Feb 28

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

SYMPHONY CONCERT, SYMPHON QUARREL

A Tranquil Yesterday with Debussy, Haydn, Gluck and Charpentier to Busy Conductor, Orchestra and Audience—A Perturbed Today with an Organized Union Ready to Confer with the Trustees—The Harvard Glee Club Puts Even Kreisler in Second Place

THOUGH nearly every tongue in Symphony Hall wagged yesterday afternoon with the controversy between the members and the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra, the concert itself betrayed not a hint of it. Mr. Monteux, holding wisely aloof from the whole quarrel, had prepared and practiced the programme as though all concerned were as tranquilly minded as he seemed. The men, as if to give individual and collective proof of their regard for the high standards of the band, played at the top of their bent. An assisting chorus of women added to interest and pleasure, chosen by Mr. Townsend with his usual flair for bright, clear, supple voices, trained by him to precision and plasticity, ease and understanding with the music in hand. Assisting solo-singers—Miss Frank and Miss Thompson—were less fortunately chosen, far less well prepared for their considerable task. In measure, perhaps, their awkward and expressionless song accounted for the cool applause that their hearers returned to Debussy's setting for orchestra and women's voices of Rossetti's poem, "The Blessed Damozel." Perhaps, again, it is not a piece advisedly included in a Symphony Concert.

Once the orchestra has made way through the prelude, it has only to weave the fine web of atmosphere and suggestion, detail by detail, above and through which should shimmer the singing voices. The chorus gained this luminosity and suavity, this soft glitter and delicate sensibility of tone. The solo-singers fell far short of such virtue, and theirs, after all, is the major part of the music. Heard, imagined apart from the chance circumstances of the day, it has the iridescent loveliness of a web of gauze spread over the poem, threaded into it. Yet the soft glow, the clear transparencies, the gentle progress, the finely chiselled detail, the whole atmosphere of remote and mystical scene, of idealized and semi-mystical emotion in tones are but reflections of Rossetti's animating and coloring verse. That verse strikes the human note. Recall the line that melts the heart; "All this is when he comes." Remember the gentle pride of the avowal to Mary, the warm petition to Christ the Lord. Debussy's music turns the Damozel to bright phantom, disembodies her vision and her longing. More than to the music the hearer makes answer to the poem and little does the music prompt him.

Before Debussy, contrasting ancients of music had their inning—Gluck with the overture to his opera, "Iphigenia in Aulis," Haydn with a little symphony in G major. Once more the overture proved that scant expressive means as we regard them nowadays, thin harmonic and instrumental dress as it seems in 1920, and eighteenth-century formulas in alternation of matter and mood, may still summon the passion and the illusion of the tragedy of Agamemnon's daughter. Enough that in the composer is the creative imagination and passion to compass them—and defy the years. In such music of the theatre Mr. Monteux is almost unfailingly eloquent; but in another vein he and the orchestra surpassed themselves. Not before in ventures into eighteenth-century symphonies have they gained the fleetness of pace, the lightness of accent, the flow of melodic line, the grace of ornament, the brightness of rhythm with which they set Haydn's music to singing, dancing, smiling and sporting anew. A feat in little, it is true, but a difficult feat and a feat well and truly done. Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy," big as they seem beside the little symphony, are twice as easy to set sounding. When they were newer than they are today, it was the custom to believe them graphic and imaginative tone-pictures—the twang of the midnight serenade, the rattle and blaze of Naples in fete, the tinkling mule-train ascending the mountain, the still girls by the fountain, the pulsing glow of talian landscape, pulsing also in the heart of the poet. Now not much is left but a thick and theatrical musical rhetoric, "effective" enough in the trite sense of the word. Long since the music-drama of "Louise" proved Charpentier man of the theatre. By the same token the Italy of his suite is the Italy that used to be painted on drop-curtains.

Chorus Assists at Symphony Concert

adv. Feb 29

By E. F. HARKINS.

Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis".....Gluck
Symphony in G major.....Haydn
"The Blessed Damozel," lyric poem...Debussy
Suite, "Impressions of Italy".....Charpentier

NO novelty on this sixteenth Symphony program—unless there were some present who are content with the odd conservatism governing Symphony programs and have consequently waited all these years to hear Debussy's setting of "The Blessed Damozel," the poem by Dante Gabriel Rossetti.

Inveterate concertgoers had heard his ethereal music long before—several times, in fact. Rossetti's picture of the fair lady who leaned out from the gold bar of Heaven, waiting for her lover—who did not come, or else passed her by—is a tone poem of itself. Its euphony and mystic imagery are well framed by Debussy.

The music, like the poem, is vapory until near the close; then it rises to emotional heights. Miss Ethel Frank, who sang the music of the lady of the seven-starred hair, missed this emotional climax, her voice being submerged in the great orchestral surge worked up by Mr. Monteux. Otherwise she sang acceptably.

Miss Claramond Thompson sang the part of the Narrator. A female chorus trained by Stephen S. Townsend also assisted, its efforts being worthy of comparison with those of the orchestra.

The audience rightly found this and all the other music on the program diverting but not exciting. The Gluck and Haydn selections, though both well interpreted, left the same impressions—grace with vigor, and then more of the same. The Charpentier suite, written, like the Debussy music, in the composer's budding days, is fuly of jejune traits.

A musical setting of a Cook's tour for the most part, the most individual note being that sounded in the lyric outburst, entitled "On the Summits," which conveys a suggestion of "Louise," the opera that came many years later. But the audience was left to depart as it came, quietly, still talking about the cold.

Advertisement.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From

The Boston Symphony gives its last concert of the season here in Infantry Hall a week from next Tuesday. Albert Spalding, the violinist, will be the soloist. Mr. Monteux has arranged a programme that will be popular in character. The symphony will be Dvorak's interesting and unique achievement, "From the New World." It was inspired by American negro melodies which the Bohemian composer heard while on a visit to this country. The symphony is particularly famous for its English horn solo in the Largo. The closing number will be Weber's overture, "Der Freischutz."

Mr. Spalding will play Mendelssohn's melodious concerto. This young American violinist made his first public appearance with Patti 15 years ago, when he was just 15 years old. He continued studying for two years with Lefort in Paris, and then made several long concert tours in Italy, France, Germany and Russia. On Oct. 11, 1911, he made his American debut in Carnegie Hall, New York, and has since played in all parts of the world.

At the outbreak of the war he enlisted with the American forces in Italy, being assigned to the Aviation Corps. He served actively at the front for two years, being an observer and bomber in one of the monster Caproni planes. Subsequently he was decorated by the Italian Government, received by the king, and gave several concerts in Rome. He returned to the American concert stage this season.

EVADING THE DRAFT LAW, AND H

SYMPHONY GIVES 17TH CONCERT

Ovation Acclaims Greatest Success Achieved in Thirty Years

FRADKIN INCIDENT MARS PROGRAM

By PHILIP HALE

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Berlioz, Fantastic Symphony; Malipiero, "Pauses of Silence"; Borodin, "On the Steppes of Central Asia"; Wagner, overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

When Mr. Monteux came on the platform he was greeted with extraordinarily hearty and prolonged applause.

After a brilliant performance of the symphony—a performance that has not been equalled here for 30 years; that has been approached only by the one given by a visiting orchestra led by Mr. Weingartner in Symphony Hall, Mr. Monteux was, naturally, recalled. He was recalled again. He then invited the orchestra to share in the applause. All stood, except Mr. Fredric Fradkin, the concert master. Whatever personal disagreement there may be between the conductor and the concert master—the reports published in the newspapers have been exaggerated and evidently one-sided—the platform of Symphony Hall is not in the course of a Symphony concert the place to air a real or fancied grievance. Mr. Fradkin, by not rising with the others, acted discourteously toward the applauding audience. When he left the stage for the intermission many in the audience hissed him for his rudeness. When he returned some, especially in the second balcony, applauded; there was also hissing; some in the orchestra were so tactless, not to say discourteous, toward the audience, as to join in the applause. Mr. Fradkin had the assurance to stand up this time. He bowed to the audience and the orchestra.

As soon as Mr. Monteux reappeared there was a mighty counter-demonstration. The applause was enthusiastic; it grew louder and louder until the great audience stood for some time, clapping hands vigorously; there was also cheering. Mr. Monteux then went on with the concert.

It was a deplorable scene. Nothing like it had happened in the history of the orchestra. May nothing like it happen again! No player, before yesterday, had allowed personal feeling to overcome him so as to forget the observance of common courtesy toward men and women that were generous in their support and in their appreciation of the orchestra to which he belonged.

This symphony is an amazing work; not only because it was first played 90 years ago when Beethoven had not been dead four years and young Wagner was studying at Leipsic; not only because in orchestration it was a revelation; it is amazing today by reason of the wild imagination, the flaming romanticism, the audacities in musical thought and musical expression. If Berlioz had not lived, the men that came after him, Wagner included, would have been obliged to work out painfully their own orchestral salvation. The influence of this genius, a man practically self-taught, a master of no instrument, brilliant as critic and essayist, a poet when writing a treatise on instrumentation, profoundly unhappy, unappreciated in his own city until long after his death, a self-torturer; the influence of this man is still felt throughout the musical world.

After the scene that has been described, the audience was hardly in a quietly receptive mood, yet there was again wonder at the moods of Malipiero's "expressions," music that 50 years from now may be to hearers as simple as Haydn's is now to us; there was enjoyment of Borodin's Sketch and Wagner's engrossing overture.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Mendelssohn, Overture, Nocturne and Scherzo from his music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Loeffler, "A Pagan Poem" (piano, Mr. Gebhard, English horn, Mr. Speyer); Glazounoff, Symphony No. 6, C minor.

THE SYMPHONY
BY OLIN DOWNES

A programme which bore testimony again to Mr. Monteux's catholicity of of taste and appreciation of many different kinds of music was given at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. It commenced with Berlioz's symphony, so audacious, so poetic, so prophetic of modern developments, the "Symphonic Fatastique," a work, bear in mind, of the 1830's. There followed Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence," a work by a modern composer of remarkable talent, heard once before at this concert, and gaining by repetition; Borodin's oriental "Steppe-Sketch from Middle Asia," and Richard Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture.

BERLIOZ'S SYMPHONY

Mr. Monteux's performance of the Berlioz Symphony was one which made the music rarely coherent and significant in its thematic developments and inter-relations, and the last movement was extremely brilliant. Not in many seasons had it been so effective. Elsewhere one wished at times for greater extremes a la Berlioz, between very soft and madly loud, for a treatment a little more temperamental. Taken all in all the music made a deep impression—one not wholly effaced by even the gross and uncalled-for discourtesy to conductor and audience on the part of the concert master.

Most surprising of all was the music of Malipiero, introduced here for the first time, if we remember rightly, by Mr. Rabaud. This music is ultra-modern in texture, harmonically very original and very new, and mystifying in its title and even mood. "The Pauses of Silence"! What does this mean? The singular thing is that one does not care particularly what it means, and that the music is curiously satisfying. Most music seems, after all, to be artificially made. It comes somewhere near what the listener wants, but really it seems only a partial or approximate expression of beauty.

If you have ever seen a sunset and then tried to reproduce the harmony on the walls of your room, you have had an experience something like the experience of the sensibilities, even when quite great music is heard. Now this music of Malipiero seems to be the exact equivalent, or tonal embodiment, of sounds heard by the soul of the ear, and greatly desired by that soul. It is music of a new subtlety, a new psychology, but at the same time it is naive and spontaneous. By virtue of supreme craftsmanship, ease and finish of expression, and an introvertible originality of the part of the composer, it has succeeded in being true and natural. Its best claim to recognition lies possibly in the very fact that it cannot be explained, or clearly described, or understood in any terms but the terms of music itself. It is very pure and absolute music.

MUSIC

The Music of Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its seventeenth concert on March 5 with the following program:

Berlioz. "Fantastic" Symphony.
Malipiero. "Pauses of Silence."
Borodin. "On the Steppes of Central Asia."
Wagner. Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

An afternoon of romantic music, yet of great variety. Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony, save for occasional episodes, still stirs the imagination. Its orchestral colors are fresh. The composer's inventive skill, when compared with the practices of the greater number of his contemporaries, is a marvel. Genius lurks in every measure. Mr. Monteux's reading of the symphony was authoritative. Trained in the Paris tradition under the great Colonne, his interpretation was full of fire and feeling. It was conceived in the "grand manner" which this music so imperatively calls for. Even the melodramatic, swaggering of certain pages seemed sincere and convincing.

Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence" was played here for the first time last season. Then the work excited interest because of its strange orchestral effects, its extreme harmonic idiom, its general novelty. According to Henry Prunières (quoted in the program book), "One is not able to hear this singular composition without a sort of awful horror," an opinion in which we heartily concur. Upon a second hearing, this composition furnishes ample proof that harmonic and orchestral effects, whose sole appeal is their novelty, are no longer interesting once their novelty is gone. There are other elements required to make a composition of lasting worth.

In the last movement of the "Fantastic" symphony the score calls for two bells and six pianofortes. Needless to say that the six pianos were not present, yet this calls to mind Mr. Salzédo's prediction of a harp section in the orchestra consisting of 35 harps. The effectiveness of the piano in the modern orchestra has not been great. Will some venturesome composer dare to introduce a pianoforte section? Having heard seven harps, we tremble to think of 35, but add to this six or more pianos! Berlioz should have reflected before writing those words.

Unless many a civil jest and [illegible] reports are mistaken, more than one ber of the Symphony Orchestra ha terday and today seen a light. How they are minded in the present quarrel, they have discovered that discipline and decency are still to prevail in the conduct of the band toward the public.

There is little need to recall in detail the incidents of the afternoon, which will make a strange page in the records of the Symphony Concerts. They befell before and after the intermission; in that quarter hour hundreds of tongues rang with them; and for the rest of the day they quite overclouded music and performance. At the Opera House last evening, they were repeated bye and bye, and large. Today the town spurts with them. Briefly they ran in this wise. Mr. Monteux, coming to his place at the beginning of the concert, was received with significantly long and loud applause as though the audience would approve his poise and procedure through the present controversy. He and the orchestra with him recalled Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" to such musical, pictorial and romantic life as it has not known in years in Bostonian ears. Sincere, hearty and insistent applause rewarded the conductor once and twice. At the second recall he bade the orchestra, according to custom, rise in its place to share and acknowledge the plaudits it had helped to win. Fradkin remained obstinately and ostentatiously in his chair. There were sharp hisses; there were renewed clappings for Mr. Monteux and the rest of the band. Then the intermission and the usual departure of conductor and men.

When the players returned, Fradkin, lingering until most of them had resumed their places, obviously courted the attention of the audience. A few hands in the second balcony clapped; more hands in the orchestra itself, especially among the minor strings, joined with them. In measure, deliberate indiscipline prompted this applause; in measure, it sprang from childish irritation at the mood of an audience altogether in sympathy with Mr. Monteux. With elaborate vanity, Fradkin bowed to his partisans on the stage and to his partisans in the auditorium. He was scarcely in his seat before Mr. Monteux returned, lifted, almost, to his platform by a flood of applause that swept from one end of Symphony Hall to the other. Many stood; cries and cheers rose above the din of hands. For once an American audience, a Bostonian audience "manifested" and beyond mistake of purpose or doubt of sincerity. The rebellious in the orchestra had their answer; the trustees received their spur. Within a few hours the salutary consequences began to be written—for beginning.

There was no reflection of these disturbances in the playing of the orchestra; indeed, from first to last, the concert was one of unusual brilliance. Mr. Monteux's reading of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" surpassed any that has been heard here, except perhaps, Mr. Weingartner's. The dramatic nature of the music tempted his better qualities, and he rose to it as he has to perhaps nothing during his stay among us. Despite its occasional ineptness and the absurdly romantic programme which inspired it, this Symphony remains one of the miracles of the art; both because of its amazing eloquence after ninety years and by reason of its entire independence of all previous and contemporary music. It is easier to imagine that it was written yesterday than it is to believe that it was composed but three years after the death of Beethoven. Except for the picturesque piping of the shepherds, the "Scene in the Meadows" now seems somewhat futile, tenuous and over long, and it is hard to take the clap-trap of the last movement seriously. But in the "March to the Scaffold" and at the end, the usually reticent Mr. Monteux was as one possessed, and it is easy to understand the applause which led to such disastrous consequences.

Malipiero's Seven Symphonic Expressions, "Pauses of Silence," were played here for the first time by Mr. Rabaud. On a second hearing the music seems less strange, and also less remarkable. Some writer on music once remarked, quite unjustly, that Sgambati was an Italian who had sold his birthright, melody. It is interesting to speculate on what he would have thought of Malipiero. The music rivets the attention, but there is little that can be carried away in recollection save biting and acid harmonies, bizarre instrumental effects and tortured melodic phrases. Between Malipiero and Wagner's Overture to the Flying Dutchman, which ended the concert, stood Borodin's Orchestral Sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia." To read the composer's explanatory preface before hearing the piece is to experience disappointment, as the music gives but faint suggestion of its programme. The two melodies are striking in themselves; the Oriental song, which typifies the advancing caravan, is fascinatingly exotic, but in company with Berlioz and Wagner, and even Malipiero, Borodin's music was no more than a pleasing interlude.

It was good to hear again the Flying Dutchman Overture, which served as a fitting conclusion to the concert. The performance was effective, although other conductors have better suggested the music's wildness and elemental breadth. Its compelling eloquence again prompted the reflection that Wagner at his best stands apart from all other composers in the beauty, vitality and validity of his ideas, and in their perfect expression.

From

The chief musical event of [illegible] week will be the concert next Tues night by the Boston Symphony Orch tra, the following programme hav been arranged by Mr. Monteux: Sy phony No. 1, in C-minor, op. 68; "On t Steppes of Central Asia," Orchest Sketches, op. 27; Concerto for violoncel in D-major, Haydn; Overture to "T Flying Dutchman," Wagner.

Jean Bedetti, the eminent French vi loncellist and leader of the orchestra 'cello se tion, will be the soloist. H beautiful tone and high skill have be doubtless discernible to Providence co certgoers this season. Mr. Bedetti ca to this country last autumn, having a tained a remarkable reputation as a v tuoso abroad. He took first prize at Paris Conservatory in 1902, and in became first 'cellist with the Op Comique Orchestra. Four years later joined the Colonne Orchestra, playing different times under Colonne, Pierne a Monteux. He played in several chamb music ensembles, and gave his own citals in a number of French cities, a in Spain, Belgium, Switzerland and Er land. He has lately appeared as solo with the orchestra in concerts in Bo ton. During the war he served for months at the front, joining the Fren forces Aug. 2, 1914.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From MAR -5 192[illegible] A

Jean Bedetti

The last Boston Symphony cert of the season but one, given in Infantry Hall next Tue evening, will be notable in the pearance of Jean Bedetti, Fra greatest 'cellist, who will Haydn's Concerto in D-major the orchestra. The same concert be further interesting in that P Monteux will conduct the fam First Symphony of Brahms in minor. By the eloquence of many voices and the dramatic po of its broader lines this mas piece has become a favorite of time. The remainder of the p gramme traverses Borodin's dese tive orchestral sketch, "On Steppes of Central Asia," and W ner's rousing Overture to "The F ing Dutchman."

ESTABLISHED 1881

From MAR - 6 1920 A

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TO INCLUDE NOTED 'CELLI

Jean Bedetti and Work by Brahms to Feature Programme Tuesday

The last Boston Symphony concert the season but one, to be given in I fantry Hall next Tuesday evening, w be notable in the appearance of Jea Bedetti, said to be France's greate 'cellist, who will play Haydn's Co certo in D-major with the orchestra.

Bedetti served actively at the Frenc front for 18 months. He has played a first 'cellist in the Opera Comique o Paris and the Colonee Orchestra, an as a virtuoso has given his own r citals throughout Europe.

Brahm's famous First Symphony in C minor will be conducted by Pierre Mont eux. The remainder of the programm includes Borodin's descriptive orchestra sketch, "On the Steppes of Centra Asia," and Wagner's rousing overture t "The Flying Dutchman."

From

MAR - 6 192[illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TO INCLUDE NOTED 'CELLIST

Jean Bedetti and Work by Brahms to Feature Programme Tuesday.

The last Boston Symphony concert o the season but one, to be given in In fantry Hall next Tuesday evening, will be notable in the appearance of Jean Bedetti, said to be France's greatest 'cellist, who will play Haydn's Concerto in D-major with the orchestra.

Bedetti served actively at the French front for 18 months. He has played as first 'cellist in the Opera Comique of Paris and the Colonee Orchestra, and as a virtuoso has given his own recitals throughout Europe.

Brahm's famous First Symphony in C-minor will be conducted by Pierre Monteux. The remainder of the programme includes Borodin's descriptive orchestral sketch, "On the Steppes of Centra Asia," and Wagner's rousing overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

RTISER, MARCH 7, 19

CONCERT IS MEMORABLE

Symphony's Performance of Berlioz's Work Is Warmly Applauded

By E. F. HARKINS.

Symphony patrons will long remember the concert of Friday afternoon. After an extraordinarily brilliant performance of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," there was a spontaneous outburst of enthusiasm from the audience, and, at a signal from Pierre Monteaux, the conductor, every member of the orchestra arose except Concertmaster Frederic Fradkin. Thereupon the plaudits were mingled with hisses—the first hisses probably ever heard at a Symphony concert.

Demonstrations and counter-demonstrations marking the conflict between Monteaux and Fradkin and the public sympathy for and against the union movement in the orchestra, vied with superb performances of the Berlioz masterpiece and Wagner's 'Flying Dutchman" overture to make this seventeenth "rehearsal" one of the most impressive events in the history of Boston's great orchestra.

The wonder is that amid such mental stress as the conductor and his men were under all through the matinee they could rise to such musical heights as were seldom reached before, even at the memorable Wagner concerts conducted by Muck.

For the demonstrations began as soon as Mr. Monteux made his first appearance. Yet, notwithstanding this show of sympathy for the conductor, in which the majority of those present joined, the players fairly excelled themselves. For them and for the conductor both it was a sheer triumph of artistry over controversy. This continued so even after the players themselves showed a division in their

Rev. Mar 6 [illegible]

20

MONTEUX GIVES BERLIOZ NUMBER

Mr. Monteux's exceptionally brilliant reading of the Berlioz Fantastic Symphony and the surprising display by Fredric Fradkin, concertmaster, of his feeling toward Mr. Monteux, by not rising, when bidden, in recognition of the applause of the audience following the symphony, were the features of yesterday afternoon's symphony concert.

The presentation of the Berlioz number rivalled the best in the history of the orchestra. Fortunately, it was enjoyed before "the scene," for that rather spoiled the rest of the concert for the audience. The concert will be repeated tonight.

BOSTON EVENING

SYMPHONY CONCERT

AN AFTERNOON THAT CLEARED THE AIR

Fradkin Affronts Audience and Conductor and, Within a Few Hours, Pays Just Penalty—The Trustees and Mr. Monteux Learn the Temper of Their Public—"Manifestations" New and Strange in the Records of the Orchestra—Incidental Music and Eloquent Performance

THE only possible answer to the untoward episodes yesterday afternoon at the Symphony Concert is written in the letter of the trustees of the orchestra, summarily and sharply dismissing Frederic Fradkin as concert-master for gross breach of discipline and grosser affront to the audience. Wisely, the letter was despatched within a few hours after those incidents had put to shame the present and the past of the Symphony Concerts and made known as promptly to a public clearly resenting them. Better still, it contains not a hesitation or reservation. At last the trustees seem ready to make an end of the mounting indiscipline within the orchestra and to face whatever consequences the restoration of order and obligation may bring. It was high time. There has been much and reasonable mistrust of their seeming dalliance, however necessitated by undisclosed circumstance, with a situation needing to be gripped and broken; while by every discoverable sign, in and out of Symphony Hall, the public of the Symphony Concerts applauds and sustains their present resolution, will join with them in the meeting of the consequences. Tame submission to such things as befell yesterday would be far worse in continuing and sapping outcome than even a temporary suspension of the Symphony Concerts (though no such event impends) and a clearance of the disaffected from the orchestra itself.

For Mr. Fradkin, now plainly uneasy under the consequences of his follies, there is hardly an extenuating circumstance, however apologetic he now feigns to be. For days past, as his outgivings to the press have proved, he has been as a man beside himself with the vanities and the insolences of a fictitious self-importance. Long since he lost all sense of the actualities of his place in the orchestra, of the decencies of his conduct toward the public. His following in the orchestra, in equal heat and blindness of folly, a few foolish partisans in the audience of Friday afternoon have done the rest. Whatever may next befall at Symphony Hall, the air is at last cleared and decision has timely replaced indecision.

EVADING THE DRAFT LAW, AND HI

SYMPHONY GIVES 17TH CONCERT

Ovation Acclaims Greatest Success Achieved in Thirty Years

FRADKIN INCIDENT MARS PROGRAM

By PHILIP HALE

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Berlioz, Fantastic Symphony; Malipiero, "Pauses of Silence"; Borodin, "On the Steppes of Central Asia"; Wagner, overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

When Mr. Monteux came on the platform he was greeted with extraordinarily hearty and prolonged applause.

After a brilliant performance of the symphony—a performance that has not been equalled here for 30 years; that has been approached only by the one given by a visiting orchestra led by Mr. Weingartner in Symphony Hall, Mr. Monteux was, naturally, recalled. He was recalled again. He then invited the orchestra to share in the applause. All stood, except Mr. Fredric Fradkin, the concert master. Whatever personal disagreement there may be between the conductor and the concert master—the reports published in the newspapers have been exaggerated and evidently one-sided—the platform of Symphony Hall is not in the course of a Symphony concert the place to air a real or fancied grievance. Mr. Fradkin, by not rising with the others, acted discourteously toward the applauding audience. When he left the stage for the intermission many in the audience hissed him for his rudeness. When he returned some, especially in the second balcony, applauded; there was also hissing; some in the orchestra were so tactless, not to say discourteous, toward the audience, as to join in the applause. Mr. Fradkin had the assurance to stand up this time. He bowed to the audience and the orchestra.

As soon as Mr. Monteux reappeared there was a mighty counter-demonstration. The applause was enthusiastic; it grew louder and louder until the great audience stood for some time, clapping hands vigorously; there was also cheering. Mr. Monteux then went on with the concert.

It was a deplorable scene. Nothing like it had happened in the history of the orchestra. May nothing like it happen again! No player, before yesterday, had allowed personal feeling to overcome him so as to forget the observance of common courtesy toward men and women that were generous in their support and in their appreciation of the orchestra to which he belonged.

This symphony is an amazing work; not only because it was first played 90 years ago when Beethoven had not been dead four years and young Wagner was studying at Leipsic; not only because in orchestration it was a revelation; it is amazing today by reason of the wild imagination, the flaming romanticism, the audacities in musical thought and musical expression. If Berlioz had not lived, the men that came after him, Wagner included, would have been obliged to work out painfully their own orchestral salvation. The influence of this genius, a man practically self-taught, a master of no instrument, brilliant as critic and essayist, a poet when writing a treatise on instrumentation, profoundly unhappy, unappreciated in his own city until long after his death, a self-torturer; the influence of this man is still felt throughout the musical world.

After the scene that has been described, the audience was hardly in a quietly receptive mood, yet there was again wonder at the moods of Malipiero's "expressions," music that 50 years from now may be to hearers as simple as Haydn's is now to us; there was enjoyment of Borodin's Sketch and Wagner's engrossing overture.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Mendelssohn, Overture, Nocturne and Scherzo from his music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Loeffler, "A Pagan Poem" (piano, Mr. Gebhard, English horn, Mr. Speyer); Glazounoff, Symphony No. 6, C minor.

THE SYMPHONY
BY OLIN DOWNES

A programme which bore testimony again to Mr. Monteux's catholicity of of taste and appreciation of many different kinds of music was given at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. It commenced with Berlioz's symphony, so audacious, so poetic, so prophetic of modern developments, the "Symphonic Fatastique," a work, bear in mind, of the 1830's. There followed Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence," a work by a modern composer of remarkable talent, heard once before at this concert, and gaining by repetition; Borodin's oriental "Steppe-Sketch from Middle Asia," and Richard Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture.

BERLIOZ'S SYMPHONY

Mr. Monteux's performance of the Berlioz Symphony was one which made the music rarely coherent and significant in its thematic developments and inter-relations, and the last movement was extremely brilliant. Not in many seasons had it been so effective. Elsewhere one wished at times for greater extremes a la Berlioz, between very soft and madly loud, for a treatment a little more temperamental. Taken all in all the music made a deep impression—one not wholly effaced by even the gross and uncalled-for discourtesy to conductor and audience on the part of the concert master.

Most surprising of all was the music of Malipiero, introduced here for the first time, if we remember rightly, by Mr. Rabaud. This music is ultra-modern in texture, harmonically very original and very new, and mystifying in its title and even mood. "The Pauses of Silence"! What does this mean? The singular thing is that one does not care particularly what it means, and that the music is curiously satisfying. Most music seems, after all, to be artificially made. It comes somewhere near what the listener wants, but really it seems only a partial or approximate expression of beauty.

If you have ever seen a sunset and then tried to reproduce the harmony on the walls of your room, you have had an experience something like the experience of the sensibilities, even when quite great music is heard. Now this music of Malipiero seems to be the exact equivalent, or tonal embodiment, of sounds heard by the soul of the ear, and greatly desired by that soul. It is music of a new subtlety, a new psychology, but at the same time it is naive and spontaneous. By virtue of supreme craftsmanship, ease and finish of expression, and an introvertible originality of the part of the composer, it has succeeded in being true and natural. Its best claim to recognition lies possibly in the very fact that it cannot be explained, or clearly described, or understood in any terms but the terms of music itself. It is very pure and absolute music.

MUSIC

The Music of Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its seventeenth concert on March 5 with the following program:

Berlioz. "Fantastic" Symphony.
Malipiero. "Pauses of Silence."
Borodin. "On the Steppes of Central Asia."
Wagner. Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

An afternoon of romantic music, yet of great variety. Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony, save for occasional episodes, still stirs the imagination. Its orchestral colors are fresh. The composer's inventive skill, when compared with the practices of the greater number of his contemporaries, is a marvel. Genius lurks in every measure. Mr. Monteux's reading of the symphony was authoritative. Trained in the Paris tradition under the great Colonne, his interpretation was full of fire and feeling. It was conceived in the "grand manner" which this music so imperatively calls for. Even the melodramatic, swaggering of certain pages seemed sincere and convincing.

Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence" was played here for the first time last season. Then the work excited interest because of its strange orchestral effects, its extreme harmonic idiom, its general novelty. According to Henry Prunières (quoted in the program book), "One is not able to hear this singular composition without a sort of awful horror," an opinion in which we heartily concur. Upon a second hearing, this composition furnishes ample proof that harmonic and orchestral effects, whose sole appeal is their novelty, are no longer interesting once their novelty is gone. There are other elements required to make a composition of lasting worth.

In the last movement of the "Fantastic" symphony the score calls for two bells and six pianofortes. Needless to say that the six pianos were not present, yet this calls to mind Mr. Salzédo's prediction of a harp section in the orchestra consisting of 35 harps. The effectiveness of the piano in the modern orchestra has not been great. Will some venturesome composer dare to introduce a pianoforte section? Having heard seven harps, we tremble to think of 35, but add to this six or more pianos! Berlioz should have reflected before writing those words.

Unless many a high falls and hot ng reports are mistaken, more than one ber of the Symphony Orchestra ha terday and today seen a light. How they are minded in the present quarrel, they have discovered that discipline and decency are still to prevail in the conduct of the band toward the public.

There is little need to recall in detail the incidents of the afternoon, which will make a strange page in the records of the Symphony Concerts. They befell before and after the intermission; in that quarter hour hundreds of tongues rang with them; and for the rest of the day they quite overclouded music and performance. At the Opera House last evening, they were repeated bye and large. Today the town spurts with them. Briefly they ran in this wise. Mr. Monteux, coming to his place at the beginning of the concert, was received with significantly long and loud applause as though the audience would approve his poise and procedure through the present controversy. He and the orchestra with him recalled Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" to such musical, pictorial and romantic life as it has not known in years in Bostonian ears. Sincere, hearty and insistent applause rewarded the conductor once and twice. At the second recall he bade the orchestra, according to custom, rise in its place to share and acknowledge the plaudits it had helped to win. Fradkin remained obstinately and ostentatiously in his chair. There were sharp hisses; there were renewed clappings for Mr. Monteux and the rest of the band. Then the intermission and the usual departure of conductor and men.

When the players returned, Fradkin, lingering until most of them had resumed their places, obviously courted the attention of the audience. A few hands in the second balcony clapped; more hands in the orchestra itself, especially among the minor strings, joined with them. In measure, deliberate indiscipline prompted this applause; in measure, it sprang from childish irritation at the mood of an audience altogether in sympathy with Mr. Monteux. With elaborate vanity, Fradkin bowed to his partisans on the stage and to his partisans in the auditorium. He was scarcely in his seat before Mr. Monteux returned, lifted, almost, to his platform by a flood of applause that swept from one end of Symphony Hall to the other. Many stood; cries and cheers rose above the din of hands. For once an American audience, a Bostonian audience "manifested" and beyond mistake of purpose or doubt of sincerity. The rebellious in the orchestra had their answer; the trustees received their spur. Within a few hours the salutary consequences began to be written—for beginning.

There was no reflection of these disturbances in the playing of the orchestra; indeed, from first to last, the concert was one of unusual brilliance. Mr. Monteux's reading of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" surpassed any that has been heard here, except perhaps, Mr. Weingartner's. The dramatic nature of the music tempted his better qualities, and he rose to it as he has to perhaps nothing during his stay among us. Despite its occasional ineptness and the absurdly romantic programme which inspired it, this Symphony remains one of the miracles of the art; both because of its amazing eloquence after ninety years and by reason of its entire independence of all previous and contemporary music. It is easier to imagine that it was written yesterday than it is to believe that it was composed but three years after the death of Beethoven. Except for the picturesque piping of the shepherds, the "Scene in the Meadows" now seems somewhat futile, tenuous and over long, and it is hard to take the clap-trap of the last movement seriously. But in the "March to the Scaffold" and at the end, the usually reticent Mr. Monteux was as one possessed, and it is easy to understand the applause which led to such disastrous consequences.

Malipiero's Seven Symphonic Expressions, "Pauses of Silence," were played here for the first time by Mr. Rabaud. On a second hearing the music seems less strange, and also less remarkable. Some writer on music once remarked, quite unjustly, that Sgambati was an Italian who had sold his birthright, melody. It is interesting to speculate on what he would have thought of Malipiero. The music rivets the attention, but there is little that can be carried away in recollection save biting and acid harmonies, bizarre instrumental effects and tortured melodic phrases. Between Malipiero and Wagner's Overture to the Flying Dutchman, which ended the concert, stood Borodin's Orchestral Sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia." To read the composer's explanatory preface before hearing the piece is to experience disappointment, as the music gives but faint suggestion of its programme. The two melodies are striking in themselves; the Oriental song, which typifies the advancing caravan, is fascinatingly exotic, but in company with Berlioz and Wagner, and even Malipiero, Borodin's music was no more than a pleasing interlude.

It was good to hear again the Flying Dutchman Overture, which served as a fitting conclusion to the concert. The performance was effective, although other conductors have better suggested the music's wildness and elemental breadth. Its compelling eloquence again prompted the reflection that Wagner at his best stands apart from all other composers in the beauty, vitality and validity of his ideas, and in their perfect expression.

From

The chief musical event of t week will be the concert next Tuesda night by the Boston Symphony Orche tra, the following programme havi been arranged by Mr. Monteux: Sy phony No. 1, in C-minor, op. 68; "On t Steppes of Central Asia." Orchest Sketches, op. 27; Concerto for violoncell in D-major, Haydn; Overture to "T Flying Dutchman," Wagner.

Jean Bedetti, the eminent French vi loncellist and leader of the orchestra 'cello se tion, will be the soloist. H beautiful tone and high skill have be doubtless discernible to Providence co certgoers this season. Mr. Bedetti ca to this country last autumn, having a tained a remarkable reputation as a v tuoso abroad. He took first prize at Paris Conservatory in 1902, and in became first 'cellist with the Op Comique Orchestra. Four years later joined the Colonne Orchestra, playing different times under Colonne, Pierne a Monteux. He played in several chamb music ensembles, and gave his own citals in a number of French cities, a in Spain, Belgium, Switzerland and En land. He has lately appeared as solo with the orchestra in concerts in Bo ton. During the war he served for months at the front, joining the Fren forces Aug. 2, 1914.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From

Jean Bedetti

The last Boston Symphony cert of the season but one, t given in Infantry Hall next Tue evening, will be notable in the pearance of Jean Bedetti, Fra greatest 'cellist, who will Hadyn's Concerto in D-major the orchestra. The same concert be further interesting in that P Monteux will conduct the fam First Symphony of Brahms in minor. By the eloquence of many voices and the dramatic po of its broader lines, this mast piece has become a favorite of time. The remainder of the p gramme traverses Borodin's deser tive orchestral sketch, "On Steppes of Central Asia," and W ner's rousing Overture to "The F ing Dutchman."

ESTABLISHED 1881

From

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TO INCLUDE NOTED 'CELLI

Jean Bedetti and Work by Brahm to Feature Programme Tuesday

The last Boston Symphony concert the season but one, to be given in I fantry Hall next Tuesday evening, w be notable in the appearance of Jea Bedetti, said to be France's greate 'cellist, who will play Haydn's Co certo in D-major with the orchestra.

Bedetti served actively at the Frenc front for 18 months. He has played a first 'cellist in the Opera Comique Paris and the Colonee Orchestra, an as a virtuoso has given his own r citals throughout Europe.

Brahm's famous First Symphony in C minor will be conducted by Pierre Mont eux. The remainder of the programm includes Borodin's descriptive orchestra sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's rousing overture t "The Flying Dutchman."

ERTISER, MARCH 7, 19

CONCERT IS MEMORABLE

Symphony's Performance of Berlioz's Work Is Warmly Applauded

By E. F. HARKINS.

Symphony patrons will long remember the concert of Friday afternoon. After an extraordinarily brilliant performance of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," there was a spontaneous outburst of enthusiasm from the audience, and, at a signal from Pierre Monteaux, the conductor, every member of the orchestra arose except Concertmaster Frederic Fradkin. Thereupon the plaudits were mingled with hisses—the first hisses probably ever heard at a Symphony concert.

Demonstrations and counter-demonstrations marking the conflict between Monteaux and Fradkin and the public sympathy for and against the union movement in the orchestra, vied with superb performances of the Berlioz masterpiece and Wagner's 'Flying Dutchman" overture to make this seventeenth "rehearsal" one of the most impressive events in the history of Boston's great orchestra.

The wonder is that amid such mental stress as the conductor and his men were under all through the matinee they could rise to such musical heights as were seldom reached before, even at the memorable Wagner concerts conducted by Muck.

For the demonstrations began as soon as Mr. Monteux made his first appearance. Yet, notwithstanding this show of sympathy for the conductor, in which the majority of those present joined, the players fairly excelled themselves. For them and for the conductor both it was a sheer triumph of artistry over controversy. This continued so even after the players themselves showed a division in their

BOSTON EVENING

SYMPHONY CONCERT

AN AFTERNOON THAT CLEARED THE AIR

Fradkin Affronts Audience and Conductor and, Within a Few Hours, Pays Just Penalty—The Trustees and Mr. Monteux Learn the Temper of Their Public—"Manifestations" New and Strange in the Records of the Orchestra—Incidental Music and Eloquent Performance

THE only possible answer to the untoward episodes yesterday afternoon at the Symphony Concert is written in the letter of the trustees of the orchestra, summarily and sharply dismissing Frederic Fradkin as concert-master for gross breach of discipline and grosser affront to the audience. Wisely, the letter was despatched within a few hours after those incidents had put to shame the present and the past of the Symphony Concerts and made known as promptly to a public clearly resenting them. Better still, it contains not a hesitation or reservation. At last the trustees seem ready to make an end of the mounting indiscipline within the orchestra and to face whatever consequences the restoration of order and obligation may bring. It was high time. There has been much and reasonable mistrust of their seeming dalliance, however necessitated by undisclosed circumstance, with a situation needing to be gripped and broken; while by every discoverable sign, in and out of Symphony Hall, the public of the Symphony Concerts applauds and sustains their present resolution, will join with them in the meeting of the consequences. Tame submission to such things as befell yesterday would be far worse in continuing and sapping outcome than even a temporary suspension of the Symphony Concerts (though no such event impends) and a clearance of the disaffected from the orchestra itself.

For Mr. Fradkin, now plainly uneasy under the consequences of his follies, there is hardly an extenuating circumstance, however apologetic he now feigns to be. For days past, as his outgivings to the press have proved, he has been as a man beside himself with the vanities and the insolences of a fictitious self-importance. Long since he lost all sense of the actualities of his place in the orchestra, of the decencies of his conduct toward the public. His following in the orchestra, in equal heat and blindness of folly, a few foolish partisans in the audience of Friday afternoon have done the rest. Whatever may next befall at Symphony Hall, the air is at last cleared and decision has timely replaced indecision.

Mch. Mac 6 11

MONTEUX GIVES BERLIOZ NUMBER

Mr. Monteux's exceptionally brilliant reading of the Berlioz Fantastic Symphony and the surprising display by Fredric Fradkin, concertmaster, of his feeling toward Mr. Monteux, by no rising, when bidden, in recognition o the applause of the audience following the symphony, were the features of yes terday afternoon's symphony concert.

The presentation of the Berlioz num ber rivalled the best in the history o the orchestra. Fortunately, it was enjoyed before "the scene," for that rath spoiled the rest of the concert for t audience. The concert will be repeat tonight.

20

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TO INCLUDE NOTED 'CELLIST

Jean Bedetti and Work by Brahms to Feature Programme Tuesday.

The last Boston Symphony concert o the season but one, to be given in I fantry Hall next Tuesday evening, will be notable in the appearance of Jean Bedetti, said to be France's greatest 'cellist, who will play Haydn's Concerto in D-major with the orchestra.

Bedetti served actively at the French front for 18 months. He has played as first 'cellist in the Opera Comique of Paris and the Colonee Orchestra, and as a virtuoso has given his own recitals throughout Europe.

Brahm's famous First Symphony in C-minor will be conducted by Pierre Monteux. The remainder of the programme includes Borodin's descriptive orchestral sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's rousing overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

EVADING THE DRAFT LAW, AND HI

SYMPHONY GIVES 17TH CONCERT

Ovation Acclaims Greatest Success Achieved in Thirty Years

FRADKIN INCIDENT MARS PROGRAM

By PHILIP HALE

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Berlioz, Fantastic Symphony; Malipiero, "Pauses of Silence"; Borodin, "On the Steppes of Central Asia"; Wagner, overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

When Mr. Monteux came on the platform he was greeted with extraordinarily hearty and prolonged applause.

After a brilliant performance of the symphony—a performance that has not been equalled here for 30 years; that has been approached only by the one given by a visiting orchestra led by Mr. Weingartner in Symphony Hall, Mr. Monteux was, naturally, recalled. He was recalled again. He then invited the orchestra to share in the applause. All stood, except Mr. Fredric Fradkin, the concert master. Whatever personal disagreement there may be between the conductor and the concert master—the reports published in the newspapers have been exaggerated and evidently one-sided—the platform of Symphony Hall is not in the course of a Symphony concert the place to air a real or fancied grievance. Mr. Fradkin, by not rising with the others, acted discourteously toward the applauding audience. When he left the stage for the intermission many in the audience hissed him for his rudeness. When he returned some, especially in the second balcony, applauded; there was also hissing; some in the orchestra were so tactless, not to say discourteous, toward the audience, as to join in the applause. Mr. Fradkin had the assurance to stand up this time. He bowed to the audience and the orchestra.

As soon as Mr. Monteux reappeared there was a mighty counter-demonstration. The applause was enthusiastic; it grew louder and louder until the great audience stood for some time, clapping hands vigorously; there was also cheering. Mr. Monteux then went on with the concert.

It was a deplorable scene. Nothing like it had happened in the history of the orchestra. May nothing like it happen again! No player, before yesterday, had allowed personal feeling to overcome him so as to forget the observance of common courtesy toward men and women that were generous in their support and in their appreciation of the orchestra to which he belonged.

This symphony is an amazing work; not only because it was first played 90 years ago when Beethoven had not been dead four years and young Wagner was studying at Leipsic; not only because in orchestration it was a revelation; it is amazing today by reason of the wild imagination, the flaming romanticism, the audacities in musical thought and musical expression. If Berlioz had not lived, the men that came after him, Wagner included, would have been obliged to work out painfully their own orchestral salvation. The influence of this genius, a man practically self-taught, a master of no instrument, brilliant as critic and essayist, a poet when writing a treatise on instrumentation, profoundly unhappy, unappreciated in his own city until long after his death, a self-torturer; the influence of this man is still felt throughout the musical world.

After the scene that has been described, the audience was hardly in a quietly receptive mood, yet there was again wonder at the moods of Malipiero's "expressions," music that 50 years from now may be to hearers as simple as Haydn's is now to us; there was enjoyment of Borodin's Sketch and Wagner's engrossing overture.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Mendelssohn, Overture, Nocturne and Scherzo from his music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Loeffler, "A Pagan Poem" (piano, Mr. Gebhard, English horn, Mr. Speyer); Glazounoff, Symphony No. 6, C minor.

THE SYMPHONY
BY OLIN DOWNES

A programme which bore testimony again to Mr. Monteux's catholicity of of taste and appreciation of many different kinds of music was given at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. It commenced with Berlioz's symphony, so audacious, so poetic, so prophetic of modern developments, the "Symphonic Fatastique," a work, bear in mind, of the 1830's. There followed Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence," a work by a modern composer of remarkable talent, heard once before at this concert, and gaining by repetition; Borodin's oriental "Steppe-Sketch from Middle Asia," and Richard Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture.

BERLIOZ'S SYMPHONY

Mr. Monteux's performance of the Berlioz Symphony was one which made the music rarely coherent and significant in its thematic developments and inter-relations, and the last movement was extremely brilliant. Not in many seasons had it been so effective. Elsewhere one wished at times for greater extremes a la Berlioz, between very soft and madly loud, for a treatment a little more temperamental. Taken all in all the music made a deep impression—one not wholly effaced by even the gross and uncalled-for discourtesy to conductor and audience on the part of the concert master.

Most surprising of all was the music of Malipiero, introduced here for the first time, if we remember rightly, by Mr. Rabaud. This music is ultra-modern in texture, harmonically very original and very new, and mystifying in its title and even mood. "The Pauses of Silence"! What does this mean? The singular thing is that one does not care particularly what it means, and that the music is curiously satisfying. Most music seems, after all, to be artificially made. It comes somewhere near what the listener wants, but really it seems only a partial or approximate expression of beauty.

If you have ever seen a sunset and then tried to reproduce the harmony on the walls of your room, you have had an experience something like the experience of the sensibilities, even when quite great music is heard. Now this music of Malipiero seems to be the exact equivalent, or tonal embodiment, of sounds heard by the soul of the ear, and greatly desired by that soul. It is music of a new subtlety, a new psychology, but at the same time it is naive and spontaneous. By virtue of supreme craftsmanship, ease and finish of expression, and an introvertible originality of the part of the composer, it has succeeded in being true and natural. Its best claim to recognition lies possibly in the very fact that it cannot be explained, or clearly described, or understood in any terms but the terms of music itself. It is very pure and absolute music.

MUSIC

The Music of Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its seventeenth concert on March 5 with the following program:

Berlioz. "Fantastic" Symphony.
Malipiero. "Pauses of Silence."
Borodin. "On the Steppes of Central Asia."
Wagner. Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

An afternoon of romantic music, yet of great variety. Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony, save for occasional episodes, still stirs the imagination. Its orchestral colors are fresh. The composer's inventive skill, when compared with the practices of the greater number of his contemporaries, is a marvel. Genius lurks in every measure. Mr. Monteux's reading of the symphony was authoritative. Trained in the Paris tradition under the great Colonne, his interpretation was full of fire and feeling. It was conceived in the "grand manner" which this music so imperatively calls for. Even the melodramatic, swaggering of certain pages seemed sincere and convincing.

Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence" was played here for the first time last season. Then the work excited interest because of its strange orchestral effects, its extreme harmonic idiom, its general novelty. According to Henry Prunières (quoted in the program book), "One is not able to hear this singular composition without a sort of awful horror," an opinion in which we heartily concur. Upon a second hearing, this composition furnishes ample proof that harmonic and orchestral effects, whose sole appeal is their novelty, are no longer interesting once their novelty is gone. There are other elements required to make a composition of lasting worth.

In the last movement of the "Fantastic" symphony the score calls for two bells and six pianofortes. Needless to say that the six pianos were not present, yet this calls to mind Mr. Salzédo's prediction of a harp section in the orchestra consisting of 35 harps. The effectiveness of the piano in the modern orchestra has not been great. Will some venturesome composer dare to introduce a pianoforte section? Having heard seven harps, we tremble to think of 35, but add to this six or more pianos! Berlioz should have reflected before writing those words.

Unless many a high falls and not ag reports are mistaken, more than one ber of the Symphony Orchestra ha terday and today seen a light. How they are minded in the present quarrel, they have discovered that discipline and decency are still to prevail in the conduct of the band toward the public.

There is little need to recall in detail the incidents of the afternoon, which will make a strange page in the records of the Symphony Concerts. They befell before and after the intermission; in that quarter hour hundreds of tongues rang with them; and for the rest of the day they quite overclouded music and performance. At the Opera House last evening, they were repeated bye and large. Today the town spurts with them. Briefly they ran in this wise. Mr. Monteux, coming to his place at the beginning of the concert, was received with significantly long and loud applause as though the audience would approve his poise and procedure through the present controversy. He and the orchestra with him recalled Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" to such musical, pictorial and romantic life as it has not known in years in Bostonian ears. Sincere, hearty and insistent applause rewarded the conductor once and twice. At the second recall he bade the orchestra, according to custom, rise in its place to share and acknowledge the plaudits it had helped to win. Fradkin remained obstinately and ostentatiously in his chair. There were sharp hisses; there were renewed clappings for Mr. Monteux and the rest of the band. Then the intermission and the usual departure of conductor and men.

When the players returned, Fradkin, lingering until most of them had resumed their places, obviously courted the attention of the audience. A few hands in the second balcony clapped; more hands in the orchestra itself, especially among the minor strings, joined with them. In measure, deliberate indiscipline prompted this applause; in measure, it sprang from childish irritation at the mood of an audience altogether in sympathy with Mr. Monteux. With elaborate vanity, Fradkin bowed to his partisans on the stage and to his partisans in the auditorium. He was scarcely in his seat before Mr. Monteux returned, lifted, almost, to his platform by a flood of applause that swept from one end of Symphony Hall to the other. Many stood; cries and cheers rose above the din of hands. For once an American audience, a Bostonian audience "manifested" and beyond mistake of purpose or doubt of sincerity. The rebellious in the orchestra had their answer; the trustees received their spur. Within a few hours the salutary consequences began to be written—for beginning.

There was no reflection of these disturbances in the playing of the orchestra; indeed, from first to last, the concert was one of unusual brilliance. Mr. Monteux's reading of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" surpassed any that has been heard here, except perhaps, Mr. Weingartner's. The dramatic nature of the music tempted his better qualities, and he rose to it as he has to perhaps nothing during his stay among us. Despite its occasional ineptness and the absurdly romantic programme which inspired it, this Symphony remains one of the miracles of the art; both because of its amazing eloquence after ninety years and by reason of its entire independence of all previous and contemporary music. It is easier to imagine that it was written yesterday than it is to believe that it was composed but three years after the death of Beethoven. Except for the picturesque piping of the shepherds, the "Scene in the Meadows" now seems somewhat futile, tenuous and over long, and it is hard to take the clap-trap of the last movement seriously. But in the "March to the Scaffold" and at the end, the usually reticent Mr. Monteux was as one possessed, and it is easy to understand the applause which led to such disastrous consequences.

Malipiero's Seven Symphonic Expressions, "Pauses of Silence," were played here for the first time by Mr. Rabaud. On a second hearing the music seems less strange, and also less remarkable. Some writer on music once remarked, quite unjustly, that Sgambati was an Italian who had sold his birthright, melody. It is interesting to speculate on what he would have thought of Malipiero. The music rivets the attention, but there is little that can be carried away in recollection save biting and acid harmonies, bizarre instrumental effects and tortured melodic phrases. Between Malipiero and Wagner's Overture to the Flying Dutchman, which ended the concert, stood Borodin's Orchestral Sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia." To read the composer's explanatory preface before hearing the piece is to experience disappointment, as the music gives but faint suggestion of its programme. The two melodies are striking in themselves; the Oriental song, which typifies the advancing caravan, is fascinatingly exotic, but in company with Berlioz and Wagner, and even Malipiero, Borodin's music was no more than a pleasing interlude.

It was good to hear again the Flying Dutchman Overture, which served as a fitting conclusion to the concert. The performance was effective, although other conductors have better suggested the music's wildness and elemental breadth. Its compelling eloquence again prompted the reflection that Wagner at his best stands apart from all other composers in the beauty, vitality and validity of his ideas, and in their perfect expression.

From

The chief musical event of t week will be the concert next Tuesd night by the Boston Symphony Orche tra, the following programme havi been arranged by Mr. Monteux: Sy phony No. 1, in C-minor, op. 68; "On Steppes of Central Asia," Orchest Sketches, op. 27; Concerto for violoncel in D-major, Haydn; Overture to "T Flying Dutchman," Wagner.

Jean Bedetti, the eminent French vi loncellist and leader of the orchestra 'cello se tion, will be the soloist. H beautiful tone and high skill have be doubtless discernible to Providence co certgoers this season. Mr. Bedetti ca to this country last autumn, having a tained a remarkable reputation as a v tuoso abroad. He took first prize at Paris Conservatory in 1902, and in became first 'cellist with the Op Comique Orchestra. Four years later joined the Colonne Orchestra, playing different times under Colonne, Pierne a Monteux. He played in several chamb music ensembles, and gave his own citals in a number of French cities, a in Spain, Belgium, Switzerland and En land. He has lately appeared as solo with the orchestra in concerts in Bo ton. During the war he served for months at the front, joining the Fren forces Aug. 2, 1914.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From MAR -5

Jean Bedetti

The last Boston Symphony cert of the season but one, t given in Infantry Hall next Tue evening, will be notable in the pearance of Jean Bedetti, Fra greatest 'cellist, who will Hadyn's Concerto in D-majo the orchestra. The same concert be further interesting in that P Monteux will conduct the fam First Symphony of Brahms in minor. By the eloquence of many voices and the dramatic po of its broader lines, this mas piece has become a favorite of time. The remainder of the p gramme traverses Borodin's deser tive orchestral sketch, "On Steppes of Central Asia," and W ner's rousing Overture to "The F ing Dutchman."

ESTABLISHED 188

From MAR 6 1920 A

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TO INCLUDE NOTED 'CELLI

Jean Bedetti and Work by Brahms to Feature Programme Tuesday

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season but one, to be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, will be notable in the appearance of Jean Bedetti, said to be France's greatest 'cellist, who will play Haydn's Concerto in D-major with the orchestra.

Bedetti served actively at the French front for 18 months. He has played as first 'cellist in the Opera Comique of Paris and the Colonee Orchestra, and as a virtuoso has given his own recitals throughout Europe.

Brahm's famous First Symphony in C minor will be conducted by Pierre Monteux. The remainder of the programme includes Borodin's descriptive orchestral sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's rousing overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TO INCLUDE NOTED 'CELLIST

Jean Bedetti and Work by Brahms to Feature Programme Tuesday.

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season but one, to be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, will be notable in the appearance of Jean Bedetti, said to be France's greatest 'cellist, who will play Haydn's Concerto in D-major with the orchestra.

Bedetti served actively at the French front for 18 months. He has played as first 'cellist in the Opera Comique of Paris and the Colonee Orchestra, and as a virtuoso has given his own recitals throughout Europe.

Brahm's famous First Symphony in C minor will be conducted by Pierre Monteux. The remainder of the programme includes Borodin's descriptive orchestral sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's rousing overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

RTISER, MARCH 7, 19

BOSTON EVENING

CONCERT IS MEMORABLE

Symphony's Performance of Berlioz's Work Is Warmly Applauded

By E. F. HARKINS.

Symphony patrons will long remember the concert of Friday afternoon. After an extraordinarily brilliant performance of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," there was a spontaneous outburst of enthusiasm from the audience, and, at a signal from Pierre Monteaux, the conductor, every member of the orchestra arose except Concertmaster Frederic Fradkin. Thereupon the plaudits were mingled with hisses—the first hisses probably ever heard at a Symphony concert.

Demonstrations and counter-demonstrations marking the conflict between Monteaux and Fradkin and the public sympathy for and against the union movement in the orchestra, vied with superb performances of the Berlioz masterpiece and Wagner's 'Flyothers Fradkin. The Wagner overranks, some applauding Monteux and ture, which closed the program, was played as brilliantly as the Berlioz symphony.

Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence"—strange, futuristic music—and Borodin's charming sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," were the other numbers on the program. But they were as mere entractes between the works revealing the gtnius of Berlioz and Wagner.

Mar. Mar 6 TT

MONTEUX GIVES BERLIOZ NUMBER

Mr. Monteux's exceptionally brilliant reading of the Berlioz Fantastic Symphony and the surprising display by Fredric Fradkin, concertmaster, of his feeling toward Mr. Monteux, by not rising, when bidden, in recognition of the applause of the audience following the symphony, were the features of yesterday afternoon's symphony concert.

The presentation of the Berlioz number rivalled the best in the history of the orchestra. Fortunately, it was enjoyed before "the scene," for that rather spoiled the rest of the concert for the audience. The concert will be repeated tonight.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

AN AFTERNOON THAT CLEARED THE AIR

Fradkin Affronts Audience and Conductor and, Within a Few Hours, Pays Just Penalty—The Trustees and Mr. Monteux Learn the Temper of Their Public—"Manifestations" New and Strange in the Records of the Orchestra—Incidental Music and Eloquent Performance

THE only possible answer to the untoward episodes yesterday afternoon at the Symphony Concert is written in the letter of the trustees of the orchestra, summarily and sharply dismissing Frederic Fradkin as concert-master for gross breach of discipline and grosser affront to the audience. Wisely, the letter was despatched within a few hours after those incidents had put to shame the present and the past of the Symphony Concerts and made known as promptly to a public clearly resenting them. Better still, it contains not a hesitation or reservation. At last the trustees seem ready to make an end of the mounting indiscipline within the orchestra and to face whatever consequences the restoration of order and obligation may bring. It was high time. There has been much and reasonable mistrust of their seeming dalliance, however necessitated by undisclosed circumstance, with a situation needing to be gripped and broken; while by every discoverable sign, in and out of Symphony Hall, the public of the Symphony Concerts applauds and sustains their present resolution, will join with them in the meeting of the consequences. Tame submission to such things as befell yesterday would be far worse in continuing and sapping outcome than even a temporary suspension of the Symphony Concerts (though no such event impends) and a clearance of the disaffected from the orchestra itself.

For Mr. Fradkin, now plainly uneasy under the consequences of his follies, there is hardly an extenuating circumstance, however apologetic he now feigns to be. For days past, as his outgivings to the press have proved, he has been as a man beside himself with the vanities and the insolences of a fictitious self-importance. Long since he lost all sense of the actualities of his place in the orchestra, of the decencies of his conduct toward the public. His following in the orchestra, in equal heat and blindness of folly, a few foolish partisans in the audience of Friday afternoon have done the rest. Whatever may next befall at Symphony Hall, the air is at last cleared and decision has timely replaced indecision

MAR 13 1920

A BOSTON HERALD, 3,

18TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Great Audience Welcomes Conductor Monteux and His Players

FINE PERFORMANCE STIRS ENTHUSIASM

By PHILIP HALE

The 18th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program, necessarily changed from the one announced last week, was as follows: Mendelssohn, Overture, Nocturne and Scherzo from the music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Grieg, Concerto for piano and orchestra (Mr. Gebhard, pianist); Beethoven, Symphony No. 4.

The great audience welcomed Mr. Monteux and the faithful men of the orchestra warmly. The enthusiasm showed conclusively appreciation of the stand taken by the trustees and of the loyalty shown by so many valuable, distinguished players. It also showed a confidence in the future and the glory of the orchestra, a confidence not to be shaken.

The performance deserved the hearty applause that punctuated the concert throughout. It is hardly necessary to write at length concerning the music itself. Mendelssohn's overture and Scherzo are still delightful. Would that he had always written in this vein, for he was, first of all, a romanticist, never so happy as when excited by a fantastical subject, as by Shakespeare's comedy, or "The First Walpurgis Night," or by a scene in Nature, as in the overture to "The Hebrides." In the Nocturne we note the peculiarly suave sentiment that too often degenerated into rank sentimentalism, as in many of the "Songs Without Words." Mr. Wendler, horn, and Mr. Laurent, flute, contributed so greatly to the success of the performance that they were obliged to come forward in acknowledgment of the applause; this applause was also for the whole orchestra. The Scherzo was played with the utmost delicacy and crispness, and the wood-wind choir covered itself with glory.

Admirable, too, was Mr. Monteux's reading of the symphony, which, with the exception of the Adazio, is not among the greater works of "the deaf man of Bonn," as he was recently characterized by a flippant critic. Here, as in the performance of Mendelssohn's music, there was ever-present clarity and a fine sense of proportion.

Is Grieg's concerto becoming shopworn? Mr. Gebhard's playing of it was brilliant, rather than poetic or romantic. The better portions of the concerto are surely romantic. In the first movement he appeared to be in a restless mood; the lyric passages were not sufficiently elastic, more than once a phrase sung enchantingly by the violoncellos was repeated by the pianist rigidly. It should be remembered, however, that Mr. Gebhard played at comparatively short notice.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be away on its last southern trip next week. The program for the concerts of March 26, 27 will be as follows: Dvorak, Symphony No. 5, "From the New World"; Wagner, Prelude to "Lohengrin," "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried"; Debussy, Little Suite (orchestrated by Henri Busser); Berlioz, Rakóczy March.

CONCERT GIVEN IN SPITE OF STRIKERS

Globe Mar 13

Symphony Orchestra's Work Is Excellent

Monteux Receives Big Ovation on Appearance

The Symphony concert yesterday afternoon proved that the orchestra, despite the strike, can give concerts which attain its usual high standard provided music written for a full modern orchestra is avoided. The possible repertory for the diminished band includes most classic symphonic music, and offers plenty of variety to choose from.

Except for an unusual volume of applause when Mr Monteux first appeared, and most of the capacity audience rose to clap loud and long, the concert proceeded as though nothing had happened. The revised program began, as the one originally planned did, with three familiar excerpts from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, and included Grieg's piano concerto in A minor and Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, replacing the previously announced "Pagan Poem" by Mr Loeffler, and Glazounoff symphony. Heinrich Gebhard was the soloist, according to schedule.

Many Violinists Missing

The most noticeable gaps in the ranks are in the strings and percussion sections of the orchestra. There were only about half the usual number of second violins, yet the quality of tone from both first and second violins seemed better than it has at any time in the past two seasons. It had the old golden shimmer, but of course lacked volume and depth, comparatively speaking.

Only momentarily, however, were the strings overbalanced by woodwind and brass, which goes to show that those who have always contended that there were too many strings in proportion to the rest of the band had some reason for their attitude.

The program book listed the strikers among the members of the orchestra, but omitted Fradkin, substituting as concert master the name of Julius Theodorowicz. The inclusion of the other strikers is probably simply due to the fact that their defection came after the programs were printed, though it caused some comment. The programs also contained, as explained elsewhere in today's Globe, an appeal from the trustees for contributions to the endowment fund of the orchestra.

Mr Gebhard Applauded

Mr Gebhard played with his usual skill and taste and was warmly applauded. The orchestra gave him capable support, and Mr Monteux led sympathetically.

There was a sonority and brilliance about the performance of the familiar Beethoven symphony which would have been worthy of comment under normal circumstances. As things stood yesterday it was a remarkable achievement, for which conductor and players deserve great praise. If there are no further defections there can be no possible doubt of the artistic success of the rest of the regular season, as well as the "Pops" afterward.

No concerts are scheduled for the coming week, as the orchestra will go on tour. The program will be repeated tonight at 8, as usual.

Beethoven Played Superbly

As for the Beethoven symphony, it was one of the best performances of this work we can remember. This early symphony gains rather than loses by a smaller body of strings than usual. It had at last the almost Haydnesque clarity, simplicity, lightness of touch that is desirable, and which is almost always lost when the symphony is played by the average-sized modern orchestra. Beethoven's fourth symphony naturally calls for fewer instruments. Mr. Monteux showed himself thoroughly a master of the score and his men carried out his wishes to the smallest nuance.

The management of the Boston Symphony states that between 75 and 80 players are now available for next week's tour, and that in addition to these about 25 additional players are expected to be enrolled in the very near future.

Fill Vacant Positions

At the rehearsal the orchestra went through Wagnerian excerpts which require a large orchestra for performance.

It was also emphasized by the management that from now on newcomers to the Boston Symphony are not in any sense "strike-breakers." They are simply men who have applied and been given positions which are now vacant in the Symphony Orchestra.

RDAY, MARCH 13,

VIRTUOSO SYMPHONY CONCERT

Superb Playing by Reduced Band--Gebhard Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

With a membership of 67, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, gave its customary Friday concert yesterday afternoon. An audience, which gathered early and displayed the greatest interest in events, applauded practically every member of the orchestra as these men came on the stage singly or in groups to take their regular seats. The place of Fredric Fradkin, the former concertmaster, was filled by J. Theodorowicz, previously assistant concertmaster.

AUDIENCE ENTHUSIASTIC

When Mr. Monteux entered he was applauded long and loudly. At the end of the concert the audience stood, applauding for some time. The programme in its revised state consisted of music from Mendelssohn's incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; the Grieg piano concerto, Heinrich Gebhard of this city as pianist, and Beethoven's Fourth Symphony.

Mendelssohn's music was held up by the late Edward MacDowell to his pupils in orchestration as a model of what a composer could do with relatively few instruments. It was delightfully played, and both Mr. Wendler, the admirable first horn, and Mr. Laurent, the equally masterly flutist, were called by Mr. Monteux to bow to the audience. Great enthusiasm and unanimity on the part of the men was felt in the performance of the overture, which was very brilliantly played. And what music this is! How fresh, how poetic today! No wonder it was applauded—the music and the virtuoso performance.

Mr. Gebhard and Grieg

It must be admitted that the music of Grieg is pale by comparison. Yet it appeared years after the youthful music of Mendelssohn. Mr. Gebhard had intended to play Charles Martin Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" for piano and orchestra, but the orchestra was too small, so that Grieg's work replaced the Loeffler composition.

Taking into account the fact that Mr. Gebhard himself can hardly have illusions about Grieg's aging music, he played it superbly, like the sane, authoritative artist that he is. To play with more abandon would have required a belief in it, and we cannot believe that Mr. Gebhard is enthusiastic about this out-moded concerto of Grieg, especially when he is deeply immersed in the music of Mr. Loeffler. But he was justly applauded and recalled, and the orchestra provided an excellent accompaniment of the concerto.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE M

Monitor Mar 13

break from October to March. When that old practice is resumed, the Hallé concerts will be increased from 15 to 20, as in pre-war years, and both band and subscribers will be extremely well pleased.

The Music of Boston

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The eighteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place March 12. The program, after revision, made necessary by the dismissal of some of the players, was as follows:

Mendelssohn—Selections from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music.

Grieg—Pianoforte Concerto, Heinrich Gebhard, soloist.

Beethoven—Symphony No. 4.

The orchestra, having recently undergone important changes, played surprisingly well. Mr. Monteux has again proved himself a man of resource under trying conditions, a man who thoroughly understands every detail of his profession, a practical musician. Those who stated that his interpretations lacked in authority failed to realize that he was patiently building up the efficiency of the orchestra so that he might in due time give all his attention to the interpretive side of his art.

This necessary technical efficiency had almost been attained and Mr. Monteux was beginning to show his audience another phase of his musical nature, as witness last week's memorable performance of Berlioz' "Fantastic" symphony, when circumstances obliged him to rebuild his almost perfect orchestra. Yet there was much to praise in yesterday's performance, even if the difficulties under which Mr. Monteux labored had not been known to the audience. The apt characterization of different styles of music was still to be observed, the dash and virtuosity of the orchestra had not been lost, the beauty of tone and phrasing which have been so noticeable during Mr. Monteux's tenure of office were still within the power of the orchestra. The audience realized the marvel that had been wrought and rewarded the orchestra and its conductor with generous applause.

Grieg's concerto served to display Mr. Gebhard's well-known and excellent qualities as a virtuoso.

TELEGRAM

ess New York City

Boston Symphony to Give Concert at Newark Tonight

NEWARK, N. J., Monday.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, will give its last concert outside of Boston at the Newark Armory tonight. Rudolph Ganz will be soloist.

From EVENING POST, New York City

A sixth famous pianist, Rudolph Ganz, will play the Grieg concerto at to-night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Newark Armory. This will be this orchestra's final concert this season outside of Boston.

The Boston Orchestra's final concert in Carnegie Hall was given on Saturday afternoon. The simplified programme included a Mozart symphony, Bordin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia"; Debussy's "Petite Suite," orchestrated by Henri Busser, and Goldmark's colorful "Sakuntala" overture.

TRIBUNE

ess: Providence, R. I.

MAR 10 1920

LARGE AUDIENCE AT CONCERT

Boston Symphony with Pierre Monteux as Director Here.

The last Boston Symphony Concert but one was given in Infantry Hall last evening with a large and highly appreciative audience in attendance.

A deal of interest centered in this particular concert because of the recent discord in the ranks of the orchestra precipitated by the retirement of Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the orchestra. The tension of the audience was relieved in this respect at the outset, however, by the fact that the orchestra was as in fact as ever and fully up to the high standard always maintained by the magnificent musical organization.

Mr. Fradkin's place was admirably taken by Mr. J. Hoffman, a gifted violinist of the orchestra, and the concert was but another of its long list of artistic triumphs in this city.

Pierre Monteux, the conductor, received a flattering reception, his demonstration being inspired doubtless in recognition of his skill not only as a conductor of rare and unusual gifts, but as a program maker for the Boston Symphony programs in Providence this season have certainly been of the most satisfying and delightful character.

At the end of the first movement of the symphony the conductor was recalled three times. The program ran as follows:

"Symphony No. 1, in C-minor, Op. 68," ..... Brams
Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
Andante sostenuto.
Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

"On the Steppes of Central Asia," Orchestral Sketch, Op. 7 .....Bordin

Concerto for violoncello in D-major.... ..... Haydn
Allegro moderato.
Adagio.
Allegro.

Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," ..... Wagner

The concert of last evening was notable in the appearance of Jean Bedett, the eminent French 'cellist, as soloist with the orchestra in the superb performance of Haydn's "Concerto in D-minor."

The Brahms beautiful Symphony No. 1 in C-minor was given a magnificent performance by the orchestra opening with a solemn introduction of great beauty and impressiveness. The final movement of the Symphony is based on themes of rare interpretation and the beautiful melody and orchestral coloring delighted the ear of the listener and satisfied the artistic sense of the most critical. Borodin's descriptive orchestra sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," gave opportunity for delightful coloring by the various instruments in the orchestra and in this as in everything else on the program, Mr. Monteux led his forces to splendid achievements.

The program ended with a brilliant and dazzling performance of Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

Jean Beditti, the soloist of the evening, displayed a rarely beautiful tone and his consummate skill with his instrument brought him an ovation.

He was enthusiastically recalled three times at the end of his performance.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE THIS EVENIN

Concert to be Given in Infant Hall as Planned.

STRIKERS JOIN REHEARSA

Threatened Disruption in Rank Over Discharge of [illegible]rtmaster Fradkin Fa[illegible]rializes. Full Number of [illegible]Will be on Hand.

The Boston Symph[illegible]ra, despite the threatened [illegible] of its membership over the [illegible]f Frederic Fradkin, concertm[illegible] appear at Infantry Hall, in [illegible]y, this evening in the fourth of its series of concerts and will provide the complete scheduled programme. This announcement was made from Symphony Hall, Boston, yesterday forenoon.

Endeavors to have other union members of the orchestra join those who remained away from Saturday night's concert over the Fradkin issue were unsuccessful, it was stated. Striking members appeared at yesterday morning's rehearsal at 10 and voluntarily joined in the rehearsal, it was announced.

In personal letters to striking members, Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the trustees of Symphony Orchestra, pointed out that their refusal to appear Saturday night had constituted a breach of the terms of their contract. He said he would meet them at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, between 2 and 5, if they cared to call. When the striking members appeared at yesterday morning's rehearsal, and asked if they could join in the rehearsal, they were told that they could join voluntarily.

According to the announcement from Boston yesterday forenoon, not only will the scheduled programme be given in this city to-night, but the requisite number of players will be on hand.

TRIBUNE

dress: Providence, R. I.

te FEB 20 '24 A

[illegible]ld, Wieniawski-Lazt.

SYMPHONY 'CELLIST'S GREAT ART.

When Jean Bedetti, the remarkable new French 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is to be the soloist at the next concert of the orchestra here on March 9, played Schumann's" Concerto" at the Symphony concerts in Boston on Jan. 30 and 31, the consensus of enthusiastic opinion was as follows:

Olin Downes in the Boston Post: "Mr. Bedetti has proved himself an extraordinary artist. . . . His technical resources seemed to be endless. There was no difficulty, however, unwieldy the occasional solo passage, which he did not completely and masterfully surmount, and every talent of the performer was modestly subordinated to the message of the music. He took his place as one of the most gifted 'cellists that have been associated with this orchestra."

H. T. Parker in the Transcript: "Only by Mr. Casals and Miss Harrison has the violoncello been so played in recent years—with such technical ease and surety, lightness and elasticity of bow and fingers, rich transparent, unforced tone, such taste, sensibility and intelligence. The Symphony Orchestra has gained one day of the rare violincellists of this present day."

Philip Hale in the Herald: "Mr. Bedetti played the Andante of this (Schumann) Concerto most poetically; but he did more than this; by his technical skill, his unfailing accuracy, his beauty of tonal quality, his phrasing, his fine differentiation, he made the other portions of the Concerto interesting—even engrossing. The dry passage work was vitalized by his skill, tone and taste."

* * *

MARY GARDEN COMING

100-110 SEVENTH AV[illegible]
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From

MEMBERS WHO QUIT BOSTON SYMPHONY RESUME PLAC[illegible]

Trustees Do Not Object to Uni[illegible] Affiliations Under Conditions.

Boston, March 8.—A committee of th[illegible] of the members of the Boston Symph[illegible] Orchestra who have joined a union affi[illegible]ated with the [illegible] Musicians conferred to-day with [illegible]erick P. Cabot, President of the board of trustees of the orchestra.

They reported back to a union meeting that they had been informed that the trustees would not object to union affiliation "if the American Federation of Musicians will make special rules for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, granting this organization privileges neither granted to nor asked for by any one of the other 16 organizations of this kind in this country."

No action was taken on this report. Earlier in the day the 35 players who had refused to participate in the regular concert last Saturday night because of the dismissal of Frederic Fradkin, concertmaster, joined the other members of the orchestra. They took this action upon the advice of Mr. Fradkin.

TRIBUNE

ess: Providence, R. I.

JEAN BEDETTI.

Jean Bedetti, who came from Europe last autumn to lead the golden-toned 'cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard as soloist at the Symphony concert next Tuesday. Mr. Bedetti's beautiful tone and his consummate skill with his instrument has certainly already been discernible to the concert-goers of Providence. Taking first prize at the Paris Conservatory in 19[illegible] he played in several chamber music ensembles, and in 1904 became first 'cellist in the "Opera Comique" Orchestra. In 19[illegible]8 he undertook additional duties in the Colonne Orchestra, where he played also as first 'cellist under three conductors—Colonne, Pierne and Monteux. As a virtuoso apart from any organization, he became particularly famous, and gave his own recitals in a number of French cities, also in Spain, Belgium, Switzerland and England. His musical career was interrupted by the war. Called out in the mobilization of Aug. 3nd, 1914, he served actively at the front for 18 months.

From TRIBUNE

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date

NOTED 'CELLIST TO PLAY AT COMING BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The last Boston Symphony Concert of the season but one, to be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, will be notable in the appearance of Jean Bedetti, France's greatest 'cellist, who will play Haydn's Concerto in D major with theo rchestra. The same concert will be further interesting in that Pierre Monteux will conduct the famous First Symphony of Brahms in C minor. But the eloquence of its many voices and the dramatic power of its broader lines, this masterpiece has become a favorite of all time. The remainder of the program traverses Borodin's descriptive orchestral sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's rousing overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

MAR 13 1920

A BOSTON HERALD, 3,

18TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Great Audience Welcomes Conductor Monteux and His Players

FINE PERFORMANCE STIRS ENTHUSIASM

By PHILIP HALE

The 18th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program, necessarily changed from the one announced last week, was as follows: Mendelssohn, Overture, Nocturne and Scherzo from the music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Grieg, Concerto for piano and orchestra (Mr. Gebhard, pianist); Beethoven, Symphony No. 4.

The great audience welcomed Mr. Monteux and the faithful men of the orchestra warmly. The enthusiasm showed conclusively appreciation of the stand taken by the trustees and of the loyalty shown by so many valuable, distinguished players. It also showed a confidence in the future and the glory of the orchestra, a confidence not to be shaken.

The performance deserved the hearty applause that punctuated the concert throughout. It is hardly necessary to write at length concerning the music itself. Mendelssohn's overture and Scherzo are still delightful. Would that he had always written in this vein, for he was, first of all, a romanticist, never so happy as when excited by a fantastical subject, as by Shakespeare's comedy, or "The First Walpurgis Night," or by a scene in Nature, as in the overture to "The Hebrides." In the Nocturne we note the peculiarly suave sentiment that too often degenerated into rank sentimentalism, as in many of the "Songs Without Words." Mr. Wendler, horn, and Mr. Laurent, flute, contributed so greatly to the success of the performance that they were obliged to come forward in acknowledgment of the applause; this applause was also for the whole orchestra. The Scherzo was played with the utmost delicacy and crispness, and the wood-wind choir covered itself with glory.

Admirable, too, was Mr. Monteux's reading of the symphony, which, with the exception of the Adazio, is not among the greater works of "the deaf man of Bonn," as he was recently characterized by a flippant critic. Here, as in the performance of Mendelssohn's music, there was ever-present clarity and a fine sense of proportion.

Is Grieg's concerto becoming shopworn? Mr. Gebhard's playing of it was brilliant, rather than poetic or romantic. The better portions of the concerto are surely romantic. In the first movement he appeared to be in a restless mood; the lyric passages were not sufficiently elastic; more than once a phrase sung enchantingly by the violoncellos was repeated by the pianist rigidly. It should be remembered, however, that Mr. Gebhard played at comparatively short notice.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be away on its last southern trip next week. The program for the concerts of March 26, 27 will be as follows: Dvorak, Symphony No. 5, "From the New World"; Wagner, Prelude to "Lohengrin," "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried"; Debussy, Little Suite (orchestrated by Henri Busser); Berlioz, Rakoczy March.

CONCERT GIVEN IN SPITE OF STRIKERS

Globe Mar 13

Symphony Orchestra's Work Is Excellent

Monteux Receives Big Ovation on Appearance

The Symphony concert yesterday afternoon proved that the orchestra, despite the strike, can give concerts which attain its usual high standard provided music written for a full modern orchestra is avoided. The possible repertory for the diminished band includes most classic symphonic music, and offers plenty of variety to choose from.

Except for an unusual volume of applause when Mr Monteux first appeared, and most of the capacity audience rose to clap loud and long, the concert proceeded as though nothing had happened. The revised program began, as the one originally planned did, with three familiar excerpts from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, and included Grieg's piano concerto in A minor and Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, replacing the previously announced "Pagan Poem" by Mr Loeffler, and Glazounoff symphony. Heinrich Gebhard was the soloist, according to schedule.

Many Violinists Missing

The most noticeable gaps in the ranks are in the strings and percussion sections of the orchestra. There were only about half the usual number of second violins, yet the quality of tone from both first and second violins seemed better than it has at any time in the past two seasons. It had the old golden shimmer, but of course lacked volume and depth, comparatively speaking.

Only momentarily, however, were the strings overbalanced by woodwind and brass, which goes to show that those who have always contended that there were too many strings in proportion to the rest of the band had some reason for their attitude.

The program book listed the strikers among the members of the orchestra, but omitted Fradkin, substituting as concert master the name of Julius Theodorowicz. The inclusion of the other strikers is probably simply due to the fact that their defection came after the programs were printed, though it caused some comment. The programs also contained, as explained elsewhere in today's Globe, an appeal from the trustees for contributions to the endowment fund of the orchestra.

Mr Gebhard Applauded

Mr Gebhard played with his usual skill and taste and was warmly applauded. The orchestra gave him capable support, and Mr Monteux led sympathetically.

There was a sonority and brilliance about the performance of the familiar Beethoven symphony which would have been worthy of comment under normal circumstances. As things stood yesterday it was a remarkable achievement, for which conductor and players deserve great praise. If there are no further defections there can be no possible doubt of the artistic success of the rest of the regular season, as well as the "Pops" afterward.

No concerts are scheduled for the coming week, as the orchestra will go on tour. The program will be repeated tonight at 8, as usual.

RDAY, MARCH 13,

VIRTUOSO SYMPHONY CONCERT

Superb Playing by Reduced Band--Gebhard Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

With a membership of 67, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, gave its customary Friday concert yesterday afternoon. An audience, which gathered early and displayed the greatest interest in events, applauded practically every member of the orchestra as these men came on the stage singly or in groups to take their regular seats. The place of Fredric Fradkin, the former concertmaster, was filled by J. Theodorowicz, previously assistant concertmaster.

AUDIENCE ENTHUSIASTIC

When Mr. Monteux entered he was applauded long and loudly. At the end of the concert the audience stood, applauding for some time. The programme in its revised state consisted of music from Mendelssohn's incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; the Grieg piano concerto, Heinrich Gebhard of this city as pianist, and Beethoven's Fourth Symphony.

Mendelssohn's music was held up by the late Edward MacDowell to his pupils in orchestration as a model of what a composer could do with relatively few instruments. It was delightfully played, and both Mr. Wendler, the admirable first horn, and Mr. Laurent, the equally masterly flutist, were called by Mr. Monteux to bow to the audience. Great enthusiasm and unanimity on the part of the men was felt in the performance of the overture, which was very brilliantly played. And what music this is! How fresh, how poetic today! No wonder it was applauded—the music and the virtuoso performance.

Mr. Gebhard and Grieg

It must be admitted that the music of Grieg is pale by comparison. Yet it appeared years after the youthful music of Mendelssohn. Mr. Gebhard had intended to play Charles Martin Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" for piano and orchestra, but the orchestra was too small, so that Grieg's work replaced the Loeffler composition.

Taking into account the fact that Mr. Gebhard himself can hardly have illusions about Grieg's aging music, he played it superbly, like the sane, authoritative artist that he is. To play it with more abandon would have required a belief in it, and we cannot believe that Mr. Gebhard is enthusiastic about this out-moded concerto of Grieg, especially when he is deeply immersed in the music of Mr. Loeffler. But he was justly applauded and recalled, and the orchestra provided an excellent accompaniment of the concerto.

Beethoven Played Superbly

As for the Beethoven symphony, it was one of the best performances of this work we can remember. This early symphony gains rather than loses by a smaller body of strings than usual. It had at last the almost Haydnesque clarity, simplicity, lightness of touch that is desirable, and which is almost always lost when the symphony is played by the average-sized modern orchestra. Beethoven's fourth symphony naturally calls for fewer instruments. Mr. Monteux showed himself thoroughly a master of the score and his men carried out his wishes to the smallest nuance.

The management of the Boston Symphony states that between 75 and 80 players are now available for next week's tour, and that in addition to these about 25 additional players are expected to be enrolled in the very near future.

Fill Vacant Positions

At the rehearsal the orchestra went through Wagnerian excerpts which require a large orchestra for performance.

It was also emphasized by the management that from now on newcomers to the Boston Symphony are not in any sense "strike-breakers." They are simply men who have applied and been given positions which are now vacant in the Symphony Orchestra.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE M

Monit Mar 13

break from October to March. When that old practice is resumed, the Hallé concerts will be increased from 15 to 20, as in pre-war years, and both band and subscribers will be extremely well pleased.

The Music of Boston

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The eighteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place March 12. The program, after revision, made necessary by the dismissal of some of the players, was as follows:

Mendelssohn—Selections from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music.

Grieg—Pianoforte Concerto, Heinrich Gebhard, soloist.

Beethoven—Symphony No. 4.

The orchestra, having recently undergone important changes, played surprisingly well. Mr. Monteux has again proved himself a man of resource under trying conditions, a man who thoroughly understands every detail of his profession, a practical musician. Those who stated that his interpretations lacked in authority failed to realize that he was patiently building up the efficiency of the orchestra so that he might in due time give all his attention to the interpretive side of his art.

This necessary technical efficiency had almost been attained and Mr. Monteux was beginning to show his audience another phase of his musical nature, as witness last week's memorable performance of Berlioz' "Fantastic" symphony, when circumstances obliged him to rebuild his almost perfect orchestra. Yet there was much to praise in yesterday's performance, even if the difficulties under which Mr. Monteux labored had not been known to the audience. The apt characterization of different styles of music was still to be observed, the dash and virtuosity of the orchestra had not been lost, the beauty of tone and phrasing which have been so noticeable during Mr. Monteux's tenure of office were still within the power of the orchestra. The audience realized the marvel that had been wrought and rewarded the orchestra and its conductor with generous applause.

Grieg's concerto served to display Mr. Gebhard's well-known and excellent qualities as a virtuoso.

TELEGRAM

ess New York City

Boston Symphony to Give Concert at Newark Tonight

NEWARK, N. J., Monday.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, will give its last concert outside of Boston at the Newark Armory tonigh.. Rudolph Ganz will be soloist.

From EVENING POST, New York City

A sixth famous pianist, Rudolph ...z, will play the Grieg concerto at ...ght's concert of the Boston Sym... Orchestra in the Newark ...y. This will be this orchestra's ...oncert this season outside of ...

...oston Orchestra's final concert ...ent- ...gie Hall was given on Satur... ...e of ...noon. The simplified pro... ...t the ...included a Mozart sym... will ...rdin's "On the Steppes of ...when ...sia"; Debussy's "Petite ...else. ...strated by Henri Busser, ...oaches ...k's colorful "Sakuntala" ...ete is

TRIBUNE

...ess: Providence, R. I.

MAR 10 1920

LARGE AUDIENCE AT CONCERT

Boston Symphony with Pierre Monteux as Director Here.

The last Boston Symphony Concert but one was given in Infantry Hall last evening with a large and highly appreciative audience in attendance.

A deal of interest centered in this particular concert because of the recent discord in the ranks of the orchestra precipitated by the retirement of Frederic Fradkin, concert master of the orchestra. The tension of the audience was relieved in this respect at the outset, however, by the fact that the orchestra was as in tact as ever and fully up to the high standard always maintained by the magnificent musical organization.

Mr. Fradkin's place was admirably taken by Mr. J. Hoffman, a gifted violinist of the orchestra, and the concert was but another of its long list of artistic triumphs in this city.

Pierre Monteux, the conductor, received a flattering reception, this demonstration being inspired doubtless in recognition of his skill not only as a conductor of rare and unusual gifts, but as a program maker for the Boston Symphony programs in Providence this season have certainly been of the most satisfying and delightful character.

At the end of the first movement of the symphony the conductor was recalled three times. The program ran as follows:

"Symphony No. 1, in C-minor, Op. 68," ..... Brams
Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
Andante sostenuto.
Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.
"On the Steppes of Central Asia," Orchestral Sketch, Op. 7 .....Bordin
Concerto for violoncello in D-major.... ..... Haydn
Allegro moderato.
Adagio.
Allegro.
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," ..... Wagner

The concert of last evening was notable in the appearance of Jean Bedett, the eminent French 'cellist, as soloist with the orchestra in the superb performance of Haydn's "Concerto in D-minor."

The Brahms beautiful Symphony No. 1 in C-minor was given a magnificent performance by the orchestra opening with a solemn introduction of great beauty and impressiveness. The final movement of the Symphony is based on themes of rare interpretation and the beautiful melody and orchestral coloring delighted the ear of the listener and satisfied the artistic sense of the most critical. Borodin's descriptive orchestra sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," gave opportunity for delightful coloring by the various instruments in the orchestra and in this as in everything else on the program, Mr. Monteux led his forces to splendid achievements.

The program ended with a brilliant and dazzling performance of Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

Jean Beditti, the soloist of the evening, displayed a rarely beautiful tone and his consummate skill with his instrument brought him an ovation.

He was enthusiastically recalled three times at the end of his performance.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE THIS EVENING

Concert to be Given in Infantry Hall as Planned.

STRIKERS JOIN REHEARSAL

Threatened Disruption in Ranks Over Discharge of Concertmaster Fradkin Fa... rialize. Full Number of ...Will be on Hand.

The Boston Symph... ...ra, despite the threatened ... of its membership over the ... of Frederic Fradkin, concertm... appear at Infantry Hall, in ...y, this evening in the fourth of its series of concerts and will provide the complete scheduled programme. This announcement was made from Symphony Hall, Boston, yesterday forenoon.

Endeavors to have other union members of the orchestra join those who remained away from Saturday night's concert over the Fradkin issue were unsuccessful, it was stated. Striking members appeared at yesterday morning's rehearsal at 10 and voluntarily joined in the rehearsal, it was announced.

In personal letters to striking members, Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the trustees of Symphony Orchestra, pointed out that their refusal to appear Saturday night had constituted a breach of the terms of their contract. He said he would meet them at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, between 2 and 5, if they cared to call. When the striking members appeared at yesterday morning's rehearsal, and asked if they could join in the rehearsal, they were told that they could join voluntarily.

According to the announcement from Boston yesterday forenoon, not only will the scheduled programme be given in this city to-night, but the requisite number of players will be on hand.

TRIBUNE

...dress: Providence, R. I.

...te FEB 2 8 1920 A

...sold, ...ler-Liszt.

SYMPHONY 'CELLIST'S GREAT ART.

When Jean Bedetti, the remarkable new French 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is to be the soloist at the next concert of the orchestra here on March 9, played Schumann's" Concerto" at the Symphony concerts in Boston on Jan. 30 and 31, the consensus of enthusiastic opinion was as follows:

Olin Downes in the Boston Post: "Mr. Bedetti has proved himself an extraordinary artist. . . . His technical resources seemed to be endless. There was no difficulty, however, unwiedy the occasional solo passage, which he did not completely and masterfully surmount, and every talent of the performer was modestly subordinated to the message of the music. He took his place as one of the most gifted 'cellists that have been associated with this orchestra."

H. T. Parker in the Transcript: "Only by Mr. Casals and Miss Harrison has the violoncello been so played in recent years—with such technical ease and surety, lightness and elasticity of bow and fingers, rich transparent, unforced tone, such taste, sensibility and intelligence. The Symphony Orchestra has gained one day of the rare violincellists of this present day."

Philip Hale in the Herald: "Mr. Bedetti played the Andante of this (Schumann) Concerto most poetically; but he did more than this; by his technical skill, his unfailing accuracy, his beauty of tonal quality, his phrasing, his fine differentiation, he made the other portions of the Concerto interesting—even engrossing. The difficult passage work was vitalized by his skill, tone and taste."

MARY GARDEN COMING

100-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From

MEMBERS WHO QUIT BOSTON SYMPHONY RESUME PLAC

Trustees Do Not Object to Uni... Affiliations Under Conditions.

Boston, March 8.—A committee of th... of the members of the Boston Symph... ated with the ...Musicians conferred to-day ... erick P. Cabot, President of the board of trustees of the orchestra.

They reported back to a union meeting that they had been informed that the trustees would not object to union affiliation "if the American Federation of Musicians will make special rules for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, granting this organization privileges neither granted to nor asked for by any one of the other 16 organizations of this kind in this country."

No action was taken on this report. Earlier in the day the 35 players who had refused to participate in the regular concert last Saturday night because of the dismissal of Frederic Fradkin, concertmaster, joined the other members of the orchestra. They took this action upon the advice of Mr. Fradkin.

TRIBUNE

...s: Providence, R. I.

JEAN BEDETTI.

...n Bedetti, who came from Europe ...autumn to lead the golden-toned ... section of the Boston Symphony ...stra, will be heard as soloist at ...ymphony concert next Tuesday. Mr. ...'s beautiful tone and his consum... skill with his instrument has ca... already been discernible to t... goers of Providence. Taking fir... At the Paris Conservatory in 19... ...ed in several chamber music e... ...shi., and in 1904 became first 'cellist ...n re "Opera Comique" Orchestra. In ...sd ...aindertook additional duties in the ...scus Orchestra, where he played also ...afts 'cellist under three conductors—...n in Pierne and Monteux. As a ...n th apart from any organization, ...s ame particularly famous, and gave ... recitals in a number of French ...R. ...so in Spain, Belgium, Switzer... ...be England. His musical career ...na... rupted by the war. Called out ...t Mobilization of Aug. 2nd, 1914, ...of... d activel... at the front for 18 ...S...

From TRIBUNE

...ddress: Providence, R. I.

...Date

NOTED 'CELLIST TO PLAY AT COMING BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The last Boston Symphony Concert of the season but one, to be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, will be notable in the appearance of Jean Bedetti, France's greatest 'cellist, who will play Haydn's Concerto in D major with the orchestra. The same concert will be further interesting in that Pierre Monteux will conduct the famous First Symphony of Brahms in C minor. But the eloquence of its many voices and the dramatic power of its broader lines, this masterpiece has become a favorite of all time. The remainder of the program traverses Borodin's descriptive orchestral sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's rousing overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

At the Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday Pierre Monteux will revive "A Pagan Poem," by Charles Martin Loeffler. The piano part will be taken by Heinrich Gebhard, whose name is connected with the first performance of this work, which took place at these concerts in 1907. The reed solo will be played by Louis Speyer. Another revival will be the sixth symphony by Glazounoff. The overture, nocturne and scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music will complete the program.

"A PAGAN POEM" AT SYMPHONY

At the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday, March 12 and 13, which will precede a week of travelling by the orchestra, Pierre Monteux will revive "A Pagan Poem," by Charles Martin Loeffler, considered by many his masterpiece. Based on an Eclogue of Virgil, this score is written for orchestra with pianoforte, English horn and three trumpets obligati. The piano part on this occasion will be taken by Heinrich Gebhard, whose name is connected with the first performance of this work, which took place at these concerts in 1907. The English bone solo will be played by Louis Speyer. Another revival will be the Sixth Symphony by the Russian Glazounoff. The programme will be introduced in lighter vein by the dainty and piquant Overture, Nocturne, and Scherzo from Mendelssohn's incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

GEBHARD TO PLAY WITH SYMPHONY

Next Friday and Saturday (March 12 and 13) the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a pair of concerts, to be followed by week of travelling. The program is distinctive by Charles Martin Loeffler's great work, "A Pagan Poem" (after Virgil), which Pierre Monteaux will revive. The score includes a piano solo which will be played by Heinrich Gebhard, an exceptionally beautiful English horn solo, to be played by Louis Speyer, the virtuoso of the orchestra, and three trumpets obbligati. Glazounoff's Sixth Symphony in C minor will also figure upon this program, and Mendelssohn's fairy music (Overture, Nocturne and Scherzo) written for "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" and a Symphony by Glazunov from Mr. Monteux—"The Flonzaleys," Mr. Bauer and New Music by Ernest Bloch—Mme. Raisa as Ornate Singer

MUSIC of fancy and dexterity begins Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening—the overture, nocturne and scherzo from Mendelssohn's numbers for Shakspeare's comedy of fairy folk, crossed lovers and Bottom and his train, "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Music of keen imagination and high technical skill continues the list—Mr. Loeffler's Pagan Poem suggested by Vergil's Eclogue of the lover drawn by spells to the passionately loving maiden. In it Mr. Gebhard as heretofore, will play the piano part, while the part for English horn will fall to Mr. Speyer, who should do much with it. Well-sounding music from practised, rather than fertile hand will end the programme—the sixth symphony of the Russian, Glazunov.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday which will precede a week of traveling by the orchestra, Mr. Monteux will revive Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," considered by many his masterpiece. Based on an eclogue of Virgil, this score is written for orchestra with pianoforte, English horn, and three trumpets obbligati. The piano part will be played by Mr. Gebhard; the English horn solo by Louis Speyer. Another revival will be the Sixth Symphony of Glazounoff. The overture, Nocturne, and Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" will be first on the program.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8—Boston Symphony Orchestra. Eighteenth program. Overture, Nocturne and Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; "Pagan

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

After returning from the last southern trip of the season, which will occupy the coming week, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the following attractive program on Friday afternoon, March 26, and Saturday evening, March 27: Dvorak's symphony "From the New World"; the prelude of "Lohengrin" and "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried"; Debussy's "Little Suite" and Berlioz's Rakoczy March.

NEXT WEEK'S SYMPHONY

After returning from the last Southern trip of the season, which will occupy the coming week, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the following programme on Friday afternoon, March 26 and Saturday evening, March 27: Symphony, "From the New World," Dvorak; Wagner prelude to "Lohengrin" and "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried"; Debussy, "Little Suite"; Berlioz' "Rakoczy" march.

Events and Comments

There are no Symphony concerts scheduled for this week. The program announced for March 26 and 27 includes Dvorak's "New World" symphony, two Wagner excerpts, the prelude to "Lohengrin" and "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," besides Debussy's "Little Suite" and Berlioz's "Rakoczy March."

ESTABLISHED 1881

From EVENING POST, MAR 13 1920 K

New York City

Boston Symphony Programmes

A notable feature of the final Thursday evening concert of this season, to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra March 18, will be the Concertino by John Alden Carpenter (the composer of "The Birthday of the Infanta"), which E. Robert Schmitz, the noted French pianist, will play with the orchestra. The other numbers will be Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

For the final matinée Saturday, March 20, Pierre Monteux will conduct "Le Pause del Silenzio" ("The Pauses of Silence"), Seven Symphonic Expressions by Malipiero, the revolutionary young Italian composer; also Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio," Mozart's symphony in G minor, and Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy."

From EVENING SUN

Address New York City

Date MAR 17 1920

Boston Symphony Changes.

The programmes for the coming Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall have been changed as follows:

To-morrow evening Mr. Monteux will conduct the fourth Beethoven symphony, the prelude to "Lohengrin," the "Siegfried Idyll," the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried" and excerpts from the third act of "The Master Singers."

Saturday afternoon will hear the overture to "Fidelio," Mozart's symphony in G minor, Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia" and "Debussy's "Petite Suite," arranged for orchestra by Henri Buesser.

MAR 14 1920

From American

New York City

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra offers the following programme for its final pair of concerts this season in Carnegie Hall. On the evening of March 18 the list comprises Carpenter's Concertino, with E. Robert Schmitz at the piano; "Fantastic" symphony by Berlioz; overture to "Flying Dutchman" by Wagner. On the afternoon of March 20 the orchestra will play "Le Pause del Silenzio" by Malipiero. Overture to "Fidelio" by Beethoven, symphony in G. minor by Mozart, "Impressions of Italy" by Charpentier.

er Cutting Bureau in the

New York City

MAR 14 H

Schmitz With Boston Orchestra.

So pronounced was the success attained by E. Robert Schmitz, the French soldier-pianist, in his playing of the John Alden Carpenter "Concertino," with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in that city last month that he has been engaged to repeat his dazzling performance with them at Carnegie Hall on Thursday next.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Providence, R. I.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra brought out at its concert on Saturday week a new composition by Carpenter, a concertino for pianoforte and orchestra, with the success that is now associated with and expected of the work of this young American composer. Mr. Carpenter's concertino is shorter than most concertos, classic or modern, and in no sense of the word is it academic. It runs in the three orthodox movements, however, allegro, slow division, and allegro again. It is written for full orchestra and the piano is joined to it much oftener than it is used as a solo instrument.

The critics report that the music is light, shimmering, sportive, "of intimate mood and playful progress, vivid with harmonic and instrumental color." The concertino is said to be extremely supple and variable, not suggestive of restlessness but rather impulsiveness and liveliness of fancy. The keynote to the composition is given in the Boston Transcript, which says: "Here at last is a concertino content to be light, fanciful, gay, sportive. An American has written it in American high spirits."

SUNDAY JOURNAL

ress New York City

Boston Symphony This Week.

At each of the final pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the season, to be given Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Pierre Monteux will give a notable piece its first performance in New York. On Thursday John Alden Carpenter's piano "Concertino," assisted by E. Robert Schmitz, the noted French pianist; on Saturday "The Pauses of Silence: Seven Symphonic Expressions," by Malipiero, the daring young Italian composer whose music has attracted considerable attention. The other numbers for the Thursday concert will be Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony, Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia" and Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman." For Saturday Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio," Mozart's Symphony in G Minor (Kochel 550), and Charpentier's Orchestral Suite, "Impressions of Italy."

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Times

New York City

Boston Symphony's Programs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra sudden parting with thirty-one of players on the eve of this week's Southern tour has necessitated a change its two programs for New York. concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursd evening will now present Beethove fourth symphony and a Wagner gro from "Lohengrin," "Siegfried" a "Master Singers." For next Saturd afternoon Mr. Monteux's revised list cludes Beethoven's "Fidelio" overtu Mozart's G minor symphony, Borodi "On the Steppes of Central Asia" a Debussy's "Petite Suite" arranged orchestra by Henri Buesser.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Herald

New York City

The final pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday night and Saturday afternoon. The programme for Thursday is: Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony; concertino, Carpenter, with Robert Schmitz playing the piano solo, Borodin, "On the Steppes of Central Asia"; Wagner, overture, "Flying Dutchman." For Saturday the programme is: Malipiero, "Le Pause del Silenzio" ("The Pauses of Silence") seven symphonic expressions; Beethoven, overture, "Fidelio"; Mozart, symphony G minor, Koechel 550; Charpentier, "Impressions of Italy."

ESTABLISHED 1881

From TIMES,

Brooklyn, N. Y. MAR 17 1920

EMA DESTINN, SOLOIST.

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 19, the soloist will be Madame Ema Destinn, the diva, who is a dramatic and lyric soprano in one. Before journeying to the land of her birth, the Czecho-Slovakia of the now troublous and revolutionary Central Europe, she transfixed many a Metropolitan Opera audience with the electric beauty of her tones. Returning to this, her adopted country, her welcome has been enthusiastic.

STAR

ress: Baltimore, Md.

e MAR - 6 1920 P

DESTINN WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mme. Ema Destinn, the so whose full-throated eloquence electric dramatic power is une in our time, will be the soloist the final Boston Symphony concert the season to be given in the Lyric Theater on Tuesday evening, March 16. An ardent Czecho-Slovak, she has been eagerly welcomed back from her revolutionary native land to this her adopted country, where season after season she has transfixed Metropolitan Opera audiences with [illegible] tones. One of her arias at this concert will be the famous song of Donna Anna in the last scene of Mozart's "Don Giovanni," "Non mi Dir." Pierre Monteux will conduct Berlioz's noted "Fantastic" Symphony, in which the composer weaves his romantic love affair through various episodes—his "Dreams and Passions," "A Ball," "Pastoral Scene," "March to the Scaffold" (culmination in his own execution) and a "Witches' Sabbath." The other numbers will be Borodin's tone picture, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's overture [illegible]

(ORIGINAL)

106-110 SEVENTH AVE.

NEW YORK

ESTABLISHED 1881

From North American

Philadelphia, Pa

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at the Academy on Wednesday evening, March 17, the soloist will be Emma Destinn, the Czecho-Slovakia prima donna. She will sing the "Non mi dir" of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni." Pierre Monteux will conduct Mozart's G mino Symphony, Beethoven's overture to hi opera "Fidelio," and Charpentier's sun ny and realistic "Impressions of Italy," consisting of the "Serenade" (with viol solo off-stage), "At the Fountain," "O Mulebäck," "On the Summits," and finally, "Naples."

Trans. Mar 21

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Mr. Monteux's Miscellany—Novel from the Musical Association — Mm Gauthier, Garrison and van Dresser Singers — Mr. Kreisler's Adieux—Mi Recitals

A "VERY FAVORITE" symphony, the old play-bills used to say, bes Mr. Monteux's programme for Symphony Concerts of next Friday af noon and Saturday evening—Dvorak's E minor, No. 5, better known by the s titie "From the New World." The sophisticated may dismiss it as an obvious music; the learned may debate whether Czech or American quality prevails through it; but the average hearer takes perennial pleasure in it because Dvorak quickens his ear and stirs his imagination. Then follow two pieces by Wagner—the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Forest-Music from "Siegfried." Thereafter comes the pretty miniatures of Debussy's "Little Suite" as shifted from piano to orchestra by Henri Busser of the Opera at Faris, and last the "Rakoczy March" from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." A promising miscellany shrewdly adjusted to the numbers of the orchestra now at Mr. Monteux's disposal.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

At the 19th pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 26-27, Mr. Monteux will conduct Dvorak's Fifth Symphony "From the New World." Written during Dvorak's sojourn in America, it has for years been an especial favorite with our public. For the first time at these concerts, Debussy's dainty "Petit Suite" will be played. It has the following movements: "En Batear, "Corteg "Menuet," "Ballet." The remainder the program is more familiar: Wagne prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "For Murmurs," from the second act of "Si fried." To close, Berlioz's Hungar "Rakoczy" March.

At the 19th pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 26-27, Pierre Monteux will conduct Dvorak's fifth symphony "From the New World." Written during the sojourn of the great Czech composer in America ,and influenced by songs of the American Negroes, it has for years been an especial favorite with our public. For the first time at these concerts, Debussy's "Petite Suite," will be played. It has the following movements: "En Bateau", "Cortege", "Menuet", "Ballet." The remainder of the programme is more familiar: W

Post Mar 21

New York City

MUSIC NOTES.

"Paoletta," a romantic opera by Pierro Floridia, was performed at the Capitol Theatre today, an excellent cast assisting the theatre's big chorus, orchestra, organ and stage band.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has prolonged its last New York visit of the season in order to give a special concert in Newark at the First Regiment Armory tonight, assisted by Rudolph Ganz.

106-110 SEVENTH AVE.

NEW YORK

ESTABLISHED 1881

JAN 24 1920

From

Willem Mengelberg, the distinguished Dutch conductor, recently changed places for a concert with Gabriel Pierne of the Cologne orchestra in Paris. The Parisians are still rubbing their eyes—which does them great credit. It will be remembered that the Boston Symphony orchestra in casting about for a suitable successor to the late lamented Dr. Karl Muck made unsuccessful advances toward Mengelberg. Apropos of these unsuccessful advances and of the present status of things with the Boston orchestra a New York critic slyly and unfeelingly remarks—"Too bad that negotiations to bring him (Mengelberg) to Boston fell through. Perhaps it is not too late after all." The latter remark, for all its subtlety, is a suggestion distinctly not nice.

ew York City

MAR 21 1920

Hippodrome recitals), [illegible] four-piano recital.

MONDAY, March 22.—Metropolitan Aeolian Hall (afternoon), Fred Mildred Wellerson, 'cello recita Symphony, Monteux conductor,

ress New York City

MAR 21 1920

Boston Symphony at Newark.

At the Boston Symphony concert to given in the Newark armory to-mor evening three notable excerpts fr Wagner's music dramas will be pla instead of Charpentier's "Impressions Italy," as originally announced. Th are "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried "A Siegfried Idyll," and selections fr the third act of the "Mastersinger introduction, dance of the apprenti and welcome to Hans Sachs. The r mainder of the program will be u changed. Weber's overture to "D Freischutz," Borodin's sketch, "on t Steppes of Central Asia," and Grieg concerto in which Rudolph Ganz, eminent pianist, will take the solo p m

ress New York City

e

Boston Symphony at Newa

Featuring the Boston Symphon chestra, with Pierre Monteux c ing the forces, and Rudolph Ganz pianist, as soloist, the sixth co the World Famous Artists' Ser take place to-morrow evening. ing in rapid order, Manager Jo Fuersman announces Ysaye and on April 3, Heifetz on April 7 a Mccormack on April 20, all at th ark Armory, under his famous ac ceting.

Trios BY SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the following unusually attractive program on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 26 and 27: Dvorak's famous symphony, two notable excerpts from Wagner, the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried"; Debussy's "Little Suite" and Berlioz's Rakoczy March.

Concert Programs of the We

SYMPHONY HALL, May at 2:3 and Saturday, at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, 19th program. "New World" Symphony, Dvorak; Little Suite, Debussy; Prelude to "Lohengrin" and "Forest Murmurs," from "Siegfried," Wagner; Rackoczy March, Berlioz. There is no soloist.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Also May 21

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Pierre Monteux will conduct Dvorak's fifth symphony ("From the New World"). For the first time at these concerts Debussy's dainty "Petite Suite" will be played. Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "Forest Murmurs" from the second act of "Siegfried" and Berliox' "Bakoosy March" are the other numbers.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

At the Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday Pierre Monteux will revive "A Pagan Poem," by Charles Martin Loeffler. The piano part will be taken by Heinrich Gebhard, whose name is connected with the first performance of this work, which took place at these concerts in 1907. The reed solo will be played by Louis Speyer. Another revival will be the sixth symphony by Glazounoff. The overture, nocturne and scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music will complete the program.

"A PAGAN POEM" AT SYMPHONY

At the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday, March 12 and 13, which will precede a week of travelling by the orchestra, Pierre Monteux will revive "A Pagan Poem," by Charles Martin Loeffler, considered by many his masterpiece. Based on an Eclogue of Virgil, this score is written for orchestra with pianoforte, English horn and three trumpets obligati. The piano part on this occasion will be taken by Heinrich Gebhard, whose name is connected with the first performance of this work, which took place at these concerts in 1907. The English bone solo will be played by Louis Speyer. Another revival will be the Sixth Symphony by the Russian Glazounoff. The programme will be introduced in lighter vein by the dainty and piquant Overture, Nocturne and Scherzo from Mendelssohn's incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

GEBHARD TO PLAY WITH SYMPHONY

Next Friday and Saturday (March 12 and 13) the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a pair of concerts, to be followed by week of travelling. The program is distinctive by Charles Martin Loeffler's great work, "A Pagan Poem" (after Virgil), which Pierre Monteaux will revive. The score includes a piano solo which will be played by Heinrich Gebhard, an exceptionally beautiful English horn solo, to be played by Louis Speyer, the virtuoso of the orchestra, and three trumpets obbligati. Glazounoff's Sixth Symphony in C minor will also figure upon this program, and Mendelssohn's fairy music (Overture, Nocturne and Scherzo) written for "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" and a Symphony by Glazunov from Mr. Monteux—"The Flonzaleys," Mr. Bauer and New Music by Ernest Bloch—Mme. Raisa as Ornate Singer

MUSIC of fancy and dexterity begins Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening—the overture, nocturne and scherzo from Mendelssohn's numbers for Shakspeare's comedy of fairy folk, crossed lovers and Bottom and his train, "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Music of keen imagination and high technical skill continues the list—Mr. Loeffler's Pagan Poem suggested by Vergil's Eclogue of the lover drawn by spells to the passionately loving maiden. In it Mr. Gebhard as heretofore, will play the piano part, while the part for English horn will fall to Mr. Speyer, who should do much with it. Well-sounding music from practised, rather than fertile hand will end the programme—the sixth symphony of the Russian, Glazunov.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday which will precede a week of traveling by the orchestra, Mr. Monteux will revive Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," considered by many his masterpiece. Based on an eclogue of Virgil, this score is written for orchestra with pianoforte, English horn, and three trumpets obbligati. The piano part will be played by Mr. Gebhard; the English horn solo by Louis Speyer. Another revival will be the Sixth Symphony of Glazounoff. The overture, Nocturne, and Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" will be first on the program.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8 — Boston Symphony Orchestra. Eighteenth program. Overture, Nocturne and Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; "Pagan

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

After returning from the last southern trip of the season, which will occupy the coming week, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the following attractive program on Friday afternoon, March 26, and Saturday evening, March 27: Dvorak's symphony "From the New World"; the prelude of "Lohengrin" and "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried"; Debussy's "Little Suite" and Berlioz's Rakoczy March.

NEXT WEEK'S SYMPHONY

After returning from the last Southern trip of the season, which will occupy the coming week, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the following programme on Friday afternoon, March 26 and Saturday evening, March 27: Symphony, "From the New World," Dvorak; Wagner prelude to "Lohengrin" and "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried"; Debussy, "Little Suite"; Berlioz' "Rakoczy" march.

Events and Comments

There are no Symphony concerts scheduled for this week. The program announced for March 26 and 27 includes Dvorak's "New World" symphony, two Wagner excerpts, the prelude to "Lohengrin" and "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," besides Debussy's "Little Suite" and Berlioz's "Rakoczy March."

ESTABLISHED 1881

From EVENING POST, New York City

Boston Symphony Programmes

A notable feature of the final Thursday evening concert of this season, to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra March 18, will be the Concertino by John Alden Carpenter (the composer of "The Birthday of the Infanta"), which E. Robert Schmitz, the noted French pianist, will play with the orchestra. The other numbers will be Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

For the final matinée Saturday, March 20, Pierre Monteux will conduct "Le Pause del Silenzio" ("The Pauses of Silence"), Seven Symphonic Expressions by Malipiero, the revolutionary young Italian composer; also Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio," Mozart's symphony in G minor, and Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy."

From EVENING SUN

Address New York City

Date

Boston Symphony Changes.

The programmes for the coming Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall have been changed as follows:

To-morrow evening Mr. Monteux will conduct the fourth Beethoven symphony, the prelude to "Lohengrin," the "Siegfried Idyll," the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried" and excerpts from the third act of "The Master Singers."

Saturday afternoon will hear the overture to "Fidelio," Mozart's symphony in G minor, Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia" and "Debussy's "Petite Suite," arranged for orchestra by Henri Buesser.

From American New York City

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra offers the following programme for its final pair of concerts this season in Carnegie Hall. On the evening of March 18 the list comprises Carpenter's Concertino, with E. Robert Schmitz at the piano; "Fantastic" symphony by Berlioz; overture to "Flying Dutchman" by Wagner. On the afternoon of March 20 the orchestra will play "Le Pause del Silenzio" by Malipiero, overture to "Fidelio" by Beethoven, symphony in G. minor by Mozart, "Impressions of Italy" by Charpentier.

...er Cutting Bureau in the ...

New York City

Schmitz With Boston Orchestra.

So pronounced was the success attained by E. Robert Schmitz, the French soldier-pianist, in his playing of the John Alden Carpenter "Concertino," with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in that city last month, that he has been engaged to repeat his dazzling performance with them at Carnegie Hall on Thursday next.

...SEVENTH AVE. NEW YORK ESTABLISHED 1881

From ...rovidence, R. I.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra brought out at its concert on Saturday week a new composition by Carpenter, a concertino for pianoforte and orchestra, with the success that is now associated with and expected of the work of this young American composer. Mr. Carpenter's concertino is shorter than most concertos, classic or modern, and in no sense of the word is it academic. It runs in the three orthodox movements, however, allegro, slow division, and allegro again. It is written for full orchestra and the piano is joined to it much oftener than it is used as a solo instrument.

The critics report that the music is light, shimmering, sportive, "of intimate mood and playful progress, vivid with harmonic and instrumental color." The concertino is said to be extremely supple and variable, not suggestive of restlessness but rather impulsiveness and liveliness of fancy. The keynote to the composition is given in the Boston Transcript, which says: "Here at last is a concertino content to be light, fanciful, gay, sportive. An American has written it in American high spirits."

...SUNDAY JOURNAL ...

...ress New York City

Boston Symphony This Week.

At each of the final pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the season, to be given Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Pierre Monteux will give a notable piece its first performance in New York. On Thursday John Alden Carpenter's piano "Concertino," assisted by E. Robert Schmitz, the noted French pianist; on Saturday "The Pauses of Silence: Seven Symphonic Expressions," by Malipiero, the daring young Italian composer whose music has attracted considerable attention. The other numbers for the Thursday concert will be Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony, Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia" and Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman." For Saturday Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio," Mozart's Symphony in G Minor (Kochel 550), and Charpentier's Orchestral Suite, "Impressions of Italy."

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Times New York City

Boston Symphony's Programs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, sudden parting with thirty-one of i players on the eve of this week's South ern tour has necessitated a change its two programs for New York. T concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursd evening will now present Beethover fourth symphony and a Wagner gro from "Lohengrin," "Siegfried" a "Master Singers." For next Saturd afternoon Mr. Monteux's revised list cludes Beethoven's "Fidelio" overtu Mozart's G minor symphony, Borodi "On the Steppes of Central Asia" a Debussy's "Petite Suite" arranged f orchestra by Henri Buesser.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Herald New York Cit

The final pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday night and Saturday aftrnoon. The programme for Thursday is: Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony; concertino, Carpenter, with Robert Schmitz playing the piano solo, Borodin, "On the Steppes of Central Asia"; Wagner, overture, "Flying Dutchman." For Saturday the programme is: Malipiero, "Le Pause del Silenzio" ("The Pauses of Silence") seven symphonic expressions; Beethoven, overture, "Fidelio"; Mozart, symphony G minor, Koechel 550; Charpentier, "Impressions of Italy."

ESTABLISHED 1881

From TIMES, Brooklyn, N. Y.

EMA DESTINN, SOLOIST.

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 19, the soloist will be Madame Ema Destinn, the diva, who is a dramatic and lyric soprano in one. Before journeying to the land of her birth, the Czecho-Slovakia of the now troublous and revolutionary Central Europe, she transfixed many a Metropolitan Opera audience with the electric beauty of her tones. Returning to this, her adopted country, her welcome has been enthusiastic.

STAR

...ress: Baltimore, Md.

...e MAR - 6 1924

DESTINN WITH BOSTO SYMPHONY

Mme. Ema Destinn, the so whose full-throated eloquence electric dramatic power is unec in our time, will be the soloist the final Boston Symphony concert of the season to be given in the Lyric Theater on Tuesday evening, March 16. An ardent Czecho-Slovak, she has been eagerly welcomed back from her revolutionary native land to this her adopted country, where season after season she has transfixed Metropolitan Opera audiences with tones. One of her arias at this co cent will be the famous song of Donna Anna in the last scene of Mozart's "Don Giovanni," "Non mi Dir." Pierre Monteux will conduct Berlioz's noted "Fantastic" Symphony, in which the composer weaves his romantic love affair through various episodes—his "Dreams and Passions," "A Ball," "Pastoral Scene," "March to the Scaffold" (culmination in his own execution) and a "Witches' Sabbath." The other numbers will be Borodin's tone picture, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's overture

(ORIGINAL) 106-110 SEVENTH AVE. NEW YORK ESTABLISHED 1881

From North American Philadelphia, Pa

* * *

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at the Academy on Wednesday evening, March 17, the soloist will be Emma Destinn, the Czecho-Slovakia prima donna. She will sing the "Non mi dir" of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni." Pierre Monteux will conduct Mozart's G mino Symphony, Beethoven's overture to hi opera "Fidelio," and Charpentier's sun ny and realistic "Impressions of Italy," consisting of the "Serenade" (with viol solo off-stage), "At the Fountain," "O Muleback," "On the Summits," and finally, "Naples."

Trans. Mar 24

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Mr. Monteux's Miscellany—Novel ... from the Musical Association — Mm Gauthier, Garrison and van Dresser Singers — Mr. Kreisler's Adieux—Mi Recitals

A "VERY FAVORITE" symphony, the old play-bills used to say, be Mr. Monteux's programme for Symphony Concerts of next Friday af noon and Saturday evening—Dvorák's E minor, No. 5, better known by the s titie "From the New World." The sophisticated may dismiss it as an obvious music; the learned may debate whether Czeck or American quality prevails through it; but the average hearer takes perennial pleasure in it because Dvorák quickens his ear and stirs his imagination. Then follow two pieces by Wagner—the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Forest-Music from "Siegfried." Thereafter comes the pretty miniatures of Debussy's "Little Suite" as shifted from piano to orchestra by Henri Busser of the Opera at Paris, and last the "Rákoczy March" from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." A promising miscellany shrewdly adjusted to the numbers of the orchestra now at Mr. Monteux's disposal.

Herald Mar 21

BOSTON SYMPHONY

At the 19th pair of Boston Symph concerts, to be given in Symphony H next Friday afternoon and Satur evening, March 26-27, Pierre Monte will conduct Dvorak's Fifth Symphony "From the New World." Written du ing Dvorak's sojourn in America, it ha for years been an especial favorite wit our public. For the first time at the concerts, Debussy's dainty "Petit Suite" will be played. It has the follo ing movements: "En Bateau," "Corteg "Menuet," "Ballet." The remainder the program is more familiar: Wagne prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "For Murmurs," from the second act of "Si fried." To close, Berlioz's Hungar "Rakoczy" March.

From Times New York City

MUSIC NOTES.

"Paoletta," a romantic opera by Pietro Floridia, was performed at the Capitol yesterday, an excellent cast assisting the theatre's big chorus, orchestra, organ and stage band.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has prolonged its last New York visit of the season in order to give a special concert in Newark at the First Regiment Armory tonight, assisted by Rudolph Ganz.

106-110 SEVENTH AVE. NEW YORK ESTABLISHED 1881 JAN 24 1924

From

Willem Mengelberg, the distinguish Dutch conductor, recently chang places for a ...cert with Gabri Pierne of the Colonne orchestra Paris. The Parisians are still rubbi their eyes—which does them gre credit. It will be remembered that t Boston Symphony orchestra in casti about for a suitable successor to t late lamented Dr. Karl Muck ma unsuccessful advances toward Meng berg. Apropos of these unsuccessf advances and of the present status things with the Boston orchestra a Ne York critic slyly and unfeelingly marks—"Too bad that negotiations bring him (Mengelberg) to Boston through. Perhaps it is not too la after all." The latter remark, for a its subtlety, is a suggestion distinct not nice.

...w York City

...Hippodrome evening), Lev... four-piano recital.

MONDAY, March 22.—Metropolitan Aeolian Hall (afternoon), Fred Mildred Wellerson, 'cello recita Symphony, Monteux conductor,

...ess New York City

Boston Symphony at Newark.

At the Boston Symphony concert to given in the Newark armory to-mor evening three notable excerpts fr Wagner's music dramas will be play instead of Charpentier's "Impressions Italy," as originally announced. Th are "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried "A Siegfried Idyll," and selections fr the third act of the "Mastersinger introduction, dance of the apprenti and welcome to Hans Sachs. The r mainder of the program will be u changed. Weber's overture to "D Freischutz," Borodin's sketch, "on t Steppes of Central Asia," and Grieg concerto in which Rudolph Ganz, eminent pianist, will take the solo p

...m

...dress New York City

...e

Boston Symphony at Newa...

Featuring the Boston Sympho chestra, with Pierre Monteux ing the forces, and Rudolph Ganz pianist, as soloist, the sixth con the World Famous Artists' Ser take place to-morrow evening. ing in rapid order, Manager Jo Fuerstman announces Ysaye and on April 3, Heifetz on April 7 a ...Cormack on April 20, all at t ...ark Armory, under his famous ac ...ening.

TWO BY SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the following unusually attractive program on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 26 and 27: Dvorak's famous symphony, two notable excerpts from Wagner, the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried"; Debussy's "Little Suite" and Berlioz's Rakoczy March.

Concert Programs of the We...

SYMPHONY HALL, ...day at 2:3... and Saturday, at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, 19th program. "New World" Symphony, Dvorak; Little Suite, Debussy; Prelude to "Lohengrin" and "Forest Murmurs," from "Siegfried," Wagner; Rackoczy March, Berlioz. There is no soloist.

Post Mar 21

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Pierre Monteux will conduct Dvorak's fifth symphony ("From the New World"). For the first time at these concerts Debussy's dainty "Petite Suite" will be played. Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "Forest Murmurs" from the second act o "Siegfried" and Berlioz' "Rakoozy March" are the other numbers.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

At the Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday Pierre Monteux will revive "A Pagan Poem," by Charles Martin Loeffler. The piano part will be taken by Heinrich Gebhard, whose name is connected with the first performance of this work, which took place at these concerts in 1907. The reed solo will be played by Louis Speyer. Another revival will be the sixth symphony by Glazounoff. The overture, nocturne and scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music will complete the program.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

After returning from the last southern trip of the season, which will occupy the coming week, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the following attractive program on Friday afternoon, March 26, and Saturday evening, March 27: Dvorak's symphony "From the New World"; the prelude of "Lohengrin" and "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried"; Debussy's "Little Suite" and Berlioz's Rakoczy March.

"A PAGAN POEM" AT SYMPHONY

At the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday, March 12 and 13, which will precede a week of travelling by the orchestra, Pierre Monteux will revive "A Pagan Poem," by Charles Martin Loeffler, considered by many his masterpiece. Based on an Eclogue of Virgil, this score is written for orchestra with pianoforte, English horn and three trumpets obligati. The piano part on this occasion will be taken by Heinrich Gebhard, whose name is connected with the first performance of this work, which took place at these concerts in 1907. The English bone solo will be played by Louis Speyer. Another revival will be the Sixth Symphony by the Russian Glazounoff. The programme will be introduced in lighter vein by the dainty and piquant Overture, Nocturne and Scherzo from Mendelssohn's incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

NEXT WEEK'S SYMPHONY

After returning from the last Southern trip of the season, which will occupy the coming week, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the following programme on Friday afternoon, March 26 and Saturday evening, March 27: Symphony, "From the New World," Dvorak; Wagner prelude to "Lohengrin" and "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried"; Debussy, "Little Suite"; Berlioz' "Rakoczy" march.

Events and Comments

There are no Symphony concerts scheduled for this week. The program announced for March 26 and 27 includes Dvorak's "New World" symphony, two Wagner excerpts, the prelude to "Lohengrin" and "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," besides Debussy's "Little Suite" and Berlioz's "Rakoczy March."

ESTABLISHED 1881

From EVENING POST,
New York City

Boston Symphony Programmes

A notable feature of the final Thursday evening concert of this season, to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra March 18, will be the Concertino by John Alden Carpenter (the composer of "The Birthday of the Infanta"), which E. Robert Schmitz, the noted French pianist, will play with the orchestra. The other numbers will be Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

For the final matinée Saturday, March 20, Pierre Monteux will conduct "Le Pause del Silenzio" ("The Pauses of Silence"), Seven Symphonic Expressions by Malipiero, the revolutionary young Italian composer; also Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio," Mozart's symphony in G minor, and Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy."

From EVENING SUN

Address New York City

Date

Boston Symphony Changes.

The programmes for the coming Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall have been changed as follows:

To-morrow evening Mr. Monteux will conduct the fourth Beethoven symphony, the prelude to "Lohengrin," the "Siegfried Idyll," the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried" and excerpts from the third act of "The Master Singers."

Saturday afternoon will hear the overture to "Fidelio," Mozart's symphony in G minor, Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia" and "Debussy's "Petite Suite," arranged for orchestra by Henri Buesser.

From American
New York City

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra offers the following programme for its final pair of concerts this season in Carnegie Hall. On the evening of March 18 the list comprises Carpenter's Concertino, with E. Robert Schmitz at the piano; "Fantastic" symphony by Berlioz; overture to "Flying Dutchman" by Wagner. On the afternoon of March 20 the orchestra will play "Le Pause del Silenzio" by Malipiero, overture to "Fidelio" by Beethoven, symphony in G. minor by Mozart, "Impressions of Italy" by Charpentier.

[illegible] Cutting Bureau in the [illegible]

New York City

Schmitz With Boston Orchestra.

So pronounced was the success attained by E. Robert Schmitz, the French soldier-pianist, in his playing of the John Alden Carpenter "Concertino," with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in that city last month that he has been engaged to repeat his dazzling performance with them at Carnegie Hall on Thursday next.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" and a Symphony by Glazunov from Mr. Monteux—"The Flonzaleys," Mr. Bauer and New Music by Ernest Bloch—Mme. Raisa as Ornate Singer

MUSIC of fancy and dexterity begins Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening—the overture, nocturne and scherzo from Mendelssohn's numbers for Shakspeare's comedy of fairy folk, crossed lovers and Bottom and his train, "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Music of keen imagination and high technical skill continues the list—Mr. Loeffler's Pagan Poem suggested by Vergil's Eclogue of the lover drawn by spells to the passionately loving maiden. In it Mr. Gebhard as heretofore, will play the piano part, while the part for English horn will fall to Mr. Speyer, who should do much with it. Well-sounding music from practised, rather than fertile hand will end the programme—the sixth symphony of the Russian, Glazunov.

GEBHARD TO PLAY WITH SYMPHONY

Next Friday and Saturday (March 12 and 13) the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a pair of concerts, to be followed by week of travelling. The program is distinctive by Charles Martin Loeffler's great work, "A Pagan Poem" (after Virgil), which Pierre Monteaux will revive. The score includes a piano solo which will be played by Heinrich Gebhard, an exceptionally beautiful English horn solo, to be played by Louis Speyer, the virtuoso of the orchestra, and three trumpets obbligati. Glazounoff's Sixth Symphony in C minor will also figure upon this program, and Mendelssohn's fairy music (Overture, Nocturne and Scherzo) written for "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday which will precede a week of traveling by the orchestra, Mr. Monteux will revive Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," considered by many his masterpiece. Based on an eclogue of Virgil, this score is written for orchestra with pianoforte, English horn, and three trumpets obbligati. The piano part will be played by Mr. Gebhard; the English horn solo by Louis Speyer. Another revival will be the Sixth Symphony of Glazounoff. The overture, Nocturne, and Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" will be first on the program.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8—Boston Symphony Orchestra. Eighteenth program. Overture, Nocturne and Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; "Pagan

ESTABLISHED 1881

From

The Boston Symphony Orchestra brought out at its concert on Saturday week a new composition by Carpenter, a concertino for pianoforte and orchestra, with the success that is now associated with and expected of the work of this young American composer. Mr. Carpenter's concertino is shorter than most concertos, classic or modern, and in no sense of the word is it academic. It runs in the three orthodox movements, however, allegro, slow division, and allegro again. It is written for full orchestra and the piano is joined to it much oftener than it is used as a solo instrument.

The critics report that the music is light, shimmering, sportive, "of intimate mood and playful progress, vivid with harmonic and instrumental color." The concertino is said to be extremely supple and variable, not suggestive of restlessness but rather impulsiveness and liveliness of fancy. The keynote to the composition is given in the Boston Transcript, which says: "Here at last is a concertino content to be light, fanciful, gay, sportive. An American has written it in American high spirits."

SUNDAY JOURNAL

ress New York City

Boston Symphony This Week.

At each of the final pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the season, to be given Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Pierre Monteux will give a notable piece its first performance in New York. On Thursday John Alden Carpenter's piano "Concertino," assisted by E. Robert Schmitz, the noted French pianist; on Saturday "The Pauses of Silence: Seven Symphonic Expressions," by Malipiero, the daring young Italian composer whose music has attracted considerable attention. The other numbers for the Thursday concert will be Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony, Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia" and Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman." For Saturday Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio," Mozart's Symphony in G Minor (Kochel 550), and Charpentier's Orchestral Suite, "Impressions of Italy."

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Times
New York City

Boston Symphony's Programs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's sudden parting with thirty-one of its players on the eve of this week's Southern tour has necessitated a change in its two programs for New York. The concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening will now present Beethoven's fourth symphony and a Wagner group from "Lohengrin," "Siegfried" and "Master Singers." For next Saturday afternoon Mr. Monteux's revised list includes Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture, Mozart's G minor symphony, Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia" and Debussy's "Petite Suite" arranged for orchestra by Henri Buesser.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Herald
New York City

The final pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday night and Saturday afternoon. The programme for Thursday is: Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony; concertino, Carpenter, with Robert Schmitz playing the piano solo, Borodin, "On the Steppes of Central Asia"; Wagner, overture, "Flying Dutchman." For Saturday the programme is: Malipiero, "Le Pause del Silenzio" ("The Pauses of Silence") seven symphonic expressions; Beethoven, overture, "Fidelio"; Mozart, symphony G minor, Koechel 550; Charpentier, "Impressions of Italy."

ESTABLISHED 1881

From TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

EMA DESTINN, SOLOIST.

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 19, the soloist will be Madame Ema Destinn, the diva, who is a dramatic and lyric soprano in one. Before journeying to the land of her birth, the Czecho-Slovakia of the now troublous and revolutionary Central Europe, she transfixed many a Metropolitan Opera audience with the electric beauty of her tones. Returning to this, her adopted country, her welcome has been enthusiastic.

STAR
Baltimore, Md.

DESTINN WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mme. Ema Destinn, the soprano whose full-throated eloquence and electric dramatic power is unequaled in our time, will be the soloist at the final Boston Symphony concert of the season to be given in the Lyric Theater on Tuesday evening, March 16. An ardent Czecho-Slovak, she has been eagerly welcomed back from her revolutionary native land to this her adopted country, where season after season she has transfixed Metropolitan Opera audiences with her tones. One of her arias at this concert will be the famous song of Donna Anna in the last scene of Mozart's "Don Giovanni," "Non mi Dir." Pierre Monteux will conduct Berlioz's noted "Fantastic" Symphony, in which the composer weaves his romantic love affair through various episodes—his "Dreams and Passions," "A Ball," "Pastoral Scene," "March to the Scaffold" (culmination in his own execution) and a "Witches' Sabbath." The other numbers will be Borodin's tone picture, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's overture to

(ORIGINAL)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From North American
Philadelphia, Pa

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at the Academy on Wednesday evening, March 17, the soloist will be Emma Destinn, the Czecho-Slovakia prima donna. She will sing the "Non mi dir" of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni." Pierre Monteux will conduct Mozart's G minor Symphony, Beethoven's overture to his opera "Fidelio," and Charpentier's sunny and realistic "Impressions of Italy," consisting of the "Serenade" (with viola solo off-stage), "At the Fountain," "On Muleback," "On the Summits," and, finally, "Naples."

Trans.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Mr. Monteux's Miscellany—Novel Pieces from the Musical Association — Mmes. Gauthier, Garrison and van Dresser for Singers — Mr. Kreisler's Adieux—Minor Recitals

A "VERY FAVORITE" symphony, as the old play-bills used to say, begins Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening—Dvorák's in E minor, No. 5, better known by the subtitle "From the New World." The sophisticated may dismiss it as an obvious music; the learned may debate whether Czech or American quality prevails through it; but the average hearer takes perennial pleasure in it because Dvorák quickens his ear and stirs his imagination. Then follow two pieces by Wagner—the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Forest-Music from "Siegfried." Thereafter comes the pretty miniatures of Debussy's "Little Suite" as shifted from piano to orchestra by Henri Busser of the Opera at Paris, and last the "Rákoczy March" from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." A promising miscellany shrewdly adjusted to the numbers of the orchestra now at Mr. Monteux's disposal.

Herald Mar 21

BOSTON SYMPHONY

At the 19th pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 26-27, Mr. Monteux will conduct Dvorak's Fifth Symphony "From the New World." Written during Dvorak's sojourn in America, it has for years been an especial favorite with our public. For the first time at these concerts, Debussy's dainty "Petite Suite" will be played. It has the following movements: "En Bateau," "Cortege," "Menuet," "Ballet." The remainder of the programme is more familiar: Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "Forest Murmurs," from the second act of "Siegfried." To close, Berlioz's Hungarian "Rakoczy" March.

Post Mar 21

At the 19th pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 26-27, Pierre Monteux will conduct Dvorak's fifth symphony "From the New World." Written during the sojourn of the great Czech composer in America, and influenced by songs of the American Negroes, it has for years been an especial favorite with our public. For the first time at these concerts, Debussy's "Petite Suite," will be played. It has the following movements: "En Bateau", "Cortege", "Menuet", "Ballet." The remainder of the programme is more familiar: Wag-

Times
New York City

MUSIC NOTES.

[illegible]," a romantic opera by Pietro [illegible] was performed at the Capitol yesterday, an excellent cast assisting the theatre chorus, orchestra, organ and stage [illegible].

[illegible]on Symphony Orchestra has promised a last New York visit of the season before to give a special concert in aid of the First Regiment Armory to-night, assisted by Rudolph Ganz.

106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From

Willem Mengelberg, the distinguished Dutch conductor, recently changed places for a concert with Gabriel Pierne of the Colonne orchestra in Paris. The Parisians are still rubbing their eyes—which does them great credit. It will be remembered that the Boston Symphony orchestra in casting about for a suitable successor to the late lamented Dr. Karl Muck made unsuccessful advances toward Mengelberg. Apropos of these unsuccessful advances and of the present status of things with the Boston orchestra a New York critic slyly and unfeelingly remarks—"Too bad that negotiations to bring him (Mengelberg) to Boston fell through. Perhaps it is not too late after all." The latter remark, for all its subtlety, is a suggestion distinctly not nice.

[illegible] New York City

[illegible] four-piano recital.

MONDAY, March 22.—Metropolitan Opera House, Aeolian Hall (afternoon), Fredrick Mildred Wellerson, 'cello recital. Symphony, Monteux conductor.

[illegible] New York City

[illegible]oston Symphony at Newark.

[illegible] the Boston Symphony concert to be given in the Newark armory to-morrow [illegible] three notable excerpts from [illegible]'s music dramas will be played, [illegible] of Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy" as originally announced. The [illegible] Mr. Dorest Murmurs" from "Siegfried" and "Siegfried Idyll," and selections from the [illegible]toned act of the "Mastersingers," [illegible] apprition, dance of the apprentices and [illegible]ally come to Hans Sachs. The remainder of the program will be made up [illegible] Weber's overture to "Der Freischütz," Borodin's sketch, "on the Steppes of Central Asia," and Grieg's [illegible] singers which Rudolph Ganz, [illegible] weekinist, will take the solo part.

[illegible]m

[illegible]dress New York City

[illegible]e

[illegible]Boston Symphony at New[illegible]

[illegible] the Boston Symphony [illegible] there were [illegible] only was the hand of Adolph Bolm [illegible] upon the stage, but some rows of [illegible] chairs had been thrown into the [illegible] darkness to provide for the Georges [illegible] orchestra, making Carnegie Hall [illegible] as Ysaye [illegible]

NEXT CONCERT TWO BY SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the following unusually attractive program on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 26 and 27: Dvorak's famous symphony, two notable excerpts from Wagner, the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried"; Debussy's "Little Suite" and Berlioz's Rakoczy March.

Concert Programs of the Week

[illegible] HALL. Friday at 2:30 Saturday, at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, 19th program. "New World" Symphony, Dvorak; Little Suite, Debussy; Prelude to "Lohengrin" and "Forest Murmurs," from "Siegfried," Wagner; Rackoczy March, Berlioz. There is no soloist.

[illegible]RHONY PROGRAM

[illegible] Symphony concerts next [illegible] afternoon and Saturday evening, Pierre Monteux will conduct Dvorak's fifth symphony ("From the New World"). For the first time at these concerts Debussy's dainty "Petite Suite" will be played. Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "Forest Murmurs" from the second act of "Siegfried" and Berliox' "Rakoczy March" are the other numbers.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

From TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Appearing as soloist at the final Boston Symphony Concert of the season to be given in the Academy of Music Friday evening, Madame Ema Destinn will sing arias revealing two sides of her art and personality. "Non mi dir," the famous aria of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni," will recall one of the diva's most noted roles. Although America is her adopted land, Madame Destinn is by birth and blood affiliation a Czech-Slovak. As such she will sing arias by the two great composers of Bohemia; the love song from Dvorak's opera "Russalka," and the Cradle Song from Smetana's opera "The Kiss."

Pierre Monteux will conduct at the same concert Berlioz's famous Fantastic Symphony which was inspired by his now historical love story. It describes the "Dreams and Passions" of the composer, "A Ball," a "Pastoral Scene," "The March to the Scaffold," and the orgy of the "Witches' Sabbath." The performance of the work in Boston was generally conceded one of the finest achievements of the season. The other numbers will be Borodin's sketch "On the Steppes of Central Asia" and Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

ESTABLISHED 1861

From STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

MAR 14

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 19, the soloist will be Madame Ema Destinn, the glorious-voiced diva who is a dramatic and lyric soprano in one. Before journeying to the land of her berth, the Czecho-Slovakia of the now troublous and revolutionary Central Europe, she transfixed many a Metropolitan opera audience with the electric beauty of her tones. Returning to this her adopted country, her welcome has been enthusiastic. Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Berlioz's noted "Fantastic" symphony in which the composer weaves his romantic love affair through various episodes, his "Dreams and Passions," "A Ball," "Pastoral Scene," "March to the Scaffold" (culminating in his own execution) and a "Witches's Sabbath." The other numbers will be Borodin's "Tone Picture," "On the steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

From CITIZEN
ess: Brooklyn, N. Y.

MAR 14 1920 A

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Last of the Series with Mme Destinn as Soloist.

Appearing as soloists at the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, March 19, Madame Emma Destinn will sing arias revealing two sides of her art and personality. "Non mir dir," the famous aria of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanna," will recall one of the diva's most noted roles. Although America is her adopted land, Madame Destinn is by birth and blood affiliation a Czecho-Slovak. As such she will sing arias by the two great composers of Bohemia, the love song from Dvorak's opera, "Russalka," and the Cradle Song from Smetana's opera, "The Kiss."

Pierre Monteux will conduct at the same concert Berlioz's famous Fantastic Symphony which was inspired by his now historical love story. It describes the "Dreams and Passions" of the composer; "A Ball," a "Pastoral Scene," "The March to the Scaffold," and the orgy of the "Witches' Sabbath." The performance of the work in Boston was generally conceded one of the finest achievements of the season. The other numbers will be Borodin's sketch "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.

MAR 15 1920

PROGRAMS CHANGED.

Boston Symphony Meets New Conditions for Brooklyn and New York Concerts.

Because of the strike of thirty-five musicians that has threatened to disrupt the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announcement comes from Boston that the programs for Friday evening in the Academy of Music and for Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall have been changed. The new order of things will provide the Brooklyn audience with Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, excerpts from Wagner, and with Emmy Destinn as soloist, an aria from Mozart's "Don Giovanni" and a group of songs. Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall the program consists of Beethoven's Fourth and selections from Wagner, while Saturday afternoon will be heard Beethoven's "Fidelio" Overture, Mozart's G-Minor Symphony, Borodin's sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and De-

From
EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

MAR 14

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN

Boston Orchestra Friday—New York Symphony Saturday Afternoon.

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, the soloist will be Mme. Emmy Destinn. Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Berlioz's noted "Fantastic" Symphony, in which the composer weaves his romantic love affair through various episodes — his "Dreams and Passions," "A Ball," "Pastoral Scene," "March to the Scaffold" (culminating in his own execution) and a "Witches' Sabbath." The other numbers will be Borodin's tone picture, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 14 1920 D

THE ORCHESTRAS' PLANS

At each of the final pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the season, to be given Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Pierre Monteux will give a notable piece its first performance in New York. On Thursday, John Alden Carpenter's piano "Concertino," assisted by E. Robert Schmitz, the noted French pianist; on Saturday, "The Pauses of Silence: Seven Symphonic Expressions," by Malipiero, the daring young Italian composer whose music has attracted considerable attention. The other numbers for the Thursday concert will be Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony, Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's Overture to "Fidelio," Mozart's Symphony in G minor (Kochel 550), and Charpentier's orchestral suite, "Impressions of Italy."

From Times
New York City

The New Symphony's revised program for March 30 and 31 includes Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, Chopin's second concerto, with Godowsky, and Tschaikovsky's fourth symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is announced at the Newark Armory tomorrow, when the soloist will be Rudolph Ganz, with a program from Weber Grieg and Borodin.

EVENING GLOBE
New York City
MAR 15

BOSTON PROGRAMMES.

The troubles in the Boston Symphony Orchestra resulting in the dropping of some thirty-odd members have forced a change in programme for the Carnegie Hall concerts announced for Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week. Neither the concertina of John Alden Carpenter nor the new work by Malipiero will be given.

The revised programme for Thursday consists of Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and the following pieces Wagner: Prelude to "Lohengri "A Siegfried Idyll," "Waldwebe from "Siegfried," and excerpts fr the third act of "Die Meistersing programme for Saturday p overt

From
INQUIRER,
Philadelphia, Pa.

MAR - 7 1920

Made a Note Of

Mme. Emmy Destinova will be th assisting artist at the closing conce for the season of the Boston Symphon Orchestra on Wednesday evenin March 17, when she will sing amo other things the "Non mi dir" aria Donna Anna in Mozart's opera of "D Giovanni." The orchestra will pl the same composer's G minor sy phony, Beethoven's "Fidelio" overtu and Charpentier's "Impressions Italy."

PRESS,
Philadelphia, Pa.

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, March 17, the soloist will be Madame Emmy Destinn, the glorious-voiced diva, who is a dramatic and lyric soprano in one. Before journeying to the land of her birth, the Czecho-Slovakia of the now troublous and revolutionary central Europe, she transfixed many a Metropolitan opera audience with the electric beauty of her tones. Returning to this, her adopted country, her welcome has been enthusiastic. One of her arias at this concert will be "Non mi dir" of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni," one of Mme. Destinn's famous roles. Pierre Monteux will conduct Mozart's immortally lovely symphony in G minor, Beethoven's overture to his opera "Fidelio," and Charpentier's sunny and realistic "Impressions of Italy." The Frenchman's work comprises "Serenade" (with viola solo off stage), "At the Fountain," "On Mule-back," "On the Summits," and finally "Naples," a glitter of characteristic color.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From
EVENING POST,
New York City

So pronounced was the success attained by E. Robert Schmitz, the French soldier pianist, in his playing of the John Alden Carpenter "Concertino" with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in that city last month that he has been engaged to repeat his dazzling performance with them at Carnegie Hall on March 18. This will be the first time in many years that this organization has used an assisting artist at any of its New York concerts.

Mr. and Mrs. Raymond Bloch will give a sonata recital at Aeolian Hall on Saturday evening, March 20.

Raymond Havens gives a piano recital at Aeolian Hall next Monday afternoon.

From
EVENING POST,
New York City

Boston Symphony Programmes Changed

The programmes for the coming Boston Symphony concerts at Carnegie Hall have been entirely changed, as follows: Thursday evening, March 18: Beethoven symphony No. 4; Wagner, prelude to "Lohengrin," "A Siegfried Idyll," "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," excerpts from Act III of "The Mastersingers." Saturday afternoon, March 20: Beethoven, overture to "Fidelio"; Mozart, symphony in G minor; Borodin, "On the Steppes of Central Asia"; Debussy, petite suite.

TELEGRAM
New York City
MAR 16 1920

Boston Symphony Programme.

Union or no union, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been disrupted because of difficulties with the Musician's Protective Union, will play its pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall this week under the direction of Pierre Monteux.

Thursday evening the programme will contain Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 in B flat major, op 60; Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin," "A Siegfried Idyll," "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," excerpts from Act III. of "The Mastersingers." Introduction, "Dance of the Apprentices." Welcome to Hans Sachs.

Saturday afternoon the following numbers will be played:—Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio;" Mozart's Symphony in G minor (Köchel 550); Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia," orchestral sketch, op 7; Debussy's Petit Suite, arranged for orchestra by Henri Büsser.

TRIBUNE
New York City
MAR 21 1920

At the Boston Symphony concert be given in the Newark Armory t morrow evening three excerpts fro Wagner's music dramas will be play instead of Charpentier's "Impressio of Italy," as originally announce They are "Forest Murmurs" from "Sie fried," "A Siegfried Idyll" and sele tions from the third act of "Th Mastersingers"; Introduction, Dance o the Apprentice and Welcome to Han Sachs. The remainder of the progra will be unchanged—Weber's overtur to "Der Freischütz," Borodin's sketc "On the Steppes of Central Asia," an Grieg's concerto, in which Rudo

From
EAGLE
ess Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR - 7 1920 D

NEXT BOSTON PROGRAM

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 19, the soloist will be Mme. Emmy Destinn, the glorious-voiced diva who is a dramatic and lyric soprano in one. Before journeying to the land of her birth, the Czecho-slovakia of the now troublous and revolutionary Central Europe, she transfixed many a Metropolitan Opera audience with the electric beauty of her tones. Returning to this, her adopted country, her welcome has been enthusiastic. Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Berlioz's noted "Fantastic" Symphony, in which the composer weaves his romantic love affair through various episodes—his "Dreams and Passions," "A Ball," "Pastoral Scene," "March to the Scaffold" (culminating in his own execution) and a "Witches' Sabbath." The other numbers will be Borodin's tone picture, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

rom.....

ddress New York City

ate MAR - 8 1920 K

A notable feature of the final Thursday evening concert of this season, to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Mar. 18, will be the Concertino, by John Alden Carpenter (the composer of the "Birthday of the Infants"), which E. Robert Schmitz, the noted French pianist, will play with the orchestra. The other numbers will be Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony and Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

m RECORD
ress Philadelphia,

—At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, March 17, the soloist will be Madame Destinn. One of her arias at this concert will be "Non mi dir" of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni." Pierre Monteux will conduct Mozart's Symphony in G minor, Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio" and Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy."

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

At the final Boston symphony concert of the season, to be given at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, March 17, the solosit will be Emma Destinn, the soprano. One of her arias will be "Non mi dir" from Mozart's "Don Giovanni." Pierre Monteux will conduct Mozart's symphony in G minor, Beethoven's overture to his opera "Fidelio," and Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy."

Evening Public
Philadelphia, Pa.

Madame Emma Destinn will be the soloist at the final Boston symphony concert of the season, to be given in the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, March 17. One of her arias will be "Non Mi Dir," from "Don Giovanni." Mr. Monteux will conduct Mozart's symphony in G minor, Beethoven's overture to his opera "Fidelio" and Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy."

Destinn To Be Soloist.

AT the final Boston Symphony Concert of the season to be given in the Lyric Theatre on Tuesday evening, March 16, the soloist will be Mme. Emma Destinn, who is a dramatic and lyric soprano in one. Before journeying to the land of her birth, the Czecho-Slovakia of troublous and revolutionary Central Europe, she pleased many a Metropolitan opera audience with the beauty of her tones. Returning to this, her adopted country, her welcome has been enthusiastic.

AMERICAN,
Baltimore, Md.

EMMY DESTINN SOLOIST

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season to be given in the Lyric Theater on Tuesday evening, March 16, the soloist will be Mme. Emmy Destinn, the glorious voiced diva, who is a dramatic and lyric soprano in one. Before journeying to the land of her birth, the Czecho-Slovakia of the now troublous and revolutionary Central Europe, she transfixed many a Metropolitan opera audience with the electric beauty of her tones.

s New York City
MAR 15 1920

At each of the final pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of the season, to be given next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Pierre Monteux will give a notable piece its first performance in New York; on Thursday, John Alden Carpenter's piano "Concertino"; on Saturday, "The Pauses of Silence: Seven Symphonic Expressions," by Malipiero, the young Italian composer, whose music has attracted considerable attention.

From
EVENING JOURNAL
ress New York City

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Orchestra, for its final Thursday evening concert in Carnegie Hall this season, on March 18 will introduce John Alden Carpenter's "concertino" for piano and orchestra, with E. Robert Schmitz as soloist, and at the following Saturday matinee will give a first performance of the "seven symphonic expressions," "Le Pause del Silenzio," by the Italian modernist, Malipiero.

The New Symphony Orche

om.....

ddress New York City

MAR - 7 1920 L

BOSTON SYMPHONY GOES TO NEWARK

Pierre Monteux Will Conduct at World Famous Artists' Series March 22.

RUDOLPH GANZ THE SOLOIST

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra appears at the Newark Armory on Monday evening, March 22, Joseph A. Fuerstman's thousands of subscribers to the World Famous Artists' Series from all parts of North Jersey will have the first opportunity of enjoying one of America's finest orchestras, under the eminent directorship of the new conductor, Pierre Monteux. The Boston Symphony personnel is considered by many the best in the world, virtually unchanged from year to year. Long famous as a conductor of opera and ballet throughout Europe, Monteux, coming here in 1916 at the head of the Ballet Russe, won renown as a conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House, and this season was prevailed upon to accept the "blue ribbon" post for a period of three years with the Boston Symphony.

The distinguished Swiss pianist, Rudolph Ganz, will be the soloist on March 22. Because Ganz is a positive aggressive factor in the development of modern musical standards, Mr. Fuerstman selected him to judge the semi-finals in his famous bi-State pianists' contest, in which Rachmaninoff judged the finals.

For this concert, the sixth in the Fuerstman series, Ganz will play Grieg's famous and brilliant concerto. Monteux will conduct for its purely orchestral numbers Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz," Borodin's Russian Tone Picture, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Charpentier's sunny and realistic "Impressions of Italy."

This concert, as was the case with those of Galli-Curci, the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, Rachmaninoff and Anna Case, will enjoy the advantage of Mr. Fuerstman's acoustical ceiling, as will also the coming armory concerts, namely, Ysaye and Elman, April 5; Heifetz, April 7; and John McCormack, April 20, thus completing one of the most remarkable series of musical events in New Jersey.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

From TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Appearing as soloist at the final Boston Symphony Concert of the season to be given in the Academy of Music Friday evening, Madame Ema Destinn will sing arias revealing two sides of her art and personality. "Non mi dir," the famous aria of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni," will recall one of the diva's most noted roles. Although America is her adopted land, Madame Destinn is by birth and blood affiliation a Czech-Slovak. As such she will sing arias by the two great composers of Bohemia: the love song from Dvorak's opera "Russalka," and the Cradle Song from Smetana's opera "The Kiss."

Pierre Monteux will conduct at the same concert Berlioz's famous Fantastic Symphony which was inspired by his now historical love story. It describes the "Dreams and Passions" of the composer, "A Ball," a "Pastoral Scene," "The March to the Scaffold," and the orgy of the "Witches' Sabbath." The performance of the work in Boston was generally conceded one of the finest achievements of the season. The other numbers will be Borodin's sketch "On the Steppes of Central Asia" and Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

From STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 19, the soloist will be Madame Ema Destinn, the glorious-voiced diva who is a dramatic and lyric soprano in one. Before journeying to the land of her berth, the Czecho-Slovakia of the now troublous and revolutionary Central Europe, she transfixed many a Metropolitan opera audience with the electric beauty of her tones. Returning to this her adopted country, her welcome has been enthusiastic. Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Berlioz's noted "Fantastic" symphony in which the composer weaves his romantic love affair through various episodes, his "Dreams and Passions," "A Ball," "Pastoral Scene," "March to the Scaffold" (culminating in his own execution) and a "Witches's Sabbath." The other numbers will be Borodin's "Tone Picture," "On the steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

From CITIZEN
ess: Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Last of the Series with Mme Destinn as Soloist.

Appearing as soloists at the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, March 19, Madame Emma Destinn will sing arias revealing two sides of her art and personality. "Non mir dir," the famous aria of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanna," will recall one of the diva's most noted roles. Although America is her adopted land, Madame Destinn is by birth and blood affiliation a Czecho-Slovak. As such she will sing arias by the two great composers of Bohemia, the love song from Dvorak's opera, "Russalka," and the Cradle Song from Smetana's opera, "The Kiss."

Pierre Monteux will conduct at the same concert Berlioz's famous Fantastic Symphony which was inspired by his now historical love story. It describes the "Dreams and Passions" of the composer; "A Ball," a "Pastoral Scene," "The March to the Scaffold," and the orgy of the "Witches' Sabbath." The performance of the work in Boston was generally conceded one of the finest achievements of the season. The other numbers will be Borodin's sketch "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.

PROGRAMS CHANGED.

Boston Symphony Meets New Conditions for Brooklyn and New York Concerts.

Because of the strike of thirty-five musicians that has threatened to disrupt the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announcement comes from Boston that the programs for Friday evening in the Academy of Music and for Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall have been changed. The new order of things will provide the Brooklyn audience with Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, excerpts from Wagner, and with Emmy Destinn as soloist, an aria from Mozart's "Don Giovanni" and a group of songs. Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall the program consists of Beethoven's Fourth and selections from Wagner, while Saturday afternoon will be heard Beethoven's "Fidelio" Overture, Mozart's G-Mnior Sympathy, Borodin's sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and De-'s Little Suite.

From
EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN

Boston Orchestra Friday—New York Symphony Saturday Afternoon.

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, the soloist will be Mme. Emmy Destinn. Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Berlioz's noted "Fantastic" Symphony, in which the composer weaves his romantic love affair through various episodes — his "Dreams and Passions," "A Ball," "Pastoral Scene," "March to the Scaffold" (culminating in his own execution) and a "Witches' Sabbath." The other numbers will be Borodin's tone picture, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.

THE ORCHESTRAS' PLANS

At each of the final pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the season, to be given Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Pierre Monteux will give a notable piece its first performance in New York. On Thursday, John Alden Carpenter's piano "Concertino," assisted by E. Robert Schmitz, the noted French pianist; on Saturday, "The Pauses of Silence: Seven Symphonic Expressions," by Malipiero, the daring young Italian composer whose music has attracted considerable attention. The other numbers for the Thursday concert will be Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony, Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's Overture to "Fidelio," Mozart's Symphony in G minor (Kochel 550), and Charpentier's orchestral suite, "Impressions of Italy."

From Times
New York City

The New Symphony's revised program for March 30 and 31 includes Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, Chopin's second concerto, with Godowsky, and Tschaikovsky's fourth symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is announced at the Newark Armory tomorrow, when the soloist will be Rudolph Ganz, with a program from Weber Grieg and Borodin.

EVENING GLOBE
New York City

BOSTON PROGRAMMES.

The troubles in the Boston Symphony Orchestra resulting in the dropping of some thirty-odd members have forced a change in programme for the Carnegie Hall concerts announced for Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week. Neither the concertina of John Alden Carpenter nor the new work by Malipiero will be given.

The revised programme for Thursday consists of Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and the following pieces Wagner: Prelude to "Lohengri "A Siegfried Idyll," "Waldweb from "Siegfried," and excerpts fr the third act of "Die Meistersing programme for Saturday pr "Fidelio" overt

From
INQUIRER,
Philadelphia, Pa.

Made a Note Of

Mme. Emmy Destinova will be th assisting artist at the closing conce for the season of the Boston Symphon Orchestra on Wednesday evenin March 17, when she will sing amo other things the "Non mi dir" aria Donna Anna in Mozart's opera of "D Giovanni." The orchestra will pl the same composer's G minor sy phony, Beethoven's "Fidelio" overtu and Charpentier's "Impressions Italy."

PRESS,
Philadelphia, Pa.

At the final Boston Symphony concer of the season, to be given at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening March 17, the soloist will be Madam Emmy Destinn, the glorious-voiced diva who is a dramatic and lyric soprano in one. Before journeying to the land of her birth, the Czecho-Slovakia of the now troublous and revolutionary central Europe, she transfixed many a Metropolitan opera audience with the electric beauty of her tones. Returning to this, her adopted country, her welcome has been enthusiastic. One of her arias at this concert will be "Non mi dir" of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni," one of Mme. Destinn's famous roles. Pierre Monteux will conduct Mozart's immortally lovely symphony in G minor, Beethoven's overture to his opera "Fidelio," and Charpentier's sunny and realistic "Impressions of Italy." The Frenchman's work comprises "Serenade" (with viola solo off stage), "At the Fountain," "On Muleback," "On the Summits," and finally, "Naples," a glitter of characteristic color.

From
EVENING POST,
New York City

Boston Symphony Programmes Changed

The programmes for the coming Boston Symphony concerts at Carnegie Hall have been entirely changed, as follows: Thursday evening, March 18: Beethoven symphony No. 4; Wagner, prelude to "Lohengrin," "A Siegfried Idyll," "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," excerpts from Act III of "The Mastersingers." Saturday afternoon, March 20: Beethoven, overture to "Fidelio"; Mozart, symphony in G minor; Borodin, "On the Steppes of Central Asia"; Debussy, petite suite.

TELEGRAM
New York City

Boston Symphony Programme.

Union or no union, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been disrupted because of difficulties with the Musician's Protective Union, will play its pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall this week under the direction of Pierre Monteux.

Thursday evening the programme will contain Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 in B flat major, op 60; Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin," "A Siegfried Idyll," "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," excerpts from Act III. of "The Mastersingers." Introduction, "Dance of the Apprentices." Welcome to Hans Sachs.

Saturday afternoon the following numbers will be played:—Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio;" Mozart's Symphony in G minor (Köchel 550); Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia," orchestral sketch, op 7; Debussy's Petit Suite, arranged for orchestra by Henri Büsser.

TRIBUNE
New York City

At the Boston Symphony concert be given in the Newark Armory t morrow evening three excerpts fro Wagner's music dramas will be play instead of Charpentier's "Impressio of Italy," as originally announce They are "Forest Murmurs" from "Sieg fried," "A Siegfried Idyll" and sele tions from the third act of "Th Mastersingers": Introduction, Dance o the Apprentice and Welcome to Han Sachs. The remainder of the progra will be unchanged—Weber's overtur to "Der Freischütz," Borodin's sketc "On the Steppes of Central Asia," an Grieg's concerto, in which Rudol

From
EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address

NEXT BOSTON PROGRAM

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 19, the soloist will be Mme. Emmy Destinn, the glorious-voiced diva who is a dramatic and lyric soprano in one. Before journeying to the land of her birth, the Czecho-slovakia of the now troublous and revolutionary Central Europe, she transfixed many a Metropolitan Opera audience with the electric beauty of her tones. Returning to this, her adopted country, her welcome has been enthusiastic. Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Berlioz's noted "Fantastic" Symphony, in which the composer weaves his romantic love affair through various episodes—his "Dreams and Passions," "A Ball," "Pastoral Scene," "March to the Scaffold" (culminating in his own execution) and a "Witches' Sabbath." The other numbers will be Borodin's tone picture, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

rom.....

ddress New York City

ate..... MAR - 8 K

A notable feature of the final Thursday evening concert of this season, to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Mar. 18, will be the Concertino, by John Alden Carpenter (the composer of the "Birthday of the Infants"), which E. Robert Schmitz, the noted French pianist, will play with the orchestra. The other numbers will be Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony and Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

m RECORD
ress Philadelphia,

—At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, March 17, the soloist will be Madame Destinn. One of her arias at this concert will be "Non mi dir" of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni." Pierre Monteux will conduct Mozart's Symphony in G minor, Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio" and Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy."

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

At the final Boston symphony concert of the season, to be given at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, March 17, the solosit will be Emma Destinn, the soprano. One of her arias will be "Non mi dir" from Mozart's "Don Giovanni." Pierre Monteux will conduct Mozart's symphony in G minor, Beethoven's overture to his opera "Fidelio," and Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy."

Evening Public
Philadelphia, Pa.

Madame Emma Destinn will be the soloist at the final Boston symphony concert of the season, to be given in the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, March 17. One of her arias will be "Non Mi Dir," from "Don Giovanni." Mr. Monteux will conduct Mozart's symphony in G minor, Beethoven's overture to his opera "Fidelio," and Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy."

Destinn To Be Soloist.

AT the final Boston Symphony Concert of the season to be given in the Lyric Theatre on Tuesday evening, March 16, the soloist will be Mme. Emma Destinn, who is a dramatic and lyric soprano in one. Before journeying to the land of her birth, the Czecho-Slovakia of troublous and revolutionary Central Europe, she pleased many a Metropolitan opera audience with the beauty of her tones. Returning to this, her adopted country, her welcome has been enthusiastic.

AMERICAN,
Baltimore, Md.

EMMY DESTINN SOLOIST.

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season to be given in the Lyric Theater on Tuesday evening, March 16, the soloist will be Mme. Emmy Destinn, the glorious voiced diva, who is a dramatic and lyric soprano in one. Before journeying to the land of her birth, the Czecho-Slovakia of the now troublous and revolutionary Central Europe, she transfixed many a Metropolitan opera audience with the electric beauty of her tones.

s New York City

At each of the final pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of the season, to be given next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Pierre Monteux will give a notable piece its first performance in New York; on Thursday, John Alden Carpenter's piano "Concertino"; on Saturday, "The Pauses of Silence: Seven Symphonic Expressions," by Malipiero, the young Italian composer, whose music has attracted considerable attention.

From
EVENING JOURNAL
New York City

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Orchestra, for its final Thursday evening concert in Carnegie Hall this season, on March 18 will introduce John Alden Carpenter's "concertino" for piano and orchestra, with E. Robert Schmitz as soloist, and at the following Saturday matinee will give a first performance of the "seven symphonic expressions," "Le Pause del Silenzio," by the Italian modernist, Malipiero.

The New Symphony Orches

om.....

ddress New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY GOES TO NEWARK

Pierre Monteux Will Conduct at World Famous Artists' Series March 22.

RUDOLPH GANZ THE SOLOIST

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra appears at the Newark Armory on Monday evening, March 22, Joseph A. Fuerstman's thousands of subscribers to the World Famous Artists' Series from all parts of North Jersey will have the first opportunity of enjoying one of America's finest orchestras, under the eminent directorship of the new conductor, Pierre Monteux. The Boston Symphony personnel is considered by many the best in the world, virtually unchanged from year to year. Long famous as a conductor of opera and ballet throughout Europe, Monteux, coming here in 1916 at the head of the Ballet Russe, won renown as a conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House, and this season was prevailed upon to accept the "blue ribbon" post for a period of three years with the Boston Symphony.

The distinguished Swiss pianist, Rudolph Ganz, will be the soloist on March 22. Because Ganz is a positive aggressive factor in the development of modern musical standards, Mr. Fuerstman selected him to judge the semi-finals in his famous bi-State pianists' contest, in which Rachmaninoff judged the finals.

For this concert, the sixth in the Fuerstman series, Ganz will play Grieg's famous and brilliant concerto. Monteux will conduct for its purely orchestral numbers Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz," Borodin's Russian Tone Picture, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Charpentier's sunny and realistic "Impressions of Italy."

This concert, as was the case with those of Galli-Curci, the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, Rachmaninoff and Anna Case, will enjoy the advantage of Mr. Fuerstman's acoustical ceiling, as will also the coming armory concerts, namely, Ysaye and Elman, April 3; Heifetz, April 7; and John McCormack, April 20, thus completing one of the most remarkable series of musical events in New Jersey.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

From TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Appearing as soloist at the final Boston Symphony Concert of the season to be given in the Academy of Music Friday evening, Madame Ema Destinn will sing arias revealing two sides of her art and personality. "Non mi dir," the famous aria of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni," will recall one of the diva's most noted roles. Although America is her adopted land, Madame Destinn is by birth and blood affiliation a Czech-Slovak. As such she will sing arias by the two great composers of Bohemia: the love song from Dvorak's opera "Russalka," and the Cradle Song from Smetana's opera "The Kiss."

Pierre Monteux will conduct at the same concert Berlioz's famous Fantastic Symphony which was inspired by his now historical love story. It describes the "Dreams and Passions" of the composer, "A Ball," a "Pastoral Scene," "The March to the Scaffold," and the orgy of the "Witches' Sabbath." The performance of the work in Boston was generally conceded one of the finest achievements of the season. The other numbers will be Borodin's sketch "On the Steppes of Central Asia" and Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

ESTABLISHED 1861

From STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 19, the soloist will be Madame Ema Destinn, the glorious-voiced diva who is a dramatic and lyric soprano in one. Before journeying to the land of her berth, the Czecho-Slovakia of the now troublous and revolutionary Central Europe, she transfixed many a Metropolitan opera audience with the electric beauty of her tones. Returning to this her adopted country, her welcome has been enthusiastic. Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Berlioz's noted "Fantastic" symphony in which the composer weaves his romantic love affair through various episodes, his "Dreams and Passions," "A Ball," "Pastoral Scene," "March to the Scaffold" (culminating in his own execution) and a "Witches's Sabbath." The other numbers will be Borodin's "Tone Picture," "On the steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

From CITIZEN
ess: Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Last of the Series with Mme Destinn as Soloist.

Appearing as soloists at the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, March 19, Madame Emma Destinn will sing arias revealing two sides of her art and personality. "Non mir dir," the famous aria of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanna," will recall one of the diva's most noted roles. Although America is her adopted land, Madame Destinn is by birth and blood affiliation a Czecho-Slovak. As such she will sing arias by the two great composers of Bohemia, the love song from Dvorak's opera, "Russalka," and the Cradle Song from Smetana's opera, "The Kiss."

Pierre Monteux will conduct at the same concert Berlioz's famous Fantastic Symphony which was inspired by his now historical love story. It describes the "Dreams and Passions" of the composer; "A Ball," a "Pastoral Scene," "The March to the Scaffold," and the orgy of the "Witches' Sabbath." The performance of the work in Boston was generally conceded one of the finest achievements of the season. Both numbers will be Borodin's sketch "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.

PROGRAMS CHANGED.

Boston Symphony Meets New Conditions for Brooklyn and New York Concerts.

Because of the strike of thirty-five musicians that has threatened to disrupt the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announcement comes from Boston that the programs for Friday evening in the Academy of Music and for Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall have been changed. The new order of things will provide the Brooklyn audience with Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, excerpts from Wagner, and with Emmy Destinn as soloist, an aria from Mozart's "Don Giovanni" and a group of songs. Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall the program consists of Beethoven's Fourth and selections from Wagner, while Saturday afternoon will be heard Beethoven's "Fidelio" Overture, Mozart's G-Mnior Sympathy, Borodin's sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Debussy's Little Suite.

From
INQUIRER,
Philadelphia, Pa.

Made a Note Of

Mme. Emmy Destinova will be the assisting artist at the closing concert for the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Wednesday evening March 17, when she will sing among other things the "Non mi dir" aria from Donna Anna in Mozart's opera of "Don Giovanni." The orchestra will play the same composer's G minor symphony, Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture and Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy."

PRESS,
Philadelphia, Pa.

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, March 17, the soloist will be Madame Emmy Destinn, the glorious-voiced diva who is a dramatic and lyric soprano in one. Before journeying to the land of her birth, the Czecho-Slovakia of the now troublous and revolutionary central Europe, she transfixed many a Metropolitan opera audience with the electric beauty of her tones. Returning to this, her adopted country, her welcome has been enthusiastic. One of her arias at this concert will be "Non mi dir" of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni," one of Mme. Destinn's famous roles. Pierre Monteux will conduct Mozart's immortally lovely symphony in G minor, Beethoven's overture to his opera "Fidelio," and Charpentier's sunny and realistic "Impressions of Italy." The Frenchman's work comprises "Serenade" (with viola solo off stage), "At the Fountain," "On Mule-back," "On the Summits," and finally, "Naples," a glitter of characteristic color.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR - 7 1920

NEXT BOSTON PROGRAM

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 19, the soloist will be Mme. Emmy Destinn, the glorious-voiced diva who is a dramatic and lyric soprano in one. Before journeying to the land of her birth, the Czecho-slovakia of the now troublous and revolutionary Central Europe, she transfixed many a Metropolitan Opera audience with the electric beauty of her tones. Returning to this, her adopted country, her welcome has been enthusiastic. Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Berlioz's noted "Fantastic" Symphony, in which the composer weaves his romantic love affair through various episodes—his "Dreams and Passions," "A Ball," "Pastoral Scene," "March to the Scaffold" (culminating in his own execution) and a "Witches' Sabbath." The other numbers will be Borodin's tone picture, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

From.....

Address New York City

Date..... MAR - 8 1920

A notable feature of the final Thursday evening concert of this season, to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Mar. 18, will be the Concertino, by John Alden Carpenter (the composer of the "Birthday of the Infants"), which E. Robert Schmitz, the noted French pianist, will play with the orchestra. The other numbers will be Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony and Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN

Boston Orchestra Friday—New York Symphony Saturday Afternoon.

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, the soloist will be Mme. Emmy Destinn. Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Berlioz's noted "Fantastic" Symphony, in which the composer weaves his romantic love affair through various episodes — his "Dreams and Passions," "A Ball," "Pastoral Scene," "March to the Scaffold" (culminating in his own execution) and a "Witches' Sabbath." The other numbers will be Borodin's tone picture, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.

THE ORCHESTRAS' PLANS

At each of the final pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the season, to be given Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Pierre Monteux will give a notable piece its first performance in New York. On Thursday, John Alden Carpenter's piano "Concertino," assisted by E. Robert Schmitz, the noted French pianist; on Saturday, "The Pauses of Silence: Seven Symphonic Expressions," by Malipiero, the daring young Italian composer whose music has attracted considerable attention. The other numbers for the Thursday concert will be Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony, Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's Overture to "Fidelio," Mozart's Symphony in G minor (Kochel 550), and Charpentier's orchestral suite, "Impressions of Italy."

From Times
New York City

The New Symphony's revised program for March 30 and 31 includes Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, Chopin's second concerto, with Godowsky, and Tschaikovsky's fourth symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is announced at the Newark Armory tomorrow, when the soloist will be Rudolph Ganz, with a program from Weber Grieg and Borodin.

EVENING GLOBE
New York City

BOSTON PROGRAMMES.

The troubles in the Boston Symphony Orchestra resulting in the dropping of some thirty-odd members have forced a change in programme for the Carnegie Hall concerts announced for Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week. Neither the concertina of John Alden Carpenter nor the new work by Malipiero will be given.

The revised programme for Thursday consists of Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and the following pieces by Wagner: Prelude to "Lohengrin," "A Siegfried Idyll," "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," and excerpts from the third act of "Die Meistersinger." The programme for Saturday prom-

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

From
EVENING POST,
New York City

So pronounced was the success attained by E. Robert Schmitz, the French soldier pianist, in his playing of the John Alden Carpenter "Concertino" with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in that city last month that he has been engaged to repeat his dazzling performance with them at Carnegie Hall on March 18. This will be the first time in many years that this organization has used an assisting artist at any of its New York concerts.

Mr. and Mrs. Raymond Bloch will give a sonata recital at Aeolian Hall on Saturday evening, March 20.

Raymond Havens gives a piano recital at Aeolian Hall next Monday afternoon.

From
EVENING POST,
New York City

Boston Symphony Programmes Changed

The programmes for the coming Boston Symphony concerts at Carnegie Hall have been entirely changed, as follows: Thursday evening, March 18: Beethoven symphony No. 4; Wagner, prelude to "Lohengrin," "A Siegfried Idyll," "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," excerpts from Act III of "The Mastersingers." Saturday afternoon, March 20: Beethoven, overture to "Fidelio"; Mozart, symphony in G minor; Borodin, "On the Steppes of Central Asia"; Debussy, petite suite.

TELEGRAM
New York City

Boston Symphony Programme

Union or no union, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been disrupted because of difficulties with the Musician's Protective Union, will play its pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall this week under the direction of Pierre Monteux.

Thursday evening the programme will contain Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 in B flat major, op 60; Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin," "A Siegfried Idyll," "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," excerpts from Act III. of "The Mastersingers." Introduction, "Dance of the Apprentices." Welcome to Hans Sachs.

Saturday afternoon the following numbers will be played:—Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio;" Mozart's Symphony in G minor (Köchel 550); Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia," orchestral sketch, op 7; Debussy's Petit Suite, arranged for orchestra by Henri Büsser.

TRIBUNE
New York City

...e Boston Symphony concert to ... in the Newark Armory to... evening three excerpts from ... music dramas will be played ...f Charpentier's "Impressions ..." as originally announced. "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried Siegfried Idyll" and selec... ...m the third act of "The ...gers": Introduction, Dance of ...ptice and Welcome to Hans ...e remainder of the program ...changed—Weber's overture ...eischütz," Borodin's sketch ...ppes of Central Asia," and ...ncerto, in which Rudolph

From
RECORD
...ress Philadelphia,

—At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, March 17, the soloist will be Madame Destinn. One of her arias at this concert will be "Non mi dir" of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni." Pierre Monteux will conduct Mozart's Symphony in G minor, Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio" and Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy."

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

At the final Boston symphony concert of the season, to be given at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, March 17, the solosit will be Emma Destinn, the soprano. One of her arias will be "Non mi dir" from ...rt's "Don Giovanni." Pie... will conduct Mozart's ...or, Beethoven's ...

... SUN
...ress: Baltimore, Md.

...te.....

Destinn To Be Soloist.

AT the final Boston Symphony Concert of the season to be given in the Lyric Theatre on Tuesday evening, March 16, the soloist will be Mme. Emma Destinn, who is a dramatic and lyric soprano in one. Before journeying to the land of her birth, the Czecho-Slovakia of troublous and revolutionary Central Europe, she pleased many a Metropolitan opera audience with the beauty of her tones. Returning to this, her adopted country, her welcome has been enthusiastic.

AMERICAN,
Baltimore, Md.

EMMY DESTINN SOLOIST.

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season to be given in the Lyric Theater on Tuesday evening, March 16, the soloist will be Mme. Emmy Destinn, the glorious voiced diva, who is a dramatic and lyric soprano in one. Before journeying to the land of her birth, the Czecho-Slovakia of the now troublous and revolutionary Central Europe, she transfixed many a Metropolitan opera audience with the electric beauty of her tones.

...rk City

...the final pair of Boston ...hestra concerts of the ...iven next Thursday ...rday afternoon, Pierre ...e a notable piece its ... in New York; on ... Alden Carpenter's ...; on Saturday, "The ... Seven Symphonic ...alipiero, the young ...hose music has at... attention.

From
EVENING JOURNAL
...ress New York City

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Orchestra, for its final Thursday evening concert in Carnegie Hall this season, on March 18 will introduce John Alden Carpenter's "concertino" for piano and orchestra, with E. Robert Schmitz as soloist, and at the following Saturday matinee will give the first performance of the "seven symphonic expressions," "Le Pause del Silenzio," by the Italian modernist, Malipiero.

"The New York Symphony Orches...

...om.....

...ddress New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY GOES TO NEWARK

Pierre Monteux Will Conduct at World Famous Artists' Series March 22.

RUDOLPH GANZ THE SOLOIST

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra appears at the Newark Armory on Monday evening, March 22, Joseph A. Fuerstman's thousands of subscribers to the World Famous Artists' Series from all parts of North Jersey will have the first opportunity of enjoying one of America's finest orchestras, under the eminent directorship of the new conductor, Pierre Monteux. The Boston Symphony personnel is considered by many the best in the world, virtually unchanged from year to year. Long famous as a conductor of opera and ballet throughout Europe, Monteux, coming here in 1916 at the head of the Ballet Russe, won renown as a conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House, and this season was prevailed upon to accept the "blue ribbon" post for a period of three years with the Boston Symphony.

The distinguished Swiss pianist, Rudolph Ganz, will be the soloist on March 22. Because Ganz is a positive aggressive factor in the development of modern musical standards, Mr. Fuerstman selected him to judge the semi-finals in his famous bi-State pianists' contest, in which Rachmaninoff judged the finals.

For this concert, the sixth in the Fuerstman series, Ganz will play Grieg's famous and brilliant concerto. Monteux will conduct for its purely orchestral numbers Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz," Borodin's Russian Tone Picture, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Charpentier's sunny and realistic "Impressions of Italy."

This concert, as was the case with those of Galli-Curci, the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, Rachmaninoff and Anna Case, will enjoy the advantage of Mr. Fuerstman's acoustical ceiling, as will also the coming armory concerts, namely, Ysaye and Elman, April 3; Heifetz, April 7; and John McCormack, April 20, thus completing one of the most remarkable series of musical events in New Jersey.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

From TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

...pianist.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Appearing as soloist at the final Boston Symphony Concert of the season to be given in the Academy of Music Friday evening, Madame Ema Destinn will sing arias revealing two sides of her art and personality. "Non mi dir," the famous aria of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni," will recall one of the diva's most noted roles. Although America is her adopted land, Madame Destinn is by birth and blood affiliation a Czech-Slovak. As such she will sing arias by the two great composers of Bohemia; the love song from Dvorak's opera "Russalka," and the Cradle Song from Smetana's opera "The Kiss."

Pierre Monteux will conduct at the same concert Berlioz's famous Fantastic Symphony which was inspired by his now historical love story. It describes the "Dreams and Passions" of the composer, "A Ball," a "Pastoral Scene," "The March to the Scaffold," and the orgy of the "Witches' Sabbath." The performance of the work in Boston was generally conceded one of the finest achievements of the season. The other numbers will be Borodin's sketch "On the Steppes of Central Asia" and Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

ESTABLISHED 1861

From STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 19, the soloist will be Madame Ema Destinn, the glorious-voiced diva who is a dramatic and lyric soprano in one. Before journeying to the land of her berth, the Czecho-Slovakia of the now troublous and revolutionary Central Europe, she transfixed many a Metropolitan opera audience with the electric beauty of her tones. Returning to this her adopted country, her welcome has been enthusiastic. Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Berlioz's noted "Fantastic" symphony in which the composer weaves his romantic love affair through various episodes, his "Dreams and Passions," "A Bell," "Pastoral Scene," "March to the Scaffold" (culminating in his own execution) and a "Witches's Sabbath." The other numbers will be Borodin's "Tone Picture," "On the steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

From CITIZEN
...ess: Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Last of the Series with Mme Destinn as Soloist.

Appearing as soloists at the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, March 19, Madame Emma Destinn will sing arias revealing two sides of her art and personality. "Non mir dir," the famous aria of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanna," will recall one of the diva's most noted roles. Although America is her adopted land, Madame Destinn is by birth and blood affiliation a Czecho-Slovak. As such she will sing arias by the two great composers of Bohemia, the love song from Dvorak's opera "Russalka," and the Cradle Song from Smetana's opera, "The Kiss."

Pierre Monteux will conduct at the same concert Berlioz's famous Fantastic Symphony which was inspired by his now historical love story. It describes the "Dreams and Passions" of the composer; "A Ball," a "Pastoral Scene," "The March to the Scaffold," and the orgy of the "Witches' Sabbath." The performance of the work in Boston was generally conceded one of the finest achievements of the season. ...oth numbers will be Borodin's sket... "C... the Steppes of Central Asia," a... Wa... ner's overture to "The Flyi... to... man."

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.

PROGRAMS CHANGED.

Boston Symphony Meets New Conditions for Brooklyn and New York Concerts.

Because of the strike of thirty-five musicians that has threatened to disrupt the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announcement comes from Boston that the programs for Friday evening in the Academy of Music and for Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall have been changed. The new order of things will provide the Brooklyn audience with Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, excerpts from Wagner, and with Emmy Destinn as soloist, an aria from Mozart's "Don Giovanni" and a group of songs. Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall the program consists of Beethoven's Fourth and selections from Wagner, while Saturday afternoon will be heard Beethoven's "Fidelio" Overture, Mozart's G-Mnior Sympathy, Borodin's sketch, "On the ...teppes of Central Asia," and De... Little Suite.

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN

Boston Orchestra Friday—New York Symphony Saturday Afternoon.

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, the soloist will be Mme. Emmy Destinn. Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Berlioz's noted "Fantastic" Symphony, in which the composer weaves his romantic love affair through various episodes — his "Dreams and Passions," "A Ball," "Pastoral Scene," "March to the Scaffold" (culminating in his own execution) and a "Witches' Sabbath." The other numbers will be Borodin's tone picture, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.

THE ORCHESTRAS' PLANS

At each of the final pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the season, to be given Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Pierre Monteux will give a notable piece its first performance in New York. On Thursday, John Alden Carpenter's piano "Concertino," assisted by E. Robert Schmitz, the noted French pianist; on Saturday, "The Pauses of Silence: Seven Symphonic Expressions," by Malipiero, the daring young Italian composer whose music has attracted considerable attention. The other numbers for the Thursday concert will be Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony, Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's Overture to "Fidelio," Mozart's Symphony in G minor (Kochel 550), and Charpentier's orchestral suite, "Impressions of Italy."

From Times
New York City

The New Symphony's revised program for March 30 and 31 includes Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, Chopin's second concerto, with Godowsky, and Tschaikovsky's fourth symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is announced at the Newark Armory tomorrow, when the soloist will be Rudolph Ganz, with a program from Weber, Grieg and Borodin.

EVENING GLOBE
New York City

BOSTON PROGRAMMES.

The troubles in the Boston Symphony Orchestra resulting in the dropping of some thirty-odd members have forced a change in programme for the Carnegie Hall concerts announced for Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week. Neither the concertina of John Alden Carpenter nor the new work by Malipiero will be given.

The revised programme for Thursday consists of Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and the following pieces: Wagner: Prelude to "Lohengrin," "A Siegfried Idyll," "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," and excerpts from the third act of "Die Meistersinger." The programme for Saturday ... "Fidelio" overture, ...

From
INQUIRER,
Philadelphia, Pa.

Made a Note Of

Mme. Emmy Destinova will be the assisting artist at the closing concert for the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Wednesday evening, March 17, when she will sing among other things the "Non mi dir" aria from Donna Anna in Mozart's opera of "Don Giovanni." The orchestra will play the same composer's G minor symphony, Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture and Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy."

PRESS,
Philadelphia, Pa.

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, March 17, the soloist will be Madame Emmy Destinn, the glorious-voiced diva who is a dramatic and lyric soprano in one. Before journeying to the land of her birth, the Czecho-Slovakia of the now troublous and revolutionary central Europe, she transfixed many a Metropolitan opera audience with the electric beauty of her tones. Returning to this, her adopted country, her welcome has been enthusiastic. One of her arias at this concert will be "Non mi dir" of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni," one of Mme. Destinn's famous roles. Pierre Monteux will conduct Mozart's immortally lovely symphony in G minor, Beethoven's overture to his opera "Fidelio," and Charpentier's sunny and realistic "Impressions of Italy." The Frenchman's work comprises "Serenade" (with viola solo off stage), "At the Fountain," "On Muleback," "On the Summits," and finally, "Naples," a glitter of characteristic color.

ESTABLISHED 1381

From
EVENING POST,
New York City

So pronounced was the success attained by E. Robert Schmitz, the French soldier pianist, in his playing of the John Alden Carpenter "Concertino" with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in that city last month that he has been engaged to repeat his dazzling performance with them at Carnegie Hall on March 18. This will be the first time in many years that this organization has used an assisting artist at any of its New York concerts.

Mr. and Mrs. Raymond Bloch will give a sonata recital at Aeolian Hall on Saturday evening, March 20.

Raymond Havens gives a piano recital at Aeolian Hall next Monday afternoon.

From
EVENING POST,
New York City

Boston Symphony Programmes Changed

The programmes for the coming Boston Symphony concerts at Carnegie Hall have been entirely changed, as follows: Thursday evening, March 18: Beethoven symphony No. 4; Wagner, prelude to "Lohengrin," "A Siegfried Idyll," "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," excerpts from Act III of "The Mastersingers." Saturday afternoon, March 20: Beethoven, overture to "Fidelio"; Mozart, symphony in G minor; Borodin, "On the Steppes of Central Asia"; Debussy, petite suite.

TELEGRAM
New York City

Boston Symphony Programme

Union or no union, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been disrupted because of difficulties with the Musician's Protective Union, will play its pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall this week under the direction of Pierre Monteux.

Thursday evening the programme will contain Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 in B flat major, op 60; Wagner's prelude to "Lohengrin," "A Siegfried Idyll," "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," excerpts from Act III. of "The Mastersingers." Introduction, "Dance of the Apprentices." Welcome to Hans Sachs.

Saturday afternoon the following numbers will be played:—Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio;" Mozart's Symphony in G minor (Köchel 550); Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia," orchestral sketch, op 7; Debussy's Petit Suite, arranged for orchestra by Henri Büsser.

TRIBUNE
New York City

At the Boston Symphony concert to be given in the Newark Armory tomorrow evening three excerpts from Wagner's music dramas will be played instead of Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy," as originally announced. They are "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," "A Siegfried Idyll" and selections from the third act of "The Mastersingers": Introduction, Dance of the Apprentice and Welcome to Hans Sachs. The remainder of the program will be unchanged—Weber's overture to "Der Freischütz," Borodin's sketch "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Grieg's concerto, in which Rudolph

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

At the final Boston symphony concert of the season, to be given at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, March 17, the solosit will be Emma Destinn, the soprano. One of her arias will be "Non mi dir" fro... "Don Giovanni." Pie... conduct Mozart's ... Beethoven's ...

...SUN
...ress: Baltimore, Md.

...te...

Destinn To Be Soloist.

At the final Boston Symphony Concert of the season to be given in the Lyric Theatre on Tuesday evening, March 16, the soloist will be Mme. Emma Destinn, who is a dramatic and lyric soprano in one. Before journeying to the land of her birth, the Czecho-Slovakia of troublous and revolutionary Central Europe, she pleased many a Metropolitan opera audience with the beauty of her tones. Returning to this, her adopted country, her welcome has been enthusiastic.

AMERICAN,
Baltimore, Md.

EMMY DESTINN SOLOIST.

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season to be given in the Lyric Theater on Tuesday evening, March 16, the soloist will be Mme. Emmy Destinn, the glorious voiced diva, who is a dramatic and lyric soprano in one. Before journeying to the land of her birth, the Czecho-Slovakia of the now troublous and revolutionary Central Europe, she transfixed many a Metropolitan opera audience with the electric beauty of her tones.

...rk City

...the final pair of Boston ...hestra concerts of the ...iven next Thursday ...rday afternoon, Pierre ...e a notable piece its ... in New York; on ... Alden Carpenter's ...; on Saturday, "The ... Seven Symphonic ... Malipiero, the young ... whose music has at... attention.

From
EAGLE
...ess Brooklyn, N. Y.

MAR - 7 1914

NEXT BOSTON PROGRAM

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 19, the soloist will be Mme. Emmy Destinn, the glorious-voiced diva who is a dramatic and lyric soprano in one. Before journeying to the land of her birth, the Czechoslovakia of the now troublous and revolutionary Central Europe, she transfixed many a Metropolitan Opera audience with the electric beauty of her tones. Returning to this, her adopted country, her welcome has been enthusiastic. Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Berlioz's noted "Fantastic" Symphony, in which the composer weaves his romantic love affair through various episodes—his "Dreams and Passions," "A Ball," "Pastoral Scene," "March to the Scaffold" (culminating in his own execution) and a "Witches' Sabbath." The other numbers will be Borodin's tone picture, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

From.....

...ddress New York City

...Date..... MAR - 8 K

A notable feature of the final Thursday evening concert of this season, to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Mar. 18, will be the Concertino, by John Alden Carpenter (the composer of the "Birthday of the Infants"), which E. Robert Schmitz, the noted French pianist, will play with the orchestra. The other numbers will be Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony and Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

...m RECORD
...dress Philadelphia, ...a.

...e...

...—At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, March 17, the soloist will be Madame Destinn. One of her arias at this concert will be "Non mi dir" of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni." Pierre Monteux will conduct Mozart's Symphony in G minor, Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio" and Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy."

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

At the final Boston symphony concert of the season, to be given at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, March 17, the solosit will be Emma Destinn, the soprano. One of her arias will be "Non mi dir" from "Don Giovanni." Pierre Monteux will conduct Mozart's ... Beethoven's ...

...m EVENING JOURNAL
...dress New York City

...e...

...Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Orchestra, for its final Thursday evening concert in Carnegie Hall this season, on March 18 will introduce John Alden Carpenter's "concertino" for piano and orchestra, with E. Robert Schmitz as soloist, and at the following Saturday matinee will give a first performance of the "seven symphonic expressions," "Le Pause del Silenzio," by the Italian modernist, Malipiero.

"The New Symphony Orches...

...om.....

...ldress New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY GOES TO NEWARK

Pierre Monteux Will Conduct at World Famous Artists' Series March 22.

RUDOLPH GANZ THE SOLOIST

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra appears at the Newark Armory on Monday evening, March 22, Joseph A. Fuerstman's thousands of subscribers to the World Famous Artists' Series from all parts of North Jersey will have the first opportunity of enjoying one of America's finest orchestras, under the eminent directorship of the new conductor, Pierre Monteux. The Boston Symphony personnel is considered by many the best in the world, virtually unchanged from year to year. Long famous as a conductor of opera and ballet throughout Europe, Monteux, coming here in 1916 at the head of the Ballet Russe, won renown as a conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House, and this season was prevailed upon to accept the "blue ribbon" post for a period of three years with the Boston Symphony.

The distinguished Swiss pianist, Rudolph Ganz, will be the soloist on March 22. Because Ganz is a positive aggressive factor in the development of modern musical standards, Mr. Fuerstman selected him to judge the semi-finals in his famous bi-State pianists' contest, in which Rachmaninoff judged the finals.

For this concert, the sixth in the Fuerstman series, Ganz will play Grieg's famous and brilliant concerto. Monteux will conduct for its purely orchestral numbers Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz," Borodin's Russian Tone Picture, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Charpentier's sunny and realistic "Impressions of Italy."

This concert, as was the case with those of Galli-Curci, the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, Rachmaninoff and Anna Case, will enjoy the advantage of Mr. Fuerstman's acoustical ceiling, as will also the coming armory concerts, namely, Ysaye and Elman, April 3; Heifetz, April 7; and John McCormack, April 20, thus completing one of the most remarkable series of musical events in New Jersey.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

WORLD,
New York City

MUSIC

JAMES GIBBONS HUNEKER

The Boston Orchestra.

Orchestras, like nations, are happiest when they don't wash their doubtful linen in public. Through no fault of Conductor Pierre Monteux, who conducted the fifth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night, he finds himself in the centre of an unmusical whirlwind—what he would call a "tourbillon"—while the menacing clash of "Die Wacht am Rhein" drowns the martial measures of the "Marseillaise." The ostensible reason given for the recent row in Boston is the Musical Union; but the fundamental cause is, unhappily, racial dissonance. So the famous band from Boston, robbed of more than a third of its players, limped to New York yesterday determined to play if the organization had only twenty members, as Manager Brennan put it.

After the defection in Boston some old members came forward, and among them were Charles Martin Loeffler, our leading composer, and Timothee Adamowski, who offered their services. Both these artists were first violins in the orchestra when Franz Kneisel was concert master and Gericke conductor. Arcadian days, indeed.

As Mr. Fradkin is now playing the role of the insurgent Lucifer, his seat was occupied by Mr. Theodovowicz, and we also noted the veteran violoncellist, Alwyn Schroeder, at his accustomed seat desk; M. Longy, oboist extraordinary, whose tone resembles the etched line of a graphic composition, was like thin fire as it ringed the woodwind choir.

There were only ten first fiddlers as against the usual sixteen; the contrabassi were reduced to six. But the demon drummer, huddled over his kettledrums, punctuated the sinister atmosphere with his subtle tapping. Ah! if Vance Thompson had only been with us to pen a prose-poem on the vastitude of silence; also to give Don the Marquis (and his patients of nobility date from the stars) a chance to write a new version of "How to hear and grow anxious." There, the cat's out of the bag, a calico cat, full grown. The word "anxious" liberates our pent-up nervousness. Everybody in the audience was nervous. Bomb outrages, false tempi, stopped horns—stopped by His Honor—what catastrophe was not predicted? And nothing happened. The orchestra ran on half-steam, though not at half-speed. Maitre Monteux stood on the pilot box and cheered his valiant crew.

It would be idle to deny that dynamic contrasts were missing. The foundational tone of the orchestra seemed to drop out at times. But the strings were plangent, the tonal balance excellent, considering circumstances, and much of the playing not only charming but of a finesse. The original programme scheme was changed. The conductor tempered the wind to the shorn strings. Beethoven's fourth symphony and a group of Wagner excerpts made up an interesting evening. The last matinee of the season here occurs tomorrow afternoon at the same hall. Cheer up, Monteux! The musical world will not allow such an orchestra to perish because of rebellion in the ranks. There is always a good fish in the sea as ever came out of it, even if the finny tribe in this case happens to be "sacred codfish." (Boston papers please copy.)

From TRIBUNE,
New York City

Boston Symphony Concert Is Given Despite Strike

Places of 33 Players Who Are Out Filled by Pensioners and Excellent Program Is Heard at Carnegie Hall

Despite the thirty-three strikers who left the orchestra last week as the result of friction over the proposed unionization of the famous organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra showed its fighting spirit in giving its concert at Carnegie Hall last evening. Loyal members were determined to carry out the plans for the trip, if with only twenty men. But their ranks, although smaller than usual, were not reduced to such desperate straits. The strikers' places were filled by pensioners, who gladly returned to assist the orchestra in a critical period of its career. Other players, it is said, were recruited from the New England Conservatory of Music.

A novelty was to have been given—John Alden Carpenter's "Concertino." But under the circumstances it was, of course, necessary to change the program to one less elaborate. Conductor Monteux chose his pieces shrewdly—Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and five Wagner numbers—the Prelude to "Lohengrin," "A Siegfried Idyll," "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," excerpts from Act III of "The Mastersingers." Considering the difficulties under which the orchestra has been laboring, a detailed criticism of the performance would not be fair, but it may be said in passing that the strings were surprisingly effective in the numbers from "Lohengrin" and "Siegfried."

ESTABLISHED 1861

From Herald
New York Ci

Boston Orchestra Abandons Berlioz for Beethoven

Mr. Monteux Changes Programme—Lacks Thirty-one Musicians.

What became of the "Symphonie Fantastique" of Hector Berlioz?

That question must have ruffled the equable temperaments of many subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts as they sat in their seats at the final Thursday evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night. The very types had melted into glowing streams of glorification when the work was lately performed in Boston, and despite the fact that a somewhat weighty concert master had remained sitting when Pierre Monteux, conductor, commanded the orchestra to rise and accept the laudations of cultivated Boston, the work had been announced for repetition before the mercenary children of New York.

But without explanation it vanished into thin air, almost as thin as some of its own, and in its place the astonished auditors beheld on the programme the unfamiliar B flat symphony No. 4 of Beethoven. Nothing fantastic about that. No witches' Sabbath nor march to the gallows nor any suggestion of a mystical return to life. Who writes essays on the fourth symphony now? No one. Yet in its day it raised a tempest in a teapot. Weber flew into a rage over it, wrote stuff and nonsense about the "no ideas of Mr. Composer" and prattled ridiculously of Gyrowetz and Pleyel.

And then there was the famous drum figure in the slow movement, by virtue of which the menial kettle drums rose to the dignity of soloists. Many fine things have been written about this symphony, but one feels certain that Boston would not have been shaken to its centre by last evening's performance, as it was by the Fradkinized interpretation of the "Fantastique."

After the Beethoven there was a row of specimens of Wagner, namely, the prelude to "Lohengrin," Siegfried Idyll," "Forest Murmurs" and bits of the third act of "The Meistersingers." The audience was very demonstrative.

Thirty-one members of the orchestra were absent last evening. The number of players was seventy-two, on a basis of ten first violins and six double basses, but some of these were substitutes. The missing members left the orchestra because of the discharge of Frederick Fradkin, the concert master, for insubordination. At the recent performance of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" in Boston he refused to rise when Mr. Monteux directed the orchestra to stand in acknowledgment of applause. Several of the seceders have already asked for reinstatement, and W. H. Brennan, the manager, said last night that all would surely do so. Mr. Fradkin will not be reinstated.

From American
New York City

ANOTHER "Little Symphony" played in Carnegie Hall last night—not under the direction of Georges Barrere, however, but with Pierre Monteux at the baton.

It was the "Boston Symphony Orchestra." The orchestra in its present condition numbers about seventy men, with ten first violins, nine second violins, eight violas, eight 'cellos and six basses. What caused heartaches last night, however, was not so much the diminished size of the band as its lack of co-ordination, unanimity, balance, precision and finish. The strength of a chain must be measured by its weakest link, and there were some very weak links in this musical chain.

"Zaza," served once more in the Metropolitan Opera House last night as a vehicle for Geraldine Farrar's histrionic art. Her principal collaborators were Crimi as Dufresne, Amato as Cascart, Kathleen Howard as Anaide, Minnie Egener as Natalie. Moranzoni conducted.

n SUN
ress New York City
te MAR 10 1912

Music

The Boston Symphony.

For its final evening concert in New York this season the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to Carnegie Hall last night, and there played a programme of Beethoven and Wagner. It was a programme rather hastily made to suit the home emergency, and it mattered not half so much as the conditions surrounding its playing. For this was the first opportunity for New York to see what changes have been made in personnel, and to prove—by the ovation Conductor Monteux had—its appreciation for the completion of the season's series.

Subtract some thirty men from approximately ninety, and the difference will be tonal as well as numerical. Yet even with the present (and only temporary) handicaps the orchestra accomplished an artistic evening. It was a rather lonely sight upon so large a platform, but it played its Beethoven fourth symphony with all possible spirit and with as fine a regard for timbre and tempo as ever made this organization famous. The romantic fervor of the Wagnerian selections did not, unfortunately, always swell to like breadths. The rough spots which marred the "Siegfried Idyll," for example, could not be blamed upon the diminished size of the orchestra, though they were undoubtedly accentuated by it. M. Monteux conducted the "Mastersingers" excerpts, on the other hand, with a brave and exultant fervor. There was also the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried."

The final concert of the Boston Symphony in New York for this season comes on Saturday afternoon. After that the management of the orchestra gave every assurance yesterday afternoon that it will return next season persevering as a non-union in the Worl tion and as one ... the less ...

pm.....
ldress New York City
ate.....

BOSTONIANS IN GREAT CONCERT

Pierre Monteux Leads Famous Orchestra With Less Than Sixty Men.

ARTISTS RISE ABOVE TROUBLES

Boston Organization Delights Another Fine Audience at Carnegie Hall.

By JOHN H. RAFTERY.

Out of its recent welter of internal dissensions, labor troubles and threatened disorganization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening emerged upon the stage of Carnegie Hall decimated but undaunted, scarred with battle but triumphant in the result, the best that are left of "the old guard" and enough of them to play a splendid concert even though the onset of their thinned ranks seemed at times wavering and almost futile in the mighty tonal massifs of Wagnerian music.

Of the regiment that once responded to the batons of Muck, Rabaud and Monteux, less than sixty musicians last evening responded to the summons of the conductor's baton, but that sixty were made up of artists, every man of them, and in some passages of the onerous program, notably in the Beethoven symphony and in "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," the deathless spirit and the unsurpassed artistry of the famous orchestra spoke in unforgettable music.

With an orchestra not more than half the size of the days of full membership Conductor Monteux was able to deliver the gorgeous Fourth Symphony with amazing power, roundness and volume, except perhaps in the majestic and overtopping finale, in which there was evidence of diminished strength in the brasses, the great strings and the percussion. But it was a lovely performance, for all that, played with impeccable sympathy, clarity and unison in the second movement and in the trio and allegro of the third.

The Prelude to "Lohengrin," which began the second half of the program, led the gradual way into mightier excerpts from Wagner, and never was there better reading of "A Siegfried Idyll" or of the third act of "The Mastersingers" than M. Monteux gave to them last evening. His men played with the zealous fervor of the splendid musicians they are, and derived many glorious passages from "The Dance of the Apprentices" and "Homage to Hans Sachs." The fine audience was generous

TELEGRAM
New York City

124

In Spite of Difficulties Boston Orchestra Play

Minus Thirty-four Players, Who Resigned, Boston Musicians Give Concert.

MISS FARRAR AS ZAZA

John Powell, Pianist, Makes a Speech at His Recital.

In spite of disruptions, resignations and trouble with the Musicians' Protective Union, the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to New York for its final evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night. Its concert master, Frederic Fradkin, was recently discharged for refusing to obey the conductor, Pierre Monteux. At a Boston concert the men of the orchestra were instructed to rise in response to applause, and Mr. Fradkin remained seated, though the others "rose to the occasion." Out of sympathy or because of large financial offers from other orchestras, or because of intervention by the Musicians' Protective Union, thirty-four other members left. And the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which five years ago was touted as the "greatest in the world," had to come here in a crippled condition.

A few extra men were secured to fill in the vacancies, making the number of musicians about seventy, which is enough to make up a fairly large symphonic body. But the balance of the different choirs was upset. The resignations came mostly with the violins, while the wood wind and brass choirs were not greatly changed, so that there was often a weakness in the string section.

The programme had to be altered on short notice. Beethoven's fourth symphony and some Wagnerian numbers were played, while a new American work by John Alden Carpenter had to be chopped.

For a makeshift orchestra the performance of the symphony was creditable. It had not the brilliance of other Beethoven performances in other seasons, but it served its purpose—to get the season over with as gracefully as possible and give the management an opportunity to fill in the vacancies.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is the only important organization of its kind which is not unionized, and the intention is to keep it independent. It was learned last night that enough applications from men in other orchestras have already been received to give assurance that next season the orchestra will not be weaker than this, and that it will be unnecessary to import players from Europe.

STAR
: Baltimore, Md.

MMY DESTINN WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

At the final Boston Symphony oncert of the season in Baltimore, o be given at the Lyric Theater ext Tuesday evening, March 16, Madame Emmy Destinn, dramatic soprano, will be the soloist. "Non mi dir," the famous aria of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni," will at this concert reveal one of the most beautiful moments in one of her most famous roles. She will also sing operatic arias by the two great Bohemian composers: The Cradle Song from Smetana's "The Kiss," and the love song from Dvorak's "Russalka."

Pierre Monteux will present Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony, which was inspired by his now historical love story. It describes the "Dreams and Passions" of the composer, "A Ball," a "Pastoral Scene," "The March to the Scaffold" and the orgy of the "Witches' Sabbath." The performance of the work in Boston was generally conceded one of the finest achievements of the season. The other numbers will be Borodin's sketch, "The Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's overture to the "Flying Dutchman."

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

The program for the Boston Symony Concert tomorrow evening, at the cademy of Music, the soloist being ma Destinn, has been changed as fol- ws:—

Beethoven—Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major.
Mozart—Aria "Non mi dir," from "Don Giovanni."
Wagner—"A Siegfried Idyll."
Songs with Orchestra—(a) Two Berceuses from "The Kiss," by Smetana; (b) Song from "Russalka," Dvorak.
Wagner—Excerpts from Act III of "The Mastersingers": Introduction, Dance of the Apprentices, Welcome to Hans Sachs.

EVENING GLOBE
New York City

Music.

The Boston Symphony Co —Other Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchest diminished number came to Car Hall last evening for its final T day concert of the present se The troubles that have recently the Boston band asunder have pretty fully aired in the press. is no need of discussing here an merits, demirts, whisperings, probabilities. Suffice it to repo evening's concert and at the time to utter a very pious hope the future of the foremost orch of the world will surmount glori any and all obstacles.

With more than thirty membe the orchestra in secession, Mr. teux was obliged to substitute ferent programme from that ori ly announced. Some pensioners orchestra returned to help it o its difficulties; it is said conserv recruits were in the ranks; two eminent graduates of the band a Loeffler and Mr. Adamowski lo offered their service, but appar were not called upon; mean time ornaments of the organizatio Messrs. Longy and Schroeder an incomparably demoniac drumme in their accustomed places, and Theodorowicz occupied the co master's desk instead of the insul nate Fradkin. The audience, w filled Carnegie Hall, greeted Mr. teux with more than usual war and throughout the evening there cordial applause for both the ductor and the band.

There was inevitably some la dynamic contrast in the perform yesterday—you can't get the fu mental tone, for instance, from double basses that you can from e But the orchestra played with s did spirit, with finish, and as its finest mettle. Beethoven's fo symphony opened the programme cept for the famous adagio, this phony is not of the "greater" thoven. Still it is Beethoven, beautiful, and then it is not pl into the ground as are its imme neighbors of the Titan brood, the and the fifth. Moreover, a smal chestra is quite authentic for its formance. Mr. Monteux read it lightfully, and the men played it crispness, with esprit, and in par lar with an excellent appreciatio the tricksy spirit of the scherzo.

Wagner selections made up the of the programme. Never had I h the climax of the prelude to "Lo grin" carried up so thrillingly.

Monteux cannot save the "Sieg Idyll" from being prolix, but he through his poetic feeling, his s choice of tempi, his skillful empl of all beauties, keep it from b soporific. In the "Waldweben" f "Siegfried" the balance between accompanying strings and the sol struments was admirably adju The music did not seem a lightly companied concerto for wind ins ments. Here again there was s variety in the tempi and a joyo engrossing climax. What a plea it would be to hear the entire scor

"Siegfried" led by Mr. Monteux!

Excerpts from the last act of Meistersinger" completed the gramme. The meditative beaut the introduction, the jollity of the prentices' dance, and the rich-t pomp of the homage to Hans S all were set forth sympathetically most musically—a thing that ca be said of many a local performa of this music both in and out of opera house. In spite of all the ficulties, this was really one of most successful and enjoyable certs the Boston Symphony Orche has ever given in our town.

PETTS SANBORN

From QUIRER,
Philadelphia, Pa.

MAR 16 1912

ston Symphony Programme Change

The programme for the coming ston Symphony Concert at the ademy of Music tomorrow evening, arch 17th, has been changed as fol- ws:

Beethoven—Symphony No. 4 in B flat major.
Mozart—Aria "Non mi dir," from Don Giovanna."
Wagner—"A Siegfried Idyll."
Songs with Orchestra—(a) Two erceuses from "The Kiss," by metana; (b) Song from "Russalka."— vorak.
Wagner—Excerpts from Act The Mastersingers." Introd ance of the Apprentices—We Hans Sachs.
Soloist, Emma Destinn.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

WORLD,
New York City

MUSIC

JAMES GIBBONS HUNEKER

The Boston Orchestra.

Orchestras, like nations, are happiest when they don't wash their doubtful linen in public. Through no fault of Conductor Pierre Monteux, who conducted the fifth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night, he finds himself in the centre of an unmusical whirlwind—what he would call a "tourbillon"—while the menacing clash of "Die Wacht am Rhein" drowns the martial measures of the "Marseillaise." The ostensible reason given for the recent row in Boston is the Musical Union; but the fundamental cause is, unhappily, racial dissonance. So the famous band from Boston, robbed of more than a third of its players, limped to New York yesterday determined to play if the organization had only twenty members, as Manager Brennan put it.

After the defection in Boston some old members came forward, and among them were Charles Martin Loeffler, our leading composer, and Timothee Adamowski, who offered their services. Both these artists were first violins in the orchestra when Franz Kneisel was concert master and Gericke conductor. Arcadian days, indeed.

As Mr. Fradkin is now playing the role of the insurgent Lucifer, his seat was occupied by Mr. Theodovowicz, and we also noted the veteran violoncellist, Alwyn Schroeder, at his accustomed seat desk; M. Longy, oboist extraordinary, whose tone resembles the etched line of a graphic composition, was like thin fire as it ringed the woodwind choir.

There were only ten first fiddlers as against the usual sixteen; the contrabassi were reduced to six. But the demon drummer, huddled over his kettledrums, punctuated the sinister atmosphere with his subtle tapping. Ah! if Vance Thompson had only been with us to pen a prose-poem on the vastitude of silence; also to give Don the Marquis (and his patents of nobility date from the stars) a chance to write a new version of "How to hear and grow anxious." There, the cat's out of the bag, a calico cat, full grown. The word "anxious" liberates our pent-up nervousness. Everybody in the audience was nervous. Bomb outrages, false tempi, stopped horns—stopped by His Honor—what catastrophe was not predicted? And nothing happened. The orchestra ran on half-steam, though not at half-speed. Maitre Monteux stood on the pilot box and cheered his valiant crew.

It would be idle to deny that dynamic contrasts were missing. The foundational tone of the orchestra seemed to drop out at times. But the strings were plangent, the tonal balance excellent, considering circumstances, and much of the playing not only charming but of a finesse. The original programme scheme was changed. The conductor tempered the wind to the shorn strings. Beethoven's fourth symphony and a group of Wagner excerpts made up an interesting evening. The last matinee of the season here occurs tomorrow afternoon at the same hall. Cheer up, Monteux! The musical world will not allow such an orchestra to perish because of rebellion in the ranks. There is always a good fish in the sea as ever came out of it, even if the finny tribe in this case happens to be "sacred codfish." (Boston papers please copy.)

From TRIBUNE,
New York City

Boston Symphony Concert Is Given Despite Strike

Places of 33 Players Who Are Out Filled by Pensioners and Excellent Program Is Heard at Carnegie Hall

Despite the thirty-three strikers who left the orchestra last week as the result of friction over the proposed unionization of the famous organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra showed its fighting spirit in giving its concert at Carnegie Hall last evening. Loyal members were determined to carry out the plans for the trip, if with only twenty men. But their ranks, although smaller than usual, were not reduced to such desperate straits. The strikers' places were filled by pensioners, who gladly returned to assist the orchestra in a critical period of its career. Other players, it is said, were recruited from the New England Conservatory of Music.

A novelty was to have been given—John Alden Carpenter's "Concertino." But under the circumstances it was, of course, necessary to change the program to one less elaborate. Conductor Monteux chose his pieces shrewdly—Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and five Wagner numbers—the Prelude to "Lohengrin," "A Siegfried Idyll," "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," excerpts from Act III of "The Mastersingers." Considering the difficulties under which the orchestra has been laboring, a detailed criticism of the performance would not be fair, but it may be said in passing that the strings were surprisingly effective in the numbers from "Lohengrin" and "Siegfried."

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Herald
New York Ci

Boston Orchestra Abandons Berlioz for Beethoven

Mr. Monteux Changes Programme—Lacks Thirty-one Musicians.

What became of the "Symphonie Fantastique" of Hector Berlioz?

That question must have ruffled the equable temperaments of many subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts as they sat in their seats at the final Thursday evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night. The very types had melted into glowing streams of glorification when the work was lately performed in Boston, and despite the fact that a somewhat weighty concert master had remained sitting when Pierre Monteux, conductor, commanded the orchestra to rise and accept the laudations of cultivated Boston, the work had been announced for repetition before the mercenary children of New York.

But without explanation it vanished into thin air, almost as thin as some of its own, and in its place the astonished auditors beheld on the programme the unfamiliar B flat symphony No. 4 of Beethoven. Nothing fantastic about that. No witches' Sabbath nor march to the gallows nor any suggestion of a mystical return to life. Who writes essays on the fourth symphony now? No one. Yet in its day it raised a tempest in a teapot. Weber flew into a rage over it, wrote stuff and nonsense about the "no ideas of Mr. Composer" and prattled ridiculously of Gyrowetz and Pleyel.

And then there was the famous drum figure in the slow movement, by virtue of which the menial kettle drums rose to the dignity of soloists. Many fine things have been written about this symphony, but one feels certain that Boston would not have been shaken to its centre by last evening's performance, as it was by the Fradkinized interpretation of the "Fantastique."

After the Beethoven there was a row of specimens of Wagner, namely, the prelude to "Lohengrin," Siegfried Idyll," "Forest Murmurs" and bits of the third act of "The Meistersingers." The audience was very demonstrative.

Thirty-one members of the orchestra were absent last evening. The number of players was seventy-two, on a basis of ten first violins and six double basses, but some of these were substitutes. The missing members left the orchestra because of the discharge of Frederick Fradkin, the concert master, for insubordination. At the recent performance of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" in Boston he refused to rise when Mr. Monteux directed the orchestra to stand in acknowledgment of applause. Several of the seceders have already asked for reinstatement, and W. H. Brennan, the manager, said last night that all would surely do so. Mr. Fradkin will not be reinstated.

From American
New York City

ANOTHER "Little Symphony" played in Carnegie Hall last night—not under the direction of Georges Barrere, however, but with Pierre Monteux at the baton.

It was the "Boston Symphony Orchestra." The orchestra in its present condition numbers about seventy men, with ten first violins, nine second violins, eight violas, eight 'cellos and six basses. What caused heartaches last night, however, was not so much the diminished size of the band as its lack of co-ordination, unanimity, balance, precision and finish. The strength of a chain must be measured by its weakest link, and there were some very weak links in this msuical chain.

"Zaza" served once more in the Metropolitan Opera House last night as a vehicle for Geraldine Farrar's histrionic art. Her principal collaborators were Crimi as Dufresne, Amato as Cascart, Kathleen Howard as Anaide, Minnie Egener as Natalie. Moranzoni conducted.

n SUN
ress New York City

te MAR 10 1

Music

The Boston Symphony.

For its final evening concert in New York this season the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to Carnegie Hall last night, and there played a programme of Beethoven and Wagner. It was a programme rather hastily made to suit the home emergency, and it mattered not half so much as the conditions surrounding its playing. For this was the first opportunity for New York to see what changes have been made in personnel, and to prove—by the ovation Conductor Monteux had—its appreciation for the completion of the season's series.

Subtract some thirty men from approximately ninety, and the difference will be tonal as well as numerical. Yet even with the present (and only temporary) handicaps the orchestra accomplished an artistic evening. It was a rather lonely sight upon so large a platform, but it played its Beethoven fourth symphony with all possible spirit and with as fine a regard for timbre and tempo as ever made this organization famous. The romantic fervor of the Wagnerian selections did not, unfortunately, always swell to like breadths. The rough spots which marred the "Siegfried Idyll," for example, could not be blamed upon the diminished size of the orchestra, though they were undoubtedly accentuated by it. M. Monteux conducted the "Mastersingers" excerpts, on the other hand, with a brave and exultant fervor. There was also the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried."

The final concert of the Boston Symphony in New York for this season comes on Saturday afternoon. After that the management of the orchestra gave every assurance yesterday afternoon that it will return next season persevering as a non-union in the Worl tion and as one the less so

om

ldress New York City

ate

BOSTONIANS IN GREAT CONCERT

Pierre Monteux Leads Famous Orchestra With Less Than Sixty Men.

ARTISTS RISE ABOVE TROUBLES

Boston Organization Delights Another Fine Audience at Carnegie Hall.

By JOHN H. RAFTERY.

Out of its recent welter of internal dissensions, labor troubles and threatened disorganization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening emerged upon the stage of Carnegie Hall decimated but undaunted, scarred with battle but triumphant in the result, the best that are left of "the old guard" and enough of them to play a splendid concert even though the onset of their thinned ranks seemed at times wavering and almost futile in the mighty tonal massifs of Wagnerian music.

Of the regiment that once responded to the batons of Muck, Rabaud and Monteux, less than sixty musicians last evening responded to the summons of the conductor's baton, but that sixty was made up of artists, every man of them and in some passages of the onerous program, notably in the Beethoven symphony and in "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," the deathless spirit and the unsurpassed artistry of the famous orchestra spoke in unforgettable music.

With an orchestra not more than half the size of the days of full membership Conductor Monteux was able to deliver the gorgeous Fourth Symphony with amazing power, roundness and volume, except perhaps in the majestic and overtopping finale, in which there was evidence of diminished strength in the brasses, the great strings and the percussion. But it was a lovely performance, for all that, played with impeccable sympathy, clarity and unison in the second movement and in the trio and allegro of the third.

The Prelude to "Lohengrin," which began the second half of the program, led the gradual way into mightier excerpts from Wagner, and never was there better reading of "A Siegfried Idyll" or of the third act of "The Mastersingers" than M. Monteux gave to them last evening. His men played with the zealous fervor of the splendid musicians they are, and derived many glorious passages from "The Dance of the Apprentices" and "Homage to Hans Sachs." The fine audience was generous

TELEGRAM
New York City

124

In Spite of Difficulties Boston Orchestra Play

Minus Thirty-four Players, Who Resigned, Boston Musicians Give Concert.

MISS FARRAR AS ZAZA

John Powell, Pianist, Makes a Speech at His Recital.

In spite of disruptions, resignations and trouble with the Musicians' Protective Union, the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to New York for its final evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night. Its concert master, Frederic Fradkin, was recently discharged for refusing to obey the conductor, Pierre Monteux. At a Boston concert the men of the orchestra were instructed to rise in response to applause, and Mr. Fradkin remained seated, though the others "rose to the occasion." Out of sympathy or because of large financial offers from other orchestras, or because of intervention by the Musicians' Protective Union, thirty-four other members left. And the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which five years ago was touted as the "greatest in the world," had to come here in a crippled condition.

A few extra men were secured to fill in the vacancies, making the number of musicians about seventy, which is enough to make up a fairly large symphonic body. But the balance of the different choirs was upset. The resignations came mostly with the violins, while the wood wind and brass choirs were not greatly changed, so that there was often a weakness in the string section.

The programme had to be altered on short notice. Beethoven's fourth symphony and some Wagnerian numbers were played, while a new American work by John Alden Carpenter had to be chopped.

For a makeshift orchestra the performance of the symphony was creditable. It had not the brilliance of other Beethoven performances in other seasons, but it served its purpose—to get the season over with as gracefully as possible and give the management an opportunity to fill in the vacancies.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is the only important organization of its kind which is not unionized, and the intention is to keep it independent. It was learned last night that enough applications from men in other orchestras have already been received to give assurance that next season the orchestra will not be weaker than this, and that it will be unnecessary to import players from Europe.

STAR

Baltimore, Md.

MMY DESTINN WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

At the final Boston Symphony oncert of the season in Baltimore, o be given at the Lyric Theater ext Tuesday evening, March 16, Madame Emmy Destinn, dramatic soprano, will be the soloist. "Non mi dir," the famous aria of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni," will at this concert reveal one of the most beautiful moments in one of her most famous roles. She will also sing operatic arias by the two great Bohemian composers: The Cradle Song from Smetana's "The Kiss," and the love song from Dvorak's "Russalka."

Pierre Monteux will present Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony, which was inspired by his now historical love story. It describes the "Dreams and Passions" of the composer, "A Ball," a "Pastoral Scene," "The March to the Scaffold" and the orgy of the "Witches' Sabbath." The performance of the work in Boston was generally conceded one of the finest achievements of the season. The other numbers will be Borodin's sketch, "The Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's overture to the "Flying Dutchman."

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

The program for the Boston Symony Concert tomorrow evening, at the ademy of Music, the soloist being ma Destinn, has been changed as fol- ows:—

Beethoven—Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major.

Mozart—Aria "Non mi dir," from "Don Giovanni."

Wagner—"A Siegfried Idyll."

Songs with Orchestra—(a) Two Berceuses from "The Kiss," by Smetana; (b) Song from "Rusalka," Dvorak.

Wagner—Excerpts from Act III of "The Mastersingers"; Introduction, Dance of the Apprentices, Welcome to Hans Sachs.

EVENING GLOBE
New York City

Music.

The Boston Symphony Con —Other Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra diminished number came to Car Hall last evening for its final T day concert of the present se The troubles that have recently the Boston band asunder have pretty fully aired in the press. is no need of discussing here an merits, demirts, whisperings, probabilities. Suffice it to repo evening's concert and at the time to utter a very pious hope the future of the foremost orch of the world will surmount glori any and all obstacles.

With more than thirty membe the orchestra in secession, Mr. teux was obliged to substitute ferent programme from that ori ly announced. Some pensioners orchestra returned to help it o its difficulties; it is said conserv recruits were in the ranks; two eminent graduates of the band a Loeffler and Mr. Adamowski lo offered their service, but appa were not called upon; mean time ornaments of the organizatio Messrs. Longy and Schroeder an incomparably demoniac drumme in their accustomed places, and Theodorowicz occupied the co master's desk instead of the insul nate Fradkin. The audience, filled Carnegie Hall, greeted Mr. teux with more than usual war and throughout the evening there cordial applause for both the ductor and the band.

There was inevitably some la dynamic contrast in the perform yesterday—you can't get the fu mental tone, for instance, fro double basses that you can from e But the orchestra played with s did spirit, with finish, and as its finest mettle. Beethoven's fo symphony opened the programme cept for the famous adagio, this phony is not of the "greater" thoven. Still it is Beethoven, beautiful, and then it is not pl into the ground as are its imme neighbors of the Titan brood, the and the fifth. Moreover, a smal chestra is quite authentic for its formance. Mr. Monteux read i lightfully, and the men played it crispness, with esprit, and in par ter with an excellent appreciatio the tricksy spirit of the scherzo.

Wagner selections made up the of the programme. Never had I h the climax of the prelude to "Lo grin" carried up so thrillingly.

Monteux cannot save the "Sieg Idyll" from being prolix, but he through his poetic feeling, his a choice of tempi, his skillful empl of all beauties, keep it from b soporific. In the "Waldweben" "Siegfried" the balance between accompanying strings and the sol struments was admirably adju The music did not seem a lightly companied concerto for wind in ments. Here again there was s variety in the tempi and a joyo engrossing climax. What a plea it would be to hear the entire scor

"Siegfried" led by Mr. Monteux!

Excerpts from the last act of Meistersinger" completed the gramme. The meditative beaut the introduction, the jollity of the prentices' dance, and the rich-t pomp of the homage to Hans Sa all were set forth sympathetically most musically—a thing that ca be said of many a local performa of this music both in and out of opera house. In spite of all the ficulties, this was really one of most successful and enjoyable certs the Boston Symphony Orche has ever given in our town.

PITTS-SANBORN

rom
QUIRER,
Philadelphia, Pa.

ston Symphony Programme Change

The programme for the coming ston Symphony Concert at the ademy of Music tomorrow evening, larch 17th, has been changed as fol- ows:

Beethoven—Symphony No. 4 in B flat major.

Mozart—Aria "Non mi dir," from Don Giovanna."

Wagner—"A Siegfried Idyll."

Songs with Orchestra—(a) Two berceuses from "The Kiss," by metana; (b) Song from "Russlka." vorak.

Wagner—Excerpts from Act The Mastersingers." Introd dance of the Apprentices—We Hans Sachs.

Soloist, Emma Destinn.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

WORLD,
New York City

MUSIC

JAMES GIBBONS HUNEKER

The Boston Orchestra.

Orchestras, like nations, are happiest when they don't wash their doubtful linen in public. Through no fault of Conductor Pierre Monteux, who conducted the fifth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night, he finds himself in the centre of an unmusical whirlwind—what he would call a "tourbillon"—while the menacing clash of "Die Wacht am Rhein" drowns the martial measures of the "Marseillaise." The ostensible reason given for the recent row in Boston is the Musical Union; but the fundamental cause is, unhappily, racial dissonance. So the famous band from Boston, robbed of more than a third of its players, limped to New York yesterday determined to play if the organization had only twenty members, as Manager Brennan put it.

After the defection in Boston some old members came forward, and among them were Charles Martin Loeffler, our leading composer, and Timothee Adamowski, who offered their services. Both these artists were first violins in the orchestra when Franz Kneisel was concert master and Gericke conductor. Arcadian days, indeed.

As Mr. Fradkin is now playing the role of the insurgent Lucifer, his seat was occupied by Mr. Theodovowicz, and we also noted the veteran violoncellist, Alwyn Schroeder, at his accustomed seat desk; M. Longy, oboist extraordinary, whose tone resembles the etched line of a graphic composition, was like thin fire as it ringed the woodwind choir.

There were only ten first fiddlers as against the usual sixteen; the contrabassi were reduced to six. But the demon drummer, huddled over his kettledrums, punctuated the sinister atmosphere with his subtle tapping. Ah! if Vance Thompson had only been with us to pen a prose-poem on the vastitude of silence; also to give Don the Marquis (and his patents of nobility date from the stars) a chance to write a new version of "How to hear and grow anxious." There, the cat's out of the bag, a calico cat, full grown. The word "anxious" liberates our pent-up nervousness. Everybody in the audience was nervous. Bomb outrages, false tempi, stopped horns—stopped by His Honor—what catastrophe was not predicted? And nothing happened. The orchestra ran on half-steam, though not at half-speed. Maitre Monteux stood on the pilot box and cheered his valiant crew.

It would be idle to deny that dynamic contrasts were missing. The foundational tone of the orchestra seemed to drop out at times. But the strings were plangent, the tonal balance excellent, considering circumstances, and much of the playing not only charming but of a finesse. The original programme scheme was changed. The conductor tempered the wind to the shorn strings. Beethoven's fourth symphony and a group of Wagner excerpts made up an interesting evening. The last matinee of the season here occurs tomorrow afternoon at the same hall. Cheer up, Monteux! The musical world will not allow such an orchestra to perish because of rebellion in the ranks. There is always a good fish in the sea as ever came out of it, even if the finny tribe in this case happens to be "sacred codfish." (Boston papers please copy.)

From American
New York City

ANOTHER "Little Symphony" played in Carnegie Hall last night—not under the direction of Georges Barrere, however, but with Pierre Monteux at the baton.

It was the "Boston Symphony Orchestra." The orchestra in its present condition numbers about seventy men, with ten first violins, nine second violins, eight violas, eight 'cellos and six basses. What caused heartaches last night, however, was not so much the diminished size of the band as its lack of co-ordination, unanimity, balance, precision and finish. The strength of a chain must be measured by its weakest link, and there were some very weak links in this msuical chain.

"Zaza" served once more in the Metropolitan Opera House last night as a vehicle for Geraldine Farrar's histrionic art. Her principal collaborators were Crimi as Dufresne, Amato as Cascart, Kathleen Howard as Anaide, Minnie Egener as Natalie. Moranzoni conducted.

From
TRIBUNE,
New York City

Boston Symphony Concert Is Given Despite Strike

Places of 33 Players Who Are Out Filled by Pensioners and Excellent Program Is Heard at Carnegie Hall

Despite the thirty-three strikers who left the orchestra last week as the result of friction over the proposed unionization of the famous organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra showed its fighting spirit in giving its concert at Carnegie Hall last evening. Loyal members were determined to carry out the plans for the trip, if with only twenty men. But their ranks, although smaller than usual, were not reduced to such desperate straits. The strikers' places were filled by pensioners, who gladly returned to assist the orchestra in a critical period of its career. Other players, it is said, were recruited from the New England Conservatory of Music.

A novelty was to have been given—John Alden Carpenter's "Concertino." But under the circumstances it was, of course, necessary to change the program to one less elaborate. Conductor Monteux chose his pieces shrewdly—Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and five Wagner numbers—the Prelude to "Lohengrin," "A Siegfried Idyll," "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," excerpts from Act III of "The Mastersingers." Considering the difficulties under which the orchestra has been laboring, a detailed criticism of the performance would not be fair, but it may be said in passing that the strings were surprisingly effective in the numbers from "Lohengrin" and "Siegfried."

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Herald
New York Ci

Boston Orchestra Abandons Berlioz for Beethoven

Mr. Monteux Changes Programme—Lacks Thirty-one Musicians.

What became of the "Symphonie Fantastique" of Hector Berlioz?

That question must have ruffled the equable temperaments of many subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts as they sat in their seats at the final Thursday evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night. The very types had melted into glowing streams of glorification when the work was lately performed in Boston, and despite the fact that a somewhat weighty concert master had remained sitting when Pierre Monteux, conductor, commanded the orchestra to rise and accept the laudations of cultivated Boston, the work had been announced for repetition before the mercenary children of New York.

But without explanation it vanished into thin air, almost as thin as some of its own, and in its place the astonished auditors beheld on the programme the unfamiliar B flat symphony No. 4 of Beethoven. Nothing fantastic about that. No witches' Sabbath nor march to the gallows nor any suggestion of a mystical return to life. Who writes essays on the fourth symphony now? No one. Yet in its day it raised a tempest in a teapot. Weber flew into a rage over it, wrote stuff and nonsense about the "no ideas of Mr. Composer" and prattled ridiculously of Gyrowetz and Pleyel.

And then there was the famous drum figure in the slow movement, by virtue of which the menial kettle drums rose to the dignity of soloists. Many fine things have been written about this symphony, but one feels certain that Boston would not have been shaken to its centre by last evening's performance, as it was by the Fradkinized interpretation of the "Fantastique."

After the Beethoven there was a row of specimens of Wagner, namely, the prelude to "Lohengrin," Siegfried Idyll," "Forest Murmurs" and bits of the third act of "The Meistersingers." The audience was very demonstrative.

Thirty-one members of the orchestra were absent last evening. The number of players was seventy-two, on a basis of ten first violins and six double basses, but some of these were substitutes. The missing members left the orchestra because of the discharge of Frederick Fradkin, the concert master, for insubordination. At the recent performance of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" in Boston he refused to rise when Mr. Monteux directed the orchestra to stand in acknowledgment of applause. Several of the seceders have already asked for reinstatement, and W. H. Brennan, the manager, said last night that all would surely do so. Mr. Fradkin will not be reinstated.

m SUN
ress New York City
te

Music

The Boston Symphony.

For its final evening concert in New York this season the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to Carnegie Hall last night, and there played a programme of Beethoven and Wagner. It was a programme rather hastily made to suit the home emergency, and it mattered not half so much as the conditions surrounding its playing. For this was the first opportunity for New York to see what changes have been made in personnel, and to prove—by the ovation Conductor Monteux had—its appreciation for the completion of the season's series.

Subtract some thirty men from approximately ninety, and the difference will be tonal as well as numerical. Yet even with the present (and only temporary) handicaps the orchestra accomplished an artistic evening. It was a rather lonely sight upon so large a platform, but it played its Beethoven fourth symphony with all possible spirit and with as fine a regard for timbre and tempo as ever made this organization famous. The romantic fervor of the Wagnerian selections did not, unfortunately, always swell to like breadths. The rough spots which marred the "Siegfried Idyll," for example, could not be blamed upon the diminished size of the orchestra, though they were undoubtedly accentuated by it. M. Monteux conducted the "Mastersingers" excerpts, on the other hand, with a brave and exultant fervor. There was also the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried."

The final concert of the Boston Symphony in New York for this season comes on Saturday afternoon. After that the management of the orchestra gave every assurance yesterday afternoon that it will return next season persevering as a non-union in the World tion and as one the less so

om

ldress New York City

ate

BOSTONIANS IN GREAT CONCERT

Pierre Monteux Leads Famous Orchestra With Less Than Sixty Men.

ARTISTS RISE ABOVE TROUBLES

Boston Organization Delights Another Fine Audience at Carnegie Hall.

By JOHN H. RAFTERY.

Out of its recent welter of internal dissensions, labor troubles and threatened disorganization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening emerged upon the stage of Carnegie Hall decimated but undaunted, scarred with battle but triumphant in the result, the best that are left of "the old guard" and enough of them to play a splendid concert even though the onset of their thinned ranks seemed at times wavering and almost futile in the mignty tonal massifs of Wagnerian music.

Of the regiment that once responded to the batons of Muck, Rabaud and Monteux, less than sixty musicians last evening responded to the summons of their conductor's baton, but that sixty was made up of artists, every man of them, and in some passages of the onerous program, notably in the Beethoven symphony and in "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," the deathless spirit and the unsurpassed artistry of the famous orchestra spoke in unforgettable music.

With an orchestra not more than half the size of the days of full membership Conductor Monteux was able to deliver the gorgeous Fourth Symphony with amazing power, roundness and volume, except perhaps in the majestic and overtopping finale, in which there was evidence of diminished strength in the brasses, the great strings and the percussion. But it was a lovely performance, for all that, played with impeccable sympathy, clarity and unison in the second movement and in the trio and allegro of the third.

The Prelude to "Lohengrin," which began the second half of the program, led the gradual way into mightier excerpts from Wagner, and never was there better reading of "A Siegfried Idyll" or of the third act of "The Mastersingers" than M. Monteux gave to them last evening. His men played with the zealous fervor of the splendid musicians they are, and derived many glorious passages from "The Dance of the Apprentices" and "Homage to Hans Sachs." The fine audience was generous

TELEGRAM
New York City

124

In Spite of Difficulties Boston Orchestra Play

Minus Thirty-four Players, Who Resigned, Boston Musicians Give Concert.

MISS FARRAR AS ZAZA

John Powell, Pianist, Makes a Speech at His Recital.

In spite of disruptions, resignations and trouble with the Musicians' Protective Union, the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to New York for its final evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night. Its concert master, Frederic Fradkin, was recently discharged for refusing to obey the conductor, Pierre Monteux. At a Boston concert the men of the orchestra were instructed to rise in response to applause, and Mr. Fradkin remained seated, though the others "rose to the occasion." Out of sympathy or because of large financial offers from other orchestras, or because of intervention by the Musicians' Protective Union, thirty-four other members left. And the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which five years ago was touted as the "greatest in the world," had to come here in a crippled condition.

A few extra men were secured to fill in the vacancies, making the number of musicians about seventy, which is enough to make up a fairly large symphonic body. But the balance of the different choirs was upset. The resignations came mostly with the violins, while the wood wind and brass choirs were not greatly changed, so that there was often a weakness in the string section.

The programme had to be altered on short notice. Beethoven's fourth symphony and some Wagnerian numbers were played, while a new American work by John Alden Carpenter had to be chopped.

For a makeshift orchestra the performance of the symphony was creditable. It had not the brilliance of other Beethoven performances in other seasons, but it served its purpose—to get the season over with as gracefully as possible and give the management an opportunity to fill in the vacancies.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is the only important organization of its kind which is not unionized, and the intention is to keep it independent. It was learned last night that enough applications from men in other orchestras have already been received to give assurance that next season the orchestra will not be weaker than this, and that it will be unnecessary to import players from Europe.

STAR
Baltimore, Md.

MMY DESTINN WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season in Baltimore, to be given at the Lyric Theater next Tuesday evening, March 16. Madame Emmy Destinn, dramatic soprano, will be the soloist. "Non mi dir," the famous aria of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni," will at this concert reveal one of the most beautiful moments in one of her most famous roles. She will also sing operatic arias by the two great Bohemian composers: The Cradle Song from Smetana's "The Kiss," and the love song from Dvorak's "Russalka."

Pierre Monteux will present Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony, which was inspired by his now historical love story. It describes the "Dreams and Passions" of the composer, "A Ball," a "Pastoral Scene," "The March to the Scaffold" and the orgy of the "Witches' Sabbath." The performance of the work in Boston was generally conceded one of the fin[illegible] of the season.

[illegible]bers will be Bo[illegible]
The Steppes of Wagner's overt[illegible] utchman."

BOSTON SYMPHONY P[illegible]

The program for the [illegible] ony Concert tomorrow ev[illegible] fol[illegible] cademy of Music, the [illegible] ma Destinn, has been cha[illegible] ws:—
Beethoven—Symphony No. 4,
r.
Mozart—Aria "Non mi dir," Giovanni."
Wagner—"A Siegfried Idyll."
Songs with Orchestra—(a) from "The Kiss," by Smetana;
Rusalka," Dvorak.
Wagner—Excerpts from Act
astersingers"; Introduction, pprentices, Welcome to Hans S[illegible] ars.

plus 89;
103-1
Arom
McG[illegible]

Au
Ti

EVENING GLOBE
New York City

Music.

The Boston Symphony Co[illegible] —Other Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra diminished number came to Car[illegible] Hall last evening for its final T[illegible] day concert of the present se[illegible] The troubles that have recently the Boston band asunder have pretty fully aired in the press. [illegible] is no need of discussing here an[illegible] merits, demirts, whisperings, probabilities. Suffice it to repo[illegible] evening's concert and at the time to utter a very pious hope the future of the foremost orch[illegible] of the world will surmount glori[illegible] any and all obstacles.

With more than thirty membe[illegible] the orchestra in secession, Mr. [illegible]teux was obliged to substitute [illegible] ferent programme from that ori[illegible]ly announced. Some pensioners [illegible] orchestra returned to help it o[illegible] its difficulties; it is said conserv[illegible] recruits were in the ranks; two [illegible] eminent graduates of the band a[illegible] Loeffler and Mr. Adamowski lo[illegible] offered their service, but appar[illegible] were not called upon; mean time [illegible] ornaments of the organizatio[illegible] Messrs. Longy and Schroeder an[illegible] incomparably demoniac drumme[illegible] in their accustomed places, and Theodorowicz occupied the co[illegible] master's desk instead of the insul[illegible]nate Fradkin. The audience, [illegible] filled Carnegie Hall, greeted Mr. [illegible]teux with more than usual war[illegible] and throughout the evening there [illegible] cordial applause for both the [illegible] ductor and the band.

There was inevitably some la[illegible] dynamic contrast in the perform[illegible] yesterday—you can't get the fu[illegible] mental tone, for instance, from [illegible] double basses that you can from e[illegible] But the orchestra played with s[illegible] did spirit, with finish, and as [illegible] its finest mettle. Beethoven's fo[illegible] symphony opened the programme [illegible] cept for the famous adagio, this [illegible] phony is not of the "greater" [illegible] thoven. Still it is Beethoven, [illegible] beautiful, and then it is not pl[illegible] into the ground as are its imme[illegible] neighbors of the Titan brood, the [illegible] and the fifth. Moreover, a smal[illegible] chestra is quite authentic for its [illegible] formance. Mr. Monteux read [illegible] lightfully, and the men played it [illegible] crispness, with esprit, and in par[illegible] lar with an excellent appreciatio[illegible] the tricksy spirit of the scherzo.

Wagner selections made up the [illegible] of the programme. Never had I h[illegible] the climax of the prelude to "Lo[illegible] grin" carried up so thrillingly.

Monteux cannot save the "Sieg[illegible] Idyll" from being prolix, but he [illegible] through his poetic feeling, his s[illegible] choice of tempi, his skillful empl[illegible] of all beauties, keep it from b[illegible] soporific. In the "Waldweben" f[illegible] "Siegfried" the balance between [illegible] accompanying strings and the sol[illegible] struments was admirably adju[illegible] The music did not seem a lightly [illegible] companied concerto for wind ins[illegible] ments. Here again there was s[illegible] variety in the tempi and a joyo[illegible] engrossing climax. What a plea[illegible] it would be to hear the entire scor[illegible]

"Siegfried" led by Mr. Monteux!

Excerpts from the last act of [illegible] Meistersinger" completed the [illegible] gramme. The meditative beauty [illegible] the introduction, the jollity of the [illegible] prentices' dance, and the rich-t[illegible] pomp of the homage to Hans Sa[illegible] all were set forth sympathetically [illegible] most musically—a thing that ca[illegible] be said of many a local performa[illegible] of this music both in and out of [illegible] opera house. In spite of all the [illegible] ficulties, this was really one of [illegible] most successful and enjoyable [illegible] certs the Boston Symphony Orche[illegible] has ever given in our town.

PITTS-SANBORN

rom
NQUIRER,
Philadelphia, Pa.

oston Symphony Programme Change

The programme for the coming Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, March 17th, has been changed as follows:

Beethoven—Symphony No. 4 in B flat major.

Mozart—Aria "Non mi dir," from "Don Giovanna."

Wagner—"A Siegfried Idyll."

Songs with Orchestra—(a) Two Berceuses from "The Kiss," by Smetana; (b) Song from "Rusalka."—Dvorak.

Wagner—Excerpts from Act "The Mastersingers." Introd[illegible] Dance of the Apprentices—We[illegible] Hans Sachs.

Soloist, Emma Destinn.

From Times
New York City
MAR 18 1920

MUSIC

By Richard Aldrich

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the last evening concert of its New York season last evening in Carnegie Hall. It makes this last visit to this city in the midst of tribulation. Some of the details of its troubles, resulting in the dismissal of Mr. Fradkin, the concert master, and the retirement of a number of other players over a matter of discipline, have been published in dispatches from Boston. There is also impending a larger question relating to the determination of many of its members to join the musical union against the wishes of the Trustees, who are carrying out the policy maintained by the founder, Major Higginson, since the establishment of the organization thirty-nine years ago.

Some of the results were apparent last evening in the appearance of the orchestra considerably reduced in numbers. Instead of the sixteen first violins that have played in recent seasons, there were ten; there was also a reduction in the number of second violins, and the double basses were six instead of eight. There were also a number of unfamiliar faces; some of them were said to be of players formerly members of the orchestra, recruited now for the emergency. The concertmaster was Mr. Theodorowicz, who has recently been Mr. Fradkin's companion at the first desk of the violins.

The program announced for the concert had been entirely changed, to meet the exigency of the reduced forces. Instead of Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony, Beethoven's Fourth was substituted; and in place of John Alden Carpenter's "Concertino" for piano and orchestra, with E. Robert Schmitz as soloist, and the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," other pieces by Wagner—the prelude to "Lohengrin," "A Siegfried Idyll," "Forest Murmurs," from "Siegfried," and the introduction to the third act of "The Mastersingers," the dance of the apprentices and the final passage called "Homage to Hans Sachs," from the same music drama—were given.

The audience was ready to show its sympathy with the conductor, and when Mr. Monteux appeared he was greeted with an extra round of applause. At the close of the symphony there was an enthusiastic demonstration, which Mr. Monteux desired to share with the players—and none failed to rise to acknowledge it.

Under the circumstances, it was not to be expected that all the remembered qualities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should be shown in the performance. But it was evident that both conductor and players were on their mettle; and the performance had many admirable qualities and showed the fine musicianship that was centred in that reduced aggregation of players. Of course, the volume of the string tone was not there. The playing of the symphony, however, had great spirit, elastic rhythm, delicacy and finesse; an engrossing performance. And if the balance of tone was different from that familiar to concertgoers of these days, some may have consoled themselves by thinking that it was nearer to that of the orchestras that played it for Beethoven in 1806.

In the prelude to "Lohengrin" the division of the strings in the scoring and the reduced numbers available for the several parts emphasized somewhat the loss in volume. But the 'Siegfried Idyll" was originally conceived for a small orchestra and loses little in a performance by one. If Mr. Monteux's beat in certain passages was a little rigid the delicacy and poetic coloring of the orchestra were delightful. The audience was cordial in its manifestation of enjoyment.

Mme. Julia Claussen's Recital.

Mme. Julia Claussen, mezzo soprano now a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company, though not of late often heard in its performances, gave a song recital in Aeolian Hall yesterday afternoon. There were interesting qualities in her delivery of an interesting program; chief of which was the evidence of a genuine understanding of the essential character and spirit of the songs she sang.

Mme. Claussen's voice is itself not of remarkable beauty; nor does she possess all the graces of the most polished style, she "scoops" now and again; how and and again there is uncertainty in her intonation. But there was something of the necessary sustained style in Sully's "Bel Epais"; spirit, though not all that there might have been of polish, in Scarlatti's "Gia il sole dal Gange." She was singularly successful in the sustained intensity of Brahms's "Sapphic Ode," in the mischievous spirit of his "Disappointed Serenader," and in the dramatic vividness of Liszt's "Three Gipsies." On the other hand, her vocal technique did not serve her well in Schubert's "To Be Sung on the Water."

There was a group of Russian songs and one of Swedish and American songs. The German songs she sang in English translations. Mme. Claussen's English had something of an accent and her diction is not of the finish that makes her wholly intelligible in song. She had an admirable accompanist in Richard Hageman.

ESTABLISHED 1881
MAR 21 19
From Times
New York City

Mr. Otto Roth, one of the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who resigned on account of the recent uproar over the action of Mr. Fradkin, the concert master, has written a letter explaining his course. In this letter, too long to print in full here, Mr. Roth, who was the oldest member of the orchestra in length of service—thirty-eight years—says that while the Fradkin incident had nothing directly to do with the union movement, that movement is indirectly the sole cause of the trouble. He declares that seventy-four members of the orchestra have pledged themselves to stand together, and will quit at the expiration of their contracts if the union is not recognized. This meant that within one year three-quarters of the orchestra must be replaced. Judge Cabot is not concerned about it, says Mr. Roth, and believes that he can build up the orchestra to its former standard, even though seventy-four leave it. Mr. Roth thinks this impossible. He declares that all other American orchestras are in the union, and this fact does not seem to interfere with their artistic development. There is yet time to save the orchestra, Mr. Roth declares, and hopes the trustees will relent.

The New York public will join in the general lamentation if the Boston Symphony Orchestra is damaged beyond repair. It is unsafe at this distance and without a knowledge of all the facts to venture any prediction; but most admirers of the orchestra will think that if three-quarters of the present personnel leave it, and the management tries to build it up to former standard with new men—or women—in their place, the outlook will not be promising. It took some of the rarest ability a good many years to bring the Boston Orchestra up to its pre-eminent position. It will not be done again immediately, even if an equal amount of ability in the direction and in the personnel is at once available.

The merits of the unionizing scheme are not for outsiders, imperfectly acquainted with the circumstances, to discuss. It is natural, probably inevitable, that the trustees of the orchestra should carry out strictly the policy they inherited from Major Higginson against it. They no doubt consider it a part of the many-sided wisdom that marked his control of the orchestra for so many years and that brought such unique results. Whether they will "relent" or whether they can withstanding the pressure, greater now than at any time in Mr. Higginson's day, and whether, if they do, they can successfully make up the loss of three-quarters of the orchestra and restore it to what it has been so very recently, these are all questions that cannot fail to interest deeply the New York musical public, and the possibilities of the situation are such as to cause pain and anxiety.

RICHARD ALDRICH

SUN
s New York City
MAR 21

Boston Orchestra Lacking Qualities of Its Best Days

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fifth matinee concert of its thirty-fourth season in this city in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. It was the final concert of the series, and the conditions surrounding it were such as to cause the admirers of the famous organization grave concern.

The story of the rebellion in the orchestra and the defection of thirty-one members has already been told here. The playing of the body brought together from the faithful members and recruits hastily summoned from among the ranks of previous members was better in the B flat symphony of Beethoven on Thursday night than in the G minor symphony of Mozart, which followed Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture on yesterday's list.

The other numbers were Borodin's "On the Steppes," Debussy's "Petite Suite," arranged for orchestra by Henri Busser, and Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture. There was some good playing in the Debussy suite, but in general the orchestra sounded rough. There was little or nothing of the delicious mellowness and transparency of tone for which the Bostonians have been noted. However, in the circumstances no finished performance could be expected.

It was evident that the sympathies of the audience were with Pierre Monteux the conductor, for the applause with which he was received when he first appeared and which followed the symphony was plainly meant as a special demonstration.

The future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is in the lap of the gods who protect union labor. It remains for unionism to perpetuate or destroy this institution. If it proves to be true that seventy-four members are pledged to leave the orchestra if it is not unionized, then the organization is doomed, for great concert orchestras cannot be improvised. For the sake of its splendid history and of musical art in this country it is to be hoped that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will survive the deadly blow it has received and will continue to bring its delightful contributions to New York's musical season.

ESTABLISHED 1881
MAR 20 1920
From STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

With forces curtained to the extent of twenty players (a result of the present "strike" on the part of that many of its personnel), the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, last evening gave the last of its annual Brooklyn quintet of concerts, the opera house of the Academy of Music seating the usual large audience such as has marked the patronage of the B. S. O. series for many past seasons. Mr. Monteux, who had originally planned to give Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony, Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture, was obliged, as a result of his lessened ensemble, to displace these full-fledged orchestral scores with others calling for more unpretentious sonorities, substituting therefor the fourthe Beethoven symphony, Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyll," and excerpts from the third act of the same composer's "The Mastersingers," including the beautifully meditative prelude, the stodgily hilarious dance of the apprentices and the music that accompanies the welcome of Hans Sachs. In the seat of concertmaster, formerly occupied by the discharged Frederick Fradkin, said discharge having been the pivot precipitating present prevailing upsetment in the ranks of the Bostonese players, sat J. Theodorowicz, while Alwin Schroeder, veteran 'cellist, had moved up to the first seat of 'cella, that has been occupied by the seceding Bedetti. The principal shortage of instruments existed in the string choir, those of the wind, brass and percussion remaining practically intact. It is not necessary, at this waning stage of the musical season, and in view of the situation in general, to present a detailed criticism of last evening's performance, beyond the statement that the programme was presented in such wise as to afford a large measure of enjoyment. It was an evening of calm music, minus the turbulency that obtains in presentation of modern compositions. Emmy Destinn, in full command of those luxuriant soprano tones that have won fame at the Metropolitan Opera House and elsewhere, was soloist in the "Non mi dir" aria from Mozart's "Don Giovanni," and three Bohemian songs from Smetana and Dvorak.

The Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, under whose auspices the Boston concerts are given, announces their continuation for the season of 1920-1921.

...ost Complete
...g Bureau in the World

...m.....
...ress New York City
...e.....

SYMPHONY CONCERTS BY TWO ORCHESTRAS

Boston Organization at Matinee and Damrosch's Band in Evening at Carnegie Hall.

Jascha Heifetz was the soloist last evening with the New York Symphony Society in an interesting program in which the Damrosch orchestra shone wtih special luster in the Mendelssohn "Scotch" symphony and in Moszkowski's "Perpetual Motion," which was bracketed with the intermezzo from the same suite. Mr. Heifetz was a flashing radiance in Glazounoff's concerto for violin with orchestra and the large audience made a great to-do about the imperturbable young virtuoso.

In the afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its thirty-fourth season in New York in a program far better suited to its present diminished size than was the opening concert of this engagement. The overture to "Fidelio," by Beethoven, Mozart's G-minor Symphony (Kochel 550), an orchestral sketch by Borodin, Debussy's "Petite Suite," arranged for orchestra by Henri Busser and Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture comprised the list. Mr. Monteux and his men were cordially applauded for their beautiful performance.

TELEGRAM
New York City
MAR 21

Boston Symphony's Farewell for the Present Season

"La Forza del Destino" Repeated at the Metropolitan.

CARUSO AS DON ALVARO

Interesting Recital by Mme. Germaine Schnitzer at Aeolian Hall.

Passing through another of those crises which have been all too frequent in its history during these recent troubled times, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard for the last time here this season, in Carnegie Hall, yesterday afternoon.

Mr. Pierre Monteux, the French leader, conducted as usual with a recalcitrant concert master replaced by Julius Theodorowicz, formerly of the Kneisel Quartet, and with nearly one-third of the players "out on strike."

Despite these defections, the great orchestra gave an excellent account of itself, showing an unimpaired beauty of tone, probably because the programme had been discreetly changed in part, so that the works presented did not overtax the diminished personnel.

The overture to "Fidelio," opening the programme, flowed smoothly and melodiously over the heads of an audience accustomed to the Boston Symphony's frequent presentations of Beethoven.

Immediately after Mozart's Symphony in G minor, with its golden melodies, made the listeners forget for a time the gloomy weather outside and fortified them to face again with renewed courage a time of critical unrest and despair.

For the second half of the programme Mr. Monteux began with Borodin's orchestral sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," recalling to opera subscribers that composer's "Prince Igor" at the Metropolitan.

According to programme the concert should have ended with Debussy's Petite Suite," which is richer in orchestral charm than that composer's pallid works usually exhibit. Perhaps the fact that Henri Busser transcribed and orchestrated the Suite may explain this fact.

Goldmark's overture to "Shakuntala" was an added number, played with exquisite richness of tone and fluency of measure. The audience was politely enthusiastic.

TRIBUNE
New York City
MAR 21 1920

Boston Orchestra Is Well Received In Carnegie Hall

Concert by the Symphony Here Declared Admirable; Mme. Schmitzer Gives Last of Her Three Recitals

The troubles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra do not seem to have affected the number of people who in New York wish to hear the famous band. The concert yesterday afternoon found Carnegie Hall crowded and Mr. Monteux greeted with more than ordinary heartiness. Mr. Monteux has naturally tempered the program to his shorn orchestra, yet despite a certain loss in tonal resonance its playing yesterday was admirable, and notably so in Debussy's Petite Suite, arranged for orchestra by Henri Büsser. Mr. Monteux is entirely at home in the music of Debussy, and he gave the Suite a graceful and atmospheric performance. The other numbers were the overture to Beethoven's "Fidelio," the Mozart G minor Symphony, Borodin's orchestral sketch "On the Steppes of Central Asia" and the overture to Goldmark's "Sakuntala."

At the same moment Mme. Germaine Schnitzer was giving the last of her three recitals at Aeolian Hall and giving it to a large and interested audience. She played a program of considerable variety, opening with a Sonata of Parodies and following it with Schumann's "Carnaval," Schubert's Impromptu, op. 142; Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 9, and shorter pieces by Chabrier, Brahms, Rachmaninoff, and Saint-Saëns. Mme. Schnitzer's tone was unfortunately singurarily hard and lacking in variety of color, but aside from this rather unexpected defect she played with a good deal of sentiment and even of fire.

om Times
New York City
MAR 21 1920

MUSIC

By Richard Aldrich

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season in New York was given in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The audience was as hearty in its greeting of Mr. Monteux, and in applauding the performance of the orchestra as it was on Thursday evening, and it gave conductor and players an equally hearty "au revoir" at the close of the concert.

As in the case of the first concert the program for this one had been materially changed on account of the reduction in the size of the orchestra and the introduction into it of some new players. It comprised Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio," Mozart's G minor symphony, Borodin's orchestral sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," an arrangement by Henri Busser of Debussy's "Petite Suite," originally written for the piano, four hands; and Karl Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture.

There was nothing unfamiliar except Debussy's suite, an early composition of rather fragile substance, and showing only the first thin burgeoning of the style characteristic of his maturer works. It is pretty and agreeable music that hardly stands orchestral treatment, though the arrangement is suitably and lightly made. Borodin's "sketch" was composed for a series of tableaux vivants, representing scenes in Russian history, and gives expression to the "Orientalism" that appealed to the composer and that he made so much use of in his opera of "Prince Igor." He intended, as he says, to suggest in this piece the refrain of a peaceful Russian song, a melancholy Oriental song, the steps of approaching horses and camels. A caravan advances, escorted by Russian soldiers, passes, and the song of the Russians and of the natives dies out. A simple panorama, presented by means simple but characteristic, musically vivid.

Mr. Monteux's reading of Mozart's symphony was especially spirited, vigorous and rhythmically alive. The playing of or chestra, however, had not all the good qualities that were heard last Thursday; it was rougher and less finished. There were some technical slips. Mr. Monteux had the symphony played with only four of his six double basses, doubtless from considerations touching the balance of the string tone, and to correspond with the reduction in the number of his violins. The lack of body and rich tonal color was especially felt in Goldmark's "Sakuntala" vorture.

The listeners, however, realized the better qualities of the performance and were liberal in their applause for all the numbers on the program. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra were made to feel the friendly attitude of the audience, and the hope that no permanent harm should come to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

rom
IMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The fact that thirty-three strikers left the Boston Symphony orchestra last week as the result of friction over proposed unionization of the organization did not greatly interfere with the concert at Aeolian Hall last night, except that the program was slightly less elaborate than originally intended. The strikers' places were filled by pensioners and players from the New England Conservatory of Music. John Alden Carpenter's "Concertino" was to have been played, but instead Conductor Monteux presented: Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and five Wagner numbers—the Prelude to 'Lohengrin," "A Siegfried Idyll," "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," excerpts from Act III. of "The Mastersingers."

rom Times
New York City

MUSIC

By Richard Aldrich

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the last evening concert of its New York season last evening in Carnegie Hall. It makes this last visit to this city in the midst of tribulation. Some of the details of its troubles, resulting in the dismissal of Mr. Fradkin, the concert master, and the retirement of a number of other players over a matter of discipline, have been published in dispatches from Boston. There is also impending a larger question relating to the determination of many of its members to join the musical union against the wishes of the Trustees, who are carrying out the policy maintained by the founder, Major Higginson, since the establishment of the organization thirty-nine years ago.

Some of the results were apparent last evening in the appearance of the orchestra considerably reduced in numbers. Instead of the sixteen first violins that have played in recent seasons, there were ten; there was also a reduction in the number of second violins, and the double basses were six instead of eight. There were also a number of unfamiliar faces; some of them were said to be of players formerly members of the orchestra, recruited now for the emergency. The concertmaster was Mr. Theodorowicz, who has recently been Mr. Fradkin's companion at the first desk of the violins.

The program announced for the concert had been entirely changed, to meet the exigency of the reduced forces. Instead of Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony, Beethoven's Fourth was substituted; and in place of John Alden Carpenter's "Concertino" for piano and orchestra, with E. Robert Schmitz as soloist, and the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," other pieces by Wagner—the prelude to "Lohengrin," "A Siegfried Idyll," "Forest Murmurs," from "Siegfried," and the introduction to the third act of "The Mastersingers," the dance of the apprentices and the final passage called "Homage to Hans Sachs," from the same music drama—were given.

The audience was ready to show its sympathy with the conductor, and when Mr. Monteux appeared he was greeted with an extra round of applause. At the close of the symphony there was an enthusiastic demonstration, which Mr. Monteux desired to share with the players—and none failed to rise to acknowledge it.

Under the circumstances, it was not to be expected that all the remembered qualities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should be shown in the performance. But it was evident that both conductor and players were on their mettle; and the performance had many admirable qualities and showed the fine musicianship that was centred in that reduced aggregation of players. Of course, the volume of the string tone was not there. The playing of the symphony, however, had great spirit, elastic rhythm, delicacy and finesse; an engrossing performance. And if the balance of tone was different from that familiar to concertgoers of these days, some may have consoled themselves by thinking that it was nearer to that of the orchestras that played it for Beethoven in 1806.

In the prelude to "Lohengrin" the division of the strings in the scoring and the reduced numbers available for the several parts emphasized somewhat the loss in volume. But the 'Siegfried Idyll" was originally conceived for a small orchestra and loses little in a performance by one. If Mr. Monteux's beat in certain passages was a little rigid the delicacy and poetic coloring of the orchestra were delightful. The audience was cordial in its manifestation of enjoyment.

Mme. Julia Claussen's Recital.

Mme. Julia Claussen, mezzo soprano, now a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company, though not of late often heard in its performances, gave a song recital in Aeolian Hall yesterday afternoon. There were interesting qualities in her delivery of an interesting program; chief of which was the evidence of a genuine understanding of the essential character and spirit of the songs she sang.

Mme. Claussen's voice is itself not of remarkable beauty; nor does she possess all the graces of the most polished style, she "scoops" now and again; now and and again there is uncertainty in her intonation. But there was something of the necessary sustained style in Sully's "B... Epais"; spirit, though not all that here might have been of polish, in Scarlatti's "Gia il, sole dal Gange." She was singularly successful in the sustained intensity of Brahms's "Sapphic Ode, in the mischievous spirit of his "Disappointed Serenader," and in the dramatic vividness of Liszt's "Three Gipsies." On the other hand, her vocal technique did not serve her well in Schubert's "To Be Sung on the Water."

There was a group of Russian songs and one of Swedish and American songs. The German songs she sang in English translations. Mme. Claussen's English had something of an accent and her diction is not of the finish that makes her wholly intelligible in song. She had an admirable accompanist in Richard Hageman.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Times
New York City

Mr. Otto Roth, one of the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who resigned on account of the recent uproar over the action of Mr. Fradkin, the concert master, has written a letter explaining his course. In this letter, too long to print in full here, Mr. Roth, who was the oldest member of the orchestra in length of service—thirty-eight years—says that while the Fradkin incident had nothing directly to do with the union movement, that movement is indirectly the sole cause of the trouble. He declares that seventy-four members of the orchestra have pledged themselves to stand together, and will quit at the expiration of their contracts if the union is not recognized. This meant that within one year three-quarters of the orchestra must be replaced. Judge Cabot is not concerned about it, says Mr. Roth, and believes that he can build up the orchestra to its former standard, even though seventy-four leave it. Mr. Roth thinks this impossible. He declares that all other American orchestras are in the union, and this fact does not seem to interfere with their artistic development. There is yet time to save the orchestra, Mr. Roth declares, and hopes the trustees will relent.

The New York public will join in the general lamentation if the Boston Symphony Orchestra is damaged beyond repair. It is unsafe at this distance and without a knowledge of all the facts to venture a prediction; but most admirers of the orchestra will think that if three-quarters of the present personnel leave it, and the management tries to build it up to former standard with new men—or women—in their place, the outlook will not be promising. It took some of the rarest ability a good many years to bring the Boston Orchestra up to its pre-eminent position. It will not be done again immediately, even if an equal amount of ability in the direction and in the personnel is at once available.

The merits of the unionizing scheme are not for outsiders, imperfectly acquainted with the circumstances, to discuss. It is natural, probably inevitable, that the trustees of the orchestra should carry out strictly the policy they inherited from Major Higginson against it. They no doubt consider it a part of the many-sided wisdom that marked his control of the orchestra for so many years and that brought such unique results. Whether they will "relent" or whether they can withstanding the pressure, greater now than at any time in Mr. Higginson's day, and whether, if they do, they can successfully make up the loss of three-quarters of the orchestra and restore it to what it has been so very recently, these are all questions that cannot fail to interest deeply the New York musical public, and the possibilities of the situation are such as to cause pain and anxiety.

RICHARD ALDRICH.

SUN
s New York City

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

With forces curtained to the extent of twenty players (a result of the present "strike" on the part of that many of its personnel), the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, last evening gave the last of its annual Brooklyn quintet of concerts, the opera house of the Academy of Music seating the usual large audience such as has marked the patronage of the B. S. O. series for many past seasons. Mr. Monteux, who had originally planned to give Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony, Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture, was obliged, as a result of his lessened ensemble, to displace these full-fledged orchestral scores with others calling for more unpretentious sonorities, substituting therefor the fourthe Beethoven symphony, Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyll," and excerpts from the third act of the same composer's "The Mastersingers," including the beautifully meditative prelude, the stodgily hilarious dance of the apprentices and the music that accompanies the welcome of Hans Sachs. In the seat of concertmaster, formerly occupied by the discharged Frederick Fradkin, said discharge having been the pivot precipitating present prevailing upsetment in the ranks of the Bostonese players, sat J. Theodorowicz, while Alwin Schroeder, veteran 'cellist, had moved up to the first seat of 'cella, that has been occupied by the seceding Bedetti. The principal shortage of instruments existed in the string choir, those of the wind, brass and percussion remaining practically intact. It is not necessary, at this waning stage of the musical season, and in view of the situation in general, to present a detailed criticism of last evening's performance, beyond the statement that the programme was presented in such wise as to afford a large measure of enjoyment. It was an evening of calm music, minus the turbulency that obtains in presentation of modern compositions. Emmy Destinn, in full command of those luxuriant soprano tones that have won fame at the Metropolitan Opera House and elsewhere, was soloist in the "Non mi dir" aria from Mozart's "Don Giovanni," and three Bohemian songs from Smetana and Dvorak.

The Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, under whose auspices the Boston concerts are given, announces their continuation for the season of 1920-1921.

...ost Complete
...s Bureau in the World

...m.....

...ress New York City

...e.....

SYMPHONY CONCERTS BY TWO ORCHESTRAS

Boston Organization at Matinee and Damrosch's Band in Evening at Carnegie Hall.

Jascha Heifetz was the soloist last evening with the New York Symphony Society in an interesting program in which the Damrosch orchestra shone wtih special luster in the Mendelssohn "Scotch" symphony and in Moszkowski's "Perpetual Motion," which was bracketed with the intermezzo from the same suite. Mr. Heifetz was a flashing radiance in Glazounoff's concerto for violin with orchestra and the large audience made a great to-do about the imperturbable young virtuoso.

In the afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its thirty-fourth season in New York in a program far better suited to its present diminished size than was the opening concert of this engagement. The overture to "Fidelio," by Beethoven, Mozart's G-minor Symphony (Kochel 550), an orchestral sketch by Borodin, Debussy's "Petite Suite," arranged for orchestra by Henri Busser and Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture comprised the list. Mr. Monteux and his men were cordially applauded for their beautiful performance.

TELEGRAM
New York City

Boston Symphony's Farewell for the Present Season

"La Forza del Destino" Repeated at the Metropolitan.

CARUSO AS DON ALVARO

Interesting Recital by Mme. Germaine Schnitzer at Aeolian Hall.

Passing through another of those crises which have been all too frequent in its history during these recent troubled times, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard for the last time here this season, in Carnegie Hall, yesterday afternoon.

Mr. Pierre Monteux, the French leader, conducted as usual with a recalcitrant concert master replaced by Julius Theodorowicz, formerly of the Kneisel Quartet, and with nearly one-third of the players "out on strike."

Despite these defections, the great orchestra gave an excellent account of itself, showing an unimpaired beauty of tone, probably because the programme had been discreetly changed in part, so that the works presented did not overtax the diminished personnel.

The overture to "Fidelio," opening the programme, flowed smoothly and melodiously over the heads of an audience accustomed to the Boston Symphony's frequent presentations of Beethoven.

Immediately after Mozart's Symphony in G minor, with its golden melodies, made the listeners forget for a time the gloomy weather outside and fortified them to face again with renewed courage a time of critical unrest and despair.

For the second half of the programme Mr. Monteux began with Borodin's orchestral sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," recalling to opera subscribers that composer's "Prince Igor" at the Metropolitan.

According to programme the concert should have ended with Debussy's "Petite Suite," which is richer in orchestral charm than that composer's pallid works usually exhibit. Perhaps the fact that Henri Busser transcribed and orchestrated the Suite may explain this fact.

Goldmark's overture to "Shakuntala" was an added number, played with exquisite richness of tone and fluency of pleasure. The audience was politely enthusiastic.

TRIBUNE
s New York City

Boston Orchestra Is Well Received In Carnegie Hall

Concert by the Symphony Here Declared Admirable; Mme. Schmitzer Gives Last of Her Three Recitals

The troubles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra do not seem to have affected the number of people who in New York wish to hear the famous band. The concert yesterday afternoon found Carnegie Hall crowded and Mr. Monteux greeted with more than ordinary heartiness. Mr. Monteux has naturally tempered the program to his shorn orchestra, yet despite a certain loss in tonal resonance its playing yesterday was admirable, and notably so in Debussy's Petite Suite, arranged for orchestra by Henri Büsser. Mr. Monteux is entirely at home in the music of Debussy, and he gave the Suite a graceful and atmospheric performance. The other numbers were the overture to Beethoven's "Fidelio," the Mozart G minor Symphony, Borodin's orchestral sketch "On the Steppes of Central Asia" and the overture to Goldmark's "Sakuntala."

At the same moment Mme. Germaine Schnitzer was giving the last of her three recitals at Aeolian Hall and giving it to a large and interested audience. She played a program of considerable variety, opening with a Sonata of Parodies and following it with Schumann's "Carnaval," Schubert's Impromptu, op. 142; Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 9, and shorter pieces by Chabrier, Brahms, Rachmaninoff, and Saint-Saëns. Mme. Schnitzer's tone was unfortunately singurarily hard and lacking in variety of color, but aside from this rather unexpected defect she played with a good deal of sentiment and even of fire.

om Times
New York City

MUSIC

By Richard Aldrich

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season in New York was given in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The audience was as hearty in its greeting of Mr. Monteux, and in applauding the performance of the orchestra as it was on Thursday evening, and it gave conductor and players an equally hearty "au revoir" at the close of the concert.

As in the case of the first concert the program for this one had been materially changed on account of the reduction in the size of the orchestra and the introduction into it of some new players. It comprised Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio," Mozart's G minor symphony, Borodin's orchestral sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," an arrangement by Henri Busser of Debussy's "Petite Suite," originally written for the piano, four hands; and Karl Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture.

There was nothing unfamiliar except Debussy's suite, an early composition of rather fragile substance, and showing only the first thin burgeoning of the style characteristic of his maturer works. It is pretty and agreeable music that hardly stands orchestral treatment, though the arrangement is suitably and lightly made. Borodin's "sketch" was composed for a series of tableaux vivants, representing scenes in Russian history, and gives expression to the "Orientalism" that appealed to the composer and that he made so much use of in his opera of "Prince Igor." He intended, as he says, to suggest in this piece the refrain of a peaceful Russian song, a melancholy Oriental song, the steps of approaching horses and camels. A caravan advances, escorted by Russian soldiers, passes, and the song of the Russians and of the natives dies out. A simple panorama, presented by means simple but characteristic, musically vivid.

Mr. Monteux's reading of Mozart's symphony was especially spirited, vigorous and rhythmically alive. The playing of or chestra, however, had not all the good qualities that were heard last Thursday; it was rougher and less finished. There were some technical slips. Mr. Monteux had the symphony played with only four of his six double basses, doubtless from considerations touching the balance of the string tone, and to correspond with the reduction in the number of his violins. The lack of body and rich tonal color was especially felt in Goldmark's "Sakuntala" vorture.

The listeners, however, realized the better qualities of the performance and were liberal in their applause for all the numbers on the program. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra were made to feel the friendly attitude of the audience, and the hope that no permanent harm should come to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

New York City

Boston Orchestra Lacking Qualities of Its Best Days

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fifth matinee concert of its thirty-fourth season in this city in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. It was the final concert of the series, and the conditions surrounding it were such as to cause the admirers of the famous organization grave concern.

The story of the rebellion in the orchestra and the defection of thirty-one members has already been told here. The playing of the body brought together from the faithful members and recruits hastily summoned from among the ranks of previous members was better in the B flat symphony of Beethoven on Thursday night than in the G minor symphony of Mozart, which followed Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture on yesterday's list.

The other numbers were Borodin's "On the Steppes," Debussy's "Petite Suite," arranged for orchestra by Henri Busser, and Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture. There was some good playing in the Debussy suite, but in general the orchestra sounded rough. There was little or nothing of the delicious mellowness and transparency of tone for which the Bostonians have been noted. However, in the circumstances no finished performance could be expected.

It was evident that the sympathies of the audience were with Pierre Monteux the conductor, for the applause with which he was received when he first appeared and which followed the symphony was plainly meant as a special demonstration.

The future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is in the lap of the gods who protect union labor. It remains for unionism to perpetuate or destroy this institution. If it proves to be true that seventy-four members are pledged to leave the orchestra if it is not unionized then the organization is doomed, for great concert orchestras cannot be improvised. For the sake of its splendid history and of musical art in this country it is to be hoped that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will survive the deadly blow it has received and will continue to bring its delightful contributions to New York's musical season.

:om
IMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The fact that thirty-three strikers left the Boston Symphony orchestra last week as the result of friction over proposed unionization of the organization did not greatly interfere with the concert at Aeolian Hall last night, except that the program was slightly less elaborate than originoally intended. The strikers' places were filled by pensioners and players from the New England Conservatory of Music. John Alden Carpenter's "Concertino" was to have been played, but instead Conductor Monteux presented: Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and five Wagner numbers—the Prelude to 'Lohengrin," "A Siegfried Idyll," "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," excerpts from Act III. of "The Mastersingers."

From Times
New York City

MUSIC

By Richard Aldrich

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the last evening concert of its New York season last evening in Carnegie Hall. It makes this last visit to this city in the midst of tribulation. Some of the details of its troubles, resulting in the dismissal of Mr. Fradkin, the concert master, and the retirement of a number of other players over a matter of discipline, have been published in dispatches from Boston. There is also impending a larger question relating to the determination of many of its members to join the musical union against the wishes of the Trustees, who are carrying out the policy maintained by the founder, Major Higginson, since the establishment of the organization thirty-nine years ago.

Some of the results were apparent last evening in the appearance of the orchestra considerably reduced in numbers. Instead of the sixteen first violins that have played in recent seasons, there were ten; there was also a reduction in the number of second violins, and the double basses were six instead of eight. There were also a number of unfamiliar faces; some of them were said to be of players formerly members of the orchestra, recruited now for the emergency. The concertmaster was Mr. Theodorowicz, who has recently been Mr. Fradkin's companion at the first desk of the violins.

The program announced for the concert had been entirely changed, to meet the exigency of the reduced forces. Instead of Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony, Beethoven's Fourth was substituted; and in place of John Alden Carpenter's "Concertino" for piano and orchestra, with E. Robert Schmitz as soloist, and the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," other pieces by Wagner—the prelude to "Lohengrin," "A Siegfried Idyll," "Forest Murmurs," from "Siegfried," and the introduction to the third act of "The Mastersingers," the dance of the apprentices and the final passage called "Homage to Hans Sachs," from the same music drama—were given.

The audience was ready to show its sympathy with the conductor, and when Mr. Monteux appeared he was greeted with an extra round of applause. At the close of the symphony there was an enthusiastic demonstration, which Mr. Monteux desired to share with the players—and none failed to rise to acknowledge it.

Under the circumstances, it was not to be expected that all the remembered qualities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should be shown in the performance. But it was evident that both conductor and players were on their mettle; and the performance had many admirable qualities and showed the fine musicianship that was centred in that reduced aggregation of players. Of course, the volume of the string tone was not there. The playing of the symphony, however, had great spirit, elastic rhythm, delicacy and finesse; an engrossing performance. And if the balance of tone was different from that familiar to concertgoers of these days, some may have consoled themselves by thinking that it was nearer to that of the orchestras that played it for Beethoven in 1806.

In the prelude to "Lohengrin" the division of the strings in the scoring and the reduced numbers available for the several parts emphasized somewhat the loss in volume. But the "Siegfried Idyll" was originally conceived for a small orchestra and loses little in a performance by one. If Mr. Monteux's beat in certain passages was a little rigid the delicacy and poetic coloring of the orchestra were delightful. The audience was cordial in its manifestation of enjoyment.

Mme. Julia Claussen's Recital.

Mme. Julia Claussen, mezzo soprano, now a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company, though not of late often heard in its performances, gave a song recital in Aeolian Hall yesterday afternoon. There were interesting qualities in her delivery of an interesting program; chief of which was the evidence of a genuine understanding of the essential character and spirit of the songs she sang.

Mme. Claussen's voice is itself not of remarkable beauty; nor does she possess all the graces of the most polished style; she "scoops" now and again; now and again there is uncertainty in her intonation. But there was something of the necessary sustained style in Sully's "Bi Epais"; spirit, though not all that here might have been of polish, in Scarlatti's "Gia il, sole dal Gange." She was singularly successful in the sustained intensity of Brahms's "Sapphic Ode, in the mischievous spirit of his "Disappointed Serenader," and in the dramatic vividness of Liszt's "Three Gipsies." On the other hand, her vocal technique did not serve her well in Schubert's "To Be Sung on the Water."

There was a group of Russian songs and one of Swedish and American songs. The German songs she sang in English translations. Mme. Claussen's English had something of an accent and her diction is not of the finish that makes her wholly intelligible in song. She had an admirable accompanist in Richard Hageman.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From Times
New York City

Mr. Otto Roth, one of the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who resigned on account of the recent uproar over the action of Mr. Fradkin, the concert master, has written a letter explaining his course. In this letter, too long to print in full here, Mr. Roth, who was the oldest member of the orchestra in length of service—thirty-eight years—says that while the Fradkin incident had nothing directly to do with the union movement, that movement is indirectly the sole cause of the trouble. He declares that seventy-four members of the orchestra have pledged themselves to stand together, and will quit at the expiration of their contracts if the union is not recognized. This meant that within one year three-quarters of the orchestra must be replaced. Judge Cabot is not concerned about it, says Mr. Roth, and believes that he can build up the orchestra to its former standard, even though seventy-four leave it. Mr. Roth thinks this impossible. He declares that all other American orchestras are in the union, and this fact does not seem to interfere with their artistic development. There is yet time to save the orchestra, Mr. Roth declares, and hopes the trustees will relent.

The New York public will join in the general lamentation if the Boston Symphony Orchestra is damaged beyond repair. It is unsafe at this distance and without a knowledge of all the facts to venture a prediction; but most admirers of the orchestra will think that if three-quarters of the present personnel leave it, and the management tries to build it up to former standard with new men—or women—in their place, the outlook will not be promising. It took some of the rarest ability a good many years to bring the Boston Orchestra up to its pre-eminent position. It will not be done again immediately, even if an equal amount of ability in the direction and in the personnel is at once available.

The merits of the unionizing scheme are not for outsiders, imperfectly acquainted with the circumstances, to discuss. It is natural, probably inevitable, that the trustees of the orchestra should carry out strictly the policy they inherited from Major Higginson against it. They no doubt consider it a part of the many-sided wisdom that marked his control of the orchestra for so many years and that brought such unique results. Whether they will "relent" or whether they can withstanding the pressure, greater now than at any time in Mr. Higginson's day, and whether, if they do, they can successfully make up the loss of three-quarters of the orchestra and restore it to what it has been so very recently, these are all questions that cannot fail to interest deeply the New York musical public, and the possibilities of the situation are such as to cause pain and anxiety.

RICHARD ALDRICH.
SUN
New York City

Boston Orchestra Lacking Qualities of Its Best Days

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fifth matinee concert of its thirty-fourth season in this city in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. It was the final concert of the series, and the conditions surrounding it were such as to cause the admirers of the famous organization grave concern.

The story of the rebellion in the orchestra and the defection of thirty-one members has already been told here. The playing of the body brought together from the faithful members and recruits hastily summoned from among the ranks of previous members was better in the B flat symphony of Beethoven on Thursday night than in the G minor symphony of Mozart, which followed Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture on yesterday's list.

The other numbers were Borodin's "On the Steppes," Debussy's "Petite Suite," arranged for orchestra by Henri Busser, and Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture. There was some good playing in the Debussy suite, but in general the orchestra sounded rough. There was little or nothing of the delicious mellowness and transparency of tone for which the Bostonians have been noted. However, in the circumstances no finished performance could be expected.

It was evident that the sympathies of the audience were with Pierre Monteux, the conductor, for the applause with which he was received when he first appeared and which followed the symphony was plainly meant as a special demonstration.

The future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is in the lap of the gods who protect union labor. It remains for unionism to perpetuate or destroy this institution. If it proves to be true that seventy-four members are pledged to leave the orchestra if it is not unionized then the organization is doomed, for great concert orchestras cannot be improvised. For the sake of its splendid history and of musical art in this country it is to be hoped that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will survive the deadly blow it has received and will continue to bring its delightful contributions to New York's musical season.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

With forces curtained to the extent of twenty players (a result of the present "strike" on the part of that many of its personnel), the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, last evening gave the last of its annual Brooklyn quintet of concerts, the opera house of the Academy of Music seating the usual large audience such as has marked the patronage of the B. S. O. series for many past seasons. Mr. Monteux, who had originally planned to give Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony, Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture, was obliged, as a result of his lessened ensemble, to displace these full-fledged orchestral scores with others calling for more unpretentious sonorities, substituting therefor the fourthe Beethoven symphony, Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyll," and excerpts from the third act of the same composer's "The Mastersingers," including the beautifully meditative prelude, the stodgily hilarious dance of the apprentices and the music that accompanies the welcome of Hans Sachs. In the seat of concertmaster, formerly occupied by the discharged Frederick Fradkin, said discharge having been the pivot precipitating present prevailing upsetment in the ranks of the Bostonese players, sat J. Theodorowicz, while Alwin Schroeder, veteran 'cellist, had moved up to the first seat of 'cella, that has been occupied by the seceding Bedetti. The principal shortage of instruments existed in the string choir, those of the wind, brass and percussion remaining practically intact. It is not necessary, at this waning stage of the musical season, and in view of the situation in general, to present a detailed criticism of last evening's performance, beyond the statement that the programme was presented in such wise as to afford a large measure of enjoyment. It was an evening of calm music, minus the turbulency that obtains in presentation of modern compositions. Emmy Destinn, in full command of those luxuriant soprano tones that have won fame at the Metropolitan Opera House and elsewhere, was soloist in the "Non mi dir" aria from Mozart's "Don Giovanni," and three Bohemian songs from Smetana and Dvorak.

The Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, under whose auspices the Boston concerts are given, announces their continuation for the season of 1920-1921.

...ost Complete
...g Bureau in the World

...m.....

Iress New York City

e.....

SYMPHONY CONCERTS BY TWO ORCHESTRAS

Boston Organization at Matinee and Damrosch's Band in Evening at Carnegie Hall.

Jascha Heifetz was the soloist last evening with the New York Symphony Society in an interesting program in which the Damrosch orchestra shone with special luster in the Mendelssohn "Scotch" symphony and in Moszkowski's "Perpetual Motion," which was bracketed with the intermezzo from the same suite. Mr. Heifetz was a flashing radiance in Glazounoff's concerto for violin with orchestra and the large audience made a first-rate to-do about the imperturbable young virtuoso.

Richard Hageman afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its thirty-fourth season in New York in a program far better than its present diminished size than the opening concert of this engagement. The overture to "Fidelio," by Beethoven; Mozart's G-minor Symphony (No. 550), an orchestral sketch by Borodin, Debussy's "Petite Suite," arranged for orchestra by Henri Busser and Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture comprised the program. Mr. Monteux and his men were applauded for their beautiful playing.

TELEGRAM
New York City

Boston Symphony's Farewell for the Present Season

"La Forza del Destino" Repeated at the Metropolitan.

CARUSO AS DON ALVARO

Interesting Recital by Mme. Germaine Schnitzer at Aeolian Hall.

Passing through another of those crises which have been all too frequent in its history during these recent troubled times, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard for the last time here this season, in Carnegie Hall, yesterday afternoon.

Mr. Pierre Monteux, the French leader, conducted as usual with a recalcitrant concert master replaced by Julius Theodorowicz, formerly of the Kneisel Quartet, and with nearly one-third of the players "out on strike."

Despite these defections, the great orchestra gave an excellent account of itself, showing an unimpaired beauty of tone, probably because the programme had been discreetly changed in part, so that the works presented did not overtax the diminished personnel.

The overture to "Fidelio," opening the programme, flowed smoothly and melodiously over the heads of an audience accustomed to the Boston Symphony's frequent presentations of Beethoven.

Immediately after Mozart's Symphony in G minor, with its golden melodies, made the listeners forget for a time the gloomy weather outside and fortified them to face again with renewed courage a time of critical unrest and despair.

For the second half of the programme Mr. Monteux began with Borodin's orchestral sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," recalling to opera subscribers that composer's "Prince Igor" at the Metropolitan.

According to programme the concert should have ended with Debussy's "Petite Suite," which is richer in orchestral charm than that composer's pallid works usually exhibit. Perhaps the fact that Henri Busser transcribed and orchestrated the Suite may explain this fact.

Goldmark's overture to "Shakuntala" was an added number, played with exquisite richness of tone and fluency of measure. The audience was politely enthusiastic.

TRIBUNE
New York City

Boston Orchestra Is Well Received In Carnegie Hall

Concert by the Symphony Here Declared Admirable; Mme. Schmitzer Gives Last of Her Three Recitals

The troubles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra do not seem to have affected the number of people who in New York wish to hear the famous band. The concert yesterday afternoon found Carnegie Hall crowded and Mr. Monteux greeted with more than ordinary heartiness. Mr. Monteux has naturally tempered the program to his shorn orchestra, yet despite a certain loss in tonal resonance its playing yesterday was admirable, and notably so in Debussy's Petite Suite, arranged for orchestra by Henri Büsser. Mr. Monteux is entirely at home in the music of Debussy, and he gave the Suite a graceful and atmospheric performance. The other numbers were the overture to Beethoven's "Fidelio," the Mozart G minor Symphony, Borodin's orchestral sketch "On the Steppes of Central Asia" and the overture to Goldmark's "Sakuntala."

At the same moment Mme. Germaine Schnitzer was giving the last of her three recitals at Aeolian Hall and giving it to a large and interested audience. She played a program of considerable variety, opening with a Sonata of Parodies and following it with Schumann's "Carnaval," Schubert's Impromptu, op. 142; Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 9, and shorter pieces by Chabrier, Brahms, Rachmaninoff, and Saint-Saëns. Mme. Schnitzer's tone was unfortunately singularly hard and lacking in variety of color, but aside from this rather unexpected defect she played with a good deal of sentiment and even of fire.

om Times
New York City

MUSIC

By Richard Aldrich

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season in New York was given in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The audience was as hearty in its greeting of Mr. Monteux, and in applauding the performance of the orchestra as it was on Thursday evening, and it gave conductor and players an equally hearty "au revoir" at the close of the concert.

As in the case of the first concert the program for this one had been materially changed on account of the reduction in the size of the orchestra and the introduction into it of some new players. It comprised Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio," Mozart's G minor symphony, Borodin's orchestral sketch, "On the Steppes of Central Asia," an arrangement by Henri Busser of Debussy's "Petite Suite," originally written for the piano, four hands; and Karl Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture.

There was nothing unfamiliar except Debussy's suite, an early composition of rather fragile substance, and showing only the first thin burgeoning of the style characteristic of his maturer works. It is pretty and agreeable music that hardly stands orchestral treatment, though the arrangement is suitably and lightly made. Borodin's "sketch" was composed for a series of tableaux vivants, representing scenes in Russian history, and gives expression to the "Orientalism" that appealed to the composer and that he made so much use of in his opera of "Prince Igor." He intended, as he says, to suggest in this piece the refrain of a peaceful Russian song, a melancholy Oriental song, the steps of approaching horses and camels. A caravan advances, escorted by Russian soldiers, passes, and the song of the Russians and of the natives dies out. A simple panorama, presented by means simple but characteristic, musically vivid.

Mr. Monteux's reading of Mozart's symphony was especially spirited, vigorous and rhythmically alive. The playing of or chestra, however, had not all the good qualities that were heard last Thursday; it was rougher and less finished. There were some technical slips. Mr. Monteux had the symphony played with only four of his six double basses, doubtless from considerations touching the balance of the string tone, and to correspond with the reduction in the number of his violins. The lack of body and rich tonal color was especially felt in Goldmark's "Sakuntala" vorecture.

The listeners, however, realized the better qualities of the performance and were liberal in their applause for all the numbers on the program. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra were made to feel the friendly attitude of the audience, and the hope that no permanent harm should come to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

:om
IMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The fact that thirty-three strikers left the Boston Symphony orchestra last week as the result of friction over proposed unionization of the organization did not greatly interfere with the concert at Aeolian Hall last night, except that the program was slightly less elaborate than originoally intended. The strikers' places were filled by pensioners and players from the New England Conservatory of Music. John Alden Carpenter's "Concertino" was to have been played, but instead Conductor Monteux presented: Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and five Wagner numbers—the Prelude to 'Lohengrin," "A Siegfried Idyll," "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," excerpts from Act III. of "The Mastersingers."

INFORMATION OBSCURED

EAGLE
: Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTONIANS "IN PARVO"

Attenuated Orchestra Plays in Carnegie Hall—John Powell Talks for Publication.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra fulfilled all obligations to subscribers by giving last evening in Carnegie Hall are final concert in its Thursday series. With 34 players out on strike in sympathy with the recently deposed concertmaster, Frederic Fradkin, the orchestra was so attenuated that Conductor Monteux was obliged perforce to substitute Beethoven's Fourth Symphony for the more elaborated scheme of Berlioz's "Fantastic" and selections from the music-dramas of Richard Wagner for John Alden Carpenter's Concertino for piano and orchestra.

Apparently the organization tha played last evening lived on and b tradition. The cephalic color schem ran from gray to shining baldness, fo youth had fled to the ranks of or ganized labor. There were materi gaps in the stage grouping and mu sical holes in the quantitative val of the string sections. Ten first vi lins and six double basses we counte an indication of a shortage of ma power that left an indelible effect the Wagner scoring, but almost gua anteed better Beethoven. By the p ture of the applause it was easy to s that the audience was out of symp thy with unionism. Applause, ho ever, wins no battles. The audien was the smallest we have ever seen a Boston Symphony concert.

EVENING JOURNAL
New York City
MAR 22 1920

HEIFETZ SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Orchestra Closes Sea son—Benno Moiseiwitsch an Germaine Schnitzer Play.

The season's concluding concerts the New York Symphony and t Boston orchestras on Saturday a Sunday wrote a gentle finis into t record. Pierre Monteux and strike-reduced band perforce had re course to music largely within th milder idiom of the strings, whils Walter Damrosch, not thus handi capped, nevertheless chose the simpler orchestral delights. It was rather curious commentary that both con ductors, actuated toward the same ds, although from different motives found Beethoven and Debussy much to their purpose.

The Boston Orchestra, for its rday matinee in Carnegie Hall, was ccupied with the overture to Bee hoven's "Fidelio," Mazart's G minor ymphony, Borodin's "On the Steppes," n orchestral version by Henri Bus er of Debussy's "Petite suite" ritten for piano, and Goldmark's Sakuntala" overture. There were lashes of excellent playing through out this program, but there were also umerous dry and sandy stretches, ot all of which were located on the orodinian steppes. Mr. Monteux at empted too much "reading" of Mo art; most conductors have discov red that the G minor symphony sounds" best when most let alone. Perhaps Mr. Monteux will also some day make this discovery concerning it—and concerning many other mat ers.

From
EVENING WORLD,
New York City
MAR 22

Heifetz Soloist At Symphony's Last Concert

By Sylvester Rawling.

So much of interest was crowded into the music of the week end that the proper perspective is not easy to find. Perhaps a brief word about the last subscription concert of the Symphony Society in Aeolian Hall yesterday afternoon should be said first, for, sticking to the topsy-turveydom at the close, the "Marseillaise" and the "Star Spangled Banner" weer played in rousing fashion, both as a farewell and as a preparation for the forthcoming European tour of the organization. The concert began with Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, interrupted after a few measures by some noisy ventilators which Mr. Damrosch knew would not be conducive to creating the "Cheerful Impressions Excited on Arriving in the Country." After a fresh start the symphony was played with fine spirit. Jascha Heifetz reaped salvos of applause and many recalls for his playing in the Glazounoff violin concerto, into which he put not only his usual technical skill and tonal perfection but something more than his wonted ardor and emotional warmth. It was a masterful performance, superbly sustained by Mr. Damrosch and the orchestra. The night before, in Carnegie Hall, soloist and orchestra had presented the same work.

The Boston Orchestra said farewell for the season at its concert in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. With its depleted numbers and its programme hastily improvised by Mr. Monteux, a review of the performance is unnecessary. All that may be expressed is a hope that the organization may remain intact—while deep down in our hearts is the fear that, come what may, Fradkins, or Monteux, or Karl Muchs, or labor unions—no matter where the trouble lies—never again may the world famous organization stand peerless. And while writing about big orchestras our New Symphony has applied for permission to change its name to the National. Already it has Artur Bodanzky for conductor, and next season it will take on William Menzel berg, the Hollander as another leader. There are rumors of a possible amalgamation of this, the latest orchestras, with the Philharmonic oldest, as old, in fact, as the nna Philharmonic.

Benno Moiseiwitsch, the pianist

From
EVENING WORLD,
New York City

Loyal Boston Orchestra Men In Last Concer

By Sylvester Rawling.

It was a depleted Boston Orc that faced its host of ever ful New York adherents in negie Hall last night. The in troubles which brought about t sertion of a third of its member been related in news despatches fro Boston. They were caused by a dis agreement between the conductor Mr. Monteux, and the concertmaster Mr. Fradkin; demands for higher sal aries and the purpose of many o the players to join the Musical Union to which the trustees object. While the end is not yet, there is universal hope that a settlement will be reached by which the organization will remain intact; for the Boston Orchestra long has been regarded as the premier orchestra of America.

Mr. Monteux, who was cordially greeted, was forced to change last night's programme. Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony and John Alden Carpenter's concertina for piano and orchestra were abandoned. Beethoven's fourth symphony and several Wagner numbers being substituted for them. The symphony suffered little in exposition by the smaller orchestra, in fact, the performance of it was admirable. The same may be said of the playing of the "Lohengrin" prelude, "A Siegfried Idyll," and the forest murmurs from "Siegfried." The excerpts from "The Mastersingers," which came at the end, lacked something of sonority. While the applause of the audience was not over enthusiastic, the tense attention given to the Wagner works showed the grip that his red-blooded music maintains.

At to-morrow afternoon's concert, the last one of the New York season, there also will be a change of programme. Mozart's G major symphony will be played.

EVENING GLOBE
ss New York City
MAR 22

Music.

he Boston Symphony Conce —Other Music.

Owing to recent happenings in B n, which have been referred to, tal ould seem, sufficiently, Pierre M nx, the conductor of the Boston mphony Orchestra, now seems to regarded by the usually somewhat athetic New York patrons of that ganization as a Joan of Arc. At y rate, upon his appearance on the tform of Carnegie Hall Saturday ternoon he was greeted with a rm of applause equivalent in quan to that which Sarah Bernhardt eives after a two years' absence m these shores. And after he had nducted Mozart's G minor sym ony, that music-tragedy of charm, murder in a Watteau picture, he s recalled again and again to the e.

The programme was not the one ginally planned, owing, etc., and as turned out, had little weight aside m the Mozart symphony, although rodin's "On the Steppes of Central a," somewhat in the manner of his teric dances in "Prince Igor," is y lovely music. Debussy's "Petite ite," written for piano and orches ted by Henri Büsser, is in the nner of Victor Herbert's "Babes in yland" and not nearly as good, lle Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overe might profitably have a long t. There was further Beethoven's rth attempt at an overture to "Fi lio." He should have been content h one of the others.

CITIZEN
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE.

Emmy Distinn Appears as Soloist at Academy of Music.

Brooklyn music lovers were given an excellent treat last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which closed its season at the Academy of Music with the last of a series of five philharmonic concerts. If any proof were needed of the high regard in which this orchestra is held here, one could gauge it simply by the fact that scarcely a single seat in the spacious Opera House was vacant. It showed that inclement weather such as prevailed last night, is not at all a determent factor when the musical thirst of Brooklynites is concerned.

Emmy Destinn, the famous soprano, was the soloist of the evening. She sang with such exquisite charm that the Academy fairly thundered with the applause that was showered upon her. Her numbers were: Aria, "Non mi dir," from Mogarth's "Don Giovanni;" two berceuses from "Hubicka," by Smetua, and a song from Dvorak's "Russalka."

Pierre Monteux conducted and he showed his skill to such perfection that the audience insisted on his taking several curtain calls. The numbers given by the orchestra were Beethoven's Four[illegible] (Wag[illegible] tersi[illegible]

From TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSIC EVENT

BOSTON SYMPHONY HE

With Emmy Destinn singing mi Dir" from "Don Giovann Beethoven's "Fourth in B Flat the symphony, the Boston Syn Orchestra bade farewell to Br for a year, at the Academy of last night. The audience was sized and the strike didn't seem to hav very disastrous effects upon the per formance.

Miss Destinn was in good voice a although her selections were not man they were well-rendered and well-re ceived. Her principal selection o course was the air from "Don Gio vanni." One would hardly call th opera the best of Mozart's composition and that the aria is the best of its in dividual numbers is not at all an axiom She also sang two berceuses from Sme tana's "Hubicka" and a song fro "Russalka" by Dvorak. None of thes melodies is highly distinguished, but o the other hand is conspicuous for ba musianship. At any rate the manne in which they were sung rendered thei adequate.

It may be said, however, that inte centered about the orchestr and its "strike-breakers." Many these were pensioners and considerin that the Beethoven symphony ough also be considered a pensioner of th city's concert stage, no difficulty wa encountered in the interpretation this very familiar number. Wagner "Siegfried Idyll" was an old story als and nearly every Brooklyn sympho orchestra program this season has bee blessed with "Die Meistersinger" in o form or another. Last night's brai was labeled "Excerpts from Act III," said excerpts being "The Introduction "Dance of the Apprentices" and "W come to Hans Sachs."

m EAGLE
dress: Brooklyn, N. Y.
e

LAST BOSTON CONCERT

Attenuated Orchestra With Destinn as Soloist—Five Concerts Announced for Next Year.

Hope apparently runs high among the Cabots and Lowells and the other Boston gentlemen who "speak only with God," for despite all present difficulties the orchestra, according to last evening's Academy program, will give during next season its usual series of five Brooklyn concerts. The dates are Nov. 5, Dec. 3, Jan. 7, Feb. 4 and March 18, and subscriptions are to be secured through the Institute.

The attenuated band concluded its Brooklyn series by an excellent concert, but with a program revised to fit "strike" limitations. The symphony was Beethoven's in B-flat major, fourth of the immortal nine, composed for the small orchestra in vogue during the early days of the last century and therefore sounding altogether correct in last evening's playing. Its measures are in sympathy with Mr. Monteux's symphonic limitations, though one might have caviled with the dark, frequently opaque, color of the strings. Clarity of outline was missing in the scherzo and apparently the "ma non troppe" escaped the conductor's eye when he read the tempo description for the final movement. But the adagio was a joy. The band should not be criticized for shortcomings on the score of precision; these are the dog days of the Boston Symphony. The whole world, however, seems mad.

For the rest Emmy Destinn (now, it seems, to be called "Ema") sang arias in Czechish from Smetana's opera "Hubicka" and from one by Dvorak called "Russalka." She was not in the best of voice and often strident of tone, but there was the old familiar beauty in all passages calling for use of the mezzo voce. Later the

VENING JOURNAL
New York City

MONTEUX LEADS DEPLETED BAND FROM BOSTON

Difficult Programme Changed to Meet Capabilities of the Smaller Orchestra.

The shifting fortunes of the Boston Orchestra in the past three years have brought it new conductors and new men and consequently changed standards of performance, but the latest fortuitude to affect its lot has lopped off a third of its personnel and reduced it to a small band. It was this two-thirds of an orchestra that came to New York and gave the first of its final pair of concerts for this season in Carnegie Hall last evening. There was present a large audience, but it was nevertheless the smallest to attend a Boston Symphony concert in many and many a year. All of which could not fail to impress the thoughtful concertgoer somewhat sadly. Platitude is the comfortless refuge of reflection in such circumstances, but platitude will

Brooklyn, N. Y.

From
EVENING POST,
New York City
MAR 12 1920

Music

Henry T. Finck

Boston Symphony Pluck

Everybody likes pluck. For that reason the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, M. Monteux, were stormily greeted when they appeared in Carnegie Hall last night. Reduced in size, like an army after a battle, the orchestra fought its way to the favor of the audience, as usual, although, of course, not with the usual approach to ideal conditions. The story of its troubles need not be told again. More than thirty men had been dismissed because of union squabbles and insubordination. The orchestra was therefore not of the usual size, but some of the vacant places were filled by former members of the orchestra and by students from the New England Conservatory.

Under the circumstances a change of programme was deemed advisable. Beethoven's fourth symphony was played in a rather dull fashion, it must be said. It was a little surprising to find Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" on the programme; for, while that piece requires only a small orchestra, it needs the utmost polish to bring out its ravishing prismatic colors and surprises, also a more elastic beat than M. Monteux's. Yet the strings and the horn were most agreeable. In the climax of the "Lohengrin" prelude the brasses were sonorously impressive. The forest murmurs from "Siegfried" and excerpts from "The Mastersingers" completed the list. It is hoped in Boston that the seceding members of the orchestra can be won back on livable terms. But Boston needs a Mæcenas, or a Medici, or a Higginson, or whatever you choose to call him.

And
in the w of ally a certain fitting robustness to the shadow. The string tone, now based on ten first violins instead of sixteen, ever and anon gave evidence of the thing that had once existed, and one or two of the first wind instruments, notably the redoubtable oboe of Mr. Longy, were still of the old quality. But this was a crippled band and no good is to be accomplished by any attempt at palliation of the fact.

Pierre Monteux, the conductor, who, by the way, was greeted by more than ordinarily extended applause in sympathy for his present difficulties, changed his program several days ago to meet the problem of the reduced numbers and, also, the reduced capabilities of his orchestra. Instead of the "Symphonie fantastique" of Berlioz, still a taxing matter for even a virtuoso band, and a "concerto" for piano and full modern orchestra by John Alden Carpenter, not yet heard here, Mr. Monteux substituted the early Fourth Symphony of Beethoven and a number of Wagnerian pieces, mostly from the operas, and the burden of which falls very largely upon the string band alone.

Beethoven's B flat symphony attracts orchestral conductors very little in these days and there is considerable excuse for their hesitancies in the matter. Although the date of its completion is some two years later than that of the "Eroica," it nevertheless must have been "on the fire" before the latter. It sounds to-day very much as a study for the C minor and the A major symphonies, although, to be sure, it is distinctively the maturing Beethoven, it possesses a beautifully consistent cyclical quality and a wealth of striking and characteristic melodic invention.

Schumann, in one of his ebullient sentimentalisms, spoke of the Fourth Symphony as standing "like a slender Greek maiden between two Norse giants." Weber, at the other extreme of criticism, poked ironic fun at it. The slenderness alone in Schumann's dictum serves. It is no more Greek than a maze of Gothic flying buttresses. It is, indeed, full of rippling gayety, light-hearted and sometimes rather heavy-handed humor and a sparkling spontaneity. Its adagio alone strikes a deeper mood.

Mr. Monteux and his band, perhaps inevitably under the circumstances, were a long distance from doing the symphony anything like justice. It emerged in skeletonic impression and occasionally it became downright dull. One was inclined to believe that Mr. Monteux was himself most largely at fault in this result, for he was often at great pains to elongate tempi, to draw out phrases unduly, to attempt disturbing pauses, and thereby sparkle and spontaneity, gayety and humor were dissipated.

A Tschaikowsky Opera in the Offing

By WILLIAM R. MURRAY.

THE PROMISE FROM BOSTON.

With regard to the Boston Symphony's future the trustees have decided beyond peradventure of a doubt that there is no room for unionism in the orchestra. Perhaps Judge Cabot and his associates have been elevated in spirit by Governor Coolidge's handling of the Boston police strike, perhaps they may have been swayed to their opinion by the popular fallacy, long existent, that the premier position of the orchestra was laid in the foundations of non-unionism. The attitude of Thursday's audience in Carnegie Hall must have been as the sound of angelic harmonies in their ears; to a mere outsider the subscribers seemed to be charged with the belief that by their applause of Conductor Monteux and his faithful few they were scotching forever and ever the hideous head of an overzealous proletariat. Manager W. H. Brennan gave the newspaper representatives the assurance that, union or no union, the orchestra would go on, and the programs held included slips requesting the subscriber to renew their faith against the season of 1920-1921.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

EAGLE
: Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTONIANS "IN PARVO"

Attenuated Orchestra Plays in Carnegie Hall—John Powell Talks for Publication.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra fulfilled all obligations to subscribers by giving last evening in Carnegie Hall are final concert in its Thursday series. With 34 players out on strike in sympathy with the recently deposed concertmaster, Frederic Fradkin, the orchestra was so attenuated that Conductor Monteux was obliged perforce to substitute Beethoven's Fourth Symphony for the more elaborated scheme of Berlioz's "Fantastic" and selections from the music-dramas of Richard Wagner for John Alden Carpenter's Concertino for piano and orchestra.

Apparently the organization tha played last evening lived on and b tradition. The cephalic color schem ran from gray to shining baldness, fo youth had fled to the ranks of o ganized labor. There were materi gaps in the stage grouping and mi sical holes in the quantitative val of the string sections. Ten first vi lins and six double basses we counte an indication of a shortage of ma power that left an indelible effect the Wagner scoring, but almost gua anteed better Beethoven. By the p ture of the applause it was easy to s that the audience was out of symp thy with unionism. Applause, ho ever, wins no battles. The audier was the smallest we have ever seen a Boston Symphony concert.

EVENING JOURNAL
New York City
MAR 22 1921

HEIFETZ SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Orchestra Closes Se son—Benno Moiseiwitsch an Germaine Schnitzer Play.

The season's concluding concerts the New York Symphony and t Boston orchestras on Saturday a Sunday wrote a gentle finis into t record. Pierre Monteux and i strike-reduced band perforce had re course to music largely within th milder idiom of the strings, whilst Walter Damrosch, not thus handicapped, nevertheless chose the simpler orchestral delights. It was rather curious commentary that both conductors, actuated toward the same ends, although from different motives, found Beethoven and Debussy much to their purpose.

The Boston Orchestra, for ... rday matinee in Carnegie Hall, was occupied with the overture to Beethoven's "Fidelio," Mozart's G minor Symphony, Borodin's "On the Steppes" an orchestral version by Henri Busser of Debussy's "Petite suite" written for piano, and Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture. There were flashes of excellent playing throughout this program, but there were also numerous dry and sandy scratches, not all of which were located on the Borodinian steppes. Mr. Monteux attempted too much "reading of Mozart; most conductors have discovered that the G minor symphony "sounds" best when most let alone. Perhaps Mr. Monteux will also some day make this discovery concerning it—and concerning many other matters.

From
EVENING WORLD,
New York City
MAR 22

Heifetz Soloist At Symphony's Last Concert

By Sylvester Rawling.

So much of interest was crowded into the music of the week end that the proper perspective is not easy to find. Perhaps a brief word about the last subscription concert of the Symphony Society in Aeolian Hall yesterday afternoon should be said first, for, sticking to the topsy-turveydom at the close, the "Marseillaise" and the "Star Spangled Banner" weer played in rousing fashion, both as a farewell and as a preparation for the forthcoming European tour of the organization. The concert began with Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, interrupted after a few measures by some noisy ventilators which Mr. Damrosch knew would not be conducive to creating the "Cheerful Impressions Excited on Arriving in the Country." After a fresh start the symphony was played with fine spirit. Jascha Heifetz reaped salvos of applause and many recalls for his playing in the Glazounoff violin concerto, into which he put not only his usual techinacl skill and tonal perfection but something more than his wonted ardor and emotional warmth. It was a masterful performance, superbly sustained by Mr. Damrosch and the orchestra. The night before, in Carnegie Hall, soloist and orchestra had presented the same work.

The Boston Orchestra said farewell for the season at its concert in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. With its depleted numbers and its programme hastily improvised by Mr. Monteux, a review of the performance is unnecessary. All that may be expressed is a hope that the organization may remain intact—while deep down in our hearts is the fear that, come what may, Fradkins, or Monteux, or Karl Muchs, or labor unions—no matter where the trouble lies—never again may the world famous organization stand peerless. And while writing about big orchestras our New Symphony has applied for permission to change its name to the National. Already it nas Artur Bodanzky for conductor, and next season it will take on William Menzelberg, the Hollande,r as another leader. There are rumors of a possible amalgamation of this, the latest orchestra, with the Philharmonic oldest, as old, in fact, as the nna Philharmonic.

Benno Moiseiwitsch, the pianist

From
EVENING WORLD,
New York City

Loyal Boston Orchestra Men In Last Concer

By Sylvester Rawling.

It was a depleted Boston Orc that faced its host of ever ful New York adherents in negie Hall last night. The in troubles which brought about t sertion of a third of its member been related in news despatches fro Boston. They were caused by a dis agreement between the conductor Mr. Monteux, and the concertmaster Mr. Fradkin; demands for higher salaries and the purpose of many of the players to join the Musical Union to which the trustees object. While the end is not yet, there is universal hope that a settlement will be reached by which the organization will remain intact; for the Boston Orchestra long has been regarded as the premier orchestra of America.

Mr. Monteux, who was cordially greeted, was forced to change last night's programme. Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony and John Alden Carpenter's concertina for piano and orchestra were abandoned. Beethoven's fourth symphony and several Wagner numbers being substituted for them. The symphony suffered little in exposition by the smaller orchestra, in fact, the performance of it was admirable. The same may be said of the playing of the "Lohengrin" prelude, "A Siegfried Idyll," and the forest murmurs from "Siegfried." The excerpts from "The Mastersingers," which came at the end, lacked something of sonority. While the applause of the audience was not over enthusiastic, the tense attention given to the Wagner works showed the grip that his red-blooded music maintains.

At to-morrow afternoon's concert, the last one of the New York season, there also will be a change of programme. Mozart's G major symphony will be played.

EVENING GLOBE
ess New York City
MAR

Music.

he Boston Symphony Conce —Other Music.

Owing to recent happenings in B n which have been referred to, tal ould seem, sufficiently, Pierre M ux, the conductor of the Boston mphony Orchestra, now seems to regarded by the usually somewhat athetic New York patrons of that ganization as a Joan of Arc. At y rate, upon his appearance on the atform of Carnegie Hall Saturday ternoon he was greeted with a rm of applause equivalent in quan to that which Sarah Bernhardt eives after a two years' absence m these shores. And after he had nducted Mozart's G minor symony, that music-tragedy of charm, murder in a Watteau picture, he s recalled again and again to the e.

The programme was not the one ginally planned, owing, etc., and as turned out, had little weight aside m the Mozart symphony, although rodin's "On the Steppes of Central ia," somewhat in the manner of his teric dances in "Prince Igor," is y lovely music. Debussy's "Petite ite," written for piano and orches ted by Henri Büsser, is in the nner of Victor Herbert's "Babes in yland" and not nearly as good, ile Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overe might profitably have a long t. There was further Beethoven's rth attempt at an overture to "Fi io." He should have been content h one of the others.

CITIZEN
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE.

Emmy Distinn Appears as Soloist at Academy of Music.

Brooklyn music lovers were given an excellent treat last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which closed its season at the Academy of Music with the last of a series of five philharmonic concerts. If any proof were needed of the high regard in which this orchestra is held here, one could gauge it simply by the fact that scarcely a single seat in the spacious Opera House was vacant. It showed that inclement weather such as prevailed last night, is not at all a determent factor when the musical thirst of Brooklynites is concerned.

Emmy Destinn, the famous soprano, was the soloist of the evening. She sang with such exquisite charm that the Academy fairly thundered with the applause that was showered upon her. Her numbers were: Aria, "Non mi dir," from Mogarth's "Don Giovanni;" two berceuses from "Hubicka," by Smetua, and a song from Dvorak's "Russalka."

Pierre Monteux conducted and he showed his skill to such perfection that the audience insisted on his taking several curtain calls. The numbers given by the orchestra were Beethoven's

From TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSIC EVENT

BOSTON SYMPHONY HE

With Emmy Destinn singing mi Dir" from "Don Giovann Beethoven's "Fourth in B Flat the symphony, the Boston Sym Orchestra bade farewell to Br for a year, at the Academy of last night. The audience was sized and the strike didn't seem to hav very disastrous effects upon the per formance.

Miss Destinn was in good voice an although her selections were not man they were well-rendered and well-re ceived. Her principal selection o course was the air from "Don Gio vanni." One would hardly call th opera the best of Mozart's composition and that the aria is the best of its in dividual numbers is not at all an axiom She also sang two berceuses from Sme tana's "Hubicka" and a song fro "Russalka" by Dvorak. None of thes melodies is highly distinguished, but o the other hand is conspicuous for ba musianship. At any rate the manne in which they were sung rendered the adequate.

It may be said, however, that inte centered about the orchestr and its "strike-breakers." Many these were pensioners and considerin that the Beethoven symphony ough also be considered a pensioner of th city's concert stage, no difficulty wa encountered in the interpretation this very familiar number. Wagner "Siegfrried Idyll" was an old story als and nearly every Brooklyn sympho orchestra program this season has bee blessed with "Die Meistersinger" in o form or another. Last night's bra was labeled "Excerpts from Act III, said excerpts being "The Introduction "Dance of the Apprentices" and "W come to Hans Sachs."

LAST BOSTON CONCERT

Attenuated Orchestra, With Destinn as Soloist—Five Concerts Announced for Next Year.

Hope apparently runs high among the Cabots and Lowells and the other Boston gentlemen who "speak only with God," for despite all present difficulties the orchestra, according to last evening's Academy program, will give during next season its usual series of five Brooklyn concerts. The dates are Nov. 5, Dec. 3, Jan. 7, Feb. 4 and March 18, and subscriptions are to be secured through the Institute.

The attenuated band concluded its Brooklyn series by an excellent concert, but with a program revised to fit "strike" limitations. The symphony was Beethoven's in B-flat major, fourth of the immortal nine, composed for the small orchestra in vogue during the early days of the last century and therefore sounding altogether correct in last evening's playing. Its measures are in sympathy with Mr. Monteux's symphonic limitations, though one might have cavilled with the dark, frequently opaque, color of the strings. Clarity of outline was missing in the scherzo and apparently the "ma non troppe" escaped the conductor's eye when he read the tempo description for the final movement. But the adagio was a joy. The band should not be criticized for shortcomings on the score of precision; these are the dog days of the Boston Symphony. The whole world, however, seems mad.

For the rest Emmy Destinn (now, it seems, to be called "Ema") sang arias in Czechish from Smetana's opera "Hubicka" and from one by Dvorak called "Russalka." She was not in the best of voice and often strident of tone, but there was the old familiar beauty in all passages calling for use of the mezzo voce. Later the s fr or Id th

VENING JOURNAL
New York City

MONTEUX LEADS DEPLETED BAND FROM BOSTON

Difficult Programme Changed to Meet Capabilities of the Smaller Orchestra.

The shifting fortunes of the Boston Orchestra in the past three years have brought it new conductors and new men and consequently changed standards of performance, but the latest fortuitude to affect its lot has lopped off a third of its personnel and reduced it to a small band. It was this two-thirds of an orchestra that came to New York and gave the first of its final pair of concerts for this season in Carnegie Hall last evening. There was present a large audience, but it was nevertheless the smallest to attend a Boston Symphony concert in many and many a year. All of which could not fail to impress the thoughtful concertgoer somewhat sadly. Platitude is the comfortless refuge of reflection in such circumstances, but platitude will

Brooklyn, N. Y.

From
EVENING POST,
New York City

Music

Henry T. Finck

Boston Symphony Pluck

Everybody likes pluck. For that reason the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, M. Monteux, were stormily greeted when they appeared in Carnegie Hall last night. Reduced in size, like an army after a battle, the orchestra fought its way to the favor of the audience, as usual, although, of course, not with the usual approach to ideal conditions. The story of its troubles need not be told again. More than thirty men had been dismissed because of union squabbles and insubordination. The orchestra was therefore not of the usual size, but some of the vacant places were filled by former members of the orchestra and by students from the New England Conservatory.

Under the circumstances a change of programme was deemed advisable. Beethoven's fourth symphony was played in a rather dull fashion, it must be said. It was a little surprising to find Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" on the programme; for, while that piece requires only a small orchestra, it needs the utmost polish to bring out its ravishing prismatic colors and surprises, also a more elastic beat than M. Monteux's. Yet the strings and the horn were most agreeable. In the climax of the "Lohengrin" prelude the brasses were sonorously impressive. The forest murmurs from "Siegfried" and excerpts from "The Mastersingers" completed the list. It is hoped in Boston that the seceding members of the orchestra can be won back on livable terms. But Boston needs a Maecenas, or a Medici, or a Higginson, or whatever you choose to call him. ally a certain hitting robustness to the shadow. The string tone, now based on ten first violins instead of sixteen, ever and anon gave evidence of the thing that had once existed, and one or two of the first wind instruments, notably the redoubtable oboe of Mr. Longy, were still of the old quality. But this was a crippled band and no good is to be accomplished by any attempt at palliation of the fact.

Pierre Monteux, the conductor, who, by the way, was greeted by more than ordinarily extended applause in sympathy for his present difficulties, changed his program several days ago to meet the problem of the reduced numbers and, also, the reduced capabilities of his orchestra. Instead of the "Symphonie fantastique" Berlioz still a taxing matter for even a virtuoso band, and a "concert ... for piano and full modern orchestra by John Alden Carpenter, not yet heard here, Mr. Monteux substituted the early Fourth Symphony of Beethoven and a number of Wagnerian pieces, mostly from the operas, and the burden of which falls very largely upon the string band alone.

Beethoven's B flat symphony attracts orchestral conductors very little in these days and there is considerable excuse for their hesitancies in the matter. Although the date of its completion is some two years later than that of the "Eroica," it nevertheless must have been "on the fire" before the latter. It sounds to-day very much as a study for the C minor and the A major symphonies, although, to be sure, it is distinctively the maturing Beethoven, it possesses a beautifully consistent cyclical quality and a wealth of striking and characteristic melodic invention.

Schumann, in one of his ebullient sentimentalisms, spoke of the Fourth Symphony as standing "like a slender Greek maiden between two Norse giants." Weber, at the other extreme of criticism, poked ironic fun at it. The slenderness alone in Schumann's dictum serves. It is no more Greek than a maze of Gothic flying buttresses. It is, indeed, full of rippling gayety, light-hearted and sometimes rather heavy-handed humor and a sparkling spontaneity. Its adagio alone strikes a deeper mood.

Mr. Monteux and his band, perhaps inevitably under the circumstances, were a long distance from doing the symphony anything like justice. It emerged in skeletonic impression and occasionally it became downright dull. One was inclined to believe that Mr. Monteux was himself most largely at fault in this result, for he was often at great pains to elongate tempi, to draw out phrases unduly, to attempt disturbing pauses, and thereby sparkle and spontaneity, gayety and humor were dissipated.

A Tschaikowsky Opera in the Offing

By WILLIAM R. MURRAY.

THE PROMISE FROM BOSTON.

With regard to the Boston Symphony's future the trustees have decided beyond peradventure of a doubt that there is no room for unionism in the orchestra. Perhaps Judge Cabot and his associates have been elevated in spirit by Governor Coolidge's handling of the Boston police strike, perhaps they may have been swayed to their opinion by the popular fallacy, long existent, that the premier position of the orchestra was laid in the foundations of non-unionism. The attitude of Thursday's audience in Carnegie Hall must have been as the sound of angelic harmonies in their ears; to a mere outsider the subscribers seemed to be charged with the belief that by their applause of Conductor Monteux and his faithful few they were scotching forever and ever the hideous head of an overzealous proletariat. Manager W. H. Brennan gave the newspaper representatives the assurance that, union or no union, the orchestra would go on, and the programs held inclosed slips requesting the subscriber to renew their faith against the season of 1920-1921.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

EAGLE
: Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTONIANS "IN PARVO"

Attenuated Orchestra Plays in Carnegie Hall—John Powell Talks for Publication.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra fulfilled all obligations to subscribers by giving last evening in Carnegie Hall are final concert in its Thursday series. With 34 players out on strike in sympathy with the recently deposed concertmaster, Frederic Fradkin, the orchestra was so attenuated that Conductor Monteux was obliged perforce to substitute Beethoven's Fourth Symphony for the more elaborated scheme of Berlioz's "Fantastic" and selections from the music-dramas of Richard Wagner for John Alden Carpenter's Concertino for piano and orchestra.

Apparently the organization tha played last evening lived on and b tradition. The cephalic color schem ran from gray to shining baldness, fo youth had fled to the ranks of or ganized labor. There were materia gaps in the stage grouping and mi sical holes in the quantitative valu of the string sections. Ten first vi lins and six double basses we counte an indication of a shortage of ma power that left an indelible effect the Wagner scoring, but almost gua anteed better Beethoven. By the n ture of the applause it was easy to s that the audience was out of symp thy with unionism. Applause, ho ever, wins no battles. The audier was the smallest we have ever seen a Boston Symphony concert.

EVENING JOURNAL
New York City
MAR 22 1920

HEIFETZ SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Orchestra Closes Sea son—Benno Moiseiwitsch an Germaine Schnitzer Play.

The season's concluding concerts the New York Symphony and t Boston orchestras on Saturday a Sunday wrote a gentle finis into t record. Pierre Monteux and l strike-reduced band perforce had re course to music largely within the milder idiom of the strings, whilst Walter Damrosch, not thus handicapped, nevertheless chose the simpler orchestral delights. It was rather curious commentary that both conductors, actuated toward the same ends, although from different motives, found Beethoven and Debussy much to their purpose.

The Boston Orchestra, for its ... urday matinee in Carnegie Hall, was occupied with the overture to Beethoven's "Fidelio," Mazart's G minor symphony, Borodin's "On the Steppes," an orchestral version by Henri Busser of Debussy's "Petite Suite," written for piano, and Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture. There were flashes of excellent playing throughout this program, but there were also numerous dry and sandy stretches, not all of which were located on the Borodinian steppes. Mr. Monteux attempted too much "reading" of Mozart; most conductors have discovered that the G minor symphony "sounds" best when most let alone. Perhaps Mr. Monteux will also some day make this discovery concerning it—and concerning many other matters.

From
EVENING WORLD,
New York City
MAR 2[illegible]

Heifetz Soloist At Symphony's Last Concert

By Sylvester Rawling.

So much of interest was crowded into the music of the week end that the proper perspective is not easy to find. Perhaps a brief word about the last subscription concert of the Symphony Society in Aeolian Hall yesterday afternoon should be said first, for, sticking to the topsy-turveydom at the close, the "Marseillaise" and the "Star Spangled Banner" weer played in rousing fashion, both as a farewell and as a preparation for the forthcoming European tour of the organization. The concert began with Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, interrupted after a few measures by some noisy ventilators which Mr. Damrosch knew would not be conducive to creating the "Cheerful Impressions Excited on Arriving in the Country." After a fresh start the symphony was played with fine spirit. Jascha Heifetz reaped salvos of applause and many recalls for his playing in the Glazounoff violin concerto, into which he put not only his usual techinacl skill and tonal perfection but something more than his wonted ardor and emotional warmth. It was a masterful performance, superbly sustained by Mr. Damrosch and the orchestra. The night before, in Carnegie Hall, soloist and orchestra had presented the same work.

The Boston Orchestra said farewell for the season at its concert in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. With its depleted numbers and its programme hastily improvised by Mr. Monteux, a review of the performance is unnecessary. All that may be expressed is a hope that the organization may remain intact—while deep down in our hearts is the fear that, come what may, Fradkins, or Monteux, or Karl Muchs, or labor unions—no matter where the trouble lies—never again may the world famous organization stand peerless. And while writing about big orchestras our New Symphony has applied for permission to change its name to the National. Already it has Artur Bodanzky for conductor, and next season it will take on William Menzelberg, the Hollande,r as another leader. There are rumors of a possible amalgamation of this, the latest orchestras, with the Philharmonic oldest, as old. in fact, as the ...nna Philharmonic.

Benno Moiseiwitsch, the pianist

From
EVENING WORLD,
New York City

Loyal Boston Orchestra Men In Last Concer

By Sylvester Rawling.

It was a depleted Boston Orch that faced its host of ever ful New York adherents in negie Hall last night. The in troubles which brought about t sertion of a third of its members been related in news despatches fro Boston. They were caused by a dis agreement between the conductor Mr. Monteux, and the concertmaster Mr. Fradkin; demands for higher salaries and the purpose of many of the players to join the Musical Union to which the trustees object. While the end is not yet, there is universal hope that a settlement will be reached by which the organization will remain intact; for the Boston Orchestra long has been regarded as the premier orchestra of America.

Mr. Monteux, who was cordially greeted, was forced to change last night's programme. Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony and John Alden Carpenter's concertina for piano and orchestra were abandoned. Beethoven's fourth symphony and several Wagner numbers being substituted for them. The symphony suffered little in exposition by the smaller orchestra, in fact, the performance of it was admirable. The same may be said of the playing of the "Lohengrin" prelude, "A Siegfried Idyll," and the forest murmurs from "Siegfried." The excerpts from "The Mastersingers," which came at the end, lacked something of sonority. While the applause of the audience was no over enthusiastic, the tense attention given to the Wagner works showed the grip that his red-blooded music maintains.

At to-morrow afternoon's concert, the last one of the New York season, there also will be a change of programme. Mozart's G major symphony will be played.

EVENING GLOBE
ess New York City

Music.

he Boston Symphony Conce —Other Music.

Owing to recent happenings in B n which have been referred to, tal uld seem, sufficiently, Pierre M hx, the conductor of the Boston mphony Orchestra, now seems to regarded by the usually somewhat athetic New York patrons of that ganization as a Joan of Arc. At y rate, upon his appearance on the atform of Carnegie Hall Saturday ternoon he was greeted with a rm of applause equivalent in quan to that which Sarah Bernhardt eives after a two years' absence m these shores. And after he had nducted Mozart's G minor sym ony, that music-tragedy of charm murder in a Watteau picture, he s recalled again and again to the e.

The programme was not the one ginally planned, owing, etc., and as turned out, had little weight aside m the Mozart symphony, although rodin's "On the Steppes of Central ia," somewhat in the manner of his teric dances in "Prince Igor," is ry lovely music. Debussy's "Petite ite," written for piano and orches ted by Henri Büsser, is in the nner of Victor Herbert's "Babes in yland" and not nearly as good, ile Goldmark's "Sakuntala" over re might profitably have a long t. There was further Beethoven's rth attempt at an overture to "Fi io." He should have been content h one of the others.

CITIZEN
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE.

Emmy Distinn Appears as Soloist at Academy of Music.

Brooklyn music lovers were given an excellent treat last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which closed its season at the Academy of Music with the last of a series of five philharmonic concerts. If any proof were needed of the high regard in which this orchestra is held here, one could gauge it simply by the fact that scarcely a single seat in the spacious Opera House was vacant. It showed that inclement weather such as prevailed last night, is not at all a determent factor when the musical thirst of Brooklynites is concerned.

Emmy Destinn, the famous soprano, was the soloist of the evening. She sang with such exquisite charm that the Academy fairly thundered with the applause that was showered upon her. Her numbers were: Aria, "Non mi dir," from Mogarth's "Don Giovanni;" two berceuses from "Hubicka," by Smetua, and a song from Dvorak's "Russalka."

Pierre Monteux conducted and he showed his skill to such perfection that the audience insisted on his taking several curtain calls. The numbers given by the orchestra were Beethoven's Four[illegible] (Wag tersi

From TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSIC EVENT

BOSTON SYMPHONY HE

With Emmy Destinn singing mi Dir" from "Don Giovann Beethoven's "Fourth in B Flat the symphony, the Boston Sym Orchestra bade farewell to Br for a year, at the Academy of last night. The audience was sized and the strike didn't seem to hav very disastrous effects upon the per formance.

Miss Destinn was in good voice an although her selections were not man they were well-rendered and well-re ceived. Her principal selection o course was the air from "Don Gio vanni." One would hardly call th opera the best of Mozart's composition and that the aria is the best of its in dividual numbers is not at all an axiom She also sang two berceuses from Sme tana's "Hubicka" and a song fro "Russalka" by Dvorak. None of thes melodies is highly distinguished, but o the other hand is conspicuous for ba musianship. At any rate the manne in which they were sung rendered the[illegible] adequate.

It may be said, however, that inte[illegible] centered about the orchest and its "strike-breakers." Many these were pensioners and considerin that the Beethoven symphony ough also be considered a pensioner of th city's concert stage, no difficulty wa encountered in the interpretation this very familiar number. Wagner "Siegfrried Idyll" was an old story als and nearly every Brooklyn sympho orchestra program this season has be blessed with "Die Meistersinger" in o form or another. Last night's bra was labeled "Excerpts from Act III," said excerpts being "The Introduction "Dance of the Apprentices" and "W come to Hans Sachs."

EAGLE
dress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

LAST BOSTON CONCERT

Attenuated Orchestra With Destinn as Soloist—Five Concerts Announced for Next Year.

Hope apparently runs high among the Cabots and Lowells and the other Boston gentlemen who "speak only with God," for despite all present difficulties the orchestra, according to last evening's Academy program, will give during next season its usual series of five Brooklyn concerts. The dates are Nov. 5, Dec. 3, Jan. 7, Feb. 4 and March 18, and subscriptions are to be secured through the Institute.

The attenuated band concluded its Brooklyn series by an excellent concert, but with a program revised to fit "strike" limitations. The symphony was Beethoven's in B-flat major, fourth of the immortal nine, composed for the small orchestra in vogue during the early days of the last century and therefore sounding altogether correct in last evening's playing. Its measures are in sympathy with Mr. Monteux's symphonic limitations, though one might have caviled with the dark, frequently opaque, color of the strings. Clarity of outline was missing in the scherzo and apparently the "ma non troppe" escaped the conductor's eye when he read the tempo description for the final movement. But the adagio was a joy. The band should not be criticized for shortcomings on the score of precision; these are the dog days of the Boston Symphony. The whole world, however, seems mad.

For the rest Emmy Destinn (now, it seems, to be called "Ema") sang arias in Czechish from Smetana's opera "Hubicka" and from one by Dvorak called "Russalka." She was not in the best of voice and often strident of tone, but there was the old familiar beauty in all passages calling for use of the mezzo voce. Later the s[illegible] f[illegible] o[illegible] Id[illegible] th[illegible]

EVENING JOURNAL
New York City

MONTEUX LEADS DEPLETED BAND FROM BOSTON

Difficult Programme Changed to Meet Capabilities of the Smaller Orchestra.

The shifting fortunes of the Boston Orchestra in the past three years have brought it new conductors and new men and consequently changed standards of performance, but the latest fortuitude to affect its lot has lopped off a third of its personnel and reduced it to a small band. It was this two-thirds of an orchestra that came to New York and gave the first of its final pair of concerts for this season in Carnegie Hall last evening. There was present a large audience, but it was nevertheless the smallest to attend a Boston Symphony concert in many and many a year. All of which could not fail to impress the thoughtful concertgoer somewhat sadly. Platitude is the comfortless refuge of reflection in such circumstances, but platitude will

Brooklyn, N. Y.

From
EVENING POST,
New York City
MAR 12[illegible]

Music

Henry T. Finck

Boston Symphony Pluck

Everybody likes pluck. For that reason the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, M. Monteux, were stormily greeted when they appeared in Carnegie Hall last night. Reduced in size, like an army after a battle, the orchestra fought its way to the favor of the audience, as usual, although, of course, not with the usual approach to ideal conditions. The story of its troubles need not be told again. More than thirty men had been dismissed because of union squabbles and insubordination. The orchestra was therefore not of the usual size, but some of the vacant places were filled by former members of the orchestra and by students from the New England Conservatory.

Under the circumstances a change of programme was deemed advisable. Beethoven's fourth symphony was played in a rather dull fashion, it must be said. It was a little surprising to find Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" on the programme; for, while that piece requires only a small orchestra, it needs the utmost polish to [illegible] its ravishing prismatic [illegible] prises, also a [illegible] Monteux [illegible] horn we[illegible] climax of [illegible] brasses [illegible] The forest [illegible] and excerp[illegible] ers" comple[illegible] an orchestra. And in Boston th[illegible] doubt very early in the of the orches[illegible] can this was the shadow of livable terms. But [illegible] been substance. Mæcenas, or a Medic[illegible] or whatever you ch[illegible]here was occasionally a certain hitting robustness to the shadow. The string tone, now based on ten first violins instead of sixteen, ever and anon gave evidence of the thing that had once existed, and one or two of the first wind instruments, notably the redoubtable oboe of Mr. Longy, were still of the old quality. But this was a crippled band and no good is to be accomplished by any attempt at palliation of the fact.

Pierre Monteux, the conductor, who, by the way, was greeted by more than ordinarily extended applause in sympathy for his present difficulties, changed his program several days ago to meet the problem of the reduced numbers and, also, the reduced capabilities of his orchestra. Instead of the "Symphonie fantastique" of Berlioz, still a taxing matter for even a virtuoso band, and a "concerti[illegible] for piano and full modern orchestra by John Alden Carpenter, not yet heard here, Mr. Monteux substituted the early Fourth Symphony of Beethoven and a number of Wagnerian pieces, mostly from the operas, and the burden of which falls very largely upon the string band alone.

Beethoven's B flat symphony attracts orchestral conductors very little in these days and there is considerable excuse for their hesitancies in the matter. Although the date of its completion is some two years later than that of the "Eroica," it nevertheless must have been "on the fire" before the latter. It sounds to-day very much as a study for the C minor and the A major symphonies, although, to be sure, it is distinctively the maturing Beethoven, it possesses a beautifully consistent cyclical quality and a wealth of striking and characteristic melodic invention.

Schumann, in one of his ebullient sentimentalisms, spoke of the Fourth Symphony as standing "like a slender Greek maiden between two Norse giants." Weber, at the other extreme of criticism, poked ironic fun at it. The slenderness alone in Schumann's dictum serves. It is no more Greek than a maze of Gothic flying buttresses. It is, indeed, full of rippling gayety, light-hearted and sometimes rather heavy-handed humor and a sparkling spontaneity. Its adagio alone strikes a deeper mood.

Mr. Monteux and his band, perhaps inevitably under the circumstances, were a long distance from doing the symphony anything like justice. It emerged in skeletonic impression and occasionally it became downright dull. One was inclined to believe that Mr. Monteux was himself most largely at fault in this result, for he was often at great pains to elongate tempi, to draw out phrases unduly, to attempt disturbing pauses, and thereby sparkle and spontaneity, gayety and humor were dissipated.

[illegible] Company [illegible] Brick dwelling at [illegible] Realty Trust sells one-family [illegible] Berlin, broker, asking price $500. [illegible] Ave., three fou[illegible] to 547 Linc[illegible] Ka-Land, C[illegible] Frank Berksh[illegible] ollent [illegible]

A Tschaikowsky Opera in the Offing

By WILLIAM B. MURRAY.

THE PROMISE FROM BOSTON.

With regard to the Boston Symphony's future the trustees have decided beyond peradventure of a doubt that there is no room for unionism in the orchestra. Perhaps Judge Cabot and his associates have been elevated in spirit by Governor Coolidge's handling of the Boston police strike, perhaps they may have been swayed to their opinion by the popular fallacy, long existent, that the premier position of the orchestra was laid in the foundations of non-unionism. The attitude of Thursday's audience in Carnegie Hall must have been as the sound of angelic harmonies in their ears; to a mere outsider the subscribers seemed to be charged with the belief that by their applause of Conductor Monteux and his faithful few they were scotching forever and ever the hideous head of an overzealous proletariat. Manager W. H. Brennan gave the newspaper representatives the assurance that, union or no union, the orchestra would go on, and the programs held included slips requesting the subscriber to renew their faith against the season of 1920-1921.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

From North American
Philadelphia, Pa.

MUZIO IN "TROVATORE"

EMMA DESTINN, WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY.

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, in the Academy next Wednesday evening, Emma Destinn, the famous Czecho-Slovak dramatic soprano, will be the soloist. She will sing "Non mi dir," the aria of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni." She will also sing operatic arias by the two great Bohemian composers, the Cradle Song from Smetana's "The Kiss" and the love song from Dvorak's "Russalka." Pierre Monteux will conduct Mozart's Symphony in G minor and Charpentier's descriptive suite, "Impressions

Inquirer
Philadelphia, Pa.

Destinn Boston Symphony Soloist

Appearing as soloist at the final Boston Symphony concert of the season to be given in the Academy of Music next Wednesday evening, March 17, Madame Emma Destinn, the most remarkable dramatic soprano of our time, will sing arias revealing two sides of her art and personality. "Non mi dir," the famous aria of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni," will recall one of the diva's most noted roles. Although America is her adopted land, Madame Destinn is by birth and blood affiliation a Czecho-Slovak. As such she will sing arias by the two great composers of Bohemia—the love song from Dvorak's Opera "Russalka," and the cradle song from Smetana's Opera "The

ESTABLISHED 1881
From News
Baltimore, Md.

Musicians

Emmy Destinn

Boston Symphony Concert.

Emmy Destinn, who was prevented by illness from filling her recital engagement here earlier in the season, will sing the "Non Mi Dir" aria, the Cradle Song from Smetana's "Hubicka" and an aria from Dvorak's "Russalka" when she appears with the Boston Symphony Tuesday evening. Monteux has selected Berlioz's

From Times
New York City

WITH THE ORCHESTRAS

Leopold Stokowski's fifth and final concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra here on Tuesday will present parts of Schubert's music to "Rosamunde," Henry Hadley's overture to "Othello," led by the composer, and the First Symphony of Brahms. Next season, eight visits to Carnegie Hall are planned from Oct. 26, 1920, to April 5, 1921.

Walter Damrosch has arranged Bach's suite in C for the Symphony Society in Aeolian Hall today, when Lucy Gates will sing a Mozart air and the Bell Song from "Lakmé." On Thursday Rosa Ponselle will sing airs from "Norma" and "Tannhäuser" at the last of Mr. Damrosch's midweek matinées in Carnegie Hall.

Josef Stransky has combined parts of Wagner's "Ring" to follow Brahms's First Symphony at the last but one of the Thursday evening Philharmonic concerts. At Friday's matinée, also last but one, there are Rubinstein's "Ocean" Symphony" and Debussy's "Faun."

Pierre Monteux will present two farewell Boston Symphony programs here next week. E. Robert Schmitz will play on March 18 in a concerto by John Alden Carpenter, while the matinée on March 20 will add "The Pauses of Silence," by an Italian composer, Malipiero.

From Tribune
New York City

Music in Newark

Making its first appearance in Newark in twelve years the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to the Newark Armory on Monday evening, March 22, under the management of Joseph A. Fuerstman. Grieg's concerto will be played by Rudolph Ganz, who will make his first appearance in Newark. "Violin nights" will be on April 3, when Ysaye and Elman will appear in recital, and April 7, when Jascha Heifetz will be the attraction. John McCormack ends the Fuerstman series on April 20.

rom EVENING SUN
ddress New York City
ate MAR -6 1920

A notable feature of the final Thursday evening concert of this season to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra March 18 will be the concer composer of the "Birthday of the Infanta"), which E. Robert Schmitz, the noted French pianist, will play with the orchestra. The other numbers will be Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

For the final matinee, Saturday, March 20, Pierre Monteux will conduct "Le Pause del Silenzio" ("The Pauses of Silence"), seven symphonic expressions by Malipiero, the revolutionary young Italian composer; also Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio," Mozart's symphony in G minor and Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy."

From Journal
Providence, R. I.
FEB 8 - 1920

Can it be that the stern New York critics, apparently resolved at the start of the season to consign Pierre Monteux and his Boston orchestra to metropolitan oblivion, have had a change of heart? One must so conclude from their reviews of the Boston organization's recent performances in the big city—or else Mr. Monteux is more variable in his work than Providence has found him. Almost uniformly the critics were enthusiastic, possibly because they noted that the audiences were. At any rate, there was evident a very notable increase of temperature in the warmth with which they praised him. Even Richard Aldrich tempered his suggestions with a certain sense of approval. James Huneker, moreover, went so far as to hint mysteriously at the fact that Monteux had "put one over" on them by proving better than they had determined to allow him to be. Mr. Huneker wrote:

"Mr. Monteux's musicianship was put to a stern test in the Brahms, and we do not hesitate to state that we have never heard him interpret a great symphony like this with such authority and sympathetic understanding. "Ce cher

Looking over the concert schedule of the various cities it becomes apparent that Boston composers are receiving recognition outside their home town. Within the same week the Philadelphia Orchestra played Mr. Gilbert's prologue to Synge's "Riders to the Sea." Mr. Damrosch included in the two concerts of the New York Symphony Orchestra Mr. Chadwick's tone-poem "Aphrodite" and the new "Caprice Basque" by Ferir, formerly the first viola player of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was played for the first time in New York.

Spirit Muse of Boston Symphony Pervades Baton of Leader and Puts Labor-Born Discord to Rout

That spirit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which years ago gained it the title of America's best polyphonic group, yesterday afternoon carried it to triumph amid difficulties. It was the farewell concert of the season at the National theater and the first tour concert since Boston music-lovers regarded, astonished, the throes of unionization and a strike through which it is passing.

As far as critics could learn, the orchestra yesterday was without a concert-master. Frederic Fradkin, the gifted first violin, was dismissed last week by Conductor Pierre Monteux for insurbordination and no one has been elevated to his place to the left of the leader.

Many Strikers in Group.

It was a heterogenous group that responded to M. Monteux's gestures. Of the 64 musicians out of a normal 96, a large part were union men who struck twice last week, according to accounts, but returned. Several were men whom age had led to retire from the orchestra years ago, but who returned to lend their aid when the organization was threatened with disruption. All gave the best that was in them, however, and appeared proud of what they had accomplished when seen in the dressing rooms afterward.

Trouble is Aggravated.

The orchestra's first strike, as the result of bitter opposition to unionization, saw nearly seventy men walk out. Of these, about thirty-six returned. Then the trouble was aggravated when Mr. Fradkin, who had signed up with the union, was curtly informed that he could no longer use the conductor's dressing-room, but must go with the men.

For his unflagging efforts to preserve the orchestral structure, M. Monteux was given a great ovation at a public rehearsal in Boston a few days later. At a wave of his baton all the musicians arose in response save M. Fradkin, the story goes. His summary dismissal for insubordination is said to have followed.

Mme. Emmy Destinn, yesterday's soloist, was brilliant.

Change in Program.

M. Monteux very wisely changed his program materially from the one previously announced, and if any criticism is due it would seem that there was to much of a dead level and a lack of any real brilliance until the final number.

The Symphony No. 4 in B-flat major of Beethoven, which has not been heard here previously in many a day, is a dainty affair and was well done, the first and third movements being particularly attractive. The orchestra's other numbers were "A Siegfried Idyll" and excerpts from Act III of "The Mastersingers," both by Wagner, the former being a type of composition always notably well done by the Boston Symphony.

RECORD
ess Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 1 - 1920

—Appearing as soloist at the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in the Academy of Music next Wednesday evening, Emma Destinn will sing "Non mi dir," the famous aria of Donna Anna, in Mozart's "Don Giovanni," and the love song from Dvorak's opera "Russalka" and the Cradle Song from Smetana's opera "The Kiss." Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Mozart's Symphony in G minor. Not the least attractive part of the program will be Charpentier's descriptive suite, "Impressions of Italy," which traverses a moonlight "Serenade," with a viola solo behind the stage; "At the Fountain," "On Muleback," "On the Summits," which is inspired by the scenic beauty of the country, and finally the glare and revelry of holiday in "Naples."

HERALD
s Washington, D. C.
MAR 14

EMMA DESTINN.

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, at the National Theater tomorrow afternoon, Madame Emma Destinn, soprano, will be the soloist. "Non mi dir," the famous aria of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni," will at his concert reveal one of the most beautiful moments in one of her most famous roles. Pierre Monteux will also conduct at the same concert Mozart's Symphony in G minor (Kochel No. 550), Beethoven's Overture to his only opera "Fidelio," and three movements from Charpentier's eventful suite, "Impressions of Italy."

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From EVENING STAR,
Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Tomorrow.

As soloist at the final Boston Sym concert of the season in t

New National Theater tomorrow a ernoon, Mme. Emmy Destinn, the gr dramatic soprano, will sing arias vealing two sides of her art and p sonality, "Non mi dir," the famo aria of Donna Anna in Mozart's "D Giovanni," and arias by the two gre composers of Bohemia, the love so from Dvorak's opera, "Russalka," a the "Cradle Song," from Smetan opera, "The Kiss."

Pierre Monteux will conduct "M zart's Symphony in G Minor" (Koch 550), matchless in charm and ly beauty; Beethoven's overture to only opera, "Fidelio," and three mo ments from Charpentier's suite, "I pressions of Italy"; "Serenade," d tinguished by a viola solo behind stage; "On Muleback" and "On Summits."

From Times
New York City

COMING MUSIC EVENTS.

The Letz Quartet will play at the Ri
Carlton on March 18 for the benefit the New York Home for Homeless Bo assisted by Harriet Van Emden, prano, pupil of Mme. Sembrich.

David and Leopold Mannes will give "father-and-son" recital for violin a piano at the Riverdale Country Schoo Riverdale-on-Hudson, in April. Th younger Mannes is a graduate of Rive dale and now an attendant at Harvar

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is appear in the Newark Armory on Mo day, March 22, assisted by Rudol
Ganz.

The New Symphony will end the se son by playing in May festivals at No folk, Va.; Macon, Ga., and Jackso ville, Fla.

Ten-Year Manhattan

om
Evening Public Ledger
hiladelphia, Pa.

Appearing as soloist at the final Boston Symphony Concert of the season to be given in the Academy of Music next Wednesday evening, Madame Emma Destinn will sing arias revealing two sides of her art and personality. "Non mi dir," the aria of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni," will recall one of the diva's roles. Although America is her adopted land, Madame Destinn is by birth and blood affiliation a Czecho-Slovak. As such she will sing arias by two great composers of Bohemia; the love-song from Dvorak's opera "Russalka," and the Cradle Song from Smetana's opera, "The Kiss."

Pierre Monteux will also conduct at this concert Mozart's symphony in G minor (Kochel 550). Not the least attractive part of the program will be Charpentier's descriptive suite, "Impressions of Italy."

From Press,
Philadelphia, Pa.

Appearing as soloist at the final Boston Symphony Concert of the season to be given in the Academy of Music next Wednesday evening, March 17, Madame Emma Destinn, the most remarkable dramatic soprano of our time, will sing arias revealing two sides of her art and personality. "Non mi dir," the famous aria of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni," will recall one of the diva's most noted roles. Although America is her adopted land, Madame Destinn is by birth and blood affiliation a Czecho-Slovak. As such she will sing arias by the two great composers of Bohemia: the love-song from Dvorak's opera, "Russalka," and the cradle song from Smetana's opera, "The Kiss."

Pierre Monteux will also conduct at this concert Mozart's symphony of the highest lyric beauty in G minor (Kochel 550). Not the least attractive part of the program will be Charpentier's descriptive suite "Impressions of Italy," which traverses a moonlight "Serenade," with a viola solo behind the stage; "At the Fountain," "On Muleback," "On the Summits," which is inspired by the scenic beauty of the country, and finally the glare and revelry the holiday in "Naples."

Dorothy

From Inquirer
Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 18

BOSTON SYMPHONY

An Interesting Concert With Madame Destinn as Soloist

Like Ophelia's funeral, with maimed rites, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, minus some score of players, gave a concert at the Academy of Music last evening. It was an interesting concert in many respects. Mme. Destinn was the soloist, and it is some years since she was heard here. Nor did the changes in the programme make it less appealing to many. Beethoven's fourth symphony was substituted for Mozart's in G minor (the Koechel), and "A Siegfried Idyll" and excerpts from "Die Meistersinger" replaced the Lenore No. 2 Overture and the Charpentier Italian suite, only recently heard here.

It would be idle to pretend that the strikers were not missed, particularly in the third and fourth movements of the symphony, and in the second Wagner number. Mr. Monteux conducted with elegance and finish, as always, but no daemonic energy manifested itself anywhere, and the men too often played as those without inspiration. The beauty of tone and expression reached in the exquisite adag o of the symphony, however, should not be overlooked. This work as a whole has unusual gayety and sprightliness. There was skill in the rendering of the "Siegfried Idyll," with its reminiscences of the familiar "Ring" themes. Of course such competent players as those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra cannot fail to give pleasure, even under adverse circumstances.

Mme. Destinn, who was warmly welcomed, sang a very beautiful cradle song from Smetana's opera, "The Kiss," and an aria from Dvorak's "Russalka," and afterwards the familiar "Non mi dir," from "Don Giovanni." Her voice has lost nothing of its richness, nor has her artistic skill diminished. It was a great pleasure to hear her again.

RECORD
ess Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Emma Destinn Heard as Soloist at Concluding Concert.

The revolution within the ranks of the Boston orchestra apparently acted as a stimulant to public curiosity since the audience attending the orchestra's fifth and last concert at the Academy of Music last night was one of the largest of the season. It would be impossible to say that the playing of the orchestra was of an excellence of regular form, although the program, which was changed from the Mozart G minor Symphony to the Beethoven B flat as well as in smaller offerings, was gone through so successfully that the applause was as great as on an evening of eventful playing. No doubt much of the insistent applause was in recognition of the surmounting of difficulties apparent in the orchestra's appearing at all. With 25 members of its regular personnel eliminated, the effort to organize, rehearse and play acceptably might well have daunted the bravest spirit. Pierre Monteux, however, seemed entirely equal to the occasion and did wonders in holding together his substitutes and in furnishing an entertaining concert.

The soloist was Emma Destinn, dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Miss Destinn's detention in Bohemia during the war made her return to the United States and reentry into opera one of the events of importance of this season. Her Bohemian songs, one by Smet and one by Dvorak last night were a genuine treat. The Cradle Song of Smetana was particularly effective. Miss Destinn was warmly received, being recalled many times.

IMES,
Washington, D. C.
s

Destinn With Boston Symphony.

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in the New National Theater on Monday afternoon, March 15, Madame Ema Destinn, the glorious-voiced soprano, who has held Metropolitan Opera audiences transfixed season after season, will be the soloist.

Escaping from the thick of troublous times in Czecho-Slovakia, her native country, she made herself the first star and idol of the Covent Garden Opera in London before returning to this, her adopted country. Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Mozart's delicately melodious symphony in G minor, one of his finest. For the rest, the following movements from Charpentier's sunny and realistic "Impressions of Italy"—the "Serenade," (with viola solo off the stage). "On Muleback," and "On the Summits." The afternoon will close with Beethoven's Overture to his opera "Fidelio."

To Be At Pol's.

om Times
New York City

BROOKLYN MUSIC.

Manager Swin of the Brooklyn Academy announces a program of Irish music with the picture, "Ireland a Nation," on St. Patrick's Day.

Emmy Destinn is the Boston Symphony's soloist for the last of its Brooklyn concerts at the Academy on Friday

INFORMATION OBSCURED

MAR 14 1920 K

From North American
Philadelphia, Pa.

MUZIO IN "TROVATORE"

MISS MME. DESTINN, WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY.

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, in the Academy next Wednesday evening, Emma Destinn, the famous Czecho-Slovak dramatic soprano, will be the soloist. She will sing "Non mi dir," the aria of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni." She will also sing operatic arias by the two great Bohemian composers, the Cradle Song from Smetana's "The Kiss" and the love song from Dvorak's "Russalka." Pierre Monteux will conduct Mozart's Symphony in G minor and Charpentier's descriptive suite, "Impressions of Italy."

Inquirer
Philadelphia, Pa.

Destinn Boston Symphony Soloist

Appearing as soloist at the final Boston Symphony concert of the season to be given in the Academy of Music next Wednesday evening, March 17, Madame Emma Destinn, the most remarkable dramatic soprano of our time, will sing arias revealing two sides of her art and personality. "Non mi dir," the famous aria of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni," will recall one of the va's most noted roles. Although merica is her adopted land, Madame estinn is by birth and blood affiliation Czecho-Slovak. As such she will ng arias by the two great composers Bohemia—the love song from Dvor-k's Opera "Russalka," and the cradle ng from Smetana's Opera "The

ABLISHED 1881

rom
News
Baltimore, Md.

Musicians

Emmy Destinn

Boston Symphony Concert.

Emmy Destinn, who was prevente by illness from filling her recital engagement here earlier in the season, will sing the "Non Mi Dir" aria, the Cradle Song from Smetana's "Hubicka" and an aria from Dvorak's "Russalka" when she appears with the Boston Symphony Tuesday evening. Monteux has selected Berlioz's ...astic Symphony, a work of

From Times
New York City

WITH THE ORCHESTRAS

Leopold Stokowski's fifth and fin concert of the Philadelphia Orchest here on Tuesday will present parts Schubert's music to "Rosamunde, Henry Hadley's overture to "Othello, led by the composer, and the First Sym phony of Brahms. Next season, eigh visits to Carnegie Hall are planne from Oct. 26, 1920, to April 5, 1921.

Walter Damrosch has arranged Bach' suite in C for the Symphony Society i Aeolian Hall today, when Lucy Gate will sing a Mozart air and the Bell Son from "Lakmé." On Thursday Ros Ponselle will sing airs from "Norma and "Tannhäuser" at the last of M Damrosch's midweek matinées in Ca negie Hall.

Josef Stransky has combined parts Wagner's "Ring" to follow Brahms First Symphony at the last but one the Thursday evening Philharmonic con certs. At Friday's matinée, also las but one, there are Rubinstein's "Ocea Symphony" and Debussy's "Faun."

Pierre Monteux will present two farewell Boston Symphony programs here next week. E. Robert Schmitz will play on March 18 in a concerto by John Alden Carpenter, while the matinée on March 20 will add "The Pauses of Silence," by an Italian composer, Malipiero.

From
Tribune
New York City

Music in Newark

Making its first appearance in Newark in twelve years the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to the Newark Armory on Monday evening, March 22, under the management of Joseph A. Fuerstman. Grieg's concerto will be played by Rudolph Ganz, who will make his first appearance in Newark. "Violin nights" will be on April 3, when Ysaye and Elman will appear in recital, and April 7, when Jascha Heifetz will be the attraction. John McCormack ends the Fuerstman series on April 20.

rom EVENING SUN
ddress New York City
ate MAR 6 1920

A notable feature of the final Thursday evening concert of this season to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra March 18 will be the concer tino by John Alden Carpenter (th composer of the "Birthday of the Infanta"), which E. Robert Schmitz, the noted French pianist, will play with the orchestra. The other numbers will be Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

For the final matinee, Saturday, March 20, Pierre Monteux will conduct "Le Pause del Silenzio" ("The Pauses of Silence"), seven symphonic expressions by Malipiero, the revolutionary young Italian composer; also Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio," Mozart's symphony in G minor and Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy."

From
Journal
Providence, R. I.

FEB 8

Can it be that the stern New York critics, apparently resolved at the start of the season to consign Pierre Monteux and his Boston orchestra to metropolitan oblivion, have had a change of heart? One must so conclude from their reviews of the Boston organization's recent performances in the big city—or else Mr. Monteux is more variable in his work than Providence has found him. Almost uniformly the critics were enthusiastic, possibly because they noted that the audiences were. At any rate, there was evident a very notable increase of temperature in the warmth with which they praised him. Even Richard A'drich tempered his suggestions with a certain sense of approval. James Huneker, moreover, went so far as to hint mysteriously at the fact that Monteux had "put one over" on them by proving better than they had determined to allow him to be. Mr. Huneker wrote:

"Mr. Monteux's musicianship was put to a stern test in the Brahms, and we do not hesitate to state that we have never heard him interpret a great symphony like this with such authority and sympathetic understanding. "Ce cher

Looking over the concert schedule of the various cities it becomes apparent that Boston composers are receiving recognition outside their home town. Within the same week the Philadelphia Orchestra played Mr. Gilbert's prologue to Synge's "Riders to the Sea," Mr. Damrosch included in the two concerts of the New York Symphony Orchestra Mr. Chadwick's tone-poem "Aphrodite" and the new "Caprice Basque" by Ferir, formerly the first viola player of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was played for the first time in New York.

Spirit Muse of Boston Symphony Pervades Baton of Leader and Puts Labor-Born Discord to Rout

That spirit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which years ago gained it the title of America's best polyphonic group, yesterday afternoon carried it to triumph amid difficulties. It was the farewell concert of the season at the National theater and the first tour concert since Boston music-lovers regarded, astonished, the throes of unionization and a strike through which it is passing.

As far as critics could learn, the orchestra yesterday was without a concert-master. Frederic Fradkin, the gifted first violin, was dismissed last week by Conductor Pierre Monteux for insurbordination and no one has been elevated to his place to the left of the leader.

Many Strikers in Group.

It was a heterogenous group that responded to M. Monteux's gestures. Of the 64 musicians out of a normal 96, a large part were union men who struck twice last week, according to accounts, but returned. Several were men whom age had led to retire from the orchestra years ago, but who returned to lend their aid when the organization was threatened with disruption. All gave the best that was in them, however, and appeared proud of what they had accomplished when seen in the dressing rooms afterward.

Trouble is Aggravated.

The orchestra's first strike, as the result of bitter opposition to unionization, saw nearly seventy men walk out. Of these, about thirty-six returned. Then the trouble was aggravated when Mr. Fradkin, who had signed up with the union, was curtly informed that he could no longer use the conductor's dressing-room, but must go with the men.

For his unflagging efforts to preserve the orchestral structure, M. Monteux was given a great ovation at a public rehearsal in Boston a few days later. At a wave of his baton all the musicians arose in response save M. Fradkin, the story goes. His summary dismissal for insubordination is said to have followed.

Mme. Emmy Destinn, yesterday's soloist, was brilliant.

Change in Program.

M. Monteux very wisely changed his program materially from the one previously announced, and if any criticism is due it would seem that there was to much of a dead level and a lack of any real brilliance until the final number.

The Symphony No. 4 in B-flat major of Beethoven, which has not been heard here previously in many a day, is a dainty affair and was well done, the first and third movements being particularly attractive. The orchestra's other numbers were "A Siegfried Idyll" and excerpts from Act III of "The Mastersingers" both by Wagner, the former being a type of composition always notably well done by the Boston Symphony.

RECORD
ess Philadelphia, Pa.

—Appearing as soloist at the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in the Academy of Music next Wednesday evening, Emma Destinn will sing "Non mi dir," the famous aria of Donna Anna, in Mozart's "Don Giovanni," and the love song from Dvorak's opera "Russalka" and the Cradle Song from Smetana's opera "The Kiss." Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Mozart's Symphony in G minor. Not the least attractive part of the program will be Charpentier's descriptive suite, "Impressions of Italy," which traverses a moonlight "Serenade," with a viola solo behind the stage; "At the Fountain," "On Muleback," "On the Summits," which is inspired by the scenic beauty of the country, and finally the glare and revelry of holiday in "Naples."

HERALD
s Washington, D. C.

EMMA DESTINN.

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, at the National Theater tomorrow afternoon, Madame Emma Destinn, soprano, will be the soloist. "Non mi dir," the famous aria of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni," will at his concert reveal one of the most beautiful moments in one of her most famous roles. Pierre Monteux will also conduct at the same concert Mozart's Symphony in G minor (Kochel No. 550), Beethoven's Overture to his only opera "Fidelio," and three movements from Charpentier's eventful suite, "Impressions of Italy."

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
EVENING STAR,
Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Tomorrow.

As soloist at the final Boston Sym concert of the season in th

New National Theater tomorrow a ernoon, Mme. Emmy Destinn, the gr dramatic soprano, will sing arias vealing two sides of her art and p sonality. "Non mi dir," the famo aria of Donna Anna in Mozart's "D Giovanni," and arias by the two gre composers of Bohemia, the love so from Dvorak's opera, "Russalka," a the "Cradle Song," from Smetan opera, "The Kiss."

Pierre Monteux will conduct "M zart's Symphony in G Minor" (Koch 550), matchless in charm and ly beauty; Beethoven's overture to only opera, "Fidelio," and three mo ments from Charpentier's suite, "I pressions of Italy"; "Serenade," tinguished by a viola solo behind stage; "On Muleback" and "On Summits."

From Times
New York City

COMING MUSIC EVENTS.

The Letz Quartet will play at the Ri Carlton on March 18 for the benefit the New York Home for Homeless Bo assisted by Harriet Van Emden, prano, pupil of Mme. Sembrich.

David and Leopold Mannes will give "father-and-son" recital for violin a piano at the Riverdale Country Schoo Riverdale-on-Hudson, in April. T younger Mannes is a graduate of Rive dale and now an attendant at Harvar

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is appear in the Newark Armory on Mo day, March 22, assisted by Rudol Ganz.

The New Symphony will end the se son by playing in May festivals at No folk, Va.; Macon, Ga., and Jackso ville, Fla.

Ten-Year Manhattan

om
Evening Public Ledger
hiladelphia, Pa.

Appearing as soloist at the final Boston Symphony Concert of the season to be given in the Academy of Music next Wednesday evening, Madame Emmy Destinn will sing arias revealing two sides of her art and personality. "Non mi dir," the aria of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni," will recall one of the diva's roles. Although America is her adopted land, Madame Destinn is by birth and blood affiliation a Czecho-Slovak. As such she will sing arias by two great composers of Bohemia; the love-song from Dvorak's opera "Russalka," and the Cradle Song from Smetana's opera, "The Kiss."

Pierre Monteux will also conduct at this concert Mozart's symphony in G minor (Kochel 550). Not the least attractive part of the program will be Charpentier's descriptive suite, "Impressions of Italy."

From
Press,
Philadelphia, Pa.

* * *

Appearing as soloist at the final Boston Symphony Concert of the season to be given in the Academy of Music next Wednesday evening, March 17, Madame Emma Destinn, the most remarkable dramatic soprano of our time, will sing arias revealing two sides of her art and personality. "Non mi dir," the famous aria of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni," will recall one of the diva's most noted roles. Although America is her adopted land, Madame Destinn is by birth and blood affiliation a Czecho-Slovak. As such she will sing arias by the two great composers of Bohemia: the love-song from Dvorak's opera, "Russalka," and the cradle song from Smetana's opera, "The Kiss."

Pierre Monteux will also conduct at this concert Mozart's symphony of the highest lyric beauty in G minor (Kochel 550). Not the least attractive part of the program will be Charpentier's descriptive suite "Impressions of Italy," which traverses a moonlight "Serenade," with a viola solo behind the stage; "At the Fountain," "On Muleback," "On the Summits," which is inspired by the scenic beauty of the country, and finally, the glare and revelry the holiday in "Naples."

* * *

Dorothy

nquirer
Philadelphia, Pa.

MAR

BOSTON SYMPHONY

An Interesting Concert With Madame Destinn as Soloist

Like Ophelia's funeral, with maimed rites, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, minus some score of players, gave a concert at the Academy of Music last evening. It was an interesting concert in many respects. Mme. Destinn was the soloist, and it is some years since she was heard here. Nor did the changes in the programme make it less appealing to many. Beethoven's fourth symphony was substituted for Mozart's in G minor (the Koechel), and "A Siegfried Idyll" and excerpts from "Die Meistersinger" replaced the Lenore No. 2 Overture and the Charpentier Italian suite, only recently heard here.

It would be idle to pretend that the strikers were not missed, particularly in the third and fourth movements of the symphony, and in the second Wagner number. Mr. Monteux conducted with elegance and finish, as always, but no daemonic energy manifested itself anywhere, and the men too often played as those without inspiration. The beauty of tone and expression reached in the exquisite adagio of the symphony, however, should not be overlooked. This work as a whole has unusual gayety and sprightliness. There was skill in the rendering of the "Siegfried Idyll," with its reminiscences of the familiar "Ring" themes. Of course such competent players as those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra cannot fail to give pleasure, even under adverse circumstances.

Mme. Destinn, who was warmly welcomed, sang a very beautiful cradle song from Smetana's opera, "The Kiss," and an aria from Dvorak's "Russalka," and afterwards the familiar "Non mi dir," from "Don Giovanni." Her voice has lost nothing of its richness, nor has her artistic skill diminished. It was a great pleasure to hear her again.

RECORD
ess Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Emma Destinn Heard as Soloist at Concluding Concert.

The revolution within the ranks of the Boston orchestra apparently acted as a stimulant to public curiosity since the audience attending the orchestra's fifth and last concert at the Academy of Music last night was one of the largest of the season. It would be impossible to say that the playing of the orchestra was of an excellence of regular form, although the program, which was changed from the Mozart G minor Symphony to the Beethoven B flat as well as in smaller offerings, was gone through so successfully that the applause was as great as on an evening of eventful playing. No doubt much of the insistent applause was in recognition of the surmounting of difficulties apparent in the orchestra's appearing at all. With 25 members of its regular personnel eliminated, the effort to organize, rehearse and play acceptably might well have daunted the bravest spirit. Pierre Monteux, however, seemed entirely equal to the occasion and did wonders in holding together his substitutes and in furnishing an entertaining concert.

The soloist was Emma Destinn, dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Miss Destinn's detention in Bohemia during the war made her return to the United States and reentry into opera one of the events of importance of this season. Her Bohemian songs, one by Smet and one by Dvorak last night were a genuine treat. The Cradle Song of Smetana was particularly effective. Miss Destinn was warmly received, being recalled many times.

IMES,
Washington, D. C.
s

...Schmack.

Destinn With Boston Symphony.

At the final Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in the New National Theater on Monday afternoon, March 15, Madame Ema Destinn, the glorious-voiced soprano, who has held Metropolitan Opera audiences transfixed season after season, will be the soloist.

Escaping from the thick of troublous times in Czecho-Slovakia, her native country, she made herself the first star and idol of the Covent Garden Opera in London before returning to this, her adopted country. Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Mozart's delicately melodious symphony in G minor, one of his finest. For the rest, the following movements from Charpentier's sunny and realistic "Impressions of Italy"—the "Serenade" (with viola solo off the stage). "On Muleback," and "On the Summits." The afternoon will close with Beethoven's Overture to his opera "Fidelio."

Tetrazzini To Be At Poli's.

om Times
New York City

BROOKLYN MUSIC.

Manager Swin of the Brooklyn Academy announces a program of Irish music with the picture, "Ireland a Nation," on St. Patrick's Day.

Emmy Destinn is the Boston Symphony's soloist for the last of its Brooklyn concerts at the Academy on Friday evening.

om
ress,
Philadelphia, Pa.

DEPLETED BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SEASON IN THIS CITY

Program Curtailed and Concert Far From Being Great Success, Owing Largely to Absence of Some of the Better String Players—Ema Destinn Is Disappointing.

BY CLARENCE K. BAWDEN.

A somewhat depleted Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its final concert of the current season in the Academy of Music, last night. Since the recent dissension among the players and the departure of some of the more important members, there was some curiosity as to how the orchestra would play last night.

The management realized the uncertainty of the adventure, as was reflected in the program that was originally announced—a program that could have been performed with quite a small orchestra. But matters were somewhat adjusted; a few additions to the string section (which, after all, was the only choir seriously affected) and a patching up of the trumpets, made it possible to change from the originally announced program.

Fortunately the visicitudes through which the orchestra has been passing has not seriously affected the playing of the concrete organization. Save for a few isolated places, the performance of the men last night measured up to a high standard. Perhaps the players felt that it was incumbent upon them to atone for the absence of some of the better string players; at any rate the loss of the former concertmeister and several of his sympathizers was not phonically apparent—except, of course, in volume, which can be easily remedied.

In the string section there were but ten firsts, nine seconds, nine violas, seven 'cllos and six bassos. This was ample for the symphony, but it was in the Wagner numbers that the meagerness of string tone was felt, especially in the Meistersinger excerpt, when the brasses all but completely submerged the poor fiddles.

The program opened with the Beethoven B flat symphony No. 4. Mr. Monteux gave a conventional reading to the first three movements, but he surely did speed up the final movement—and the impression was one of exhileration. The other orchestral numbers were from Wagner, the "Siegfried Idyll" and two excerpts from the third act of the "Mastersingers," the Dance of the Apprentices and the Welcome to Hans Sachs.

In the first part of the "Siegfried Idyll" Mr. Monteux failed to imbue the music with that wonderful languorous charm with which it may be interpreted; the tempo was unbending and the impression one of inflexibility, the requisite "mood" was missing. As the "Idyll" progressed the interpretation became more sympathetic, but we sense the need of a different mental attitude on the Boston conductor through much of this beautiful orchestral composition.

The "Mastersinger" excerpts were quite an improvement upon the "Idyll"; we are happy to find that Mr. Monteux can read aright the psychology of a Wagner score. In this "Mastersinger" music the excellence of the brasses was noted, the embouchure firm and the tonal quality fine and unwavering.

The soloist of the concert was Ema Destinn—or is it Emmy—or is it Destinova? At one time—and it is only a few years ago—Emmy Destinn was rightfully considered one of the great sopranos of the world. But alas and alack, something has happened—and Ema Destinn is not the Emmy Destinn of a few years ago. The quality of her voice has changed, it seems an effort for her to sing, and oftimes she is woefully out of tune. Only in mezzo voce work is one reminded of the surpassing singer of days gone by. What has caused this lamentable change? Can it be the orbicular anatomy? In all earnestness we urge Ema Destinn to make desperate efforts to regain her former lack of averdupois—for we fear the trouble lies therein.

The soloist's first selection was a group of two Bohemian excerpts, a cradle song from Smetana's opera, "The Kiss," and Russalk's song from Dvorak's opera, "Russalka." The former had a charming ending—a seemingly uncompleted close on the dominant chord. The second appearance of the soprano was to sing the Mozart aria, "Non mi die," from Don Giovanni.

In this aria Destinn was heard to better advantage; in the first place, the Itlian words brought out much more pleasant sounds than the Bohemian text, and the singer seemed more comfortable than in the earlier songs.

Altogether the concert might not have been considered a huge success. It was unfortunate that Mr. Monteux's first season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should close with a lack of brilliance.

om MAR 18 1920 E
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN CLOSING CONCERT

Effects of Recent Trouble Apparent in Work of the Organization

mphony No. 4 ..... Beethoven ndulka's Cradle Song ..... Smetana salk's Song ..... Dvorak
Ema Destinn
frried's Idyll ..... Wagner citative and aria from "Don Giovanni." Mozart
Ema Destinn
erpts from Act III of "Meistersinger." Wagner

The Boston Symphony Orchestra ed its current season in Philadelia with its fifth concert last evening. is hardly fair to demand the usual ndards of orchestral playing to an hestra so "shot to pieces" as the ston organization was last evening, the entire aggregation numbered only ut sixty men and therefore there lacking the tone color and the volne necessary in the Wagnerian numrs, as well as that warm richness ich can only be obtained by a large well-trained body of strings.

The "revolt," if so serious a word y be used over the unionization mix-, has cost the Boston Orchestra about rty men, nearly all among the strings. ere has been the loss of the contrasoon and one of the first trumpets, t outside of this the reed and brass tions are practically intact; the ings, however, have suffered severely, among the older players to go being Otto Roth and A. Bak, two of the oldest of the first violins in point of service. Last evening the first violins numbered ten, against a normal number of sixteen; the seconds nine, normal twelve; violas nine, normal ten; cellos seven, normal ten, and basses six, normal eight. Owing doubtless to the small number of strings, the orchestra brought along on the trip only two of each of the reeds, instead of four, as had been customary, and four horns instead of eight. Ten former members of the orchestra came to the directors and volunteered their services to tide over the crisis.

Under these circumstances and with the natural feeling of unrest that must pervade the organization, in view of the happenings of the last few weeks, a concert of the ordinary merit was not to be expected, and it was not given. Mr. Monteux has changed the program at the last moment, substituting the Beethoven Symphony No. 4 for the Mozart G minor and the Wagner numbers in place of the Fidelio Overture and the Charpentier "Impressions of Italy."

The orchestra played in the spasmodic style of an organization which has just passed through a mental cyclone, and it was apparent that the events of the very recent past have not been without effect upon Mr. Monteux as well, for his readings were routine and his conducting uncertain. However, when it is considered what the orchestra has gone through in the last two weeks, it did pretty well at that.

Ema Destinn, which seems to be the latest spelling of the much-orthographized name of the famous Czecho-Slovak prima donna, was the soloist of the evening. She sang first two songs of the great Bohemian composers, Smetana and Dvorak, both highly uninteresting selections, but well performed. Her second appearance was in the recitative and the aria "Non mi dir," from "Don Giovanni," and in it she did some fine singing and artistic interpretation, rising in places to the highest musical levels of the evening.

rom MAR 19 E
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

The young Italian barber who daily removes the stubble from the genial face of Arthur Judson, manager of the Philadelphia Orchestra, is not only a great talker, like many other tonsorialists, but, according to Mr. Judson, he is also an astute philosopher and profound psychologist.

Last week when the newspapers carried dispatches to the effect that one-third of the Boston Orchestra had gone on strike young Giuseppe was thoroughly posted in advance in order to give Mr. Judson a "line of talk" in which he might be interested.

After discussing the pros and cons of the Boston musicians' action, Giuseppe dismissed the subject by exclaiming:

"Ah, Mr. Juds', you oughta know da feelin's da playa da fidd' dey only g[et] [sa]lfin [fo]r—nut!"

107 Mass Ave

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.
(ORIGINAL)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From
Theatre Magazine
New York City

The Voices of the Singers

WELCOME, George Hamlin. The distinguished American tenor drew himself out of the obscurity of his busy studios, and gave a recital which made his audience wonder why he was so sparing of his vocal pearls. Singers ought to study the Hamlin program-architecture. He is a draughtsman of the first rank; he makes climaxes and he makes dramatic pauses!

First of the month's singers, among the women, I would place Leonora Sparkes, who might be described as a parcel of charm, with a voice that is purity personified. She sings gloriously and interprets her songs with a prodigality of voice and manner which spurs the imaginations of her listeners to better thinking and feeling. I do not put her first because she is the best singer. No, indeed, there were Destinn and Fremstad. But Sparkes has such a manner about her, that her recitals are a delight. Ethel Frank and a group of Boston Symphony men made a memorable recital. Inez Barbour, the wife of Henry Hadley, faced a large audience and convinced them that she is an artist who deserves the widest kind of recognition.

The Orchestras

THEN we had orchestras. I take a deep gulp and try to give you in a sentence the story of the performances of the New York Symphony Society and the Philharmonic. The latter gave a notable performance of Sibelius' "Finlandia," which, under Stransky's unusually inspired baton, was a marvelous piece of work. The Boston organization under Monteux have developed into something which they were not. Some are happy and some are sorry to see that the classics are giving way to modern offerings. If the Boston Orchestra is not the place for really worthy modern music where can it go? And yet, is it fair to the regular audience which is not up to the whimsicalities and temperament and outlandishness of Debussy's "Jeux," to give that composition? It seems to me, as much as I like it, that the score belongs first in lesser organizations where some may become acquainted and coached. Max Jacobs, with his Orchestral Society, was aided by Thibaud and Marguerite Namara, of whose voice too much cannot be said. It has grown into a classical example of perfect timbre.

splendid unanimity in attack and in the execution of difficult passage work.

Jean Bedetti, the orchestra's first 'cellist, made his Providence debut in the Haydn D-major concerto. He was apparently nervous, but overcame any such feeling he may have had after the first movement. He is a player of romantic or temperamental style and made quite a sensation. The concerto is showy and gives the player a chance to sing in melody as well as scintillate technically. Mr. Bedetti did both. The last two movements showed him at his best. A searching, soulful tone and a certain sentimentalism in phrasing marked the melodic portions, and bowing featured the finale. He was given an ovation, being recalled three times.

From
Bulletin MAR 18 1920 E
Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony

Final Concert of Season, With Ema Destinn as Soloist

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra returned last evening for its fifth and final concert of the season, at the Academy of Music. There was the usual large audience which showed with marked cordiality its appreciation of an interesting, if not particularly notable program, with Ema Destinn, soprano, as the soloist.

The program was considerably changed from that originally announced, the symphony being the No. 4 in B flat major, Op. 60, of Beethoven, instead of Mozart's G minor, while two Wagner selections were substituted for the "Fidelio" overture of Beethoven and Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy." Only the numbers allotted to Mme. Destinn were the ones announced, and even these were changed in their order, songs by Smetana and Dvorak being sung first, the recitative and aria from "Don Giovanni," Mozart, coming second, instead of in the reverse order, as printed on the program.

It can scarcely be said that the Boston orchestra's last concert of the season was its best. The recent upheaval, resulting in the dismissal of M. Fradkin, the concertmaster, and some other changes in the personnel, has not improved the quality of the music. To the contrary, there were evidences of change in more than one part of the performance, some raggedness and tonal deficiencies as compared with many previous concerts. But there was much fine playing also. The fourth is perhaps the least familiar of Beethoven's nine symphonies, and it is not the most inspired nor the most melodious. The adagio is the most like the real Beethoven, and the finale reaches a height of musical expression, but as a whole the work pales in comparison with the fifth and several—or all—of the others.

Pierre Monteux strengthened the good impression he formerly had made as the new permanent conductor of the orchestra. He showed his capability, added to a suave manner and ingratiating presence, in his reading of the symphony, and won new laurels in his conducting of the Wagnerian numbers, the "Siegfried Idyll" and Dance of the Apprentices and Welcome to Hans Sachs, from "Die Meistersingers." The new concertmaster of the orchestra, J. Theodorowicz, made a decidedly favorable impression. He is a tall, dark man, who fills his important position with capability, dignity and unobtrusiveness.

In addition to the other changes, as mentioned, Mme. Destinn announced another variation on her name. Originally she was Emmy Destinn, then Emmy Destinova—now she is Ema Destinn. But, whatever she decides to be called, the Bohemian soprano is a distinguished singer. While having added considerable in the way of avoirdupois, that she did not need, Destinn still has vivacity, and after each of her numerous recalls tripped off the stage in a joyous, captivating manner. Her voice is as vibrant and brilliant as ever, most remarkable for its dramatic quality, particularly the high tones, with some middle and lower ones that are harsh and at times almost unpleasant. She was at her best in the cradle songs from Smetana's opera, "Hubicka," (The Kiss), in which there was some beautiful pianissimo work, though the Mozart aria showed more of her real distinction as a dramatic singer.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Except for rear rows in the top gallery, the seating capacity of the Academy was taken fully last night to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux. In the midst of the painful and trying period of reconstruction, for a body of players first disrupted by the world war, and now shot to pieces again in civil strife, there must be sympathy if the orchestra seems a melancholy ruin of its one-time greatness, the shell without the soul.

The sad remainder was for part of the time amazingly good, though the Siegfried Idyll of Wagner, that should have resounded with the joy of the influx of the springtide, was listless and dispirited, compared with the exultant proclamation of the days of old.

The program, too, had been rebuilt, and it began with Beethoven's Fourth symphony instead of Mozart in G minor. The heavy brasses had been withdrawn, as Beethoven's score does not ask for them, and that made the orchestra look smaller than ever till the next music brought them on. At best, there were many vacancies in the roster, which told heavily on the tone of the strings in particular, and the depletion was melancholy to contemplate, though Theodoronicz is a careful concertmaster, and such veterans as Schroeder and Longy still remind us of the dignity of their art and their heritage.

Parts of act III of "The Mastersingers" also were played, and the string and coherent chords of the brasses at the close were the best instrumental work of an orchestra that, on the whole, has gone from Muck to mush.

Into the post-mortem atmosphere Ema Destinn, as she now is known, brought enlivening contributions—cradle song, from Smetana's "Hubicka," beautifully given, with a final note that exquisitely tapered into silence; somewhat consonantal and nasal interpretation of a lyric from Dvorak's "Russalka," and an aria from Mozart's "Don Giovanni." Those things, done with insight and feeling, went far to relieve the tedium of a singularly lusterless concert.

rom
Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md. 128

DESTINN TO SING WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Orchestra Will Also Present Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony And Wagner's Overture.

At the season's final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given at the Lyric this evening, Mme. Ema Destinn, dramatic soprano will be the soloist. She will sing arias revealing two sides of her art.

Her first number will be "Non mi dir," the famous aria of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni." Although America is her adopted country, Mme. Destinn is a Czecho-Slovak. She will also sing arias by two great composers of her native land, the love song from Dvorak's opera "Russalka" and the cradle song from Smetana's opera, "The Kiss."

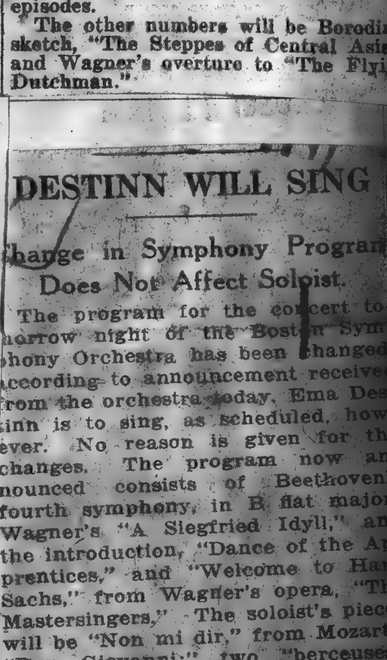
Pierre Monteux, the conductor, has chosen Berlioz's famous fantastic symphony, which is supposed to have been inspired by the composer's love story. "A Ball," "A Pastoral Scene," "The March to the Scaffold" and the orgy of the "Witches' Sabbath" are some of the episodes.

The other numbers will be Borodin's sketch, "The Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

DESTINN WILL SING

Change in Symphony Program Does Not Affect Soloist.

The program for the concert tomorrow night of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been changed, according to announcement received from the orchestra today, Ema Destinn is to sing, as scheduled, however. No reason is given for the changes. The program now announced consists of Beethoven's fourth symphony, in B flat major; Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyll," and the introduction, "Dance of the Apprentices," and "Welcome to Hans Sachs," from Wagner's opera, "The Mastersingers." The soloist's pieces will be "Non mi dir," from Mozart's "Don Giovanni;" two "berceuses" from "The Kiss," by Smetena, and a song from "Rusalka," by Dvorak.



EMMY DESTINN

Mme. Destinn will be the soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening at the Lyric.

SUN
Baltimore, Md.
MAR 1 * 1920 E

TO GIVE FINAL CONCERT

APPEARING as soloist at the final Boston Symphony Concert of the season, to be given in the Lyric Theatre Tuesday evening, Mme. Ema Destinn, dramatic soprano, will sing arias, revealing two sides of her art and personality. "Non mi dir," the famous aria of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni," will recall one of the most noted roles. Although America her adopted land, Mme. Destin is birth and blood affiliation a Czecho-Slovak. As such she will sing arias the two great composers of Bohemia the love song from Dvorak's opera "Russalka" and the cradle song from Smetana's opera "The Kiss."

Pierre Monteux will conduct at same concert Berlioz's famous fa symphony, which was inspired his now historical love story. scribes the "Dreams and Passio the composer, "A Ball," a "P Scene," "The March to the Sca and the orgy of the "Witches' Sab The performance of the work in was generally conceded one of the achievements of the season. The numbers will be Borodin's sketch Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

om
ress,
Philadelphia, Pa.

DEPLETED BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SEASON IN THIS CITY

Program Curtailed and Concert Far From Being Great Success, Owing Largely to Absence of Some of the Better String Players—Ema Destinn Is Disappointing.

BY CLARENCE K. BAWDEN.

A somewhat depleted Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its final concert of the current season in the Academy of Music, last night. Since the recent dissension among the players and the departure of some of the more important members, there was some curiosity as to how the orchestra would play last night.

The management realized the uncertainty of the adventure, as was reflected in the program that was originally announced—a program that could have been performed v quite a small orchestra. But matters were somewhat adjusted; a few additions to the string section (which, after all, was the only choir seriously affected) and a patching up of the trumpets, made it possible to change from the originally announced program.

Fortunately the visicitudes through which the orchestra has been passing has not seriously affected the playing of the concrete organization. Save for a few isolated places, the performance of the men last night measured up to a high standard. Perhaps the players felt that it was incumbent upon them to atone for the absence of some of the better string players; at any rate the loss of the former concertmeister and several of his sympathizers was not phonically apparent—except, of course, in volume, which can be easily remedied.

In the string section there were but ten firsts, nine seconds, nine violas, seven 'cllos and six bassos. This was ample for the symphony, but it was in the Wagner numbers that the meagerness of string tone was felt, especially in the Meistersinger excerpt, when the brasses all but completely submerged the poor fiddles.

The program opened with the Beethoven B flat symphony No. 4. Mr. Monteux gave a conventional reading to the first three movements, but he surely did speed up the final movement—and the impression was one of exhileration. The other orchestral numbers were from Wagner, the "Siegfried Idyll" and two excerpts from the third act of the "Mastersingers," the Dance of the Apprentices and the Welcome to Hans Sachs.

In the first part of the "Siegfried Idyll" Mr. Monteux failed to imbue the music with that wonderful languorous charm with which it may be interpreted; the tempo was unbending and the impression one of inflexibility, the real "mood" was missing. As the "Idyll" progressed the interpretation became more sympathetic, but we sense the need of a different mental attitude of the Boston conductor through much of this beautiful orchestral composition.

The "Mastersinger" excerpts were quite an improvement upon the "Idyll;" we are happy to find that Mr. Monteux can read aright the psychology of a Wet mar score. In this "Mastersinger" mu the excellence of the brasses was noted theembouchure firm and the tonal quality fine and unwavering.

The soloist of the concert was Ema Destinn—or is it Emmy—or is it Destinova? At one time—and it is only a few years ago—Emmy Destinn was rightfully considered one of the great sopranos of the world. But alas and alack, something has happened—and Ema Destinn is not the Emmy Destinn of a few years ago. The quality of her voice has changed, it seems an effort for he rto sing, and oftimes she is woefully out of tune. Only in mezzo voce work is one reminded of the surpassing singer of days gone by. What has caused this lamentable change? Can it be the orbicular anatomy? In all earnestness we urge Ema Destinn to make desperate efforts to regain her former lack of averdupois—for we fear the trouble lies therein.

The soloist's first selection was a group of two Bohemian excerpts, a cradle song from Smetana's opera, "The Kiss," and Russalk's song from Dvorak's opera, "Russalka." The former had a charming ending—a seemingly uncompleted close on the dominant chord. The second appearance of the soprano was to sing the Mozart aria, "Non mi die," from Don Giovanni.

In this aria Destinn was heard to better advantage; in the first place, the Itlian words brought out much more pleasant sounds than the Bohemian text, and the singer seemed more comfortable than in the earlier songs.

Altogether the concert might not have been considered a huge success. It was unfortunate that Mr. Monteux's first season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should close with a lack of brilliance.

From MAR 10
Bulletin

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT THRILLS LARGE AUDIENCE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra minus Frederic Fradkin, recently deposed concertmaster, but otherwise numerically and artistically intact, gave the fourth concert of its Providence season in Infantry Hall last evening. The orchestra's troubles had not the slightest effect on this particular concert, the first violins merely moving up one seat, which gave Mr. J. Hoffman the place at the leader's desk. And the players added another notable performance to their credit for the season, the programme being one which proved a source of keen delight to the big audience. Mr. Monteux was recalled three times after the final movement of the Brahms symphony and Mr. Bedetti, 'cellist, the evening's soloist, received similar appreciation after his playing of the Hayden D-major concerto.

This was the programme:

Brahms.....Symphony No. 1, in C-minor, Op. 68
Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
Andante sostenuto.
Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.
Borodin.....''On the Steppes of Central Asia,'' Orchestral Sketch, Op. 7
Haydn.....Concerto for Violoncello in D-major
Allegro moderato.
Adagio.
Allegro.
Wagner....Overture to ''The Flying Dutchman''

Brahm's symphonies have long since come to their own. The acrimonious discussions which once raged over these symphonic works have subsided and they now occupy the high place which is rightfully theirs. Characterized by profundity of thought rather than by the more obvious and consequently easily grasped style of writing, they need thorough acquaintance before their full beauty is revealed. Perhaps for this reason these masterpieces of polyphony will always appeal more strongly to the musician than to the layman. The average audience, however, is charmed by the richly clothed melody, grandeur of conception and imaginative power which are inseparable from these symphonies.

Brahms's first, in C-minor, played last evening, while by no means his greatest work, is a massive and beautiful one. The last movement is unusually long and contains enough melodic material for several symphonies. It is likewise the most striking portion of the symphony and under Mr. Monteux's direction the orchestra played it in inspiring style.

The more one sees Mr. Monteux conduct the stronger becomes the conviction that he is one of the most capable leaders the Boston orchestra has ever possessed. He is not only a thorough musician, but an artist to his finger tips. There is no school of musical writing in which he is not perfectly at home. From Wagner to Debussy, his knowledge and sympathetic appreciation are always found delightfully equal to the task set for him. He is red-blooded, virile and can imagine and produce effects of orchestral grandeur that overwhelm the listener. And he can be suave or elegant in style, or, with persuasive beat and gesture, persuade his instrumental voices to sing with wonderful softness and delicacy. In the reading of works by modernists, those excursions into the pale, strange musical regions where imagination reigns supreme, his genius is unquestioned, and his flights of fancy result in effects that beautifully interpret the inspiration of the composer.

Borodin, the Russian, is particularly happy when describing in orchestral language characteristic scenes of Russian life. His ''On the Steppes of Central Asia'' depicts a caravan guarded by Russian soldiers traversing a vast desert. The clear orchestration makes the picture easy to imagine, the violin's high plaintive note held in unison against a suggestive colorful background, giving the idea of unending stretches of sandy plain. The picture is quite vividly portrayed by the composer and Mr. Monteux skilfully painted it in striking instrumental colors.

Wagner's overture to ''The Flying Dutchman,'' played with great virtuosity, made a brilliant and exciting final number. In this the violins showed splendid unanimity in attack and in the execution of difficult passage work.

Jean Bedetti, the orchestra's first 'cellist, made his Providence debut in the Haydn D-major concerto. He was apparently nervous, but overcame any such feeling he may have had after the first movement. He is a player of romantic or temperamental style and made quite a sensation. The concerto is showy and gives the player a chance to sing in melody as well as scintillate technically. Mr. Bedetti did both. The last two movements showed him at his best. A searching, soulful tone and a certain sentimentalism in phrasing marked the melodic portions, and brilliant finger work and bowing featured the finale. He was given an ovation, being recalled three times.

From
Bulletin, MAR 18 1920 E
Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony

Final Concert of Season, With Ema Destinn as Soloist

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra returned last evening for its fifth and final concert of the season, at the Academy of Music. There was the usual large audience, which showed with marked cordiality its appreciation of an interesting, if not particularly notable program, with Ema Destinn, soprano, as the soloist.

The program was considerably changed from that originally announced, the symphony being the No. 4 in B flat major, Op. 60, of Beethoven, instead of Mozart's G minor, while two Wagner selections were substituted for the ''Fidelio'' overture of Beethoven and Charpentier's ''Impressions of Italy.'' Only the numbers allotted to Mme. Destinn were the ones announced, and even these were changed in their order, songs by Smetana and Dvorak being sung first, the recitative and aria from ''Don Giovanni,'' Mozart, coming second, instead of in the reverse order, as printed on the program.

It can scarcely be said that the Boston orchestra's last concert of the season was its best. The recent upheaval, resulting in the dismissal of M. Fradkin, the concertmaster, and some other changes in the personnel, has not improved the quality of the music. To the contrary, there were evidences of change in more than one part of the performance, some raggedness and tonal deficiencies as compared with many previous concerts. But there was much fine playing also. The fourth is perhaps the least familiar of Beethoven's nine symphonies, and it is not the most inspired nor the most melodious. The adagio is the most like the real Beethoven, and the finale reaches a height of musical expression, but as a whole the work pales in comparison with the fifth and several—or all—of the others.

Pierre Monteux strengthened the good impression he formerly had made as the new permanent conductor of the orchestra. He showed his capability, added to a suave manner and ingratiating presence, in his reading of the symphony, and won new laurels in his conducting of the Wagnerian numbers, the ''Siegfried Idyll'' and Dance of the Apprentices and Welcome to Hans Sachs, from ''The Meistersingers.'' The new concertmaster of the orchestra, J. Theodorowicz, made a decidedly favorable impression. He is a tall, dark man, who fills his important position with capability, dignity and unobtrusiveness.

In addition to the other changes, as mentioned, Mme. Destinn announced another variation on her name. Originally she was Emmy Destinn, then Emmy Destinova—now she is Ema Destinn. But, whatever she decides to be called, the Bohemian soprano is a distinguished singer. While having added considerable in the way of avoirdupois, that she did not need, Destinn still has vivacity, and after each of her numerous recalls tripped off the stage in a joyous, captivating manner. Her voice is as vibrant and brilliant as ever, most remarkable for its dramatic quality, particularly the high tones, with some middle and lower ones that are harsh and at times almost unpleasant. She was at her best in the cradle songs from Smetana's opera, ''Hubicka,'' (The Kiss), in which there was some beautiful pianissimo work, though the Mozart aria showed more of her real distinction as a dramatic singer.

From
Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md. 128

DESTINN TO SING WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Orchestra Will Also Present Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony And Wagner's Overture.

At the season's final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given at the Lyric this evening, Mme. Ema Destinn, dramatic soprano will be the soloist. She will sing arias revealing two sides of her art.

Her first number will be ''Non mi dir,'' the famous aria of Donna Anna in Mozart's ''Don Giovanni.'' Although America is her adopted country, Mme. Destinn is a Czecho-Slovak. She will also sing arias by two great composers of her native land, the love song from Dvorak's opera ''Russalka'' and the cradle song from Smetana's opera, ''The Kiss.''

Pierre Monteux, the conductor, has chosen Berlioz's famous fantastic symphony, which is supposed to have been inspired by the composer's love story. ''A Ball,'' ''A Pastoral Scene,'' ''The March to the Scaffold'' and the orgy of the ''Witches' Sabbath'' are some of the episodes.

The other numbers will be Borodin's sketch, ''The Steppes of Central Asia,'' and Wagner's overture to ''The Flying Dutchman.''

DESTINN WILL SING

Change in Symphony Program Does Not Affect Soloist.

The program for the concert tomorrow night of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been changed, according to announcement received from the orchestra today. Ema Destinn is to sing, as scheduled, however. No reason is given for the changes. The program now announced consists of Beethoven's fourth symphony, in B flat major; Wagner's ''A Siegfried Idyll,'' and the introduction, ''Dance of the Apprentices,'' and ''Welcome to Hans Sachs,'' from Wagner's opera, ''The Mastersingers.'' The soloist's pieces will be ''Non mi dir,'' from Mozart's ''Don Giovanni;'' two ''berceuses'' from ''The Kiss,'' by Smetena, and a song from ''Rusalka,'' by Dvorak.

EMMY DESTINN.
Mme. Destinn will be the soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening at the Lyric.

SUN
Baltimore, Md.
MAR

om MAR 18
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN CLOSING CONCERT

Effects of Recent Trouble Apparent in Work of the Organization

Symphony No. 4.....Beethoven
Vendulka's Cradle Song.....Smetana
Russalk's Song.....Dvorak
Ema Destinn
Siegfried's Idyll.....Wagner
Recitative and aria from ''Don Giovanni.'' Mozart
Ema Destinn
Excerpts from Act III of ''Meistersinger.'' Wagner

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its current season in Philadelphia with its fifth concert last evening. It is hardly fair to demand the usual standards of orchestral playing to an orchestra so ''shot to pieces'' as the Boston organization was last evening, for the entire aggregation numbered only about sixty men and therefore there was lacking the tone color and the volume necessary in the Wagnerian numbers, as well as that warm richness which can only be obtained by a large and well-trained body of strings.

The ''revolt,'' if so serious a word may be used over the unionization mix-up, has cost the Boston Orchestra about thirty men, nearly all among the strings. There has been the loss of the contra-bassoon and one of the first trumpets, but outside of this the reed and brass sections are practically intact; the strings, however, have suffered severely, among the older players to go being Otto Roth and A. Bak, two of the oldest of the first violins in point of service. Last evening the first violins numbered ten, against a normal number of sixteen; the seconds nine, normal twelve; violas nine, normal ten; cellos seven, normal ten, and basses six, normal eight. Owing doubtless to the small number of strings, the orchestra brought along on the trip only two of each of the reeds, instead of four, as had been customary, and four horns instead of eight. Ten former members of the orchestra came to the directors and volunteered their services to tide over the crisis.

Under these circumstances and with the natural feeling of unrest that must pervade the organization, in view of the happenings of the last few weeks, a concert of the ordinary merit was not to be expected, and it was not given. Mr. Monteux has changed the program at the last moment, substituting the Beethoven Symphony No. 4 for the Mozart G minor and the Wagner numbers in place of the Fidelio Overture and the Charpentier ''Impressions of Italy.''

The orchestra played in the spasmodic style of an organization which has just passed through a mental cyclone, and it was apparent that the events of the very recent past have not been without effect upon Mr. Monteux as well, for his readings were routine and his conducting uncertain. However, when it is considered what the orchestra has gone through in the last two weeks, it did pretty well at that.

Ema Destinn, which seems to be the latest spelling of the much-orthographized name of the famous Czecho-Slovak prima donna, was the soloist of the evening. She sang first two songs of the great Bohemian composers, Smetana and Dvorak, both highly uninteresting selections, but well performed. Her second appearance was in the recitative and the aria ''Non mi dir,'' from ''Don Giovanni,'' and in it she did some fine singing and artistic interpretation, rising in places to the highest musical levels of the evening.

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

The young Italian barber who daily removes the stubble from the genial face of Arthur Judson, manager of the Philadelphia Orchestra, is not only a great talker, like many other tonsorialists, but, according to Mr. Judson, he is also an astute philosopher and profound psychologist.

Last week when the newspapers carried dispatches to the effect that one-third of the Boston Orchestra had gone on strike young Giuseppe was thoroughly posted in advance in order to give Mr. Judson a ''line of talk'' in which he might be interested.

After discussing the pros and cons of the Boston musicians' action, Giuseppe dismissed the subject by exclaiming:

''Ah, Mr. Juds', you oughta know da fellas da playa da fidd' dey only gotta halfa da nut!''

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

ESTABLISHED 1801

Except for rear rows in the top gallery, the seating capacity of the Academy was taken fully last night to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux. In the midst of the painful and trying period of reconstruction, for a body of players first disrupted by the world war, and now shot to pieces again in civil strife, there must be sympathy if the orchestra seems a melancholy ruin of its one-time greatness, the shell without the soul.

The sad remainder was for part of the time amazingly good, though the Siegfried Idyll of Wagner, that should have resounded with the joy of the influx of the springtide, was listless and dispirited, compared with the exultant proclamation of the days of old.

The program, too, had been rebuilt, and it began with Beethoven's Fourth symphony instead of Mozart in G minor. The heavy brasses had been withdrawn, as Beethoven's score does not ask for them, and that made the orchestra look smaller than ever till the next music brought them on. At best, there were many vacancies in the roster, which told heavily on the tone of the string, in particular, and the depletion was melancholy to contemplate, though Theodoronicz is a careful concertmaster, and such veterans as Schroeder and Longy still remind us of the dignity of their art and their heritage.

Parts of act III of ''The Mastersingers'' also were played, and the string and coherent chords of the brasses at the close were the best instrumental work of an orchestra that, on the whole, has gone from Muck to mush.

Into the post-mortem atmosphere Ema Destinn, as she now is known, brought enlivening contributions—cradle song, from Smetana's ''Hubicka,'' beautifully given, with a final note that exquisitely tapered into silence; somewhat consonantal and nasal interpretation of a lyric from Dvorak's ''Russalka,'' and an aria from Mozart's ''Don Giovanni.'' Those things, done with insight and feeling, went far to relieve the tedium of a singularly lusterless concert.

TO GIVE FINAL CONCERT

APPEARING as soloist at the final Boston Symphony Concert of the season, to be given in the Lyric Theatre Tuesday evening, Mme. Ema Destinn, dramatic soprano, will sing arias revealing two sides of her art and personality. ''Non mi dir,'' the famous aria of Donna Anna in Mozart's ''Don Giovanni,'' will recall one of the singer's most noted roles. Although America is her adopted land, Mme. Destinn is by birth and blood affiliation a Czecho-Slovak. As such she will sing arias by the two great composers of Bohemia: the love song from Dvorak's opera ''Russalka'' and the cradle song from Smetana's opera ''The Kiss.''

Pierre Monteux will conduct at the same concert Berlioz's famous fantastic symphony, which was inspired by his now historical love story. It describes the ''Dreams and Passions'' of the composer, ''A Ball,'' a ''Pastoral Scene,'' ''The March to the Scaffold'' and the orgy of the ''Witches' Sabbath.'' The performance of the work in Boston was generally conceded one of the finest achievements of the season. The other numbers will be Borodin's sketch, ''The Steppes of Central Asia,'' and Wagner's overture to ''The Flying Dutchman.''

om
ress,
Philadelphia, Pa.

DEPLETED BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SEASON IN THIS CITY

Program Curtailed and Concert Far From Being Great Success, Owing Largely to Absence of Some of the Better String Players—Ema Destinn Is Disappointing.

BY CLARENCE K. BAWDEN.

A somewhat depleted Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its final concert of the current season in the Academy of Music, last night. Since the recent dissension among the players and the departure of some of the more important members, there was some curiosity as to how the orchestra would play last night.

The management realized the uncertainty of the adventure, as was reflected in the program that was originally announced—a program that could have been performed v quite a small orchestra. But matters were somewhat adjusted; a few additions to the string section (which, after all, was the only choir seriously affected) and a patching up of the trumpets, made it possible to change from the originally announced program.

Fortunately the visicitudes through which the orchestra has been passing has not seriously affected the playing of the concrete organization. Save for a few isolated places, the performance of the men last night measured up to a high standard. Perhaps the players felt that it was incumbent upon them to atone for the absence of some of the better string players; at any rate the loss of the former concertmeister and several of his sympathizers was not phonically apparent—except, of course, in volume, which can be easily remedied.

In the string section there were but ten firsts, nine seconds, nine violas, seven 'cllos and six bassos. This was ample for the symphony, but it was in the Wagner numbers that the meagerness of string tone was felt, especially in the Meistersinger excerpt, when the brasses all but completely submerged the poor fiddles.

The program opened with the Beethoven B flat symphony No. 4. Mr. Monteux gave a conventional reading to the first three movements, but he surely did speed up the final movement—and the impression was one of exhileration. The other orchestral numbers were from Wagner, the "Siegfried Idyll" and two excerpts from the third act of the "Mastersingers," the Dance of the Apprentices and the Welcome to Hans Sachs.

In the first part of the "Siegfried Idyll" Mr. Monteux failed to imbue the music with that wonderful languorous charm with which it may be interpreted; the tempo was unbending and the impression one of inflexibility, the real "mood" was missing. As the "Idyll" progressed the interpretation became more sympathetic, but we sense the need of a different mental attitude of the Boston conductor through much of this beautiful orchestral composition.

The "Mastersinger" excerpts were quite an improvement upon the "Idyll;" we are happy to find that Mr. Monteux can read aright the psychology of a Wagnar score. In this "Mastersinger" music the excellence of the brasses was noted, theembouchure firm and the tonal quality fine and unwavering.

The soloist of the concert was Ema Destinn—or is it Emmy—or is it Destinova? At one time—and it is only a few years ago—Emmy Destinn was rightfully considered one of the great sopranos of the world. But alas and alack, something has happened—and Ema Destinn is not the Emmy Destinn of a few years ago. The quality of her voice has changed, it seems an effort for he rto sing, and oftimes she is woefully out of tune. Only in mezzo voce work is one reminded of the surpassing singer of days gone by. What has caused this lamentable change? Can it be the orbicular anatomy? In all earnestness we urge Ema Destinn to make desperate efforts to regain her former lack of averdupois—for we fear the trouble lies therein.

The soloist's first selection was a group of two Bohemian excerpts, a cradle song from Smetana's opera, "The Kiss," and Russalk's song from Dvorak's opera, "Russalka." The former had a charming ending—a seemingly uncompleted close on the dominant chord. The second appearance of the soprano was to sing the Mozart aria, "Non mi die," from Don Giovanni.

In this aria Destinn was heard to better advantage; in the first place, the Itlian words brought out much more pleasant sounds than the Bohemian text, and the singer seemed more comfortable than in the earlier songs.

Altogether the concert might not have been considered a huge success. It was unfortunate that Mr. Monteux's first season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should close with a lack of brilliance.

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN CLOSING CONCERT

Effects of Recent Trouble Apparent in Work of the Organization

Symphony No. 4.....Beethoven
Vendulka's Cradle Song.....Smetana
Russalk's Song.....Dvorak
Ema Destinn
Siegfried's Idyll.....Wagner
Recitative and aria from "Don Giovanni."
Mozart
Ema Destinn
Excerpts from Act III of "Meistersinger."
Wagner

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its current season in Philadelphia with its fifth concert last evening. It is hardly fair to demand the usual standards of orchestral playing to an orchestra so "shot to pieces" as the Boston organization was last evening, for the entire aggregation numbered only about sixty men and therefore there was lacking the tone color and the volume necessary in the Wagnerian numbers, as well as that warm richness which can only be obtained by a large and well-trained body of strings.

The "revolt," if so serious a word may be used over the unionization mix-up, has cost the Boston Orchestra about thirty men, nearly all among the strings. There has been the loss of the contra-bassoon and one of the first trumpets, but outside of this the reed and brass sections are practically intact; the strings, however, have suffered severely, among the older players to go being Otto Roth and A. Bak, two of the oldest of the first violins in point of service. Last evening the first violins numbered ten, against a normal number of sixteen; the seconds nine, normal twelve; violas nine, normal ten; cellos seven, normal ten, and basses six, normal eight. Owing doubtless to the small number of strings, the orchestra brought along on the trip only two of each of the reeds, instead of four, as had been customary, and four horns instead of eight. Ten former members of the orchestra came to the directors and volunteered their services to tide over the crisis.

Under these circumstances and with the natural feeling of unrest that must pervade the organization, in view of the happenings of the last few weeks, a concert of the ordinary merit was not to be expected, and it was not given. Mr. Monteux has changed the program at the last moment, substituting the Beethoven Symphony No. 4 for the Mozart G minor and the Wagner numbers in place of the Fidelio Overture and the Charpentier "Impressions of Italy."

The orchestra played in the spasmodic style of an organization which has just passed through a mental cyclone, and it was apparent that the events of the very recent past have not been without effect upon Mr. Monteux as well, for his readings were routine and his conducting uncertain. However, when it is considered what the orchestra has gone through in the last two weeks, it did pretty well at that.

Ema Destinn, which seems to be the latest spelling of the much-orthographized name of the famous Czecho-Slovak prima donna, was the soloist of the evening. She sang first two songs of the great Bohemian composers, Smetana and Dvorak, both highly uninteresting selections, but well performed. Her second appearance was in the recitative and the aria "Non mi dir," from "Don Giovanni," and in it she did some fine singing and artistic interpretation, rising in places to the highest musical levels of the evening.

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

The young Italian barber who daily removes the stubble from the genial face of Arthur Judson, manager of the Philadelphia Orchestra, is not only a great talker, like many other tonsorialists, but, according to Mr. Judson, he is also an astute philosopher and profound psychologist.

Last week when the newspapers carried dispatches to the effect that one-third of the Boston Orchestra had gone on strike young Giuseppe was thoroughly posted in advance in order to give Mr. Judson a "line of talk" in which he might be interested.

After discussing the pros and cons of the Boston musicians' action, Giuseppe dismissed the subject by exclaiming:

"Ah, Mr. Juds', you oughta know da fellas da playa da fidd' dey only got halfa da nut!"

From Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT THRILLS LARGE AUDIENCE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra minus Frederic Fradkin, recently deposed concertmaster, but otherwise numerically and artistically intact, gave the fourth concert of its Providence season in Infantry Hall last evening. The orchestra's troubles had not the slightest effect on this particular concert, the first violins merely moving up one seat, which gave Mr. J. Hoffman the place at the leader's desk. And the players added another notable performance to their credit for the season, the programme being one which proved a source of keen delight to the big audience. Mr. Monteux was recalled three times after the final movement of the Brahms symphony and Mr. Bedetti, 'cellist, the evening's soloist, received similar appreciation after his playing of the Hayden D-major concerto.

This was the programme:

Brahms....Symphony No. 1, in C-minor, Op. 68
Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
Andante sostenuto.
Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.
Borodin.....''On the Steppes of Central Asia,''
Orchestral Sketch, Op. 7
Haydn.....Concerto for Violoncello in D-major
Allegro moderato.
Adagio.
Allegro.
Wagner....Overture to ''The Flying Dutchman''

Brahm's symphonies have long since come to their own. The acrimonious discussions which once raged over these symphonic works have subsided and they now occupy the high place which is rightfully theirs. Characterized by profundity of thought rather than by the more obvious and consequently easily grasped style of writing, they need thorough acquaintance before their full beauty is revealed. Perhaps for this reason these masterpieces of polyphony will always appeal more strongly to the musician than to the layman. The average audience, however, is charmed by the richly clothed melody, grandeur of conception and imaginative power which are inseparable from these symphonies.

Brahms's first, in C-minor, played last evening, while by no means his greatest work, is a massive and beautiful one. The last movement is unusually long and contains enough melodic material for several symphonies. It is likewise the most striking portion of the symphony and under Mr. Monteux's direction the orchestra played it in inspiring style.

The more one sees Mr. Monteux conduct the stronger becomes the conviction that he is one of the most capable leaders the Boston orchestra has ever possessed. He is not only a thorough musician, but an artist to his finger tips. There is no school of musical writing in which he is not perfectly at home. From Wagner to Debussy, his knowledge and sympathetic appreciation are always found delightfully equal to the task set for him. He is red-blooded, virile and can imagine and produce effects of orchestral grandeur that overwhelm the listener. And he can be suave or elegant in style, or, with persuasive beat and gesture, persuade his instrumental voices to sing with wonderful softness and delicacy. In the reading of works by modernists, those excursions into the pale, strange musical regions where imagination reigns supreme, his genius is unquestioned, and his flights of fancy result in effects that beautifully interpret the inspiration of the composer.

Borodin, the Russian, is particularly happy when describing in orchestral language characteristic scenes of Russian life. His "On the Steppes of Central Asia" depicts a caravan guarded by Russian soldiers traversing a vast desert. The clear orchestration makes the picture easy to imagine, the violin's high plaintive note held in unison against a suggestive colorful background, giving the idea of unending stretches of sandy plain. The picture is quite vividly portrayed by the composer and Mr. Monteux skilfully painted it in striking instrumental colors.

Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman," played with great virtuosity, made a brilliant and exciting final number. In this the violins showed splendid unanimity in attack and in the execution of difficult passage work.

Jean Bedetti, the orchestra's first 'cellist, made his Providence debut in the Haydn D-major concerto. He was apparently nervous, but overcame any such feeling he may have had after the first movement. He is a player of romantic or temperamental style and made quite a sensation. The concerto is showy and gives the player a chance to sing in melody as well as scintillate technically. Mr. Bedetti did both. The last two movements showed him at his best. A searching, soulful tone and a certain sentimentalism in phrasing marked the melodic portions, and brilliant finger work and bowing featured the finale. He was given an ovation, being recalled three times.

From
Bulletin
Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony

Final Concert of Season, With Ema Destinn as Soloist

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra returned last evening for its fifth and final concert of the season, at the Academy of Music. There was the usual large audience, which showed with marked cordiality its appreciation of an interesting, if not particularly notable program, with Ema Destinn, soprano, as the soloist.

The program was considerably changed from that originally announced, the symphony being the No. 4 in B flat major, Op. 60, of Beethoven, instead of Mozart's G minor, while two Wagner selections were substituted for the "Fidelio" overture of Beethoven and Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy." Only the numbers allotted to Mme. Destinn were the ones announced, and even these were changed in their order, songs by Smetana and Dvorak being sung first, the recitative and aria from "Don Giovanni," Mozart, coming second, instead of in the reverse order, as printed on the program

It can scarcely be said that the Boston orchestra's last concert of the season was its best. The recent upheaval, resulting in the dismissal of M. Fradkin, the concertmaster, and some other changes in the personnel, has not improved the quality of the music. To the contrary, there were evidences of change in more than one part of the performance, some raggedness and tonal deficiencies as compared with many previous concerts. But there was much fine playing also. The fourth is perhaps the least familiar of Beethoven's nine symphonies, and it is not the most inspired nor the most melodious. The adagio is the most like the real Beethoven, and the finale reaches a height of musical expression, but as a whole the work pales in comparison with the fifth and several—or all—of the others.

Pierre Monteux strengthened the good impression he formerly had made as the new permanent conductor of the orchestra. He showed his capability, added to a suave manner and ingratiating presence, in his reading of the symphony, and won new laurels in his conducting of the Wagnerian numbers, the "Siegfried Idyll" and Dance of the Apprentices and Welcome to Hans Sachs, from "Die Meistersingers." The new concertmaster of the orchestra, J. Theodorowicz, made a decidedly favorable impression. He is a tall, dark man, who fills his important position with capability, dignity and unobtrusiveness.

In addition to the other changes, as mentioned, Mme. Destinn announced another variation on her name. Originally she was Emmy Destinn, then Emmy Destinova—now she is Ema Destinn. But, whatever she decides to be called, the Bohemian soprano is a distinguished singer. While having added considerable in the way of avoirdupois, that she did not need, Destinn still has vivacity, and after each of her numerous recalls tripped off the stage in a joyous, captivating manner. Her voice is as vibrant and brilliant as ever, most remarkable for its dramatic quality, particularly the high tones, with some middle and lower ones that are harsh and at times almost unpleasant. She was at her best in the cradle songs from Smetana's opera, "Hubicka," (The Kiss), in which there was some beautiful pianissimo work, though the Mozart aria showed more of her real distinction as a dramatic singer.

ESTABLISHED 1861

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Except for rear rows in the top gallery, the seating capacity of the Academy was taken fully last night to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux. In the midst of the painful and trying period of reconstruction, for a body of players first disrupted by the world war, and now shot to pieces again in civil strife, there must be sympathy if the orchestra seems a melancholy ruin of its one-time greatness, the shell without the soul.

The sad remainder was for part of the time amazingly good, though the Siegfried Idyll of Wagner, that should have resounded with the joy of the influx of the springtide, was listless and dispirited, compared with the exultant proclamation of the days of old.

The program, too, had been rebuilt, and it began with Beethoven's Fourth symphony instead of Mozart in G minor. The heavy brasses had been withdrawn, as Beethoven's score does not ask for them, and that made the orchestra look smaller than ever till the next music brought them on. At best, there were many vacancies in the roster, which told heavily on the tone of the strings in particular, and the depletion was melancholy to contemplate, though Theodoronicz is a careful concertmaster, and such veterans as Schroeder and Longy still remind us of the dignity of their art and their heritage.

Parts of act III of "The Mastersingers" also were played, and the string and coherent chords of the brasses at the close were the best instrumental work of an orchestra that, on the whole, has gone from Muck to mush.

Into the post-mortem atmosphere Ema Destinn, as she now is known brought enlivening contributions—cradle song, from Smetana's "Hubicka," beautifully given, with a final note that exquisitely tapered into silence; a somewhat consonantal and nasal interpretation of a lyric from Dvorak's "Russalka," and an aria from Mozart's "Don Giovanni." Those things, done with insight and feeling, went far to relieve the tedium of a singularly lusterless concert.

From
Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

DESTINN TO SING WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Orchestra Will Also Present Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony And Wagner's Overture.

At the season's final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given at the Lyric this evening, Mme. Ema Destinn, dramatic soprano will be the soloist. She will sing arias revealing two sides of her art.

Her first number will be "Non mi dir," the famous aria of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni." Although America is her adopted country, Mme. Destinn is a Czecho-Slovak. She will also sing arias by two great composers of her native land, the love song from Dvorak's opera "Russalka" and the cradle song from Smetana's opera, "The Kiss."

Pierre Monteux, the conductor, has chosen Berlioz's famous fantastic symphony, which is supposed to have been inspired by the composer's love story. "A Ball," "A Pastoral Scene," "The March to the Scaffold" and the orgy of the "Witches' Sabbath" are some of the episodes.

The other numbers will be Borodin's sketch, "The Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

DESTINN WILL SING

hange in Symphony Program Does Not Affect Soloist.

The program for the concert tomorrow night of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been changed, according to announcement received from the orchestra today. Ema Destinn is to sing, as scheduled, however. No reason is given for the changes. The program now announced consists of Beethoven's fourth symphony, in B flat major; Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyll," and the introduction, "Dance of the Apprentices," and "Welcome to Hans Sachs," from Wagner's opera, "The Mastersingers," The soloist's pieces will be "Non mi dir," from Mozart's "Don Giovanni;" two "berceuses" from "The Kiss," by Smetena, and a song from "Rusalka," by Dvorak.

EMMY DESTINN.

Mme. Destinn will be the soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening at the Lyric.

SUN

Baltimore, Md.

TO GIVE FINAL CONCERT

APPEARING as soloist at the final

Boston Symphony Concert of the season, to be given in the Lyric Theatre Tuesday evening, Mme. Ema Destinn, dramatic soprano, will sing arias, revealing two sides of her art and personality. "Non mi dir," the famous aria of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni," will recall one of the most noted roles. Although America is her adopted land, Mme. Destin is by birth and blood affiliation a Czecho-Slovak. As such she will sing arias by the two great composers of Bohemia: the love song from Dvorak's opera "Russalka" and the cradle song from Smetana's opera "The Kiss."

Pierre Monteux will conduct at the same concert Berlioz's famous fantastic symphony, which was inspired by his now historical love story. It describes the "Dreams and Passions" of the composer, "A Ball," a "Pastoral Scene," "The March to the Scaffold" and the orgy of the "Witches' Sabbath." The performance of the work in Boston was generally conceded one of the finest achievements of the season. The other numbers will be Borodin's sketch, "The Steppes of Central Asia," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

E BOSTON HERALD, S

19TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Loyal House Acclaims Return of Monteux and "Faithful" Players

SHOW OLD POWER IN 'LOHENGRIN' PRELUDE

By PHILIP HALE

The 19th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Dvorak, "From the New World symphony; Wagner, Prelude to "Lohengrin;" and "Forest Numbers" from "Siegfrier;" Debussy, Little Suite (first time at these concerts if not in Boston); Berlioz, Rakoczy March.

This was a remarkably brilliant concert, one that excited the enthusiasm of an audience that completely filled the hall. Mr. Monteux was greeted warmly when he came on the platform. There was the assurance of belief in him; appreciation of the players faithful to their engagement and mindful of their obligation to the audience that has for many years been faithful to them; confidence in the splendor of the orchestra in the future as in the past. The applause that followed the performance of each composition was not merely sympathetic and encouraging; it was the enthusiastic approval of the performance itself; and the performance in each instance justly deserved this recognition.

Sitting one night with Horatio Parker when Dvorak's "New World" swmphony was played, we were surprised to hear him characterize the work as "meretricious." Did he mean by this that it was immediately pleasing; that it was showily attractive; that it was too melodious? Our friend, whose departure is mourned by many, had a habit of making surprising statements; perhaps to provoke discussion; perhaps to express a passing whim. He certainly did not mean that the music was showy, for the sake of show. There never was a simpler, more sincere composer than Dvorak. He was by nature a child or a savage—which is often the same thing—delighting in strongly marked rhythms and gorgeous colors. He saw red, yellow, scarlet, purple when he sat down to compose. How he would rejoice today in a jazz band! There was a time when this symphony almost caused shedding of blood over the question whether it was inspired by "Negro music." Now, without thought of this question without inquiry as to "Negro" or Czech origin, the music gives pleasure at the time of performance and in the recollection of it.

Mr. Monteux put on the program the Prelude to "Lohengrin," probably because he and many others enjoy hearing it; and also to prove that in spite of street rumors and statements, to say the least misleading and often palpably absurd, that have been published in newspapers of this city and of New York, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not today without a sufficient and capable string choir. (And so at the next concert a Concerto Grosso of Handel's for strings will be performed.) The Prelude was finely played, as was the excerpt from "Siegfried," which took us back to the nights of German opera in Boston. Again we saw and heard Max Alvary, a wretched singer, but the most picturesque and convincing of Siegfried's; again we saw and heard other Germans, who howled and bawled and shrieked and were fat and dramatically grotesque; again we saw and heard Jean de Reszke, a city gentleman lost for a few hours in the forest.

Debussy's little Suite, written originally for piano (four hands), and orchestrated by Busser, was played for the first time at a Symphony concert. The four pieces are pretty in themselves and delicately transferred to the orchestra. The first, "En Bateau," was already familiar through the transcription for violin and piano. The Suite is signed with Debussy's name, but the moods and the expression are by no means those of the Debussy that brought a new harmonic scheme into the world and still exerts a mighty influence.

It was often said in Paris during our student years: "to hear the music of Berlioz, you must attend a Colonne concert." It might now be said: "to hear the Rakoczy March, you must hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra play it, led by Monteux." The march has often been performed in Boston: never with the irresistible dash, the blazing fire, the furious and overwhelming climax that marked the performance of yesterday.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Handel, concerto Grosso for strings, No. 5, D major; Wagner, Prelude to "Parsifal"; Saint-Saens, concerto No. 5, for piano (Rudolph Ganz, pianist); Smetana, Overture to "The Sold Bride."

Post Mar 27 BOST

BRILLIANT CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Dvorak, Debussy and Wagner Numbers Played

BY OLIN DOWNES

The 19th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was accounted by many, one of the most brilliant concerts of the season. This though the orchestra was still of diminished numbers, consisting of between 70 and 80 men, and including two players who had rejoined the orchestra on recent days.

These were August Rettberg, who replaced Mr. Neumann at the tympani, and Carl Hampe, now first trombone and one of the finest trombonists in the history of this organization.

AUDIENCE ENTHUSIASTIC

The audience, however, had not shrunk in numbers, nor had its enthusiasm for the music and its support of Mr. Monteux and the management in any way flagged or weakened Mr. Monteux was again applauded long and loudly, both at the beginning and at the end of the concert, following the performance of the electrical "Rakocy March" of Berlioz.

For a novelty at these concerts there was played the early and charming "Petite Suite" of Debussy, originally a suite for piano, and later orchestrated by Henri Busser. The music is Massenetish, but fanciful and lending itself well to orchestral treatment. This suite was preceded by two Wagnerian excerpts, the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," and the prelude to "Lohengrin," music marvellous alike in its inspiration and its scoring.

To proceed in the established order of this article, which discusses the programme backwards, the Dvorak "New World" symphony opened the programme, and the pleasure of the audience in this delightful music was impressively demonstrated. Again Mr. Monteux had chosen a piece which sounds better and not worse with a relatively small orchestra. The felicity of Dvorak's instrumentation, simple as it is, is always astonishing, and often as invertive as his harmony. The folk-quality of the music, which has been so often discussed as "American" folk-music, because, forsooth, Dvorak uses a scrap of "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot" and other negroid or Indian themes, is as a matter of fact not American, but Bohemian. Dvorak used a little of the material of folk-melody which he found here, but he used it wholly in the manner and the spirit of his native land, in the work which remains the orchestral masterpiece of his career.

Traveler Mar 27

MARY A. CUTLER.

Symphony Men Give Delightful Concert Number

A very interesting program was rendered yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting.

The first number was a Dvorah spmphony, "From the ew World." in E minor. This symphony is full of pathos and longing and expresses a great depth of feeling. Largo, the second movement, was especially sweet and beautiful. The orchestra played the pianissimo passages of this movement very delicately.

One could not fail to be moved by the impressiveness of Wagner's "Prelude" to Lohengrin.

After Debussy's delightful "Petite Suite" a sharp contrast was drawn by the stirring "Rakoszy arch" from "The Damnation of Faust" by Hector Berlioz.

A large audience expressed its delight and appreciation to Conductor Monteux, the faithful members of the orchestra and to the new musicians by enthusiastis applause.

Trans Mar 27

Programmes in Prospect

No symphony stands on Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next week—a happy departure from routine. With Mr. Ganz, long unheard here, for assisting pianist, the list of pieces stands:

Concerto Grosso in D major for Strings..Händel
(Solo Parts by Messrs. Theodorowicz, Hoffmann, Denayer, Bedetti.)
Prelude to the Opera, "Parsifal".....Wagner
Concerto in F minor (No. 5) for Pianoforte with Orchestra.....Saint-Saëns Overture to the Opera, "The Bartered Bride".....Smetana

Items and Announcements

After the coming of Mr. Ganz next week only two more "assisting artists" remain to be heard with the Symphony Orchestra this season—Mr. Cortot, the admired Parisian pianist, who carried all before him a year and more ago, and Mr. McCormack, the tenor, taking leave of Boston for his European tour at the concerts of May 1 and 2. A managerial tangle in which Miss Destinn has twisted herself, compelled the cancelling of her engagement.

ORCHESTRA WINS UNUSUAL APPLAUSE

Globe Mar 27

Spirited Performance at the Symphony Concert

Dvorak, Wagner, Berlioz, Debussy Among Composers Interpreted

There was unusual applause at the Symphony concert yesterday at each break in a program, which consisted of familiar and well-liked pieces by Dvorak, Wagner and Berlioz, and one novelty, an orchestral arrangement by Henri Busser of Debussy's "Little Suite," written for piano four hands. There was no soloist. The diminished orchestra, with a few new men, again gave a performance that proved beyond question that the season will be finished at no sacrifice of quality.

Dvorak's "New World" Symphony is a favorite illustration with those who believe that American art should derive its themes and atmosphere from American folk music. Its rhythms certainly are often like those of negro music, but the composer's Bohemian compatriots say that they are also the rhythms of his native folk music.

The themes are all Dvorak's own, beyond question. It is a fruitless task to explore the sources of masterpieces in a hope of being able to find a formula which will replace the creative imagination of productive genius. The important thing about this symphony is its intrinsic musical worth.

Like all Dvorak's music it shows great fertility of melodic invention and little skill in development and variation. It is spontaneous, not well made. There are some banal harmonies. The performance was spirited, yet balanced and proportioned.

Wagner fared less well than Dvorak at Mr Monteux' hands. The "Lohengrin" Prelude demands a more smoothly mounting crescendo, and in the "Waldweben" the leading motives did not stand out solidly from the orchestral background.

The pretty "Little Suite" sounds much better on the piano than it does in M. Busser's flat-footed and probably pot-boiling arrangement, yet Mr Monteux achieved a spirited performance.

The remarkably brilliant performance of the "Rackoczy March" with which the concert closed was a triumph for all concerned. It far surpassed that given here recently by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

Next week Rudolph Ganz will play the solo part in Saint-Saens' Fifth Piano Concerto. The other numbers are to be a "Concerto Grosso" by Handel; the prelude to "Parsifal," and Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride."

Record Mar 27

40—Dazzling, Dancing,

THE 'NEW WORLD'

Depleted Symphony Orchestra Given Warm Approval

By J. V. CLARK

The depleted Boston Symphony Orchestra gave another concert yesterday afternoon to a capacity audience that applauded to the echo Pierre Monteux, the conductor, and the faithful. The applause was deserved, for the concert was a brilliant one. The program was an applause-getter if ever there was one. The Symphony was the "New World" of Dvorak; there were two Wagnerian numbers, a new, delicious little suites by Debussy and the brilliant Rokacy March by Berlioz.

People applaud the music they know and love. All of this music, save the Debussy, is familiar to one and all. The placing of the "Lohengrin" prelude on the program was a challenge by Mr. Monteux to those reviewers, who have said that the string section was sadly injured by the strikers. It is, of course, perfectly apparent to the most untrained ear that there is much of the volume lacking in the strings that was there before the strike, but the tone is still the lovely silver tone that has made this section of the orchestra famous the country over.

The Berlioz march, too, ordinarily sounds better with a band of greater proportions, but Mr. Monteux played it with such fire and sweep that the effect was electrical.

With the Dvorak symphony the orchestra was on fairly easy ground. This symphony, with its American folk tunes Bohemianized, sounds fully as well with an orchestra of 70 as with an orchestra of 100.

The work is orchestrated in such a clear, simple, straightforward style, its workmanship is so neat and its appeal is so essentially the appeal of simple tunes rather than great effects that it goes splendidly with a small orchestra.

There is, of course, no intention on the part of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to let the orchestra stand at its present size. Even the most ardent admirer of Mr. Monteux, the trustees and the established order at Symphony Hall would not advise such a stand, but until matters have been adjusted and the band is again at its peace time strength the concerts are of sufficient merit to warrant the approbation of all music lovers.

What the future of orchestral music in Boston will be no man knoweth. For the spring season of 1920 Boston is enjoying excellent orchestral concerts.

RECRUITS PLAY FOR SYMPHONY

Advertiser Mar 28

Ten of 32 Places Left Vacant Already Filled; Concert Brilliant

By E. F. HARKINS.

In spite of its still croppled condition, the Smyphony Orchestra's nineteenth matinee concert was one of the best of the season. The orchestra is being recruited slowly. Of the thirty-two places left vacant after the Fradkin incident, ten have been filled, at least temporarily. Some twenty more players are needed to make up the regular complement.

Among the recruits who took part in the nineteenth pair of concerts were Rettberg, tympani player, and Hempe, of trombone fame. In its long career the orchestra has had only two tympanists, Rettberg and Neumann. The later followed Fradkin into what is called the American Federation Symphony Orchestra of Boston.

In the latest program the customary roster is displaced by a statement from the trustees of the orchestra, acknowledging contributions to the projected $3,000,000 maintenance fund.

The attitude of the trustees and patrons indicate thot powerful efforts are to be made this year to sustain the orchestra under the independent policy fixed many years ago by Major Higginson.

The 19th program comprised Dvorak's symphony in E minor, "From the New World," which was written luring the composer's stay in New York; two Wogner numbers, the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "Forest Murmurs" from "Sitgfried"; Debussy's "Petite Suite," offered for the first time at these concerts, and the Rakoczy March from Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust." The present weakness of the string sections of the orchestra was evident here and there in forte passages; nevertheless, the concert was brilliant and thoroughly delightful from first to last.

The Debussy "novelty" is in reality a work nearly twenty years old. The suite was written for two pianos and then Henri Busser turned it into an orchestral piece. It is not typical Debussy music, for it abounds in the frank melodious expressions that Debussy disdained when he became an impressionist. To see an audience toking genuine delight in Debussy "tunes," as in the folk-song moods of the Dvrok symphony, was indeed a rare spectacle.

Christmas No Santa Claus

Monitor Mar 27

..., SATURDAY, MARCH

MUSIC

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The program of the nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on March 27 was as follows:

Dvorák, Symphony "From the New World"
Wagner.....Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Wagner..Forest murmurs from "Siegfried"
Debussy.....Petite Suite
Orchestrated by Henri Büsser
Berlioz....."Rákóczy March"

Dvořák's symphony has not been heard here for some time, and it was a pleasure to renew acquaintance with this old friend, at one time so frequently to be met with. The largo and scherzo are still as fresh as ever, still making their emotional appeal. The other movements have lost somewhat in charm. The development of the themes seems stilted and old-fashioned.

The prelude to "Lohengrin" is always impressive, but the necessity of playing the "Forest Murmurs" is not entirely obvious. Whatever the value of this scene may be in the theater, it is certainly ineffective in the concert room. The picturing of the forest has been done more strikingly and suggestively by other composers.

Debussy's suite, originally written for pianoforte, four hands, but now cleverly orchestrated by Henri Büsser, is agreeable music. Music of this character was good to hear after the more serious and taxing moods of the program. Refined, ingratiating, it pleased an appreciative, even enthusiastic audience. Berlioz's march has seldom been given a more inspiring reading. Under Mr. Monteux's hands the "great romanticist" is gradually coming into his own in this city where his music has suffered so much in the past from unsympathetic interpretations.

The orchestra played with unusual beauty of tone and great flexibility.

SYMPHONY IS HEARD AT BEST

Depleted Boston Orchestra Gives Artistic Performance of Well Selected Program

By FRED J. McISAAC.

That fabled bird, the phoenix, which rose triumphant from its ashes has to yield the palm to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The strife beset organization gave a concert yesterday afternoon which can be described as brilliant because there isn't any more effective adjective.

About seventy-five men were in place, the same band which made the Southern tour last week and collected so many encomiums. The hall was packed and the audience extremely applausive.

WELL SELECTED PROGRAM.

Monteux has been skilful in selecting works which did not require a larger orchestra than he possessed, and as a matter of fact there are few symphonic works which cannot be admirably played by seventy-five men. He is also advancing as a conductor by leaps and bounds. No Prussian drill master ever built up a finer orchestra climax than he achieved in the Hungarian march from Berlioz's Damnation of Faust.

The war is undoubtedly over when a French conductor will play the national airs of one of our former enemies and an American audience will greet it with terrific applause. But that march is a glorious thing.

Dvorak's symphony "From the New World" opened the pragram; a Lohengrin prelude, and the Forest Murmur, a tone poem arranged from "Siegfried" by Wagner, and a little suite by Debussy was played for the first time in Boston. This was a work written in the youth of Debussy as a piano duet. He thought so little of it that he allowed another composer to make an orchestration of it, and the result is that it doesn't sound in the least like the Debussy we know.

NEW MEMBERS SKILLFUL.

Of course there is a hole in the string section of the Boston Symphony which can be replaced only with the greatest difficulty, and the volume of the strings is somewhat lessened thereby, but so far as I can notice no other serious harm has come to the orchestra through the secession of a third of its men. The new members, up to the present, have been skillfully chosen.

Trans.

, MARCH 27, 1920

phony

SYMPHONY CONCERT

NEW MOODS ASTIR THROUGH THE AUDIENCE

Hearers That Recent Happenings Have Awakened—A Sufficient Orchestra, with Conductor and Men on Their Mettle—The Restless and Waning Secession—Wagner, Berlioz, Debussy and Dvorak Fill a Diversified and Agreeable Programme

AREKINDLED audience, stimulating to see, hear and feel, now frequents the Symphony Concerts. It is numerous as usual; even yesterday when there was no "assisting artist" and no outstanding piece, it filled every seat in Symphony Hall. Thither, however, it goes in a new spirit. No longer does it take orchestra, conductor, concerts, as a matter of course. The recent secession from the band, the malignant desire of a few seceders, to disrupt and extinguish it—could they work their full will—have awakened the subscribing public to new sense of pleasures received and returns to render. It hears the chosen music with quickened ears, freshly it notes the merit, the distinctions of performance; in a difficult hour it would encourage the conductor and his forces, the directing management, the sustaining trustees. Hence the intent listening of yesterday; hence the long, hearty and sincere applause bestowed upon Mr. Monteux and all concerned; hence a pervading atmosphere of animation, interest, pleasure. "The trustees," said a leaf in the programme-book, replacing the usual tabulation of the orchestra, "heartily thank the patrons who have already contributed, according to their varying means, by checks and pledges to the future maintenance of the orchestra. This prompt response to the first suggestion that a permanent fund will be raised, gives clear proof of the support to be expected from Boston concert-goers. Every immediate contributor helps to give the campaign the strong start essential to its ultimate success." By the same token every such concert as that of yesterday helps, by the temper of both stage and auditorium, to surmount the present and assure the future.

As it is the orchestra comprises seventy-odd players, three-quarters, and a little more, of the usual numbers in recent years. It is as large, indeed, as it was through not a few auspicious and unquestioned seasons of beginning. Sundry young musicians, already tested and waiting opportunity to join the band, have increased the string choir; out of semi-retirement have come such a virtuoso of the trombone as Mr. Hamper and so expert a kettle-drummer as Mr. Rettberger. The orchestra is quite large enough for a wide choice of pieces distributed through interesting programmes. The several choirs are better balanced than they were a fortnight ago, and there was little hint of diminished tone even in the divided violins of the prelude to Wagner's opera, "Lohengrin." Only in the forest-music from his later "Siegfried"—a more closely woven music—did the hearer miss a full-throated underbody of tone, a larger sonority. Even in the Rákóczy March from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," the orchestra flamed and clanged. With every choir in such mettle as it was yesterday, with every individual player clearly minded to do his utmost, the orchestra holds firm and supple. In it as in the audience is new esprit de corps.

Moreover, there is reason to expect a gradual secession from the seceders themselves—a secession indeed that has already begun. It is an open secret, though obviously they do not hand it to the newspapers, that certain men in their ranks are quietly on their way back to Symphony Hall. It is as true, though again their spokesmen overlook the matter, that certain others are making contracts that by next autumn, if not earlier, will take them far from any actual or hypothetical Boston Orchestra. Zest for the secession is manifestly cooling outside a few faithful "Fradkinattes." In new contacts the more intelligent seceders have discovered that not a few blatant partisans of "unionism," "Americanization" and that sort of thing count the hearing of symphonic music like to a visit to the dentist and are no more inclined to pay money for it than they would for a series of lectures on the epistle to the Ephesians.

By this time these men are as well aware that the sentiment of the sustaining public for symphony concerts in Boston runs almost unanimously against them; that many a conductor, manager and guarantor of orchestra or opera company in America, whatever may be his public pretence, is eagerly watching and waiting to see Symphony Hall make head against an over-exacting union and in private, makes no secret of his desire. Worse still, as some say, the august officers of the union itself, having "demands" elsewhere to enforce, are by no means so zealous in this "Boston affair" as they were expected to be. Hence more "unrest" even among the restless and the amusing whistling to keep up courage that pipes out almost every day a new orchestra—to be incorporated—a new concert hall—to be built, a new nebula of some sort for the seceders' rather empty heaven. They themselves put no faith in these outgivings. They are a part of the game; they deceive no one; there is reason to believe that even the vasty vanity of Mr. Fradkin does swallow them with a painful gulp. Events, or rather the failure of events to eventuate, are gradually curing the seceders of that painful, lingering, very human malady which is self-deceit.

Familiar pieces, except one, naturally filled the concert and that one—Debussy's "Little Suite"—is no more than a dexterous, pleasant trifle. He wrote it as piano-duet in his young years; perhaps to put a few hundred francs in his purse; thirteen years later, when Debussy was celebrated but not prolific, Henri Büsser, musical man of all work in Paris, obligingly and amiably scored it for orchestra. It begins with pretty little melodies in lightly swaying rhythms—"En Bateau"; continues with a brightly paced march-tune with a tinkling intermezzo—"Cortège"; proceeds with an artfully artless Minuet; ends with dance-tunes, now sparkling, now sensuous—"Ballet." It is all neat, pretty, graceful, charming; the late Monsieur Massenet, the venerable—some prefer senile—Monsieur Saint-Saëns would surely admire it; any drawing-room would not talk shrilly enough quite to drown it. Barely once, and curiously in the Minuet does Debussy show the budding horns of individual idiom and innovation. Enough that innate elegance and finesse adorn his trifle. On that score in performance, Mr. Monteux, the string and the wind choirs matched him. The foil, for concluding number, was Berlioz's Rákóczy March—the antipodes of the "Little Suite," music that stamps and shouts, boils and flames, sweeps tribes or armies forward, cries with them to each other and to heaven. Somehow the "big note" of these "Romantics" somehow outlasts the purlings of Messieurs les Elégants. Fortunately for his audience, Mr. Monteux keeps good company with both.

Wagner and Dvorák provided the rest—the Wagner of the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the forest-music in the second act of "Siegfried"; the Dvorák of the symphony, "From the New World." The Prelude was test-piece to the string choir; contrary to anticipation, there was no hint of diminished numbers; beyond expectation, silvery shimmer and then golden glow of tone lighted the pathway of the Grail descending from heaven, reascending to it. As of old, the music wrought illusion; mystical and romantic voice blended within it; in pure loveliness of melodic progress, it sang anew. In riper years, Wagner wrote more spaciously, more intensively; but not until the end in "Parsifal," with such ethereal beauty summoned anew. Vigorously Mr. Monteux swept the Grail across the troubled earth; a shade too slow was, perhaps, the pace of descent and ascent; but at his hands the prelude was thrilling to hear. Somehow, he is not always so eloquent with fragments of Wagner's later music-drama. Two or three months ago he fell short of the might and splendor of day, the stern and quiver of the forests in the sunshine, the clang of heroic youth in the postlude that sends Siegfried up to Brynhild's fiery rock evaded him. But the Volsung music sang deep especially on Mr. Bedetti's violoncello, while the birds might have envied Mr. Laurent's flute. There was also Dvorák's symphony—a simple, homely, transparent music, as easy to write, seemingly, as it is easy to hear, born of elementaray instinct for tune rhythm and color, stirring responsive instinct in those that hear gladly, open-heartedly. Thereby it has survived many a page of more sophisticated and artificial music. After all, a symphonic primer may be pleasant to con. Mr. Monteux turned the worn leaves quickly.

H. T. PARKER.

Globe Mar 28

BOSTON SUNDAY

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Symphony Orchestra Finances

The current endeavor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to raise an endowment fund of $3,000,000 lends point to the query how symphony orchestras are supported.

It is well known that the Boston Symphony has always had to face an annual deficit, which during the years from 1881 to 1913 averaged about $20,000, according to the historical sketch published in 1914 by Mr M. A. DeWolfe Howe. According to a recent statement by Judge Cabot, now chairman of the trustees, the deficit last season was nearly $100,000, the largest on record. During the 37 seasons of Maj Higginson's control, which ended in May, 1918, he paid all deficits out of his own pocket. This means that the audiences of the concerts here and elsewhere benefitted by an expenditure of nearly $1,000,000, made by a single public spirited citizen determined to give this city the best possible orchestra, regardless of expense.

The present board of 10 trustees, with the aid, it is said, of a few others, have since made good the deficits. They are now giving the subscribers to the concerts and others interested in them a chance to help by making contributions to a permanent fund large enough, so that it should provide an income capable of meeting all expenses.

It is not necessary to enter into the merits of the present controversy on the subject of unionizing the orchestra, which has no necessary connection with the methods by which the concerts are to be financed, or with the financial procedure in other cities where orchestras are maintained.

None Are Self-Supporting

The first thing that is obvious in any survey of the Symphony Orchestras throughout the world is that there does not appear to be one anywhere which is run as a self-supporting business enterprise. Not only are there never any profits from existing orchestras, except sporadically for single years, but there is seemingly never any hope of profit on the part of the founders and sustainers of them.

There are, of course, in many lesser and in some great cities, in America and England, orchestras made up of musicians who are either cultivated amateurs or holders of other positions which bring them their living, to whom playing symphonies is a recreation. These Symphony Orchestras, like such choruses as the Handel and Haydn Society in Boston, often make a profit on the small number of concerts given annually. But it is not fair to compare such organizations on a voluntary basis with the great orchestras which demand most of the time and energy of every member during eight months out of every year. No great orchestra can rely chiefly on local talent voluntarily contributed in recruiting its personnel. It must search for the best players and especially for the best leader available, and the best is seldom the cheapest.

It is difficult to explain to a sceptic exactly why the choice of a conductor is of such great importance to an orchestra. The average nonmusician is likely to assume that anyone capable of beating time with a stick will serve. Yet the difference in the playing of any orchestra under a new leader is so marked that his influence ought to become obvious to every listener.

The point to stress in the present connection is simply that first-rate conductors are so rare that there are not more than 20 of them in the profession at a given moment, so that the competition to obtain their services makes a very high salary necessary. The figures for the Boston Orchestra have never been officially announced, but current rumor puts the leader's salary at $25,000 a year. It is certain that the Detroit Orchestra pays Mr Gabrilowitsch $27,500.

Since, therefore, it is impossible, judging by experience, to make a first-rate Symphony Orchestra a dividend-paying proposition, and since there will always be a deficit, the problem to be faced in every city where one is to be maintained is how to meet the deficit.

Orchestras Public Necessities

If it is assumed, as it is in Germany, France and in Russia, under both Czars and Bolsheviki, that Symphony Orchestras are public necessities, just as much as schools and museums and parks are, the problem is met by an appropriation of public funds raised by taxation. If it is assumed, as it has so far been in most parts of the English-speaking world, that although band concerts in the parks in Summer are public necessities, Symphony concerts are luxuries for the idle rich, nothing but private generosity can make the latter possible.

The private generosity which has so far maintained our Symphony Orchestras in this country has taken several forms. There have been few individuals able and willing to bear the whole financial burden of great orchestras alone, as Maj Higginson did for so long. The New York Symphony Society has been aided greatly by H. H. Flagler, the railroad magnate, and the Philharmonic Society in New York owes its present fine orchestra largely to a bequest from the late Joseph Pulitzer.

The Philadelphia Orchestra has just raised an endowment fund of $1,000,000, which relieves numerous guarantors of the major portion of their responsibility. It was stated in the drive for this fund that without it the orchestra would have to give up all endeavor to rank, as it now does, among the best in the world, because it would not be able to afford the best players.

The Chicago Orchestra owns its own hall, which was built with money collected by public subscription, in which small contributions bulked large. Rental of the hall, and reduction of fixed charges, has reduced the deficit and left a chance for a small annual surplus in the best years.

The other orchestras, except one in Baltimore, which is aided by the city, simply duplicate the forms of private benevolence exemplified above. It is unsafe to rely on an individual who may die or grow tired of orchestral music. Trusting to a group of individuals is even less secure, because no one among them can feel quite as much personal pride and responsibility as a single founder and sustainer feels. A permanent endowment fund is the only sure way of maintaining an orchestra in this country at present. Let us hope that Boston will raise one for its old orchestra, and, perhaps, another for a new one.

Concert Program of the Week

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8—Boston Symphony Orchestra, 20th program. Prelude to "Parsifal," Wagner; Concerto Grosso in D-major, Handel; Concerto No. 5 for pianoforte and orchestra, Saint-Saëns; overture to "The Bartered Bride," Smetana. Soloist, Rudolph Ganz.

Transcript Mar 27

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Haendel, Wagner, Smetana, Saint-Saëns on Mr. Monteux's Programme—Mr. Ganz for Assisting Pianist—Mr. Heifetz Before Long Absence—Novel French Songs from Miss Frank—Other Recitals

ANOTHER well distributed and promising miscellany fills Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next. It begins with a full-voiced, full-bodied, striding Concerto Grosso of Händel, written for string choir and containing solo-parts for the first violins (Messrs. Theodorowicz and Hoffmann; the first viola (Mr. Denayer) and the first violoncello (Mr. Bedetti). Next comes the anguished and aspiring prelude to Wagner's opera, "Parsifal," much applauded from Mr. Monteux in other cities; then Saint-Saëns's rarely heard concerto in F major for piano and orchestra with Mr. Ganz, at last revisiting Boston in the solo part; and finally, the flashing, racing overture to Smetana's Czech opera, "The Bartered Bride"—for long years one of the virtuoso-feats of the Boston band.

For the concert of the orchestra in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge on Thursday evening, Mr. Monteux has set the same programme with a change of concerto. On the other side of the Charles, Mr. Albert Stoessel will be the "assisting artis and he will be heard in Brahms's concer for violin and orchestra. He is easy recall as a promising violinist, who returne from Berlin to Boston and subsequently m rated to St. Louis to be concert-master Mr. Zach's orchestra.

Adv. Mar 28

charge.

GANZ SYMPHONY SOLOIST

In commemoration of Good Friday,

BOST

Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" will h be played at the Symphony concerts next Friday and Saturday. Pierre Monteau will also conduct Handel's "Concerto Grosso" for string orchestra. Rudolph Ganz, the eminent Swiss pianist, will play with the orchestra Saint-Saens' concerto in F major. The closing piece will be Smetana's overture to "The Sol Bride."

HEIFETZ' FAR

Post Mar 28

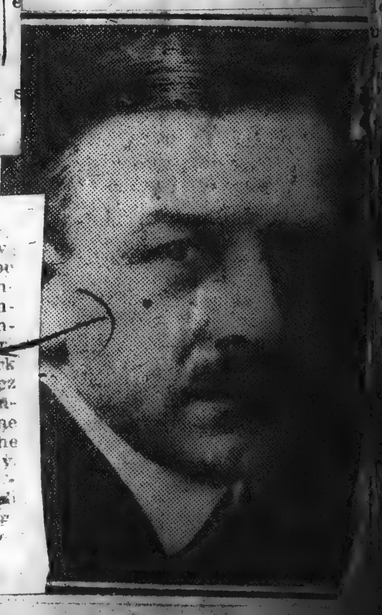
Symphony Concert

The programme of the 20th concert of he Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening n Symphony Hall will consist of Handel's "Concerto Grosso," No. 5, in D major, for string orchestra, with J. Theodorowicz and J. Hoffmann as solo violins, F. Denayer, solo viola, and Jean Bedetti, solo 'cellist; Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal"; Saint-Saens' fifth piano concerto in F major—the concerto of which the slow movement is built on a Nubian love song—and Smetana's sparkling overture to his operatic comedy, "The Bartered Bride."

Herald Mar 28

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

In commemoration of Good Friday Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal" will be played at the Boston Symphony concerts Friday and Saturday. Mr. Monteux will also conduct Handel's "Concerto Grosso" in D-major for string orchestra. The solo parts in this work will be taken by Messrs. Theodorowicz and Hoffman, violins; Bedetti, violincello, and Denayer, viola. However, the soloist proper will be Rudolph Ganz, the eminent Swiss pianist, who will play Saint-Saens's Concerto No. 5 in F Major, one of the movements of which was construeted on a Nubian love song. The brilliant closing piece will be Smetana's Overture to "The Sold Bride."



ETHEL FRANK

Trans.

Chopin.

The Harvard Glee Club, whose new prowess in choral singing is recounted elsewhere in these columns, will share with the Symphony Orchestra the concert for its Pension Fund at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 18. It well deserves the invitation.

SYMPHONY IS HEARD AT BEST

Depleted Boston Orchestra Gives Artistic Performance of Well Selected Program

By FRED J. McISAAC.

That fabled bird, the phoenix, which rose triumphant from its ashes has to yield the palm to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The strife beset organization gave a concert yesterday afternoon which can be described as brilliant because there isn't any more effective adjective.

About seventy-five men were in place, the same band which made the Southern tour last week and collected so many encomiums. The hall was packed and the audience extremely applausive.

WELL SELECTED PROGRAM.

Monteux has been skilful in selecting works which did not require a larger orchestra than he possessed. and as a matter of fact there are few symphonic works which cannot be admirably played by seventy-five men. He is also advancing as a conductor by leaps and bounds. No Prussian drill master ever built up a finer orchestra climax than he achieved in the Hungarian march from Berlioz's Damnation of Faust.

The war is undoubtedly over when a French conductor will play the national airs of one of our former enemies and an American audience will greet it with terrific applause. But that march is a glorious thing.

Dvorak's symphony "From the New World" opened the program: a Lohengrin prelude, and the Forest Murmur, a tone poem arranged from "Siegfried" by Wagner, and a little suite by Debussy was played for the first time in Boston. This was a work written in the youth of Debussy as a piano duet. He thought so little of it that he allowed another composer to make an orchestration of it, and the result is that it doesn't sound in the least like the Debussy we know.

NEW MEMBERS SKILLFUL.

Of course there is a hole in the string section of the Boston Symphony which can be replaced only with the greatest difficulty, and the volume of the strings is somewhat lessened thereby, but so far as I can notice no other serious harm has come to the orchestra through the secession of a third of its men. The new members, up to the present, have been skillfully chosen.

As it is, the orchestra comprises seventy-odd players, three-quarters, and a little more, of the usual numbers in recent years. It is as large, indeed, as it was through not a few auspicious and unquestioned seasons of beginning. Sundry young musicians, already tested and waiting opportunity to join the band, have increased the string choir; out of semi-retirement have come such a virtuoso of the trombone as Mr. Hamper and so expert a kettle-drummer as Mr. Rettberger. The orchestra is quite large enough for a wide choice of pieces distributed through interesting programmes. The several choirs are better balanced than they were a fortnight ago, and there was little hint of diminished tone even in the divided violins of the prelude to Wagner's opera, "Lohengrin." Only in the forest-music from his later "Siegfried"—a more closely woven music—did the hearer miss a full-throated underbody of tone, a larger sonority. Even in the Rákóczy March from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," the orchestra flamed and clanged. With every choir in such mettle as it was yesterday, with every individual player clearly minded to do his utmost, the orchestra holds firm and supple. In it as in the audience is new esprit de corps.

Moreover, there is reason to expect a gradual secession from the seceders themselves—a secession indeed that has already begun. It is an open secret, though obviously they do not hand it to the newspapers, that certain men in their ranks are quietly on their way back to Symphony Hall. It is as true, though again their spokesmen overlook the matter, that certain others are making contracts that by next autumn, if not earlier, will take them far from any actual or hypothetical Boston Orchestra. Zest for the secession is manifestly cooling outside a few faithful "Fradkinettes." In new contacts the more intelligent seceders have discovered that not a few blatant partisans of "unionism," "Americanization" and that sort of thing count the hearing of symphonic music like to a visit to the dentist and are no more inclined to pay money for it than they would for a series of lectures on the epistle to the Ephesians.

By this time these men are as well aware that the sentiment of the sustaining public for symphony concerts in Boston runs almost unanimously against them; that many a conductor, manager and guarantor of orchestra or opera company in America, whatever may be his public pretence, is eagerly watching and waiting to see Symphony Hall make head against an over-exacting union and in private, makes no secret of his desire. Worse still, as some say, the august officers of the union itself, having "demands" elsewhere to enforce, are by no means so zealous in this "Boston affair" as they were expected to be. Hence more "unrest" even among the restless and the amusing whistling to keep up courage that pipes out almost every day a new orchestra—to be incorporated—a new concert hall—to be built, a new nebula of some sort for the seceders' rather empty heaven. They themselves put no faith in these outgivings. They are a part of the game; they deceive no one; there is reason to believe that even the vasty vanity of Mr. Fradkin does swallow them with a painful gulp. Events, or rather the failure of events to eventuate, are gradually curing the seceders of that painful, lingering, very human malady which is self-deceit.

Familiar pieces, except one, naturally filled the concert and that one—Debussy's "Little Suite"—is no more than a dexterous, pleasant trifle. He wrote it as piano-duet in his young years; perhaps to put a few hundred francs in his purse; thirteen years later, when Debussy was celebrated but not prolific, Henri Büsser, musical man of all work in Paris, obligingly and amiably scored it for orchestra. It begins with pretty little melodies in lightly swaying rhythms—"En Bateau"; continues with a brightly paced march-tune with a tinkling intermezzo—"Cortège"; proceeds with an artfully artless Minuet; ends with dance-tunes, now sparkling, now sensuous—"Ballet." It is all neat, pretty, graceful, charming; the late Monsieur Massenet, the venerable—some prefer senile—Monsieur Saint-Saëns would surely admire it; any drawing-room would not talk shrilly enough quite to drown it. Barely once, and curiously in the Minuet does Debussy show the budding horns of individual idiom and innovation. Enough that innate elegance and finesse adorn his trifle. On that score in performance, Mr. Monteux, the string and the wind choirs matched him. The foil, for concluding number, was Berlioz's Rákóczy March—the antipodes of the "Little Suite," music that stamps and shouts, boils and flames, sweeps tribes or armies forward, cries with them to each other and to heaven. Somehow the "big note" of these "Romantics" somehow outlasts the purlings of Messieurs les Elégants. Fortunately for his audience, Mr. Monteux keeps good company with both.

Wagner and Dvorak provided the rest—the Wagner of the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the forest-music in the second act of "Siegfried"; the Dvorak of the symphony, "From the New World." The Prelude was test-piece to the string choir; contrary to anticipation, there was no hint of diminished numbers; beyond expectation, silvery shimmer and then golden glow of tone lighted the pathway of the Grail descending from heaven, reascending to it. As of old, the music wrought illusion; mystical and romantic voice blended within it; in pure loveliness of melodic progress, it sang anew. In riper years, Wagner wrote more spaciously, more intensively; but not until the end in "Parsifal," with such ethereal beauty summoned anew. Vigorously Mr. Monteux swept the Grail across the troubled earth; a shade too slow was, perhaps, the pace of descent and ascent; but at his hands the prelude was thrilling to hear. Somehow, he is not always so eloquent with fragments of Wagner's later music-drama. Two or three months ago he fell short of the might and splendor of the glorification of Siegfried dead; yesterday, the sheen and quiver of the forests in the sunshine, the clang of heroic youth in the postlude that sends Siegfried up to Brynhild's fiery rock evaded him. But the Volsung music sang deep especially on Mr. Bedetti's violoncello, while the birds might have envied Mr. Laurent's flute. There was also Dvorak's symphony—a simple, homely, transparent music, as easy to write, seemingly, as it is easy to hear, born of elementaray instinct for tune rhythm and color, stirring responsive instinct in those that hear gladly, openheartedly. Thereby it has survived many a page of more sophisticated and artificial music. After all, a symphonic primer may be pleasant to con. Mr. Monteux turned the worn leaves quickly.

H. T. PARKER

Globe Mar 28

BOSTON SUNDAY

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Symphony Orchestra Finances

The current endeavor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to raise an endowment fund of $3,000,000 lends point to the query how symphony orchestras are supported.

It is well known that the Boston Symphony has always had to face an annual deficit, which during the years from 1881 to 1913 averaged about $20,000, according to the historical sketch published in 1914 by Mr M. A. DeWolfe Howe. According to a recent statement by Judge Cabot, now chairman of the trustees, the deficit last season was nearly $100,000, the largest on record. During the 37 seasons of Maj Higginson's control, which ended in May, 1918, he paid all deficits out of his own pocket. This means that the audiences of the concerts here and elsewhere benefitted by an expenditure of nearly $1,000,000, made by a single public spirited citizen determined to give this city the best possible orchestra, regardless of expense.

The present board of 10 trustees, with the aid, it is said, of a few others, have since made good the deficits. They are now giving the subscribers to the concerts and others interested in them a chance to help by making contributions to a permanent fund large enough, so that it should provide an income capable of meeting all expenses.

It is not necessary to enter into the merits of the present controversy on the subject of unionizing the orchestra, which has no necessary connection with the methods by which the concerts are to be financed, or with the financial procedure in other cities where orchestras are maintained.

None Are Self-Supporting

The first thing that is obvious in any survey of the Symphony Orchestras throughout the world is that there does not appear to be one anywhere which is run as a self-supporting business enterprise. Not only are there never any profits from existing orchestras, except sporadically for single years, but there is seemingly never any hope of profit on the part of the founders and sustainers of them.

There are, of course, in many lesser and in some great cities, in America and England, orchestras made up of musicians who are either cultivated amateurs or holders of other positions which bring them their living, to whom playing symphonies is a recreation. These Symphony Orchestras, like such choruses as the Handel and Haydn Society in Boston, often make a profit on the small number of concerts given annually. But it is not fair to compare such organizations on a voluntary basis with the great orchestras which demand most of the time and energy of every member during eight months out of every year. No great orchestra can rely chiefly on local talent voluntarily contributed in recruiting its personnel. It must search for the best players and especially for the best leader available, and the best is seldom the cheapest.

It is difficult to explain to a sceptic exactly why the choice of a conductor is of such great importance to an orchestra. The average nonmusician is likely to assume that anyone capable of beating time with a stick will serve. Yet the difference in the playing of any orchestra under a new leader is so marked that his influence ought to become obvious to every listener.

The point to stress in the present connection is simply that first-rate conductors are so rare that there are not more than 20 of them in the profession at a given moment, so that the competition to obtain their services makes a very high salary necessary. The figures for the Boston Orchestra have never been officially announced, but current rumor puts the leader's salary at $25,000 a year. It is certain that the Detroit Orchestra pays Mr Gabrilowitsch $27,500.

Since, therefore, it is impossible, judging by experience, to make a first-rate Symphony Orchestra a dividend-paying proposition, and since there will always be a deficit, the problem to be faced in every city where one is to be maintained is how to meet the deficit.

Orchestras Public Necessities

If it is assumed, as it is in Germany, France and in Russia, under both Czars and Bolsheviki, that Symphony Orchestras are public necessities, just as much as schools and museums and parks are, the problem is met by an appropriation of public funds raised by taxation. If it is assumed, as it has so far been in most parts of the English-speaking world, that although band concerts in the parks in Summer are public necessities, Symphony concerts are luxuries for the idle rich, nothing but private generosity can make the latter possible.

The private generosity which has so far maintained our Symphony Orchestras in this country has taken several forms. There have been few individuals able and willing to bear the whole financial burden of great orchestras alone, as Maj Higginson did for so long. The New York Symphony Society has been aided greatly by H. H. Flagler, the railroad magnate, and the Philharmonic Society in New York owes its present fine orchestra largely to a bequest from the late Joseph Pulitzer.

The Philadelphia Orchestra has just raised an endowment fund of $1,000,000, which relieves numerous guarantors of the major portion of their responsibility. It was stated in the appeals for this fund that without it the orchestra would have to give up all endeavor to rank, as it now does, among the best in the world, because it would not be able to afford the best players.

The Chicago Orchestra owns its own hall, which was built with money collected by public subscription, in which small contributions bulked large. Rental of the hall, and reduction of fixed charges, has reduced the deficit and left a chance for a small annual surplus in the best years.

The other orchestras, except one in Baltimore, which is aided by the city, simply duplicate the forms of private benevolence exemplified above. It is unsafe to rely on an individual who may die or grow tired of orchestral music. Trusting to a group of individuals is even less secure, because no one among them can feel quite as much personal pride and responsibility as a single founder and sustainer feels. A permanent endowment fund is the only sure way of maintaining an orchestra in this country at present. Let us hope that Boston will raise one for its old orchestra, and, perhaps, another for a new one.

Concert Program of the Week

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8—Boston Symphony Orchestra, 20th program. Prelude to "Parsifal," Wagner; Concerto Grosso in D-major, Handel; Concerto No. 5 for pianoforte and orchestra, Saint-Saens; overture to "The Bartered Bride," Smetana. Soloist, Rudolph Ganz.

Transcript Mar 27

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Haendel, Wagner, Smetana, Saint-Saens on Mr. Monteux's Programme—Mr. Ganz for Assisting Pianist—Mr. Heifetz Before Long Absence—Novel French Songs from Miss Frank—Other Recitals

ANOTHER well distributed and promising miscellany fills Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next. It begins with a full-voiced, full-bodied, striding Concerto Grosso of Händel, written for string choir and containing solo-parts for the first violins (Messrs. Theodorowicz and Hoffmann; the first viola (Mr. Denayer) and the first violoncello (Mr. Bedetti). Next comes the anguished and aspiring prelude to Wagner's opera, "Parsifal," much applauded from Mr. Monteux in other cities; then Saint-Saëns's rarely heard concerto in F major for piano and orchestra with Mr. Ganz, at last revisiting Boston in the solo part; and finally, the flashing, racing overture to Smetana's Czech opera, "The Bartered Bride"—for long years one of the virtuoso-feats of the Boston band.

For the concert of the orchestra in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge on Thursday evening, Mr. Monteux has set the same programme with a change of concerto. On the other side of the Charles, Mr. Albert Stoessel will be the "assisting artis and he will be heard in Brahms's concer for violin and orchestra. He is easy recall as a promising violinist, who returne from Berlin to Boston and subsequently m rated to St. Louis to be concert-master Mr. Zach's orchestra.

Globe Mar 28

charge.

GANZ SYMPHONY SOLOIST

In commemoration of Good Friday, [illegible]

Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" will h be played at the Symphony concerts e next Friday and Saturday. Pierre Monteau will also conduct Handel's "Concerto Grosso" for string orchestra. Rudolph Ganz, the eminent Swiss pianist, will play with the orchestra Saint-Saens' concerto in F major. The closing piece will be Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride."

HEIFETZ' FAREWELL

Post Mar 28

Symphony Concert

The programme of the 20th concert of he Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening n Symphony Hall will consist of Handel's "Concerto Grosso," No. 5, in D major, for string orchestra, with J. Theodorowicz and J. Hoffmann as solo violins, F. Denayer, solo viola, and Jean Bedetti, solo 'cellist; Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal"; Saint-Saens' fifth piano concerto in F major—the concerto of, which the slow movement is built on a Nubian love song—and Smetana's sparkling overture to his operatic comedy, "The Bartered Bride."

Herald Mar 28

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

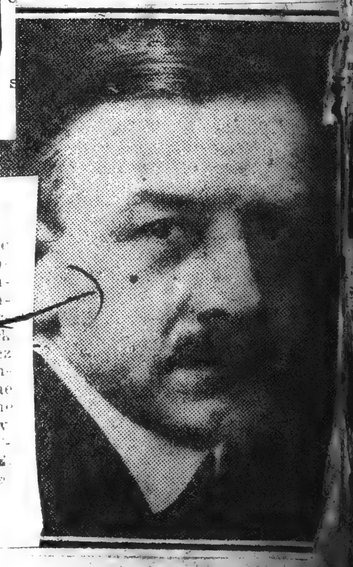
In commemoration of Good Friday Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal" will be played at the Boston Symphony concerts Friday and Saturday. Mr. Monteux will also conduct Handel's "Concerto Grosso" in D-major for string orchestra. The solo parts in this work will be taken by Messrs. Theodorowicz and Hoffman, violins; Bedetti, violincello, and Denayer, viola. However, the soloist proper will be Rudolph Ganz, the eminent Swiss pianist, who will play Saint-Saens's Concerto No. 5 in F Major, one of the movements of which was construeted on a Nubian love song. The brilliant closing piece will be Smetana's Overture to "The Sold Bride."

ETHEL FRANK

Trans.

Chopin.

The Harvard Glee Club, whose new prowess in choral singing is recounted elsewhere in these columns, will share with the Symphony Orchestra the concert for its Pension Fund at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, April 18. It well deserves the invitation.



Amer Mar 27

SYMPHONY IS HEARD AT BEST

Depleted Boston Orchestra Gives Artistic Performance of Well Selected Program

By FRED J. McISAAC.

That fabled bird, the phoenix, which rose triumphant from its ashes has to yield the palm to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The strife beset organization gave a concert yesterday afternoon which can be described as brilliant because there isn't any more effective adjective.

About seventy-five men were in place, the same band which made the Southern tour last week and collected so many encomiums. The hall was packed and the audience extremely applausive.

WELL SELECTED PROGRAM.

Monteux has been skilful in selecting works which did not require a larger orchestra than he possessed. and as a matter of fact there are few symphonic works which cannot be admirably played by seventy-five men. He is also advancing as a conductor by leaps and bounds. No Prussian drill master ever built up a finer orchestra climax than he achieved in the Hungarian march from Berlioz's Damnation of Faust.

The war is undoubtedly over when a French conductor will play the national airs of one of our former enemies and an American audience will greet it with terrific applause. But that march is a glorious thing.

Dvorak's symphony "From the New World" opened the program: a Lohengrin prelude, and the Forest Murmur, a tone poem arranged from "Siegfried" by Wagner, and a little suite by Debussy was played for the first time in Boston. This was a work written in the youth of Debussy as a piano duet. He thought so little of it that he allowed another composer to make an orchestration of it, and the result is that it doesn't sound in the least like the Debussy we know.

NEW MEMBERS SKILLFUL.

Of course there is a hole in the string section of the Boston Symphony which can be replaced only with the greatest difficulty, and the volume of the strings is somewhat lessened thereby, but so far as I can notice no other serious harm has come to the orchestra through the secession of a third of its men. The new members, up to the present, have been skillfully chosen.

Trans.

L, MARCH 27, 1920 *

phony

SYMPHONY CONCERT

NEW MOODS ASTIR THROUGH THE AUDIENCE

Hearers That Recent Happenings Have Awakened—A Sufficient Orchestra, with Conductor and Men on Their Mettle—The Restless and Waning Secession — Wagner, Berlioz, Debussy and Dvorak Fill a Diversified and Agreeable Programme

AREKINDLED audience, stimulating to see, hear and feel, now frequents the Symphony Concerts. It is numerous as usual; even yesterday when there was no "assisting artist" and no outstanding piece, it filled every seat in Symphony Hall. Thither, however, it goes in a new spirit. No longer does it take orchestra, conductor, concerts, as a matter of course. The recent secession from the band, the malignant desire of a few seceders, to disrupt and extinguish it—could they work their full will—have awakened the subscribing public to new sense of pleasures received and returns to render. It hears the chosen music with quickened ears, freshly it notes the merit, the distinctions of performance; in a difficult hour it would encourage the conductor and his forces, the directing management, the sustaining trustees. Hence the intent listening of yesterday; hence the long, hearty and sincere applause bestowed upon Mr. Monteux and all concerned; hence a pervading atmosphere of animation, interest, pleasure. "The trustees," said a leaf in the programme-book, replacing the usual tabulation of the orchestra, "heartily thank the patrons who have already contributed, according to their varying means, by checks and pledges to the future maintenance of the orchestra. This prompt response to the first suggestion that a permanent fund will be raised gives clear proof of the support to be expected from Boston concert-goers. Every immediate contributor helps to give the campaign the strong start essential to its ultimate success." By the same token every such concert as that of yesterday helps, by the temper of both stage and auditorium, to surmount the present and secure the future.

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

MORE SIGNS AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Significant Audience of Saturday—The Seceders in the Orchestra Begin to Return—Mr. Heifetz Takes Leave in Familiar Perfections—Miss Garrison in a Recital of Her Own—American Pieces for Paris

UNMISTAKABLE are the signs of the times at the Symphony Concerts. No "assisting artist" in vogue graced the programme of Saturday evening; no celebrated piece, novel or familiar, stood upon it. Instead, such conventional items as Dvorák's symphony, "From the New World," the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," the forest-music from his "Siegfried," the Rákóczy March of Berlioz, filled it. An orchestra of seventy-odd, instead of an orchestra of ninety-odd, was to play these numbers, and everyone who pays any heed to symphony concerts was well aware of Mr. Monteux's diminished forces—and of the causes of the diminution. Yet every seat in Symphony Hall was occupied and standing-room might have been sold, were it the custom of the concerts to sell it. From the coming of the conductor upon the stage to his final departure from it the applause was as hearty and sincere as all concerned could make it. Mr. Monteux received his share for vivid performance, in particular, of the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and of the Rákóczy March; but plainly it was toward the orchestra that the clappings were most fervent. Not once but twice it was standing to receive just tribute to its present loyalties and present mettle. Out of tribulation, the Symphony Orchestra, the Symphony Concerts, the public of both seemed born again. And as though this were not enough, at the rehearsal this morning three of the seceders were sitting in their places; while applications of others for reinstatement were under consideration. For Händel's Concerto Grosso, to be played on Thursday, Friday and Saturday, Mr. Monteux's string choir numbered a full fifty. Before the secession it counted but fifty-seven. Yes: the Symphony Orchestra does continue.

Mr. Schmitz, the French pianist, who played the solo part in Mr. Carpenter's Concertino with the Symphony Orchestra in Boston last winter and who will repeat it in Cambridge next month, is planning to carry the piece to London and Paris for performance late in the spring. As yet those cities know Mr. Carpenter's music only by the suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator."

When Mr. Cortot, the pianist, plays with the Symphony Orchestra next month he will be heard in two unfamiliar pieces—Beethoven's third Concerto, usually overlooked for the fourth and the fifth, and a Fantasia written by Debussy in his student-years at Rome and discovered after his death among his papers.

Explaining a Disappointment

There was not a little disappointment among the public of the Symphony Concerts last winter when Mr. Kreisler, announced to play Brahms's Concerto for violin, substituted for it Beethoven's, in which he had been often heard here. At the time there was no explanation. Now comes hint of the prompting reasons for the change from the accounts in the New York newspapers of Mr. Kreisler's fortunes with Brahms's Concerto when he played it last week with the Philharmonic Society. Says the Times for example:

> There were great energy and fire in Mr. Kreisler's performance; there were passages of the well-remembered splendid eloquence and fire; a poetical delivery of the beautiful cantilena of a depth and moving quality that few have ever equalled in this concerto. But there was at times something labored in his playing; an effort to produce breadth and power of tone, and especially to gain the movement and the pulse of rhythm that he apparently desired. . . . It must be said, too, that there was occasional uncertainty of intonation in the passage-work and a roughness of execution in some of it that is not a characteristic of Mr. Kreisler's playing at its best. Yet how fine were many of the stretches of wide double stopping in their purity and clearness—effects that are of magical beauty and that give such a strangely marked individuality to certain pages of the concerto.

Items of the Re[illegible] and thereafter into the American Expeditionary Force. Now he has returned ripened—perhaps the more for war-time experiences. His tone is deeper, smoother, richer and at need more incisive. His intelligence reads the music in hand clearly—even when contours are as intricate and contents as abstruse as Brahms in this Concerto chose to make them. Securely he played it—with the mingling of confidence and of warmth that is justice to Brahms's voice and style. He caught the nervous energy, the opening vistas of the first movement, the dusky beauty of the [illegible], the tempered vigors of the finale. Once more the Concerto—spacious, poised, close knit, at once reflective and expansive [illegible] as a man's music for men; [illegible] Mr. Stoessel played it.

Music

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

WELL ON THE WAY TO NORMAL COURSE

The Symphony Orchestra Heard, Nearly as Usual, in Cambridge—Mr. Stoessel Plays Brahms's Violin Concerto—Edwin Hughes, Pianist with Limitations—Mr. Longy to Disinter Fanelli — The Next Bach Festival

POSSIBLY the audience at the Symphony Concert in Cambridge, last evening, believed that the orchestra had so far conquered its recent plight as to need no further encouragement to fortitude. There was reason for such notion, inasmuch as the band, sitting upon the stage of Sanders Theatre, seemed as numerous as it ever is on the further bank of the Charles. True, before and after the playing of Brahms's Concerto for violin, there were shiftings enough from chair to chair in the string choir to suggest that it is not yet quite normal when it must undertake, at short notice, a "repertory piece." On the other hand, Mr. Monteux's violins, violas, violoncellos and basses are now in sufficient force and practice to achieve a full-voiced and warm-blooded performance of a striding Concerto Grosso by Händel; while throughout the evening, there was but one obvious slip among the newcomers—not, as it happened in the freshly recruited strings, but in the brass at an entrance in the prelude to "Parsifal." Otherwise all concerned and all that befell seemed quite normal, even to the hearty applause that is the habit of this audience at Cambridge. Perhaps, it could not have swelled its clapping if it would; yet, when the players upon the wind and the brass instruments came to the stage in the pause after Händel's Concerto, much more than the usual ripple of hands greeted them. By so much at least, the listeners remembered recent incidents; while they can take thought of the future as well as the past, if they are minded to write signatures on a slip in the programme-book inviting them to contributions to the endowment fund. Within and without the "university circle," Cambridge would miss these Symphony Concerts, did an untoward fate overtake the orchestra. As it happens, also, under precedent set by Mr. Higginson, it is asked to pay less for them than any other occasional public of the band. No doubt it remembers recent incidents—one, moreover, in its own theatre—but last evening, it seemed to believe that peace and plenty were already reëstablished. In a sense they are; but by no means have the secession and the consequences of the secession altogether vanished.

Mr. Monteux took his courage in his hands when he set the string choir to a Concerto by Händel within the wooden walls of Sanders Theatre. Those walls are exceedingly resonant and, as always with eighteenth-century pieces, they disclosed every detail of the music—and also of the playing. Händel himself also wrote nakedly—patterns in tone for the patterns' sake before the days in which lush harmonies may opportunely swathe the composer's design or iridescent intricacies mist it. At every turn conductor and choir met well the test. Neither sonority nor incisiveness evaded them. The violins in particular sounded keen and bright; the violas were by no means the "noiseless tenor" of someone's scornful phrase; the darker strings, oftenest making backgrounds, were full-textured. So played, the ample periods of the introduction strode; the patterning of the allegros had pith and point; the slow movement rose in large and flowing curve; the minuet kept its native state; the presto went unhurried and unblurred. By wise choice of pace, Mr. Monteux kept the music to intrinsic dignity; largely he rounded the aspiring phrases; eloquently, as Händel bid, choir answered choir. Ours are the days of pastels and etchings in tones. In these Concerti Grossi, Händel wove tapestries. So the conductor made the music sound. If the flowing finesse of certain ancient music sometimes eludes Mr. Monteux, the contrasting breadths and vigors of a Händel or a Rameau do not.

As resonant were the strings in the succeeding Prelude to "Parsifal," as sharp of accent when Wagner would have his music most anguished, as deep of tone when he answers despair with compassion. As to Händel's Concerto, so is Sanders Theatre to this Prelude—the place above all others hereabouts in which to hear it. For when Wagner in relative old age would write preface and epitome to his final opera, he also put to paper a naked, simplified, concentrated music, distilling and isolating to his purpose his spacious range of means. He strips agony; he unveils mercy; he summons spiritual pomps; he opens celestial vistas. No music that he has written better gains the imagined, the impressive ends. None is freer from tonal rhetoric or mere romantic glamour. As he wrote, Mr. Monteux imparted; in no other fragment of Wagner has he been so eloquent; few heard without emotion. Last for one more test of the strings, the whipping rhythms, the whirring under-voices, the racing pace, the bright glints of Smetana's overture to his Czech opera, "The Bartered Bride." Again they and the music fared well—if not quite to the perfection that haunts virtuoso conductors.

Between the two Preludes stood Brahms's Concerto for violin with Albert Stoessel to play the solo-part. Boston knew him first as youthful and able violinist driven by the war from studies in Berlin. Then he vanished into the St. Louis Orchestra

20TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Strings Excel in Handel's "Concerto"—Prelude to "Parsifal" Given

PROGRAM IN SPIRIT WITH GOOD FRIDAY

By PHILIP HALE

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Monteux conducted. The program was as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso for strings, D major, No. 5 (edited by G. F. Kogel); Wagner, Prelude to "Parsifal"; Saint-Saëns, Concerto, F Major, No. 5, for piano; Smetana, overture to "The Sold Bride." Rudolph Ganz was the pianist. The solo violins in Handel's Concerto were played by Messrs. Theodorowicz and Hoffman; the solo viola, by Mr. Denayer; the solo violoncello by Mr. Bedetti.

There was a triumph of strings in Handel's concerto and in Smetana's overture. Mr. Monteux had confidence in the new members; his confidence was fully justified. It may be said without exaggeration that the present section of second violins is the most capable in the history of the orchestra. Admirable, too, was the work of the other players on stringed instruments. All were severely tested; all acquitted themselves gloriously. The young blood in the orchestra of today is more than a fair exchange for the phlegm of past seasons. The new members and the old were on their mettle.

Now is the time for the trustees to make an energetic, unrelaxing "drive" for the desired endowment. The orchestra, today, is a superb body of players; it will be even a more magnificent institution at the beginning of next season. The great ability of Mr. Monteux as disciplinarian and intepreter is fully recognized. Interest in the "new" orchestra, which contains nearly all the famous players of the past, is at its height. The great public, not only the audiences, should take pride in this orchestra as a civic institution. It should also forbid insidious German propaganda to work its mole-like way in matters of art.

Mr. Monteux has proved that as a program-maker he is far from being a chauvinist; he welcomes music of all nations, provided the music is good.

When one hears a work of Handel played as it was yesterday by soloists and choir, one no longer wonders why Beethoven shortly before his death said of Handel: "He is the master of us all." What freshness, spirit, vitality there is in this old music! The solemn beauty of the Largo, beautifully performed, is Miltonic. There is a grandeur, nobility in the Handelian simplicity that no other composer has attained, not even Bach; not even Palestrina or Vittoria.

The prelude to "Parsifal" was fitly chosen for a concert on Good Friday. What has been said about the character of the drama—and much has been written in bitter comment by warm admirers of the music itself—has not shaken the belief of those regarding "Parsifal" as a profoundly religious work in its symbolism and its realism. Who would rashly disturb this faith? Who would point out much that is obnoxious, abhorrent in the doctrines that are inculcated? The performance, an impressive one, conducted with rare skill and understanding, was heard as if it were part of a religious service.

We became acquainted with Saint-Saëns's concerto 16 years ago, when Mr. Ferruccio—we are tempted to write "Ferocious"—Busoni introduced it, and it made little impression at the time. Yesterday, as it was played by Mr. Ganz and the orchestra, the concerto was engrossing. The thematic material of the first movement no longer seemed almost childish; it reminded one of Mozart's adorable simplicity. Nor is it necessary to say that this material is finely employed. The rhapsodical orientalism, with the use of a Nubian boat song, is fascinating; it does not for a moment degenerate into anything merely bizarre. Saint-Saëns here catches the spirit of the East, but he is not mastered by it; he does not lose his shrewdly observing, coolly reflecting western head. Then comes the rushing finale, which, however, does not throw aside in the excitement the traditional French elegance that characterizes the work of Saint-Saëns. Mr. Ganz played as Saint-Saëns played when he was in his high estate; but with more warmth in the lyric passages. In the bravura and more furious passages he, too, kept his head, ever mindful of clarity and elegance. All in all, a most excellent performance by pianist and orchestra.

A stirring reading of Smetana's ever-welcome overture, a performance that in its brilliance and speed did not lose in clearness and precision, brought to an end one of the most memorable concerts of the season.

(Copyright, 1920, by the Tribune

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Mozart, Concertante Symphonie for Violin and Viola (Messrs. Theodorowicz and Denayer); Dukas, Overture to "Polyeucte" (first time at these concerts); Raval, "Ma Mere l'Oye," five children's pieces; Borodin, Polovtskian Dances from "Prince Igor," act II (first time at these concerts).

SYMPHONY REVELS IN VIRTUOSITY

Orchestra and Mr. Ganz Display Great Powers

BY OLIN DOWNES

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was undoubtedly one of the most brilliant of the season. In response, perhaps, to rumors that the Boston Symphony, owing to the strike of certain members, was practically without a string division, the opening number on the programme was Handel's fifth "Concerto grosso," for strings alone, with Messrs. Theodorowitz, concertmaster; J. Hoffmann, second concertmaster; F. Denayer, first viola, and J. Bedetti, first 'cellist, as players of the solo passages. Seldom has the string division of this orchestra been heard to better advantage.

IN PRE-STRIKE FORM

The majestic introduction was played with the most imposing sonority and vibrancy of tone, and the fugue which follows was characterized by the utmost clearness of the parts and the finest rythmic precision. In the Largo, and the trio of the Menuet, the players showed their skill in cantalena. Solo players and ensemble distinguished themselves. It is not astonishing that Mr. Monteux could accomplish all this with his players, for he is a very serious student of old as well as new music, and was himself, for many years, a viola player of attainments. But it may have served to answer conclusively, the rumor concerning a lack of strings in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The orchestra of last week, augmented by some of the recent strikers who have resigned from the musical union, and returned to the symphony, showed its capacities in other performances, for the full band, of Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal"; Saint-Saens piano concerto in F-major, too rarely played, and the sparkling overture to Smetana's "Bartered Bride," in which the strings had again their opportunity. Rudolph Gans was the solo pianist.

Both Sublime and Vulgar

Either conditions of the moment were uncommonly propitious, or Mr. Ganz has grown substantially as an artist since last he played in Boston. He brought with him, in addition, an entertaining concerto, which is too little played. This fifth concerto of Saint-Saens has for its material a first movement, which is Saint-Saens in his conventionally glib vein; a second movement which must rank among the most picturesque and warmly imagined passages in his instrumental compositions, and a finale, flashy to the point of vulgarity, which nevertheless affords a marvellous display of virtuosity—if the pianist is equal, as Mr. Ganz was fully equal to the occasion.

The concerto, indeed, is the epitome of certain inconsistencies of matter and style, which students of Saint-Saens' music have often observed. There is the neat dove-tailing of the different portions of the first movement, the clear, polished style, the meaningless decorative quality which says nothing. Then there is the remarkable slow movement, an oriental rhapsody the middle section, of which is built on a Nubian love song heard by Saint-Saens as he went down the Nile in a dahabeeyah. Forthwith the composer paints a perfect picture of the orient, an orient to which he does full justice, leaving an impression so vivid, so beautiful, so genuinely of the east, that you will never forget it. (The editor of the programme book calls attention to the instrumentation of certain passages in this movement as compared with the instrumentation of the Nile music in Verdi's Aida, and there is, indeed, striking similarity.)

In this slow movement the piano and orchestra are on a par. The one in-tered thoroughly into the spirit of measure. His playing of the slow movement will linger long in the memory because of its dramatic eloquence, its sensuous appeal.

His performance of the finale was simply breath-taking, for its authority, its sureness and grip, as for the headlong pace of the entire movement. There are many—we are among them—who think the occasion very exceptional when the performance of a soloist does not mar the effect of an orchestral programme, especially when that orchestra is the Boston Symphony. When a virtuoso does appear, he should do so either as the player of a work in which the piano is employed orchestrally, or else as a virtuoso who exhilarates everyone by his personality and the excitement of his playing.

Taking ground yesterday in the latter class, Mr. Ganz added to the pleasure and the thrill of an orchestral concert. It is needless to say that he was repeatedly recalled. So on several occasions was Mr. Monteux and the orchestra itself.

strument is as important and as dramatic in expression as the other. Then what we? We have at first the most irritating music in the world, a theme as vulgar, as showy, as cheap as any that Saint-Saens has produced—fully as cheap, for example, as the theme of the last movement of the B-minor violin concerto. The fun comes in the development of this matter and in subsidiary themes which appear. The music is at times almost savage or barbaric; at other times, as at the beginning, it verges perilously on farce. The composer has his tongue in his cheek, and he wantonly offends our best people.

Mr. Ganz could hardly have improved on his performance. His tone was of the most beautiful quality in singing passages. He had incomparable strength and velocity when required. He en-

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

MORE SIGNS AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Significant Audience of Saturday—The Seceders in the Orchestra Begin to Return—Mr. Heifetz Takes Leave in Familiar Perfections—Miss Garrison in a Recital of Her Own—American Pieces for Paris

UNMISTAKABLE are the signs of the times at the Symphony Concerts. No "assisting artist" in vogue graced the programme of Saturday evening; no celebrated piece, novel or familiar, stood upon it. Instead, such conventional items as Dvorák's symphony, "From the New World," the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," the forest-music from his "Siegfried," the Rákóczy March of Berlioz, filled it. An orchestra of seventy-odd, instead of an orchestra of ninety-odd, was to play these numbers, and everyone who pays any heed to symphony concerts was well aware of Mr. Monteux's diminished forces—and of the causes of the diminution. Yet every seat in Symphony Hall was occupied and standing-room might have been sold, were it the custom of the concerts to sell it. From the coming of the conductor upon the stage to his final departure from it the applause was as hearty and sincere as all concerned could make it. Mr. Monteux received his share for vivid performance, in particular, of the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and of the Rákóczy March; but plainly it was toward the orchestra that the clappings were most fervent. Not once but twice it was standing to receive just tribute to its present loyalties and present mettle. Out of tribulation, the Symphony Orchestra, the Symphony Concerts, the public of both seemed born again. And as though this were not enough, at the rehearsal this morning three of the seceders were sitting in their places; while applications of others for reinstatement were under consideration. For Händel's Concerto Grosso, to be played on Thursday, Friday and Saturday, Mr. Monteux's string choir numbered a full fifty. Before the secession it counted but fifty-seven. Yes: the Symphony Orchestra does continue.

Mr. Schmitz, the French pianist, who played the solo part in Mr. Carpenter's Concertino with the Symphony Orchestra in Boston last winter and who will repeat it in Cambridge next month, is planning to carry the piece to London and Paris for performance late in the spring. As yet those cities know Mr. Carpenter's music only by the suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator."

When Mr. Cortot, the pianist, plays with the Symphony Orchestra next month he will be heard in two unfamiliar pieces—Beethoven's third Concerto, usually overlooked for the fourth and the fifth, and a Fantasia written by Debussy in his student-years at Rome and discovered after his death among his papers.

Explaining a Disappointment

There was not a little disappointment among the public of the Symphony Concerts last winter when Mr. Kreisler, announced to play Brahms's Concerto for violin, substituted for it Beethoven's, in which he had been often heard here. At the time there was no explanation. Now comes hint of the prompting reasons for the change from the accounts in the New York newspapers of Mr. Kreisler's fortunes with Brahms's Concerto when he played it last week with the Philharmonic Society. Says the Times for example:

> There were great energy and fire in Mr. Kreisler's performance; there were passages of the well-remembered splendid eloquence and fire; a poetical delivery of the beautiful cantilena of a depth and moving quality that few have ever equalled in this concerto. But there was at times something labored in his playing; an effort to produce breadth and power of tone, and especially to gain the movement and the pulse of rhythm that he apparently desired.
>
> It must be said, too, that there was occasional uncertainty of intonation in the passage-work and a roughness of execution in some of it that is not a characteristic of Mr. Kreisler's playing at its best. Yet how fine were many of the stretches of wide double stopping in their purity and clearness—effects that are of magical beauty and that give such a strangely marked individuality to certain pages of the concerto.

Items of the Day and thereafter into the American Expeditionary Force. Now he has returned ripened—perhaps the more for war-time experiences. His tone is deeper, smoother, richer and at need more incisive. His intelligence reads the music in hand clearly—even when contours are as intricate and contents as abstruse as Brahms in this Concerto chose to make them. Securely he played it—with the mingling of continence and of warmth that is justice to Brahms's voice and style. He caught the nervous energy, the opening vistas of the first movement, the dusky beauty of the adagio, the tempered vigors of the finale. Once more the Concerto—spacious, poised, close knit, at once reflective and expansive—sounded as a man's music for men; while man-fashion Mr. Stoessel played it.

Music

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

WELL ON THE WAY TO NORMAL COURSE

The Symphony Orchestra Heard, Nearly as Usual, in Cambridge—Mr. Stoessel Plays Brahms's Violin Concerto—Edwin Hughes, Pianist with Limitations—Mr. Longy to Disinter Fanelli — The Next Bach Festival

POSSIBLY the audience at the Symphony Concert in Cambridge, last evening, believed that the orchestra had so far conquered its recent plight as to need no further encouragement to fortitude. There was reason for such notion, inasmuch as the band, sitting upon the stage of Sanders Theatre, seemed as numerous as it ever is on the further bank of the Charles. True, before and after the playing of Brahms's Concerto for violin, there were shiftings enough from chair to chair in the string choir to suggest that it is not yet quite normal when it must undertake, at short notice, a "repertory piece." On the other hand, Mr. Monteux's violins, violas, violoncellos and basses are now in sufficient force and practice to achieve a full-voiced and warm-blooded performance of a striding Concerto Grosso by Händel; while throughout the evening, there was but one obvious slip among the newcomers—not, as it happened in the freshly recruited strings, but in the brass at an entrance in the prelude to "Parsifal." Otherwise all concerned and all that befell seemed quite normal, even to the hearty applause that is the habit of this audience at Cambridge. Perhaps, it could not have swelled its clapping if it would; yet, when the players upon the wind and the brass instruments came to the stage in the pause after Händel's Concerto, much more than the usual ripple of hands greeted them. By so much at least, the listeners remembered recent incidents; while they can take thought of the future as well as the past, if they are minded to write signatures on a slip in the programme-book inviting them to contributions to the endowment fund. Within and without the "university circle," Cambridge would miss these Symphony Concerts, did an untoward fate overtake the orchestra. As it happens, also, under precedent set by Mr. Higginson, it is asked to pay less for them than any other occasional public of the band. No doubt it remembers recent incidents—one, moreover, in its own theatre—but last evening, it seemed to believe that peace and plenty were already reëstablished. In a sense they are; but by no means have the secession and the consequences of the secession altogether vanished.

Mr. Monteux took his courage in his hands when he set the string choir to a Concerto by Händel within the wooden walls of Sanders Theatre. Those walls are exceedingly resonant and, as always with eighteenth-century pieces, they disclosed every detail of the music—and also of the playing. Händel himself also wrote nakedly—patterns in tone for the patterns' sake before the days in which lush harmonies may opportunely swathe the composer's design or iridescent intricacies mist it. At every turn conductor and choir met well the test. Neither sonority nor incisiveness evaded them. The violins in particular sounded keen and bright; the violas were by no means the "noiseless tenor" of someone's scornful phrase; the darker strings, oftenest making backgrounds, were full-textured. So played, the ample periods of the introduction strode; the patterning of the allegros had pith and point; the slow movement rose in large and flowing curve; the minuet kept its native state; the presto went unhurried and unblurred. By wise choice of pace, Mr. Monteux kept the music to intrinsic dignity; largely he rounded the aspiring phrases; eloquently, as Händel bid, choir answered choir. Ours are the days of pastels and etchings in tones. In these Concerti Grossi, Händel wove tapestries. So the conductor made the music sound. If the flowing finesse of certain ancient music sometimes eludes Mr. Monteux, the contrasting breadths and vigors of a Händel or a Rameau do not.

As resonant were the strings in the succeeding Prelude to "Parsifal," as sharp of accent when Wagner would have his music most anguished, as deep of tone when he answers despair with compassion. As to Händel's Concerto, so is Sanders Theatre to this Prelude—the place above all others hereabouts in which to hear it. For when Wagner in relative old age would write preface and epitome to his final opera, he also put to paper a naked, simplified, concentrated music, distilling and isolating to his purpose his spacious range of means. He strips agony; he unveils mercy; he summons spiritual pomps; he opens celestial vistas. No music that he has written better gains the imagined, the impressive ends. None is freer from tonal rhetoric or mere romantic glamour. As he wrote, Mr. Monteux imparted; in no other fragment of Wagner has he been so eloquent; few heard without emotion. Last for one more test of the strings, the whipping rhythms, the whirring under-voices, the racing pace, the bright glints of Smetana's overture to his Czech opera, "The Bartered Bride." Again they and the music fared well—if not quite to the perfection that haunts virtuoso conductors.

Between the two Preludes stood Brahms's Concerto for violin with Albert Stoessel to play the solo-part. Boston knew him first as youthful and able violinist driven by the war from studies in Berlin. Then he vanished into the St. Louis Orchestra in its brilliance and speed did not lose in clearness and precision, brought to an end one of the most memorable concerts of the season.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Mozart, Concertante Symphonie for Violin and Viola (Messrs. Theodorowicz and Denayer); Dukas, Overture to "Polyeucte" (first time at these concerts); Raval, "Ma Mere l'Oye," five children's pieces; Borodin, Polovtskian Dances from "Prince Igor," act II (first time at these concerts).

20TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Strings Excel in Handel's "Concerto"—Prelude to "Parsifal" Given

PROGRAM IN SPIRIT WITH GOOD FRIDAY

By PHILIP HALE

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Monteux conducted. The program was as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso for strings, D major, No. 5 (edited by G. F. Kogel); Wagner, Prelude to "Parsifal"; Saint-Saëns, Concerto, F Major, No. 5, for piano; Smetana, overture to "The Sold Bride." Rudolph Ganz was the pianist. The solo violins in Handel's Concerto were played by Messrs. Theodorowicz and Hoffman; the solo viola, by Mr. Denayer; the solo violoncello by Mr. Bedetti.

There was a triumph of strings in Handel's concerto and in Smetana's overture. Mr. Monteux had confidence in the new members; his confidence was fully justified. It may be said without exaggeration that the present section of second violins is the most capable in the history of the orchestra. Admirable, too, was the work of the other players on stringed instruments. All were severely tested; all acquitted themselves gloriously. The young blood in the orchestra of today is more than a fair exchange for the phlegm of past seasons. The new members and the old were on their mettle.

Now is the time for the trustees to make an energetic, unrelaxing "drive" for the desired endowment. The orchestra, today, is a superb body of players; it will be even a more magnificent institution at the beginning of next season. The great ability of Mr. Monteux as disciplinarian and intepreter is fully recognized. Interest in the "new" orchestra, which contains nearly all the famous players of the past, is at its height. The great public, not only the audiences, should take pride in this orchestra as a civic institution. It should also forbid insidious German propaganda to work its mole-like way in matters of art.

Mr. Monteux has proved that as a program-maker he is far from being a chauvinist; he welcomes music of all nations, provided the music is good.

When one hears a work of Handel played as it was yesterday by soloists and choir, one no longer wonders why Beethoven shortly before his death said of Handel: "He is the master of us all." What freshness, spirit, vitality there is in this old music! The solemn beauty of the Largo, beautifully performed, is Miltonic. There is a grandeur, nobility in the Handelian simplicity that no other composer has attained, not even Bach; not even Palestrina or Vittoria.

The prelude to "Parsifal" was fitly chosen for a concert on Good Friday. What has been said about the character of the drama—and much has been written in bitter comment by warm admirers of the music itself—has not shaken the belief of those regarding "Parsifal" as a profoundly religious work in its symbolism and its realism. Who would rashly disturb this faith? Who would point out much that is obnoxious, abhorrent in the doctrines that are inculcated? The performance, an impressive one, conducted with rare skill and understanding, was heard as if it were part of a religious service.

We became acquainted with Saint-Saëns's concerto 16 years ago, when Mr. Ferruccio—we are tempted to write "Ferocious"—Busoni introduced it, and it made little impression at the time. Yesterday, as it was played by Mr. Ganz and the orchestra, the concerto was engrossing. The thematic material of the first movement no longer seemed almost childish; it reminded one of Mozart's adorable simplicity. Nor is it necessary to say that this material is finely employed. The rhapsodical orientalism, with the use of a Nubian boat song, is fascinating; it does not for a moment degenerate into anything merely bizarre. Saint-Saëns here catches the spirit of the East, but he is not mastered by it; he does not lose his shrewdly observing, coolly reflecting western head. Then comes the rushing finale, which, however, does not throw aside in the excitement the traditional French elegance that characterizes the work of Saint-Saëns. Mr. Ganz played as Saint-Saëns played when he was in his high estate; but with more warmth in the lyric passages. In the bravura and more furious passages he, too, kept his head, ever mindful of clarity and elegance. All in all, a most excellent performance by pianist and orchestra.

A stirring reading of Smetana's ever-welcome overture, a performance that (Copyright, 1920, by the Tribune

SYMPHONY REVELS IN VIRTUOSITY

Orchestra and Mr. Ganz Display Great Powers

BY OLIN DOWNES

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was undoubtedly one of the most brilliant of the season. In response, perhaps, to rumors that the Boston Symphony, owing to the strike of certain members, was practically without a string division, the opening number on the programme was Handel's fifth "Concerto grosso," for strings alone, with Messrs. Theodorowitz, concertmaster; J. Hoffmann, second concertmaster; F. Denayer, first viola, and J. Bedetti, first 'cellist, as players of the solo passages. Seldom has the string division of this orchestra been heard to better advantage.

IN PRE-STRIKE FORM

The majestic introduction was played with the most imposing sonority and vibrancy of tone, and the fugue which follows was characterized by the utmost clearness of the parts and the finest rythmic precision. In the Largo, and the trio of the Menuet, the players showed their skill in cantalena. Solo players and ensemble distinguished themselves. It is not astonishing that Mr. Monteux could accomplish all this with his players, for he is a very serious student of old as well as new music, and was himself, for many years, a viola player of attainments. But it may have served to answer conclusively, the rumor concerning a lack of strings in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The orchestra of last week, augmented by some of the recent strikers who have resigned from the musical union, and returned to the symphony, showed its capacities in other performances, for the full band, of Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal"; Saint-Saens piano concerto in F-major, too rarely played, and the sparkling overture to Smetana's "Bartered Bride," in which the strings had again their opportunity. Rudolph Gans was the solo pianist.

Both Sublime and Vulgar

Either conditions of the moment were uncommonly propitious, or Mr. Ganz has grown substantially as an artist since last he played in Boston. He brought with him, in addition, an entertaining concerto, which is too little played. This fifth concerto of Saint-Saens has for its material a first movement, which is Saint-Saens in his conventionally glib vein; a second movement which must rank among the most picturesque and warmly imagined passages in his instrumental compositions, and a finale, flashy to the point of vulgarity, which nevertheless affords a marvellous display of virtuosity—if the pianist is equal, as Mr. Ganz was fully equal to the occasion.

The concerto, indeed, is the epitome of certain inconsistencies of matter and style, which students of Saint-Saens' music have often observed. There is the neat dove-tailing of the different portions of the first movement, the clear, polished style, the meaningless decorative quality which says nothing. Then there is the remarkable slow movement, an oriental rhapsody the middle section, of which is built on a Nubian love song heard by Saint-Saens as he went down the Nile in a dahabeeyah. Forthwith the composer paints a perfect picture of the orient, an orient to which he does full justice, leaving an impression so vivid, so beautiful, so genuinely of the east, that you will never forget it. (The editor of the programme book calls attention to the instrumentation of certain passages in this movement as compared with the instrumentation of the Nile music in Verdi's Aida, and there is, indeed, striking similarity.)

In this slow movement the piano and orchestra are on a par. The one instrument is as important and as dramatic in expression as the other. Then what we? We have at first the most irritating music in the world, a theme as vulgar, as showy, as cheap as any that Saint-Saens has produced—fully as cheap, for example, as the theme of the last movement of the B-minor violin concerto. The fun comes in the development of this matter and in subsidiary themes which appear. The music is at times almost savage or barbaric; at other times, as at the beginning, it verges perilously on farce. The composer has his tongue in his cheek, and he wantonly offends our best people.

Mr. Ganz could hardly have improved on his performance. His tone was of the most beautiful quality in singing passages. He had incomparable strength and velocity when required. He entered thoroughly into the spirit of every measure. His playing of the slow movement will linger long in the memory because of its dramatic eloquence, its sensuous appeal.

His performance of the finale was simply breath-taking, for its authority, its sureness and grip, as for the headlong pace of the entire movement. There are many—we are among them—who think the occasion very exceptional when the performance of a soloist does not mar the effect of an orchestral programme, especially when that orchestra is the Boston Symphony. When a virtuoso does appear, he should do so either as the player of a work in which the piano is employed orchestrally, or else as a virtuoso who exhilarates everyone by his personality and the excitement of his playing.

Taking ground yesterday in the latter class, Mr. Ganz added to the pleasure and the thrill of an orchestral concert. It is needless to say that he was repeatedly recalled. So on several occasions was Mr. Monteux and the orchestra itself.

ticularly in North Russia.

HANDEL'S CONCERTO WINS WARM APPLAUSE

Wagner, Saint-Saens and Smetana Also at Symphony

The feature of yesterday's symphony concert turned out to be a remarkably fine performance of Handel's Concerto Grosso in D major, for string orchestra, in which the four solo parts were taken by Messrs Theodorowiez and Hoffmann, violins; Mr Denayer, viola, and Mr Bedetti, 'cello. They thoroughly deserved the applause which compelled them to rise and bow acknowledgement. Each is a virtuoso more admirable than most of the much advertised recital givers.

The number of strings is still somewhat less than the full quota, but the quality of their playing is wholly admirable. The volume of tone is not noticeably less than normal, and its richness and smoothness could hardly be improved upon.

The majestic sonority of Handel's music is the feature of it which always impresses the average listener and performer; yet, as Rolland argues in his life of the composer, its lightness and delicacy are often hardly less striking. Yesterday the fleetness and grace of the presto were as artistically conveyed to the listener, as was the grave and noble dignity of the Largo.

Mr Monteux's interpretation of the prelude to "Parsifal" lacks the massive solidity of Dr Muck's. Monteux makes the rhythm more restless and the motives ejaculatory outbursts. His is romantic Wagner where Muck's was classic in its poised and balanced power.

Rudolph Ganz gave a meticulous performance of the solo part in Saint-Saens' Fifth Piano Concerto. His playing suited the music, which is well made without being either dull or deep. The slow movement, with its rather conventionally exotic coloring, and the finale, which probably recalled "jazz" to more than one listener by its clever syncopated rhythms, gave especial pleasure, to judge by the volume of applause.

Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride" has long been a show piece with the Symphony Orchestra. Yesterday's performance was spirited, but less flawlessly finished than some we have heard in former years. The music begins to show signs of age, as minor masterpieces have a way of doing when the fashions of the generation in which they gained their vogue are outmoded.

This program will be repeated tonight at 8. The concerts next week bring Concertante Symphony by Mozart; the first performance here of Dukas' overture to "Polyeucte"; a revival of Ravel's "Mother Goose" and the first performance at these concerts of dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor."

Monitor Cpy 3

MUSIC

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The twenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on April 2 was as follows:

Handel, Concerto grosso in D major; Wagner, Prelude to "Parsifal"; Saint-Saëns, Pianoforte Concerto No. 5, Rudolph Ganz, soloist; Smetana, Overture to "Sold Bride."

This program, although containing no novelties, was so well selected and arranged, its contrasts were so artfully contrived and well balanced that it refreshed the listener. Handel, too long known only as the composer of "Messiah," was again revealed to us as the master of pure form and noble melodic outline. How fresh and inspiring this concerto must have sounded to eighteenth century ears accustomed to the operatic trivialities of that day and how fresh and inspiring it sounded yesterday in comparison with the often forced and unnatural musical speech of the present day. It contains great thoughts said with a great and noble simplicity and was so played by Mr. Monteux. The fifth concerto of Saint-Saëns is among the few interesting modern compositions for piano and orchestra. The orchestral portion of the work is important but never overshadows the piano part, while this latter never degenerates into a mere display passage work. The second movement, an oriental rhapsody, is by far the finest of the three, and it is certainly one of the composer's most original inspirations. Its orientalism is not of the often too literal type favored by Rimsky-Korsakoff and other Russians. Its suggestiveness is brought about by the simplest means, much being left to the imagination. This movement was played by Mr. Ganz and the orchestra with the spontaneous abandon of an improvisation. In the past Mr. Ganz has often played with a depressing coldness. Not so on yesterday afternoon, when he played not only with his familiar and accustomed virtuosity (truly remarkable in the final movement), but also with an added grace and delicacy of touch and sentiment altogether satisfactory. Was he not, perhaps, given additional inspiration by the orchestra, which accompanied him with such perfect understanding? The string section of the orchestra, now restored to almost full strength, played Handel's concerto grosso with fine tone and ensemble. Mr. Monteux led throughout the afternoon with his accustomed enthusiasm and the audience and orchestra responded in kind.

York Trio (Cl...

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe

THE ORCHESTRA FILLED AND IN FORM AGAIN

A Sufficient and Efficient String Choir That Praises Mr. Monteux—The Freshness and Bigness of Haendel — More Wagner, and a Moral — Saint-Saens Both Elegant and Exotic

SOONER than there was reason to expect, in better quality than there was reason, almost, to hope, Mr. Monteux has filled the chairs in the string choir left vacant by the recent secession from the Symphony Orchestra. Few anticipated the repairing of the gaps before the beginning, next autumn, of a new season. Yet within a month the conductor has restored the band to sufficiency and efficiency. The decimated strings now stand only a little short of full quota; the wood winds and the horns continue virtually intact; the trumpets and the trombones have regained familiar strength. There is no lack, at need, of manipulators for the instruments of percussion. A player upon the tuba is much to be desired, a second harp would be useful; but for most practical purposes, the Symphony Orchestra flourishes again in full numbers. Were it not so, Mr. Monteux would hardly have included Ravel's exacting suite of tonal tales from "Mother Goose" in the concerts of next week or be meditating a repetition of his flaming version of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," as yet unheard by the audiences of Saturday. Upon the few programmes remaining he may now set what he will.

The restored orchestra is, moreover, a band of signal quality. No listener to the string choir in Sanders Theatre on Thursday evening, in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, may plausibly doubt its virtue. At both concerts it was well tested. A Concerto Grosso of Händel—stripped and unsparing music—disclosed its sonority, plasticity and propulsive power, revealed its warmth and sensibility of tone. The Prelude to Wagner's opera, "Parsifal," proved its command of enriching, expressing and dramatizing voice. The Overture to Smetana's folk-opera, "The Bartered Bride," left no doubt of its keenness for pace, rhythm, climax. Since the best days of Dr. Muck, the string choir has not been—especially in the second violins—so full-bodied, warm-blooded and generally sensitive an instrument. Diligently Mr. Monteux has sifted the many applicants and finally chosen well from them. The wood-winds, of course, keep unique quality; the brass, unless the listener questions the sharpness of French trumpets, do their office. Händel's Concerto, intermittent repertory piece "at these concerts," has moved in no larger stride, sang in no more profound voice. The Prelude to "Parsifal" has seldom seemed a more poignant music of anguish, aspiration, compassion, even if in the past it has been woven in more mystical glamors of tone. Smetana's Overture teemed with rhythmic life, snapped with lively modulation and sprightly contrast, needed only a little more burnishing of glint and sparkle. When the Symphony Orchestra plays, there is need no longer to make allowance for adverse conditions. Mr. Monteux's work and the new spirit in all the choirs—and in the audience too—have removed them. And that work the more praises him because he has done it unperturbed and undiscouraged, with endless pains and unrelaxing standards. Once more the quiet way to meet an emergency is—to meet it.

Both in Cambridge on Thursday and in Boston on Friday pieces and performance highly pleased the audience. Beyond peradventure the average twentieth-century ear hears eighteenth-century music gladly. It may be no more than superficial with Mozart because his infinite grace, flawless felicity and perfect plasticity are almost a sophistication in themselves. The interwoven splendors, the manifold and exhaustless creative passion of Bach may in measure baffle it. A high god, however human his momentary guise, has his remoteness. With Haydn and Handel, however, the listener of 1920 is on firm ground. The simplicity, the directness, the melodious sentiment, the springing vivacities, the transparent artistry and artlessness of Haydn make music in his ear. No less surely and delightedly he answers to the ample periods, the sonorous progress, the ordered and expansive vigors of the Händel of concertos, overtures and orchestral interludes. Every one of us in our hearts loves on occasion a stately, a ceremonious music. Our moderns may feign to write it when the occasion bids and the rules are handy, but by no more than half do they really believe in what they put to paper; whereas with Händel it was self-expression in a stimulating world.

To more sophisticated ears, there is a fascination, besides, in this music of dominant and vitalized line, of relatively naked tonal design. To conscious or unconscious surfeit our listening generation knows the harmonic luxuriance of Wagner, Strauss and their brood; the harmonic sharpness and subtlety of the children of light—and Paris. From Berlioz to Carpenter we have been titillated with timbres in endless gamut of color. Back we go to Händel in such a Concerto as that of yesterday and lo! there is only tonal line—yet how ample and supple, how energetic and diverse, striding the air, weaving patterns of sound upon it. These designs are specious and stately; in large progress they take shape, round themselves; rhythm animates them; contrasts diversify them; sonorously the strands expand, entwine, mount, cumulate; creative power fashions and speeds them: the final impression is of stripped beauty—a music for the mind as well as for the senses. There is color in it also; for Ravel was not the first to set string timbre beside or against string timbre; or Loeffler the earliest divider of such a choir. Our moderns would be sumptuous or sinuous. For Händel the straightfo...

...es, with the Prelude to "Parsifal," he ended for the year excerpts from Wagner's music-dramas. With reason he has restored them to the active repertory of the Symphony Concerts, wherein music is played to give pleasure and not to minister to prejudice. By many a sign his public hears them eagerly, especially when he is as eloquent with them as he was with this very Prelude, with the Prelude to "Lohengrin" a week ago, the Prelude to "Tristan" upon a Thursday in Cambridge, the final scene of "The Gleaming of the Gods" when Mme. Matzenauer sang with the orchestra. Some, hearing this music, no doubt rejoice inwardly that Wagner happened to be a German composer only forty years removed from our immediate time. Others hearing it, repine and rail outwardly at that same inexorable fact. Meanwhile, ninety-nine out of every hundred listeners are taking not a thought of Wagner's nationality and care not half a pin for him otherwise than as maker of music. Enough that in tones he stirs, illudes, pleasures, transports them; that changeless in his operas dwell a lasting power, an enduring beauty.

The truth is that in concert-hall or opera house listeners and composers are thorough-going individualists. It is an excellent thing that Mr. Carpenter, for example, happens to be an American and that clear American impulses prompt some of his music; but what would such birth, residence and predilection profit him were he mediocre of imagination and skill? Being French, Debussy is counted among the artistic glories of France, but his music is what he himself out of mind and spirit—and only incidentally out of accidental circumstance—made it. Because Debussy was Debussy, and not because he was a

Continued on Following Page

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Continued from Preceding Page

French citizen, is it both unique and universal. So equally with the listener. He may find Mr. Carpenter's music boresome, prefer Dvorak's to it and yet remain 114 per cent American. He may rail at Debussy with the senile fury of Saint-Saëns and still dwell within the union sacrée of French citizenry. As with Debussy, so with Wagner. His music also is unique and universal, not because he was German, but because he was himself. As individually, and with no ther sensation, the listener receives a personal pleasure and stimulation. There is no more to be said—unless it be that by like title and as like source of pleasure, the Strauss of "Don Juan," "Eulenspiegel" and "Death and Transfiguration" will as surely and speedily return to American concert-rooms.

This same Saint-Saëns, not as querulous railer in print, but as expert artificer in tones provided the fourth piece of the day—his Concerto in F major for piano and orchestra, the Concerto with which he rounded half a century as pianist and that hearers best remember from a singular middle movement. This Andante begins with whirling and acrid measures, not without Oriental dissonance; it calms into a thin, piercing, reiterating Nubian love-song that Saint-Saëns happened to hear upon the Nile. There is more Oriental dissonance; subdued, the wild measures of the beginning return. It is as though the composer had flung into his Concerto a semi-tropical rhapsody, brief and graphic. The rest is the Saint-Saëns of familiar dexterity, who makes a finale sound and glitter and race almost out of nothing, who leads fancy and form hand in hand through a first movement, who is equally happy in crisp "passage-work" to display the pianist and in crystalline melody of cool sentiment. Saint-Saëns elegant, exotic, entertaining—and the Concerto has run its course. Mr. Ganz, not too often heard in Boston, played the solo part, played it—with one reserve—in the very image of the music. Over-much, as it seemed, he urged the pace in the first movement and even in the finale; but otherwise he was as lucid and brittle, as elegant or exotic as Saint-Saëns himself. Music of poetry and passion used sometimes to betray him into hardness and exaggerated stress. In music of artifice, even when he pushes the pace, his poise is pleasure.

H. T. PARKER

Trans Cpy 3

SYMPHONY GIVES 20TH CONCERT

An excellent and varied concert was given yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting.

Mr. Rudolph Ganz was the assisting artist. He played Saint-Saens's F major pianoforte concerto. Mr. Ganz's interpretation of the concerto was admirable. He played with intelligence as well as sincere thoughtfulness and clearly brought out the distinct charm of the composition.

Mr. Monteux and the musicians are to be congratulated for the splendid rendition of Handel's Concerto Grosso in D major for string orchestra. This number requires, besides the string orchestra, four solo instruments. Two solo violins played by Mr. Theodorowicz and Mr. Hoffman, one solo viola played by Mr. Denayer, and one solo violoncello played by Mr. Jean Bedette. The dignity and clearness of Handel's composing was very evident. Dignity, especially in Largo, movement III. and clearness in the succession and combination of themes and voices.

The Prelude to Parsifal, very fitting for Good Friday, was most impressive.

The usual large and appreciative audience attended.

A LOYAL BAND; WHAT OF THE PUBLIC?

At first it seemed likely that the increase, the fresh and keen access of merit which the Symphony Orchestra displayed in the concerts immediately following the departure of some of the members of the band, must be attributed to the special stimulus of the occasion, perhaps even to mere excitement. Even so, it was an encouraging and a pleasing sign—that the reaction, in a moment when deterioration might well have been feared, should be on the favorable and not on the unfavorable side. The point worth noticing today, however, is of importantly larger significance. The new verve, the sharpening of artistic finesse that came out of the muddled days of early March, have not disappeared with the passing of the crisis that brought them forward. On the contrary, by the verdict of the critics, by the delight of the audience, they are admitted to have remained as enduring values through all the recent concerts.

This is indeed a heartening and a commendable manifestation. In regard to the attitude of the men, it seems to have a real meaning. It appears as an affirmation, a new revealment of that fundamental concern for the orchestra, of regard for its character as a musical organization of the highest quality, in fact as in national repute, which we had always supposed the members possessed, and which, indeed, it is clear they must have possessed, else the orchestra never could have achieved in the past what it has achieved. Such a manifestation of loyalty and of standards on the part of the band today—fulfilling with spirit their present obligations whatever may be their plans for the future—should not fail of the response from the public of the Symphony concerts which it deserves. The full campaign for a $3,000,000 endowment fund still waits formal announcement. But the opportunity for immediate giving has been provided, notice to this effect being included for the second time in the programme books of yesterday's concert and tonight's.

The men's response under conditions of special trial is, as we say, a special reason why the public's voluntary response should now be as excellent. But the full outlook upon the situation is wider than that. The economic problems of the Symphony, as viewed in the light of the resources and the ambitions of other orchestras throughout the country, are grave and very grave. They will either stimulate the public of Boston to very generous support and response, or the day will come when, though not as contract-breakers or on account of any loss of the essential loyalty which the band is now showing, enough of its members will be drawn away through the natural operation of competition and economic circumstance so that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have no longer the distinguishing, the all-important mark of supreme quality which it bears today.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Herald Cpy 4

One of the most important events of the musical season in Boston will be the 34th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in aid of its pension fund for retired members Sunday afternoon, April 18, at 3:30. Pierre Monteux and the distinguished men under him will join in full force with the Harvard glee club for a choral concert on a large scale. It is certainly fitting that these two bodies should come together, for the Harvard glee club has been trained by Archibald T. Davison to such a degree of executive perfection that the dictum of critical opinion estimates it the finest male choir that has been heard hereabouts in years. Mr. Monteux is preparing engrossing music for the symphonic part, in addition to some fine works for chorus and orchestra. The chorus will also sing unaccompanied.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Ravel's charmingly scored "Mother Goose" suite of Children's Pieces, which has not been heard at the Boston Symphony concerts since 1915, will be played at the coming 21st pair of concerts on Friday and Saturday. The movements are: "Pavane of Sleeping Beauty," "Hop o' My Thumb," "Laideronnette, Empress of the Pagodas," "Beauty and the Beast Converse," and "The Fairy Garden." Mr. Monteux has placed on the same program Mozart's Concertante Symphonie for violin and viola (K. 364), Duka's Overture to "Polyeucte," and the vigorous Polovtstelan Dances from "Prince Igor." country to join her fiance.

Post Cpy 4

NEXT PROGRAM FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

The 21st program for the Boston Symphony concerts, to be given next Friday and Saturday, will consist of Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite (of which the movements are "Pavane of Sleeping Beauty," "Hop o' My Thumb," "Laideronnette, Empress of the Pagodas," "Beauty and the Beast Converse" and "The Fairy Garden"), Mozart's Concertante Symphonie for Violin and Viola, Dukas's Overture to "Polyeucte," and the vigorous Polovtstelan Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor."

...Globe Cpy 4

CHORAL PENSION CON...

One of the most important ... the musical season in Boston w... 34th concert by the Boston Sy... Orchestra in aid of its pension ... retired members, Sunday a... April 18, at 3:30. Pierre Monteux ... distinguished men under him ... in full forces with the Harv... Club for a choral concert on ... scale. It is certainly fitting th... two bodies should come toge... the Harvard Glee Club has bee... by Dr. Archibald T. Davison t... degree of executive perfection ... dictum of critical opinion esti... the finest male choir that h... eard hereabouts in years. Mr. ... preparing some engrossing m... the symphonic part of the progr... ddition to some fine works fo... nd orchestra. The noted chorus ... o sing numbers unaccompanied.

Globe Cpy 4

HARVARD GLEE CLUB TO ASSIST SYMPHONY

One of the most important ... of the musical season in Bost... be the thirty-fourth concert by ... Boston Symphony Orchestra in ... of its pension fund for retired ... bers, on Sunday afternoon, Apri... Pierre Monteux and the orche... will join with the Harvard Glee ... for a choral concert on a large s...

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Ravel's "Mother Goose" su... which has not been heard at the B... ton Symphony Concerts since 19... will be played next Friday and S...

urday. On the same program ... Mozart's "Concertante Symphonie ... for violin and viola; Dukas' overtu... to "Polyeucte" and dances fr... Borodin's "Prince Igor."

Globe Cpy 3

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Mr. Monteux Sets Another Promisi... Novel Programme—Mme. Tetrazzi... turns—Four Pianists Side by ... Two Young Tenors as Well—Mr. ... ler's String Quartet at Cambridge

WITH a full orchestra again ... disposal, Mr. Monteux is ... return next week to his ... range and freshness of programme ... Symphony Concerts. Fortunately, ... need accommodate his list of p... next Friday afternoon and Saturday ... ing to no "assisting artist." It co... accordingly, a rarely heard "Concer... Symphonie" by Mozart for violin ... and small orchestra in which Mr. ... dorowicz and Mr. Denayer will pla... solo-parts; Dukas's overture to Cor... tragedy of Christian martyrs and ... persecutors, "Polyeucte," an all... new piece; the suite in which Ra... translated into tones five fairy tale... masterpieces of tonal fancy and sk... the dances from Borodin's opera o... sians and Tartars, "Prince Igor," ... bered from the repertory of the ... Ballet but hitherto unknown to Bo... concert-halls.

ticularly in North Russia.

HANDEL'S CONCERTO WINS WARM APPLAUSE

Wagner, Saint-Saens and Smetana Also at Symphony

The feature of yesterday's symphony concert turned out to be a remarkably fine performance of Handel's Concerto Grosso in D major, for string orchestra, in which the four solo parts were taken by Messrs Theodorowiez and Hoffmann, violins; Mr Denayer, viola, and Mr Bedetti, 'cello. They thoroughly deserved the applause which compelled them to rise and bow acknowledgement. Each is a virtuoso more admirable than most of the much advertised recital givers.

The number of strings is still somewhat less than the full quota, but the quality of their playing is wholly admirable. The volume of tone is not noticeably less than normal, and its richness and smoothness could hardly be improved upon.

The majestic sonority of Handel's music is the feature of it which always impresses the average listener and performer; yet, as Rolland argues in his life of the composer, its lightness and delicacy are often hardly less striking. Yesterday the fleetness and grace of the presto were as artistically conveyed to the listener, as was the grave and noble dignity of the Largo.

Mr Monteux's interpretation of the prelude to "Parsifal" lacks the massive solidity of Dr Muck's. Monteux makes the rhythm more restless and the motives ejaculatory outbursts. His is romantic Wagner where Muck's was classic in its poised and balanced power.

Rudolph Ganz gave a meticulous performance of the solo part in Saint-Saens' Fifth Piano Concerto. His playing suited the music, which is well made without being either dull or deep. The slow movement, with its rather conventionally exotic coloring, and the finale, which probably recalled "jazz" to more than one listener by its clever syncopated rhythms, gave especial pleasure, to judge by the volume of applause.

Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride" has long been a show piece with the Symphony Orchestra. Yesterday's performance was spirited, but less flawlessly finished than some we have heard in former years. The music begins to show signs of age, as minor masterpieces have a way of doing when the fashions of the generation in which they gained their vogue are outmoded.

This program will be repeated tonight at 8. The concerts next week bring a Concertante Symphony by Mozart; the first performance here of Dukas' overture to "Polyeucte"; a revival of Ravel's "Mother Goose" and the first performance at these concerts of dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor."

Monitor Cyp 3

MUSIC

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The twenteth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on April 2 was as follows:

Handel, Concerto grosso in D major; Wagner, Prelude to "Parsifal"; Saint-Saëns, Pianoforte Concerto No. 5, Rudolph Ganz, soloist; Smetana, Overture to the "Sold Bride"

This program, although containing no novelties, was so well selected and arranged, its contrasts were so artfully contrived and well balanced that it refreshed the listener. Handel, too long known only as the composer of the "Messiah," was again revealed to us as the master of pure form and noble melodic outline. How fresh and inspiring this concerto must have sounded to eighteenth century ears accustomed to the operatic trivialities of that day and how fresh and inspiring it sounded yesterday in comparison with the often forced and unnatural musical speech of the present day. It contains great thoughts said with a great and noble simplicity and was so played by Mr. Monteux. The fifth concerto of Saint-Saëns is among the few interesting modern compositions for piano and orchestra. The orchestral portion of the work is important but never overshadows the piano part, while this latter never degenerates into a mere display of passage work. The second movement, an oriental rhapsody, is by far the finest of the three, and it is certainly one of the composer's most original inspirations. Its orientalism is not of the often too literal type favored by Rimsky-Korsakoff and other Russians. Its suggestiveness is brought about by the simplest means, much being left to the imagination. This movement was played by Mr. Ganz and the orchestra with the spontaneous abandon of an improvisation. In the past Mr. Ganz has often played with a depressing coldness. Not so on yesterday afternoon, when he played not only with his familiar and accustomed virtuosity (truly remarkable in the final movement), but also with an added grace and delicacy of touch and sentiment altogether satisfactory. Was he not, perhaps, given additional inspiration by the orchestra, which accompanied him with such perfect understanding? The string section of the orchestra, now restored to almost full strength, played Handel's concerto grosso with fine tone and ensemble. Mr. Monteux led throughout the afternoon with his accustomed enthusiasm and the audience and orchestra responded in kind.

The New York Trio (Cl...

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Cyp 2

THE ORCHESTRA FILLED AND IN FORM AGAIN

A Sufficient and Efficient String Choir That Praises Mr. Monteux—The Freshness and Bigness of Haendel — More Wagner, and a Moral — Saint-Saens Both Elegant and Exotic

SOONER than there was reason to expect, in better quality than there was reason, almost, to hope, Mr. Monteux has filled the chairs in the string choir left vacant by the recent secession from the Symphony Orchestra. Few anticipated the repairing of the gaps before the beginning, next autumn, of a new season. Yet within a month the conductor has restored the band to sufficiency and efficiency. The decimated strings now stand only a little short of full quota; the wood winds and the horns continue virtually intact; the trumpets and the trombones have regained familiar strength. There is no lack, at need, of manipulators for the instruments of percussion. A player upon the tuba is much to be desired, a second harp would be useful; but for most practical purposes, the Symphony Orchestra flourishes again in full numbers. Were it not so, Mr. Monteux would hardly have included Ravel's exacting suite of tonal tales from "Mother Goose" in the concerts of next week or be meditating a repetition of his flaming version of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," as yet unheard by the audiences of Saturday. Upon the few programmes remaining he may now set what he will.

The restored orchestra is, moreover, a band of signal quality. No listener to the string choir in Sanders Theatre on Thursday evening, in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, may plausibly doubt its virtue. At both concerts it was well tested. A Concerto Grosso of Händel—stripped and unsparing music—disclosed its sonority, plasticity and propulsive power, revealed its warmth and sensibility of tone. The Prelude to Wagner's opera, "Parsifal," proved its command of enriching, expressing and dramatizing voice. The Overture to Smetana's folk-opera, "The Bartered Bride," left no doubt of its keenness for pace, rhythm, climax. Since the best days of Dr. Muck, the string choir has not been —especially in the second violins—so full-bodied, warm-blooded and generally sensitive an instrument. Diligently Mr. Monteux has sifted the many applicants and finally chosen well from them. The wood-winds, of course, keep unique quality; the brass, unless the listener questions the sharpness of French trumpets, do their office. Händel's Concerto, intermittent repertory piece "at these concerts," has moved in no larger stride, sang in no more orotund voice. The Prelude to "Parsifal" has seldom seemed a more poignant music of anguish, aspiration, compassion, even if in the past it has been woven in more mystical glamors of tone. Smetana's Overture teemed with rhythmic life, snapped with lively modulation and sprightly contrast, needed only a little more burnishing of glint and sparkle. When the Symphony Orchestra plays, there is need no longer to make allowance for adverse conditions. Mr. Monteux's work and the new spirit in all the choirs—and in the audience too—have removed them. And that work the more praises him because he has done it unperturbed and undiscouraged, with endless pains and unrelaxing standards. Once more the quiet way to meet an emergency is—to meet it.

Both in Cambridge on Thursday and in Boston on Friday pieces and performance highly pleased the audience. Beyond peradventure the average twentieth-century ear hears eighteenth-century music gladly. It may be no more than superficial with Mozart because his infinite grace, flawless felicity and perfect plasticity are almost a sophistication in themselves. The interwoven splendors, the manifold and exhaustless creative passion of Bach may in measure baffle it. A high god, however human his momentary guise, has his remoteness. With Haydn and Handel, however, the listener of 1920 is on firm ground. The simplicity, the directness, the melodious sentiment, the springing vivacities, the transparent artistry and artlessness of Haydn make music in his ear. No less surely and delightedly he answers to the ample periods, the sonorous progress, the ordered and expansive vigors of the Händel of concertos, overtures and orchestral interludes. Every one of us in our hearts loves on occasion a stately, a ceremonious music. Our moderns may feign to write it when the occasion bids and the rules are handy, but by no more than half do they really believe in what they put to paper; whereas with Händel it was self-expression in a stimulating world.

To more sophisticated ears, there is a fascination, besides, in this music of dominant and vitalized line, of relatively naked tonal design. To conscious or unconscious surfeit our listening generation knows the harmonic luxuriance of Wagner, Strauss and their brood; the harmonic sharpness and subtlety of the children of light—and Paris. From Berlioz to Carpenter we have been titillated with timbres in endless gamut of color. Back we go to Händel in such a Concerto as that of yesterday and lo! there is only tonal line—yet how ample and supple, how energetic and diverse, striding the air, weaving patterns of sound upon it. These designs are spacious and stately; in large progress they take shape, round themselves; rhythm animates them; contrasts diversify them; sonorously the strands expand, entwine, mount, cumulate; creative power fashions and speeds them: the final impression is of stripped beauty—a music for the mind as well as for the senses. There is color in it also; for Ravel was not the first to set string timbre beside or against string timbre; or Loeffler the earliest divider of such a choir. Our moderns would be sumptuous or sinuous. For Händel the straightfor-

...Monteux alters pending programmes, with the Prelude to "Parsifal," he ended for the year excerpts from Wagner's music-dramas. With reason he has restored them to the active repertory of the Symphony Concerts, wherein music is played to give pleasure and not to minister to prejudice. By many a sign his public hears them eagerly, especially when he is as eloquent with them as he was with this very Prelude, with the Prelude to "Lohengrin" a week ago, the Prelude to "Tristan" upon a Thursday in Cambridge, the final scene of "The Gloaming of the Gods" when Mme. Matzenauer sang with the orchestra. Some, hearing this music, no doubt rejoice inwardly that Wagner happened to be a German composer only forty years removed from our immediate time. Others hearing it, repine and rail outwardly at that same inexorable fact. Meanwhile, ninety-nine out of every hundred listeners are taking not a thought of Wagner's nationality and care not half a pin for him otherwise than as maker of music. Enough that in tones he stirs, illudes, pleasures, transports them; that changeless in his operas dwell a lasting power, an enduring beauty.

The truth is that in concert-hall or opera house listeners and composers are thorough-going individualists. It is an excellent thing that Mr. Carpenter, for example, happens to be an American and that clear American impulses prompt some of his music; but what would such birth, residence and predilection profit him were he mediocre of imagination and skill? Being French, Debussy is counted among the artistic glories of France, but his music is what he himself out of mind and spirit —and only incidentally out of acoidental circumstance—made it. Because Debussy was Debussy, and not because he was a

Continued on Following Page

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Continued from Preceding Page

French citizen, is it both unique and universal. So equally with the listener. He may find Mr. Carpenter's music boresome, prefer Dvořák's to it and yet remain 114 per cent American. He may rail at Debussy with the senile fury of Saint-Saëns and still dwell within the union sacrée of French citizenry. As with Debussy, so with Wagner. His music also is unique and universal, not because he was German, but because he was himself. As individually, and with no ther sensation, the listener receives a personal pleasure and stimulation. There is no more to be said—unless it be that by like title and as like source of pleasure, the Strauss of "Don Juan," "Eulenspiegel" and "Death and Transfiguration" will as surely and speedily return to American concert-rooms.

This same Saint-Saëns, not as querulous railer in print, but as expert artificer in tones provided the fourth piece of the day—his Concerto in F major for piano and orchestra, the Concerto with which he rounded half a century as pianist and that hearers best remember from a singular middle movement. This Andante begins with whirling and acrid measures, not without Oriental dissonance; it calms into a thin, piercing, reiterating Nubian love-song that Saint-Saëns happened to hear upon the Nile. There is more Oriental dissonance; subdued, the wild measures of the beginning return. It is as though the composer had flung into his Concerto a semi-tropical rhapsody, brief and graphic. The rest is the Saint-Saëns of familiar dexterity, who makes a finale sound and glitter and race almost out of nothing, who leads fancy and form hand in hand through a first movement, who is equally happy in crisp "passage-work" to display the pianist and in crystalline melody of cool sentiment. Saint-Saëns elegant, exotic, entertaining—and the Concerto has run its course. Mr. Ganz, not too often heard in Boston, played the solo part, played it—with one reserve—in the very image of the music. Over-much, as it seemed, he urged the pace in the first movement and even in the finale; but otherwise he was as lucid and brittle, as elegant or exotic as Saint-Saëns himself. Music of poetry and passion used sometimes to betray him into hardness and exaggerated stress. In music of artifice, even when he pushes the pace, his poise is pleasure.

H. T. PARKER

Trans Cyp 3

SYMPHONY GIVES 20TH CONCERT

An excellent and varied concert was given yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting.

Mr. Rudolph Ganz was the assisting artist. He played Saint-Saens's F major pianoforte concerto. Mr. Ganz's interpretation of the concerto was admirable. He played with intelligence as well as sincere thoughtfulness and clearly brought out the distinct charm of the composition.

Mr. Monteux and the musicians are to be congratulated for the splendid rendition of Handel's Concerto Grosso in D major for string orchestra. This number requires, besides the string orchestra, four solo instruments. Two solo violins played by Mr. Theodorowicz and Mr. Hoffman, one solo viola played by Mr. Denayer, and one solo violoncello played by Mr. Jean Bedette. The dignity and clearness of Handel's composing was very evident. Dignity, especially in Largo, movement III. and clearness in the succession and combination of themes and voices.

The Prelude to Parsifal, very fitting for Good Friday, was most impressive.

The usual large and appreciative audience attended.

Cyp 10

A LOYAL BAND; WHAT OF THE PUBLIC?

At first it seemed likely that the increase, the fresh and keen access of merit which the Symphony Orchestra displayed in the concerts immediately following the departure of some of the members of the band, must be attributed to the special stimulus of the occasion, perhaps even to mere excitement. Even so, it was an encouraging and a pleasing sign—that the reaction, in a moment when deterioration might well have been feared, should be on the favorable and not on the unfavorable side. The point worth noticing today, however, is of importantly larger significance. The new verve, the sharpening of artistic finesse that came out of the muddled days of early March, have not disappeared with the passing of the crisis that brought them forward. On the contrary, by the verdict of the critics, by the delight of the audience, they are admitted to have remained as enduring values through all the recent concerts.

This is indeed a heartening and a commendable manifestation. In regard to the attitude of the men, it seems to have a real meaning. It appears as an affirmation, a new revealment of that fundamental concern for the orchestra, of regard for its character as a musical organization of the highest quality, in fact as in national repute, which we had always supposed the members possessed, and which, indeed, it is clear they must have possessed, else the orchestra never could have achieved in the past what it has achieved. Such a manifestation of loyalty and of standards on the part of the band today—fulfilling with spirit their present obligations whatever may be their plans for the future—should not fail of the response from the public of the Symphony concerts which it deserves. The full campaign for a $3,000,000 endowment fund still waits formal announcement. But the opportunity for immediate giving has been provided, notice to this effect being included for the second time in the programme books of yesterday's concert and tonight's.

The men's response under conditions of special trial is, as we say, a special reason why the public's voluntary response should now be as excellent. But the full outlook upon the situation is wider than that. The economic problems of the Symphony, as viewed in the light of the resources and the ambitions of other orchestras throughout the country, are grave and very grave. They will either stimulate the public of Boston to very generous support and response, or the day will come when, though not as contract-breakers or on account of any loss of the essential loyalty which the band is now showing, enough of its members will be drawn away through the natural operation of competition and economic circumstance so that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have no longer the distinguishing, the all-important mark of supreme quality which it bears today.

Cyp 4

PENSION FUND CONCERT

One of the most important events of the musical season in Boston will be the 34th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in aid of its pension fund for retired members Sunday afternoon, April 18, at 3:30. Pierre Monteux and the distinguished men under him will join in full force with the Harvard glee club for a choral concert on a large scale. It is certainly fitting that these two bodies should come together, for the Harvard glee club has been trained by Archibald T. Davison to such a degree of executive perfection that the dictum of critical opinion estimates it the finest male choir that has been heard hereabouts in years. Mr. Monteux is preparing engrossing music for the symphonic part, in addition to some fine works for chorus and orchestra. The chorus will also sing unaccompanied.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Ravel's charmingly scored "Mother Goose" suite of Children's Pieces, which has not been heard at the Boston Symphony concerts since 1915, will be played at the coming 21st pair of concerts on Friday and Saturday. The movements are: "Pavane of Sleeping Beauty," "Hop o' My Thumb," "Laideronnette, Empress of the Pagodas," "Beauty and the Beast Converse," and "The Fairy Garden." Mr. Monteux has placed on the same program Mozart's Concertante Symphonie for violin and viola (K. 364), Duka's Overture to "Polyeucte," and the vigorous Polovtstsian Dances from "Prince Igor." country to join her fiance.

Post Cyp 4

NEXT PROGRAM FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

The 21st program for the Boston Symphony concerts, to be given next Friday and Saturday, will consist of Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite (of which the movements are "Pavane of Sleeping Beauty," "Hop o' My Thumb," "Laideronnette, Empress of the Pagodas," "Beauty and the Beast Converse" and "The Fairy Garden"), Mozart's Concertante Symphonie for Violin and Viola, Dukas's Overture to "Polyeucte," and the vigorous Polovtstsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor."

Cyp

Friday at 2:30, and Saturday ... ston Symphony Orchestra. T... st program. Concertante Sym... r violin and viola, Mozart; "... oose," Ravel; Overture to "Poly... ukas; Dances from "Prince Igo... din.

Cyp

CHORAL PENSION CO...

One of the most important ... the musical season in Boston w... 34th concert by the Boston Sy... Orchestra in aid of its pension ... retired members, Sunday af... April 18, at 3:30. Pierre Monteux ... distinguished men under him ... in full forces with the Harv... Club for a choral concert on ... scale. It is certainly fitting th... two bodies should come toge... he Harvard Glee Club has bee... by Dr. Archibald T. Davison t... legree of executive perfection ... dictum of critical opinion esti... he finest male choir that h... eard hereabouts in years. Mr. ... preparing some engrossing m... he symphonic part of the prog... ddition to some fine works fo... nd orchestra. The noted chorus ... o sing numbers unaccompanied.

Cyp 4

HARVARD GLEE CLUB TO ASSIST SYMPHONY

One of the most important ... of the musical season in Bost... be the thirty-fourth concert by ... Boston Symphony Orchestra in ... of its pension fund for retired m... bers, on Sunday afternoon, Apri... Pierre Monteux and the orche... will join with the Harvard Glee ... for a choral concert on a large ...

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Ravel's "Mother Goose" ... su... which has not been heard at the B... ton Symphony Concerts since 19... will be played next Friday and S...

urday. On the same program ... Mozart's "Concertante Symphonie ... for violin and viola; Dukas' overtu... to "Polyeucte" and dances fr... Borodin's "Prince Igor."

Trans Cyp 3

CONCERTS NEXT WEE...

Mr. Monteux Sets Another Promisi... Novel Programme—Mme. Tetrazzi... turns—Four Pianists Side by ... Two Young Tenors as Well—Mr... ler's String Quartet at Cambridge

WITH a full orchestra again ... disposal, Mr. Monteux is ... return next week to his ... range and freshness of programme ... Symphony Concerts. Fortunately, ... need accommodate his list of p... next Friday afternoon and Saturday ... ing to no "assisting artist." It co... accordingly, a rarely heard "Concer... Symphonie" by Mozart for violin, ... and small orchestra in which Mr. ... dorowicz and Mr. Denayer will pla... solo-parts; Dukas's overture to Cor... tragedy of Christian martyrs and ... persecutors. "Polyeucte," an alto... new piece; the suite in which Rav... translated into tones five fairy tales ... masterpieces of tonal fancy and ski... the dances from Borodin's opera o... tians and Tartars, "Prince Igor," ... bered from the repertory of the ... Ballet but hitherto unknown to Bo... concert-halls.

From Times
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY "POPS."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, soon ending its home season, has recently announced plans for the annual series of popular Summer concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston. This will be the thirty-fifth year of "The Pops," and the first under the Dry Law. The managers are W. H. Brennan and his assistant, G. E. Judd, and the conductor for the Summer term, as for some seasons past, is Agide Jacchia.

A note in the current Boston programs conveys the first intimation as to plans for meeting the high cost of orchestras, owing to competitive bidding for men to recruit new organizations here and in the West. The Trustees of the Boston Symphony heartily thank the patrons who have contributed, according to their varying means, by checks and pledges, to the future maintenance of the orchestra.

"This prompt response," adds the note, "to the first suggestion that a permanent fund will be raised, gives clear proof of the support to be expected from Boston concert goers. Every immediate contributor helps to give the campaign the strong start essential to its ultimate success."

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date MAR 28 1920 A

LAST BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Although popular in character, the program which Pierre Monteux has made for the closing Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, April 6, represents the highest symphonic achievement. The symphony will be the masterpiece of Dvorak, the great Bohemian composer, "From the New World," which was inspired by the American negro melodies during his sojourn here. The symphony is particularly famous for the beautiful English horn solo in the Largo. Albert Spaulding, the foremost American virtuoso, and one of the finest violinists of our time, will play, as soloist, Mendelssohn's brilliant and melodious concerto. The closing number will be Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz."

From News
Baltimore, Md.
MAR 18 1920 E

BOSTON SYMPHONY

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its concluding concert of the Baltimore season at the Lyric last evening before a large and highly appreciative audience. Troubles which are said to have occurred within the Boston Orchestral family, rumors of which reached our city, may possibly have been the cause of the radical difference that was made between the program announced and the program presented. The program as finally adopted consisted of Symphony No. 4, Beethoven; "Siegfried Idyll" and "Dance of the Apprentices" and "Welcome to Hans Sachs," from "The Meistersingers," Wagner; and vocal numbers. Recitative and Aria from "Don Giovanni," Mozart; Sons with Orchestra, Smetana and Dvorak. Madame Emmy Destinn, soprano, was the soloist.

It is purely a matter of musical taste as to whether the change was not in some ways for the better. The Berlioz Fantastic Symphony is not often heard, but is replete with interest and is a fine example of Berlioz's great mastery of orchestral scoring. It demanded, however, a larger orchestra than was present last night, and Beethoven is always acceptable. His Fourth Symphony as presented last evening reflected to a certain extent the French conception of Beethoven. This was more particularly noticeable in the extremely rapid tempo at which the final movement was taken. The accelerated pace was rather a novel conception, but by no means lacking in charm.

Madame Destinn is a true artist and sings with much real feeling. The quality of her "forte" tones was not always quite as pleasing, but her "piano" effects were absolutely beautiful. Her interpretation of the Smetana "Cradle Song" was a positive delight, as was also her singing of Russalk's Song from Dvorak's opera "Russalka," and so thought the entire audience, which testified its heartfelt approval by long and continued applause. W. G. O.

...eals and Announcements

For the Symphony Concerts of next week on Friday, April 9, and Saturday, April 10, Mr. Monteux will return to music of the dance, which he chooses interestingly and with which he succeeds well. The impending pieces are the Polovtsian ...nces from Borodin's opera of Russians ... Tartars, "Prince Igor"—familiar item ... the repertories of the Diaaghlev Ballet ... the Metropolitan Opera House, but ...erto unheard at the Symphony Con... and Ravel's ballet, "Mother Goose," ... made known here by Dr. Muck. The ...ms of the programme are Dukas's ... to Cornelle's tragedy of Christian ... and Roman persecutors, "Poly... "Concertante" by Mozart ...wicz), viola (Mr.

Symphony Orchestra Passing Through Most Critical Period of Its Career

Permanent Fund Needed to Meet Keen Competition in Orchestral Field; "Strike" Brings Up Issue of a Living Wage

By E. F. HARKINS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra management regards itself as well over the crisis recently brought about by the unparalleled Fradkin incident and the consequent departure of thirty members who sympathized with the concert-master in his encounter with Conductor Monteux.

But this feeling at Symphony Hall is due to an optimistic spirit. The orchestra will not be unionized. The trustees have settled that issue. But it must be reconstructed to a considerable extent. So the crisis, which mainly concerns the artistic prestige of the orchestra, still exists and there is buoyant talk of "new blood."

Already the reconstruction of this most celebrated of American orchestras is making rapid headway. Several of the players who withdrew after Fradkin's dismissal have returned. They came back of their own accord, Symphony Hall reports. In any event, they are returning on terms laid down by the management. These terms cover not only salaries, but rehearsal hours and matters of discipline. So far as salaries go, future terms are likely to be better than they ever were before.

It is crtain that others among the three score and one who figured in the late rebellion will join outside orchestras. The competition in the orchestral field was never so keen as it is today. Recently, for instance, a member of the Symphony Hall organization received an offer from a Western orchestra of twice the salary he is receiving now, and he was advised to take it.

The Boston management is in no position to indulge in this competition. Not at present, at any rate. What effect the permanent fund now being subscribed to by friends of the orchestra will have upon this policy is a question. If the fund should be realized, then the trustees will have the income from $3,000,000 to dispense. This permanent fund is intended to augment and extend the present guaranty fund and to meet future needs. But the trustees are prudent men. They are fighting shy of extravagance.

Orchestra Staggering Under Blows for Two Years

According to reports from the union, no less than seventy of the ninety-eight members whose names appeared on the Symphony program a month ago have joined the American Federation of Musicians, thus making themselves eligible for positions in other symphony orchestras. Fifty-six became members of the local union. This number has been reduced within the last few days by the return of some of the "lost sheep." The management seems confident that others will return and that those who did not go out a month ago will remain where they are. Hence, they say the worst is over. The union viewpoint is quite the opposite.

The orchestra has been staggering along for two years under blows from various quarters. No organization could take such blows without showing signs of injury. Muck's fall took from the orchestra perhaps the foremost director in the symphonic field. If he had a few peers, at least he had no superiors; and after him fell many members of the orchestra who were of German blood or German affiliations. And here comes up the question of Americanization.

All the other symphony orchestras in the country—and opera house orchestras, for that matter—are in the American Federation of Musicians, and every union musician must be an American citizen. At least, he must have taken out his first papers. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, being maintained on an independent policy, has not concerned itself particularly about this citizenship question. Members have been dropped for inefficiency by certain very critical conductors, but never, until the United States went into the world war, were they sent their way because of foreign ties. Then the reaction against the Muck men became so bitter among patrons of the orchestra that even Germans who had taken out their first citizenship papers were not permitted to return. Some of them joined other orchestras—union orchestras, of course—but the Symphony management here would have nothing more to do with them.

The feeling among the influential patrons, apparently, swung from one extreme to the other. Up to wartime not a word had been said against the predominant German element in the orchestra, for that element had a staunch supporter in Major Higginson, who laid the foundation of the orchestra's fame when he brought Gericke and the nucleus of the new band over from Vienna back in the middle eighties.

It is evident, consequently, that the German regime ended with Muck, after an artistic success lasting a third of a century.

Orchestra Has Now Reached Most Critical Point in History

The orchestra has now reached the most critical point in its history, owing, first, to the war blow and, again, to what may be called the Fradkin blow. But it had in part recovered from the first blow when it got the second. Before the recent set-to between the trustees and the Fradkin sympathizers the orchestra was playing splendidly under Pierre Monteux. Since then there has been a partial eclipse. The tone balance has suffered through the weakening of the certain sections, chiefly the strings; and the strings were for many years the great glory of the orchestra, rivalling the brilliancy of Muck himself. What will happen now?

The management is looking forward optimistically to the opening of the next season. Many applicants for the vacant places are demonstrating their skill every day at Symphony Hall. Whether they are Americans is not considered; only they must not be Germans. The management protests that American players are welcome, provided they are capable. Moreover, it points to the fact that Fredric Fradkin was made concert master two years ago partly for the reason that he was American born.

Strangely enough, another reason for Fradkin's selection was the good report made regarding him by Mr. Monteux. Fradkin had been concert master under Monteux with the Ballet Russe Band.

Many new faces will doubtless be seen in the orchestra before the year is out. To what extent the union question will enter into this reconstruction is not quite certain. The union leaders say that as soon as the union men still playing with the orchestra work out their present contracts, which will be in the course of another few months, they must either resign from the band or from the union. But the management is preparing for all this. Better terms are to be offered the men, with contracts running for four or five years instead of for only a year or two.

In other words, with the help of the patrons, every effort will be made to restore the prestige of the orchestra under the independent policy fought for years ago by Major Higginson and upheld ever since. The union issue came up once before, some twenty years ago, and Major Higginson said that he would not have a union man in the Symphony ranks. The men had to give up their union cards.

But since the Muck smash-up unionism has been making more progress in the orchestra than it ever made before—all of which was disclosed after Monteux and Fradkin had their row over in Sanders Theatre. The management seems determined to solve the union problem by means of this $3,000,000 permanent fund, which will help them to overcome conditions against which union members have been complaining—salary conditions mostly. The problem will really be settled first of all by the attitude and the money of the subscribers to the concerts. Their attitude seems to be strongly in favor of the time-honored Higginson policy. The monetary side of their enthusiasm remains to be seen. The orchestra has been so skillfully managed as to meet expenses so far, and in this respect it also is unique.

Most Others Lose.

Most other orchestras in the country lose tons of money every season. They are managed extravagantly, according to reliable reports. The Boston Symphony, on the other hand, has generally been self-supporting. But the margin of money profit has never been a large one. It will be smaller than ever next season—and it may even be turned into a deficit—if the patrons do not rally around the trustees and provide money to keep the players contented. Even a symphony player cannot subsist on pride alone.

The "strike" will not have been in vain if the living wage be assured. And if it be not, who would blame the players for seeking more lucrative field?

The question of art enters into the crisis largely in proportion to the number of new players that will be required to take the place of men determined to stand by Fradkin. No orchestra, union or non-union, has any monopoly of fine players; and that players of true artistic calibre have been steadily increasing in number in this country is illustrated by the renown enjoyed by orchestras outside of Boston.

But the glory of the Boston Symphony Orchestra did not depart with Muck and his proteges. Some of the performances this season, under Monteux have justified the fame of Boston's unique independent orchestra. For Monteux has his great afternoons and evenings, inspiring his men as they must be inspired to meet the highest artistic standards.

And remember that these signal successes have been achieved with an orchestra that has changed materially every decade. Not for several seasons has there been in the orchestra any player who sat before Henschel when the first concert was given in the Autumn of 1881. Only four of the original members were present when, nine years ago, the thirtieth anniversary was celebrated. And of the ninety-eight men then playing under Max Fiedler's baton only thirty-five remained to start the present season under Monteux. Many changes were made during the Muck years; in fact, Muck started his final season here with hardly more than half the men that greeted him eleven years before.

Much Comment.

This gave rise to much comment. People are still heard to say that Muck was a tyrant to his men—for some people will say almost anything against him now, as five years ago they could hardly get enough voice to sing his praises. As a matter of fact, Muck dealt in subtle irony and sarcasm when he had occasion to reprove men who were late for rehearsals or careless in their playing.

To give a few examples. On one occasion, when he spied a man reading a paper during rehearsal, he stopped the players and riveted his

Continued on Page 2, Column 4.

Thurs Apr. 1

Spring Sign and Symbol

"The Pops"
As Epitomized by Gluvas Williams

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PASSING ITS CRISIS

Continued From First Page.

glance on the offending member. The man thought he might as well read while waiting for his turn to come in. But that wasn't Muck's view.

"This is no reading room," he said. "You can retire if you wish to read the paper, but, considering your musical ability, I think it would be more profitable to you to remain and listen to the others play."

Punctuality became a virtue with members of the orchestra during Muck's administration—much to the relief of the management. The latecomer would be grilled politely, but thoroughly. Watch in hand, Muck would remind the offender that no one was dispensing any indulgences to keep the orchestra waiting; and, then, he would add a few remarks to the effect that no gentleman and artist would treat his confreres so inconsiderately. Several scenes of that order put an end to tardiness. He had a masterful but courtly way with the players as well as with those hero-worshippers who wrote him notes that he never destroyed.

RIGID DISCIPLINE.

Muck's rigid discipline was extremely effective under a policy which requires rehearsals the first four days of every week during which the orchestra is at home—a policy which has had much to do with the maintenance of the high technical standard for which the Boston Symphony has been renowned since its rudimentary days, when Theodore Thomas used to bring the New York Orchestra to Boston to show the Puritan faithful that they had still much to learn in symphonic matters.

Anyhow, the present crisis is, on the surface, at any rate, the most serious the orchestra has faced since Henschel's time, but it may well result in the establishment of a more American system in place of the German system that prevailed for a third of a century. The trustees mention the "vital importance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to our community and the country." That importance is not merely a matter of excellent programs and artistic performances. It also involves the encouragement of American players, graduates of the many admirable American music schools. Listemann, the first concert-master, was a resident violinist. From his time until Fradkin came to take Witek's place the orchestra had no American concert-master. Fradkin's advent marked a step in the right direction, considering the "vital importance" just referred to, which affects not only patrons of the orchestra, but worthy and ambitious American musicians.

The "importing system," as it has been called, still applies to conductors quite generally throughout the country; but there is no longer any reason why it should apply to players.

To sum up, the feeling at Symphony Hall is that when the clouds have rolled away the orchestra will be found in excellent condition. Anyhow, it will be a non-union orchestra. That has been decreed.

From Times
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY "POPS."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, soon ending its home season, has recently announced plans for the annual series of popular Summer concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston. This will be the thirty-fifth year of "The Pops," and the first under the Dry Law. The managers are W. H. Brennan and his assistant, G. E. Judd, and the conductor for the Summer term, as for some seasons past, is Agide Jacchia.

A note in the current Boston programs conveys the first intimation as to plans for meeting the high cost of orchestras, owing to competitive bidding for men to recruit new organizations here and in the West. The Trustees of the Boston Symphony heartily thank the patrons who have contributed, according to their varying means, by checks and pledges, to the future maintenance of the orchestra.

"This prompt response," adds the note, "to the first suggestion that a permanent fund will be raised, gives clear proof of the support to be expected from Boston concert goers. Every immediate contributor helps to give the campaign the strong start essential to its ultimate success."

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date MAR 28 1920 A

LAST BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Although popular in character, the program which Pierre Monteux has made for the closing Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, April 6, represents the highest symphonic achievement. The symphony will be the masterpiece of Dvorak, the great Bohemian composer, "From the New World," which was inspired by the American negro melodies during his sojourn here. The symphony is particularly famous for the beautiful English horn solo in the Largo. Albert Spaulding, the foremost American virtuoso, and one of the finest violinists of our time, will play, as soloist, Mendelssohn's brilliant and melodious concerto. The closing number will be Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz."

From
News
Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its concluding concert of the Baltimore season at the Lyric last evening before a large and highly appreciative audience. Troubles which are said to have occurred within the Boston Orchestral family, rumors of which reached our city, may possibly have been the cause of the radical difference that was made between the program announced and the program presented. The program as finally adopted consisted of Symphony No. 4, Beethoven; "Siegfried Idyll" and "Dance of the Apprentices" and "Welcome to Hans Sachs," from "The Meistersingers," Wagner; and vocal numbers. Recitative and Aria from "Don Giovanni," Mozart; Sons with Orchestra, Smetana and Dvorak. Madame Emmy Destinn, soprano, was the soloist.

It is purely a matter of musical taste as to whether the change was not in some ways for the better. The Berlioz Fantastic Symphony is not often heard, but is replete with interest and is a fine example of Berlioz's great mastery of orchestral scoring. It demanded, however, a larger orchestra than was present last night, and Beethoven is always acceptable. His Fourth Symphony as presented last evening reflected to a certain extent the French conception of Beethoven. This was more particularly noticeable in the extremely rapid tempo at which the final movement was taken. The accelerated pace was rather a novel conception, but by no means lacking in charm.

Madame Destinn is a true artist and sings with much real feeling. The quality of her "forte" tones was not always quite as pleasing, but her "piano" effects were absolutely beautiful. Her interpretation of the Smetana "Cradle Song" was a positive delight, as was also her singing of Russalk's Song from Dvorak's opera "Russalka," and so thought the entire audience, which testified its heartfelt approval by long and continued applause. W. G. O.

...ems and Announcements

For the Symphony Concerts of next week on Friday, April 9, and Saturday, April 10, Mr. Monteux will return to music of the dance, which he chooses interestingly and with which he succeeds well. The impending pieces are the Polovtsian ...lances from Borodin's opera of Russians ...d Tartars, "Prince Igor"—familiar item in the repertories of the Diaaghiev Ballet and the Metropolitan Opera House, but hitherto unheard at the Symphony Con...s; and Ravel's ballet, "Mother Goose," ...t made known here by Dr. Muck. The ...r items of the programme are Dukas's ...e to Corneille's tragedy of Christian ... and Roman persecutors, "Poly... a "Concertante" by Mozart ...Theodorowicz), viola (Mr.

Symphony Orchestra Passing Through Most Critical Period of Its Career

Permanent Fund Needed to Meet Keen Competition in Orchestral Field; "Strike" Brings Up Issue of a Living Wage

By E. F. HARKINS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra management regards itself as well over the crisis recently brought about by the unparalleled Fradkin incident and the consequent departure of thirty members who sympathized with the concert-master in his encounter with Conductor Monteux.

But this feeling at Symphony Hall is due to an optimistic spirit. The orchestra will not be unionized. The trustees have settled that issue. But it must be reconstructed to a considerable extent. So the crisis, which mainly concerns the artistic prestige of the orchestra, still exists and there is buoyant talk of "new blood."

Already the reconstruction of this most celebrated of American orchestras is making rapid headway. Several of the players who withdrew after Fradkin's dismissal have returned. They came back of their own accord, Symphony Hall reports. In any event, they are returning on terms laid down by the management. These terms cover not only salaries, but rehearsal hours and matters of discipline. So far as salaries go, future terms are likely to be better than they ever were before.

It is crtain that others among the three score and one who figured in the late rebellion will join outside orchestras. The competition in the orchestral field was never so keen as it is today. Recently, for instance, a member of the Symphony Hall organization received an offer from a Western orchestra of twice the salary he is receiving now, and he was advised to take it.

The Boston management is in no position to indulge in this competition. Not at present, at any rate. What effect the permanent fund now being subscribed to by friends of the orchestra will have upon this policy is a question. If the fund should be realized, then the trustees will have the income from $3,000,000 to dispense. This permanent fund is intended to augment and extend the present guaranty fund and to meet future needs. But the trustees are prudent men. They are fighting shy of extravagance.

Orchestra Staggering Under Blows for Two Years

According to reports from the union, no less than seventy of the ninety-eight members whose names appeared on the Symphony program a month ago have joined the American Federation of Musicians, thus making themselves eligible for positions in other symphony orchestras. Fifty-six became members of the local union. This number has been reduced within the last few days by the return of some of the "lost sheep." The management seems confident that others will return and that those who did not go out a month ago will remain where they are. Hence, they say the worst is over. The union viewpoint is quite the opposite.

The orchestra has been staggering along for two years under blows from various quarters. No organization could take such blows without showing signs of injury. Muck's fall took from the orchestra perhaps the foremost director in the symphonic field. If he had a few peers, at least he had no superiors; and after him fell many members of the orchestra who were of German blood or German affiliations. And here comes up the question of Americanization.

All the other symphony orchestras in the country—and opera house orchestras, for that matter—are in the American Federation of Musicians, and every union musician must be an American citizen. At least, he must have taken out his first papers. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, being maintained on an independent policy, has not concerned itself particularly about this citizenship question. Members have been dropped for inefficiency by certain very critical conductors, but never, until the United States went into the world war, were they sent their way because of foreign ties. Then the reaction against the Muck men became so bitter among patrons of the orchestra that even Germans who had taken out their first citizenship papers were not permitted to return. Some of them joined other orchestras—union orchestras, of course—but the Symphony management here would have nothing more to do with them.

The feeling among the influential patrons, apparently, swung from one extreme to the other. Up to wartime not a word had been said against the predominant German element in the orchestra, for that element had a staunch supporter in Major Higginson, who laid the foundation of the orchestra's fame when he brought Gericke and the nucleus of the new band over from Vienna back in the middle eighties.

It is evident, consequently, that the German regime ended with Muck, after an artistic success lasting a third of a century.

Orchestra Has Now Reached Most Critical Point in History

The orchestra has now reached the most critical point in its history, owing, first, to the war blow and, again, to what may be called the Fradkin blow. But it had in part recovered from the first blow when it got the second. Before the recent set-to between the trustees and the Fradkin sympathizers the orchestra was playing splendidly under Pierre Monteux. Since then there has been a partial eclipse. The tone balance has suffered through the weakening of the certain sections, chiefly the strings; and the strings were for many years the great glory of the orchestra, rivalling the brilliancy of Muck himself. What will happen now?

The management is looking forward optimistically to the opening of the next season. Many applicants for the vacant places are demonstrating their skill every day at Symphony Hall. Whether they are Americans is not considered; only they must not be Germans. The management protests that American players are welcome, provided they are capable. Moreover, it points to the fact that Fredric Fradkin was made concert master two years ago partly for the reason that he was American born.

Strangely enough, another reason for Fradkin's selection was the good report made regarding him by Mr. Monteux. Fradkin had been concert master under Monteux with the Ballet Russe Band.

Many new faces will doubtless be seen in the orchestra before the year is out. To what extent the union question will enter into this reconstruction is not quite certain. The union leaders say that as soon as the union men still playing with the orchestra work out their present contracts, which will be in the course of another few months, they must either resign from the band or from the union. But the management is preparing for all this. Better terms are to be offered the men, with contracts running for four or five years instead of for only a year or two.

In other words, with the help of the patrons, every effort will be made to restore the prestige of the orchestra under the independent policy fought for years ago by Major Higginson and upheld ever since. The union issue came up once before, some twenty years ago, and Major Higginson said that he would not have a union man in the Symphony ranks. The men had to give up their union cards.

But since the Muck smash-up unionism has been making more progress in the orchestra than it ever made before—all of which was disclosed after Monteux and Fradkin had their row over in Sanders Theatre. The management seems determined to solve the union problem by means of this $3,000,000 permanent fund, which will help them to overcome conditions against which union members have been complaining—salary conditions mostly. The problem will really be settled first of all by the attitude and the money of the subscribers to the concerts. Their attitude seems to be strongly in favor of the time-honored Higginson policy. The monetary side of their enthusiasm remains to be seen. The orchestra has been so skillfully managed as to meet expenses so far, and in this respect it also is unique.

Most Others Lose.

Most other orchestras in the country lose tons of money every season. They are managed extravagantly, according to reliable reports. The Boston Symphony, on the other hand, has generally been self-supporting. But the margin of money profit has never been a large one. It will be smaller than ever next season—and it may even be turned into a deficit—if the patrons do not rally around the trustees and provide money to keep the players contented. Even a symphony player cannot subsist on pride alone.

The "strike" will not have been in vain if the living wage be assured. And if it be not, who would blame the players for seeking more lucrative field?

The question of art enters into the crisis largely in proportion to the number of new players that will be required to take the place of men determined to stand by Fradkin. No orchestra, union or non-union, has any monopoly of fine players; and that players of true artistic calibre have been steadily increasing in number in this country is illustrated by the renown enjoyed by orchestras outside of Boston.

But the glory of the Boston Symphony Orchestra did not depart with Muck and his proteges. Some of the performances this season, under Monteux have justified the fame of Boston's unique independent orchestra. For Monteux has his great afternoons and evenings, inspiring his men as they must be inspired to meet the highest artistic standards.

And remember that these signal successes have been achieved with an orchestra that has changed materially every decade. Not for several seasons has there been in the orchestra any player who sat before Henschel when the first concert was given in the Autumn of 1881. Only four of the original members were present when, nine years ago, the thirtieth anniversary was celebrated. And of the ninety-eight men then playing under Max Fiedler's baton only thirty-five remained to start the present season under Monteux. Many changes were made during the Muck years; in fact, Muck started his final season here with hardly more than half the men that greeted him eleven years before.

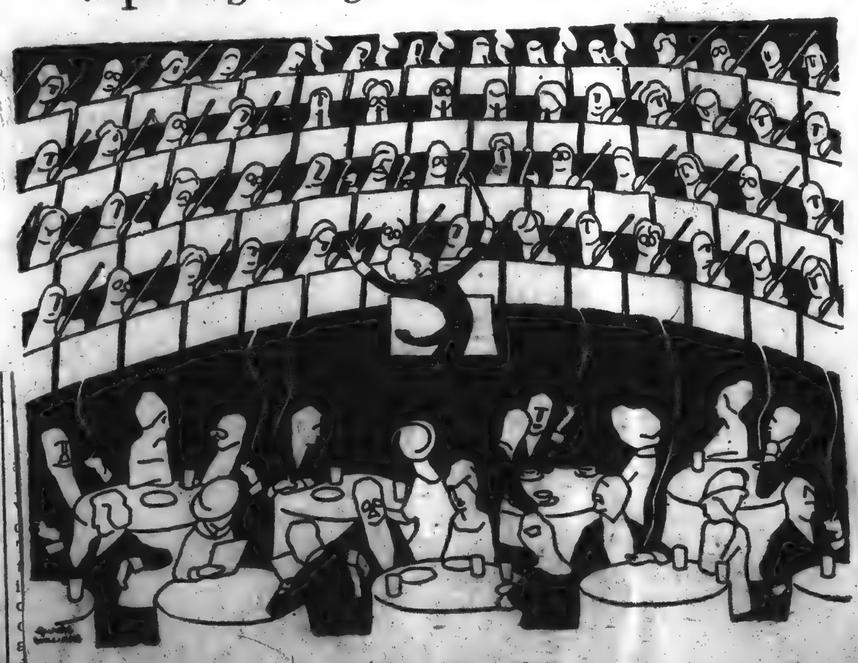
Much Comment.

This gave rise to much comment. People are still heard to say that Muck was a tyrant to his men—for some people will say almost anything against him now, as five years ago they could hardly get enough voice to sing his praises. As a matter of fact, Muck dealt in subtle irony and sarcasm when he had occasion to reprove men who were late for rehearsals or careless in their playing.

To give a few examples. On one occasion, when he spied a man reading a paper during rehearsal, he stopped the players and riveted his

Continued on Page 2, Column 4.

Spring Sign and Symbol



"The Pops"
As Epitomized by Gluyas Williams

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PASSING ITS CRISIS

Continued From First Page.

glance on the offending member. The man thought he might as well read while waiting for his turn to come in. But that wasn't Muck's view.

"This is no reading room," he said. "You can retire if you wish to read the paper, but, considering your musical ability, I think it would be more profitable to you to remain and listen to the others play."

Punctuality became a virtue with members of the orchestra during Muck's administration—much to the relief of the management. The latecomer would be grilled politely, but thoroughly. Watch in hand, Muck would remind the offender that no one was dispensing any indulgences to keep the orchestra waiting; and, then, he would add a few remarks to the effect that no gentleman and artist would treat his confreres so inconsiderately. Several scenes of that order put an end to tardiness. He had as masterful but courtly way with the players as well as with those hero-worshippers who wrote him notes that he never destroyed.

RIGID DISCIPLINE.

Mack's rigid discipline was extremely effective under a policy which requires rehearsals the first four days of every week during which the orchestra is at home—a policy which has had much to do with the maintenance of the high technical standard for which the Boston Symphony has been renowned since its rudimentary days, when Theodore Thomas used to bring the New York Orchestra to Boston to show the Puritan faithful that they had still much to learn in symphonic matters.

Anyhow, the present crisis is, on the surface, at any rate, the most serious the orchestra has faced since Henschel's time, but it may well result in the establishment of a more American system in place of the German system that prevailed for a third of a century. The trustees mention the "vital importance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to our community and the country." That importance is not merely a matter of excellent programs and artistic performances. It also involves the encouragement of American players, graduates of the many admirable American music schools. Listemann, the first concert-master, was a resident violinist. From his time until Fradkin came to take Witek's place the orchestra had no American concert-master. Fradkin's advent marked a step in the right direction, considering the "vital importance" just referred to, which affects not only patrons of the orchestra, but worthy and ambitious American musicians.

The "importing system," as it has been called, still applies to conductors quite generally throughout the country; but there is no longer any reason why it should apply to players.

To sum up, the feeling at Symphony Hall is that when the clouds have rolled away the orchestra will be found in excellent condition. Anyhow, it will be a non-union orchestra. That has been decreed.

Symphonic Silhouette

Mr. Monteux Conducting

Cut and Colored by Katharine G. Buffum of Philadelphia Now in Boston Making Such Pictures in Aid of the Bryn Mawr Endowment Fund

Mr. Cortot, the Pianist in Unusual Pieces with Symphony Orchestra—Mr. Schmitz Also Comes Again—Mr. Spalding, the Violinist, and Miss Braslau, the Singer, Together—Music at the Art Museum—Other Programmes

THE Parisian pianist, Alfred Cortot, much applauded in Boston a year and more ago for his crispness of touch and tone, his keen intelligence and alert finesse with music and instrument, promises to be the pervading figure at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Contrary to custom but according to his own particular way on such occasions, he will be heard in two pieces—Beethoven's early and seldom played Concerto in C minor, and a Fantasia by Debussy written in his younger years, unpublished during his life, discovered after his death and not yet known to American concert-rooms. In England and in France, the resurrection has been variously viewed. The orchestral preludes to Mr. Cortot is the overture to Beethoven's opera, "Fidelio"; the orchestral postlude two fragments of Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Golden Cockerel."

Herald Apr 11

...favorites.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

An unusually fine program has been arranged for the pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon. The Harvard Glee Club will join forces with the orchestra in two choruses from Rubenstein's opera, "The Tower of Babel," and in a Netherlands Prayer of Thanksgiving. Unaccompanied, the Glee Club will sing three devotional numbers by Palestrina, Lotti and Leisring. The orchestra will play Saint-Saens' "...pieces.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

France's greatest pianist, Alfred Cortot, will be the soloist with the Symphony Orchestra next Friday and Saturday. He will figure in Beethoven's third concerto in C minor and Debussy's fantasy, which will then have its first performances in this country. Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio" and the introduction to Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, "Le Coq d'Or" and the rousing march from the third act will also be played.

Herald Apr 11

PENSION FUND PROGRAM

An unusually fine program has been arranged for the 34th Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon at 3:30 o'clock. The Harvard Glee Club, Dr. A. T. Davison's male chorus of 100, will join forces with the Symphony Orchestra in two choruses from Rubinstein's "Tower of Babel," and in a Netherlands Folk Prayer of Thanksgiving, unaccompanied, the Glee Club will sing three devotional numbers from the 16th and 17th centuries by Palestrina, Lotti and Leisring. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will play the following symphonic works: Saint-Saens's "Organ" Symphony in C minor (Albert W. Snow, organist), a minuet from Gluck's "Orpheus," with George Laurent as flute soloist, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish Themes.

CORTOT WITH ORCHESTRA

Ranked as one of France's greatest pianists, Alfred Cortot, much applauded as soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts last season, will be welcomed by many when he reappears with the orchestra in Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday. He will play Beethoven's Third Concerto in C minor; also Debussy's Fantasy, which will then have its first performances in this country. Mr. Monteux will begin the program with Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio," and conclude it with the introduction to Rimsky-Korsakoff's Opera, "Le Coq d'Or," and the march from the third act.

Travels Apr 10

HARVARD GLEE CLUB TO ASSIST FUND CONCERT

For the pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra to be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday, April 18, at 3:30, the orchestra will combine with the Harvard Glee Club of 100 men to give a program memorable in proportions and engrossing in character.

Globe Apr 11

Events and Comments

There will be many who will regret that the program announced for the Pension Fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra, next Sunday, departs from the long-established precedent of a Wagner program for the last such concert in each season. Mr Monteux evidently thinks as Mr Rabaud sometimes seemed to, that Boston has a cult for the complete works of Saint-Saens, whose Third Symphony, for organ and orchestra, we are to hear next Sunday for something like the 10th time in five seasons. The Harvard Glee Club, Dr A. T. Davison conductor, will sing with the orchestra choruses from Rubinstein's oratorio "The Tower of Babel." They are also to sing a capella the beautiful Dutch folk tune "The Prayer of Thanksgiving," which everyone familiar with Harvard in the last decade will recall as a favorite.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8—Boston Symphony Orchestra. Twenty-second program. Overture to "Fidelio," Beethoven; third piano concerto, Beethoven; fantasy for piano and orchestra, Debussy, first time in America; introduction and march from act 3 of "Le Coq D'Or," Rimsky-Korsakoff. Soloist, Alfred Cortot.

JORDAN HALL ...Wednesda...

Debussy's Fantasy

That admirable pianist Alfred Cortot will play at the Symphony concerts this week a concerto of Beethoven that is not often heard, and a Fantasy of Debussy which will be performed in this country for the first time. The history of this Fantasy is a singular one.

Debussy was awarded the prix de Rome in 1884. From Rome he sent as his "envoi" for the first year a fragment of a lyric drama, "Almanzor" (drama of Heine); an orchestral Suite in two parts, "Spring," for orchestra and chorus; the third was "The Blessed Damozel"; the fourth was to have been this "Fantasy" for piano and orchestra.

As he could not find a satisfactory translation of Heine's poem, he never completed the drama. His "Printemps" did not please the hide-bound conservatives of the Institute at Paris. They were shocked by the use of the voice, without words, used in an instrumental role, and the tonality seemed to them dangerous. One of them remarked: "One does not write in F sharp major for orchestra." Debussy, vexed, therefore did not allow his third "Envoi", namely "The Blessed Damozel" to be performed at the Institute concert. The "Fantasy", intended as the fourth envoy, remained in the hands of the composer.

Some years later it was announced for performance at a concert of the National Society of Music in Paris, but at the last rehearsal, Debussy, not satisfied with the second part, withdrew it. The Fantasy was not published during the composer's lifetime. It was not performed in public until late in 1919.

Mr. Cortot played it at a concert of the Royal Philharmonic Society, London, on November 20, 1919. It was said at the time that there had been a semi-private performance in London by Mr. Cortot, not with orchestra, but with Berthe Bert playing the transcription for second piano from the score.

The concerto was performed in Paris for the rst time on Dec. 7, 1919, at a Lamoureux concert conducted by Messager, when Marguerite Long was the pianist. Gustave Samazeuilh, reviewing the performance, said that while the orchestration was not characteristic of the later Debussy, the music showed the exceptional gifts that gave him later his world-wide reputation. The reviewer found in the first portion an irresistibly fascinating youthful freshness and spirit, and certain formal features that reminded him of d'Indy's Symphony on a Mountain Air. In the transition from the Andante to the Finale, one heard already the voices of the sirens in Debussy's "Nocturnes"; in the Finale there is anticipation of the fancy that vitalized his string quartet, the fourth "Lyric Prose," and the subtle rhythm of "Fetes." "The writing for the piano often enlaces the orchestral speech with capricious garlands." Well, well! We shall hear what we shall hear. Certainly if any one can bring out all that is in this Fantasy, his name is Alfred Cortot.

Herald

THURSDAY AFTERNOON; LYDIA ...OT, PIANO SOLOIST, BOSTON SYM... ...RDAY Apr 11

Programmes in Prospect Ap 8

As already announced, the Harvard Glee Club, in the new mastery of choral singing to which Dr. Davison and its own efforts have raised it, will assist the Symphony Orchestra at the concert on Sunday afternoon, April 18, in Symphony Hall, for the profit of its Pension Fund. By itself the Club will sing ancient pieces by Palestrina, Lotti and Leisring; with the orchestra it will be heard in two fragments of Rubinstein's oratorio, "The Tower of Babel," and in an arrangement of "A Prayer of Thanksgiving" from Dutch folk-song. The appointed orchestral pieces are Saint-Saëns's so-called Organ Symphony; a ballet air from Gluck's "Orpheus," with Mr. Laurent playing the solo part for flute, and Rimsky-Korsakov's glittering "Spanish Caprice."

Mr. Cortot, the Parisian pianist of keen intelligence and crisp touch, will assist the Symphony Orchestra at the regular concerts of next week. He will play the solo parts in a Fantasia by Debussy to be heard for the first times in America and in Beethoven's third Concerto—a piece seldom revived. The Fantasia is music that Debussy wrote in his student years at Rome and wisely withheld from publication. Now that the composer is dead, Mr. Cortot has somehow laid hold of it. When he played it last winter in the Hallé Concerts at Manchester in England, the reviewers regretted the resurrection. Mr. Monteux's orchestral numbers are Beethoven's overture, "Fidelio," and the Introduction and March from the third act of Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Golden Cockerel."

Post Ap 9

PROGRAMME FOR PENSION FUND CONCERT

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Dr. A. T. Davison, director of the Harvard Glee Club, have arranged a very interesting programme for the 34th pension fund of the orchestra to be held on Sunday afternoon, April 18, at 3:30 o'clock, in Symphony Hall, at which the orchestra and glee club will join forces.

The programme will be as follows:

Saint-Saens—organ Symphony in C. minor, No. 5, Op. 78; Mr. Albert Snow, organist.

A capella—Palestrina, Adoramus Te; Lotti, Crucifixus; Leisring, O Filii et Filiae.

Gluck—Minuet from the opera "Orpheus"; flute solo, Georges Laurent.

Chorus and orchestra—Rubenstein, two pictures from "The Tower of Babel"; choruses of Ham and Japhet; Netherlands folk song, "Prayer of Thanksgiving."

Rimsky-Korsakoff — Caprice on Spanish themes, Op. 34: Alborada, variations, Alborada, scene and Gypsy song, "Fandango of the Asturias."

Amer. Apr. 10

CORTOT SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Alfred Cortot, the first pianist of France and one of the best remembered soloists of last season, will play two numbers with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the twenty-second pair of concerts on Friday and Saturday, April 16 and 17, Beethoven's Concerto in C minor No. 3 and Debussy's Fantasy, which will then have its first American prefermances.

Trav Ap 10

French Pianist Will Play Soon with Symphony

Alfred Cortot, the first pianist of France and one of the best remembered soloists of last season, will play two numbers with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the 22d pair of concerts on Friday and Saturday (April 16 and 17): Beethoven's concerto in C minor No. 3 and Debussy fantasy, which will then have its first American performances. Pierre Monteux will begin the concerts with Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio" and conclude them with the introduction to Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera "Le Coq d'Or" and the brilliant march from the third act.

Post Ap 11

Cortot With Orchestra

The distinguished French pianist, Alfred Cortot, will be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts of this week in Symphony Hall. He will play Beethoven's Third Concerto in C minor, and Debussy's "Fantasy" for piano and orchestra, which will then have its first performances in this country. Pierre Monteux will begin the programme with Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio" and conclude it with the introduction to Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, "Le Coq d'Or," and the rousing march from the third act.

Pension Fund Programme

An unusually fine programme has been arranged for the 34th pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon at 3:30 o'clock. The Harvard Glee Club, Dr. A. T. Davison's remarkable male chorus of 100, will join forces with the Symphony Orchestra in the choruses. Unaccompanied the glee club will sing three devotional numbers from the 16th and 17th centuries by Palestrina, Lotti and Leisring. Pierre Monteux and his orchestra will also give the following symphonic works: Saint-Saen's mountainous and impressive "Organ" symphony in C minor (Mr. Albert W. Snow, organist); a minuet from Gluck's "Orpheus," with George Laurent as flute soloist, and finally Rimsky-Korsakoff's rhythmic caprice on Spanish themes, consisting of Alborada, variations, scene and gypsy song, Fandango of the Austrias.

Trans Ap 10

SUNDAY afternoon, April 18, in Symphony Hall, a concert by the Symphony Orchestra for the profit of its Pension Fund. The remarkable men's choir into which Dr. Davison has developed the Harvard Glee Club will also be heard in ancient and modern music. The orchestral numbers of Saint-Saëns's so-called Organ Symphony; a dance from Gluck's opera, "Orpheus" with Mr. Laurent as solo-flute and Rimsky-Korsakov's glittering "Spanish Caprice." The Harvard Choir will sing pieces by Palestrina and Lotti unaccompanied and three choruses with the band.

...ms and Announcements

...In the second week in May Mr. Monteux ...ill depart for Paris to refresh himself at ...me, to spy out new and interesting ...usic, to choose sundry new players for ...acant chairs in the Symphony Orchestra.

From Morning Telegraph
New York City
Aug 3 1919

Now It's Unanimous.

Despite rumors to the contrary, H. Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, states very emphatically that Pierre Monteux will be conductor of the orchestra during the 1919-1920 season.

...U Gas.	55	ov		bottle	62½ 63¼
...town Shoe	100	101	Ont ...saver
do pf.....	95¼	98	Otis Eleva
...run Term.	7	8	Otis Steel
...burns Bros.	126	127½	Pac Develop

...era, Concerts, Plays and Play...

Symphonic Silhouette

Mr. Monteux Conducting

Cut and Colored by Katharine G. Buffum of Philadelphia Now in Boston Making Such Pictures in Aid of the Bryn Mawr Endowment Fund

---

Programmes in Prospect

As already announced, the Harvard Glee Club, in the new mastery of choral singing to which Dr. Davison and its own efforts have raised it, will assist the Symphony Orchestra at the concert on Sunday afternoon, April 18, in Symphony Hall, for the profit of its Pension Fund. By itself the Club will sing ancient pieces by Palestrina, Lotti and Leisring; with the orchestra it will be heard in two fragments of Rubinstein's oratorio, "The Tower of Babel," and in an arrangement of "A Prayer of Thanksgiving" from Dutch folk-song. The appointed orchestral pieces are Saint-Saëns's so-called Organ Symphony; a ballet air from Gluck's "Orpheus," with Mr. Laurent playing the solo part for flute, and Rimsky-Korsakov's glittering "Spanish Caprice."

Mr. Cortot, the Parisian pianist of keen intelligence and crisp touch, will assist the Symphony Orchestra at the regular concerts of next week. He will play the solo parts in a Fantasia by Debussy to be heard for the first times in America and in Beethoven's third Concerto—a piece seldom revived. The Fantasia is music that Debussy wrote in his student years at Rome and wisely withheld from publication. Now that the composer is dead, Mr. Cortot has somehow laid hold of it. When he played it last winter in the Hallé Concerts at Manchester in England, the reviewers regretted the resurrection. Mr. Monteux's orchestral numbers are Beethoven's overture, "Fidelio," and the Introduction and March from the third act of Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Golden Cockerel."

...ms and Announcements

...In the second week in May Mr. Monteux ...ll depart for Paris to refresh himself at ...me, to spy out new and interesting ...usic, to choose sundry new players for ...acant chairs in the Symphony Orchestra.

From Morning Telegraph
New York City
Aug 3 1919

Now It's Unanimous.

Despite rumors to the contrary, H. Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, states very emphatically that Pierre Monteux will be conductor of the orchestra during the 1919-1920 season.

Post Apr 9

PROGRAMME FOR PENSION FUND CONCERT

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Dr. A. T. Davison, director of the Harvard Glee Club, have arranged a very interesting programme for the 34th pension fund of the orchestra to be held on Sunday afternoon, April 18, at 3:30 o'clock, in Symphony Hall, at which the orchestra and glee club will join forces.

The programme will be as follows:

Saint-Saens—organ Symphony in C minor, No. 3, Op. 78; Mr. Albert Snow, organist.

A capella—Palestrina, Adoramus Te; Lotti, Crucifixus; Leisring, O Filii et Filiae.

Gluck—Minuet from the opera "Orpheus"; flute solo, Georges Laurent.

Chorus and orchestra—Rubenstein, two pictures from "The Tower of Babel"; choruses of Ham and Japhet; Netherlands folk song, "Prayer of Thanksgiving."

Rimsky-Korsakoff — Caprice on Spanish themes, Op. 34: Alborada, variations, Alborada, scene and Gypsy song, "Fandango of the Asturias."

Amer. Apr. 10

...ORTOT SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Alfred Cortot, the first pianist of France and one of the best remembered soloists of last season, will play two numbers with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the twenty-second pair of concerts on Friday and Saturday, April 16 and 17, Beethoven's Concerto in C minor No. 3 and Debussy's Fantasy, which will then have its first American preformances.

Trav Apr 10

French Pianist Will Play Soon with Symphony

Alfred Cortot, the first pianist of France and one of the best remembered soloists of last season, will play two numbers with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the 22d pair of concerts on Friday and Saturday (April 16 and 17): Beethoven's concerto in C minor No. 3 and Debussy fantasy, which will then have its first American performances. Pierre Monteux will begin the concerts with Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio" and conclude them with the introduction to Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera "Le Coq d'Or" and the brilliant march from the third act.

Post Apr 11

Cortot With Orchestra

The distinguished French pianist, Alfred Cortot, will be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts of this week in Symphony Hall. He will play Beethoven's Third Concerto in C minor, and Debussy's "Fantasy" for piano and orchestra, which will then have its first performances in this country. Pierre Monteux will begin the programme with Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio" and conclude it with the introduction to Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, "Le Coq d'Or," and the rousing march from the third act.

Pension Fund Programme

An unusually fine programme has been arranged for the 34th pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon at 3:30 o'clock. The Harvard Glee Club, Dr. A. T. Davison's remarkable male chorus of 100, will join forces with the Symphony Orchestra in the choruses. Unaccompanied the glee club will sing three devotional numbers from the 16th and 17th centuries by Palestrina, Lotti and Leisring. Pierre Monteux and his orchestra will also give the following symphonic works: Saint-Saen's mountainous and impressive "Organ" symphony in C minor (Mr. Albert W. Snow, organist); a minuet from Gluck's "Orpheus," with George Laurent as flute soloist, and finally Rimsky-Korsakoff's rhythmic caprice on Spanish themes, consisting of Alborada, variations, scene and gypsy song, Fandango of the Austrias.

Trans Apr 10

SUNDAY afternoon, April 18, in Symphony Hall, a concert by the Symphony Orchestra for the profit of its Pension Fund. The remarkable men's choir into which Dr. Davison has developed the Harvard Glee Club will also be heard in ancient and modern music. The orchestral numbers of Saint-Saëns's so-called Organ Symphony; a dance from Gluck's opera, "Orpheus" with Mr. Laurent as solo-flute and Rimsky-Korsakov's glittering "Spanish Caprice." The Harvard Choir will sing pieces by Palestrina and Lotti unaccompanied and three choruses with the band.

Mr. Cortot, the Pianist in Unusual Pieces with Symphony Orchestra—Mr. Schmitz Also Comes Again—Mr. Spalding, the Violinist, and Miss Braslau, the Singer, Together—Music at the Art Museum—Other Programmes

THE Parisian pianist, Alfred Cortot, much applauded in Boston a year and more ago for his crispness of touch and tone, his keen intelligence and alert finesse with music and instrument, promises to be the pervading figure at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Contrary to custom but according to his own particular way on such occasions, he will be heard in two pieces—Beethoven's early and seldom played Concerto in C minor, and a Fantasia by Debussy written in his younger years, unpublished during his life, discovered after his death and not yet known to American concert-rooms. In England and in France, the resurrection has been variously viewed. The orchestral prelude to Mr. Cortot is the overture to Beethoven's opera, "Fidelio"; the orchestral postlude two fragments of Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Golden Cockerel."

Globe Apr 11

...large favorites.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

An unusually fine program has been arranged for the pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon. The Harvard Glee Club will join forces with the orchestra in two choruses from Rubenstein's opera, "The Tower of Babel," and in a Netherlands Prayer of Thanksgiving. Unaccompanied, the Glee Club will sing three devotional numbers by Palestrina, Lotti and Leisring. The orchestra will play Saint-Saens' "...pieces.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

France's greatest pianist, Alfred Cortot, will be the soloist with the Symphony Orchestra next Friday and Saturday. He will figure in Beethoven's third concerto in C minor and Debussy's fantasy, which will then have its first performances in this country. Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio" and the introduction to Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, "Le Coq d'Or" and the rousing march from the third act will also be played.

Herald Apr 11

PENSION FUND PROGRAM

An unusually fine program has been arranged for the 34th Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon at 3:30 o'clock. The Harvard Glee Club, Dr. A. T. Davison's male chorus of 100, will join forces with the Symphony Orchestra in two choruses from Rubinstein's "Tower of Babel," and in a Netherlands Folk Prayer of Thanksgiving, unaccompanied, the Glee Club will sing three devotional numbers from the 16th and 17th centuries by Palestrina, Lotti and Leisring. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will play the following symphonic works: Saint-Saens's "Organ" Symphony in C minor (Albert W. Snow, organist), a minuet from Gluck's "Orpheus," with George Laurent as flute soloist, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish Themes.

CORTOT WITH ORCHESTRA

Ranked as one of France's greatest pianists, Alfred Cortot, much applauded as soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts last season, will be welcomed by many when he reappears with the orchestra in Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday. He will play Beethoven's Third Concerto in C minor; also Debussy's Fantasy, which will then have its first performances in this country. Mr. Monteux will begin the program with Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio," and conclude it with the introduction to Rimsky-Korsakoff's Opera, "Le Coq d'Or," and the march from the third act.

Travelr Apr 10

HARVARD GLEE CLUB TO ASSIST FUND CONCERT

For the pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra to be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday, April 18, at 3:30, the orchestra will combine with the Harvard Glee Club of 100 men to give a program memorable in proportions and engrossing in character.

Globe Apr 11

Events and Comments

There will be many who will regret that the program announced for the Pension Fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra, next Sunday, departs from the long-established precedent of a Wagner program for the last such concert in each season. Mr Monteux evidently thinks as Mr Rabaud sometimes seemed to, that Boston has a cult for the complete works of Saint-Saens, whose Third Symphony, for organ and orchestra, we are to hear next Sunday for something like the 10th time in five seasons. The Harvard Glee Club, Dr A. T. Davison conductor, will sing with the orchestra choruses from Rubinstein's oratorio "The Tower of Babel." They are also to sing a capella the beautiful Dutch folk tune "The Prayer of Thanksgiving," which everyone familiar with Harvard in the last decade will recall as a favorite.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8—Boston Symphony Orchestra. Twenty-second program. Overture to "Fidelio," Beethoven; third piano concerto, Beethoven; fantasy for piano and orchestra, Debussy, first time in America; introduction and march from act 3 of "Le Coq D'Or," Rimsky-Korsakoff. Soloist, Alfred Cortot.

JORDAN HALL, Wednesday...

Herald Apr 11

Debussy's Fantasy

That admirable pianist Alfred Cortot will play at the Symphony concerts this week a concerto of Beethoven that is not often heard, and a Fantasy of Debussy which will be performed in this country for the first time. The history of this Fantasy is a singular one.

Debussy was awarded the prix de Rome in 1884. From Rome he sent as his "envoi" for the first year a fragment of a lyric drama, "Almanzor" (drama of Heine); an orchestral Suite in two parts, "Spring," for orchestra and chorus; the third was "The Blessed Damozel"; the fourth was to have been this "Fantasy" for piano and orchestra.

As he could not find a satisfactory translation of Heine's poem, he never completed the drama. His "Printemps" did not please the hide-bound conservatives of the Institute at Paris. They were shocked by the use of the voice, without words, used in an instrumental role, and the tonality seemed to them dangerous. One of them remarked: "One does not write in F sharp major for orchestra." Debussy, vexed, therefore did not allow his third "Envoi", namely "The Blessed Damozel" to be performed at the Institute concert. The "Fantasy", intended as the fourth envoy, remained in the hands of the composer.

Some years later it was announced for performance at a concert of the National Society of Music in Paris, but at the last rehearsal, Debussy, not satisfied with the second part, withdrew it. The Fantasy was not published during the composer's lifetime. It was not performed in public until late in 1919.

Mr. Cortot played it at a concert of the Royal Philharmonic Society, London, on November 20, 1919. It was said at the time that there had been a semi-private performance in London by Mr. Cortot, not with orchestra, but with Berthe Bert playing the transcription for second piano from the score.

The concerto was performed in Paris for the rst time on Dec. 7, 1919, at a Lamoureux concert conducted by Messager, when Marguerite Long was the pianist. Gustave Samazeuilh, reviewing the performance, said that while the orchestration was not characteristic of the later Debussy, the music showed the exceptional gifts that gave him later his world-wide reputation. The reviewer found in the first portion an irresistibly fascinating youthful freshness and spirit, and certain formal features that reminded him of d'Indy's Symphony on a Mountain Air. In the transition from the Andante to the Finale, one heard already the voices of the sirens in Debussy's "Nocturnes"; in the Finale there is anticipation of the fancy that vitalized his string quartet, the fourth "Lyric Prose," and the subtle rhythm of "Fetes." "The writing for the piano often enlaces the orchestral speech with capricious garlands." Well, well! We shall hear what we shall hear. Certainly if any one can bring out all that is in this Fantasy, his name is Alfred Cortot.

Herald

THURSDAY AFTERNOON; LYDIA ...OT, PIANO SOLOIST, BOSTON SYM... ...RDAY Apr 11

...U Gas. 55 ... bottle 62½ 63¼
...own Shoe.100 101 | Out ...aver... | ...
...do pf..... 95½ 98 | Otis Eleva... | ...te s 147
...run Term. 7 8 | Otis Steel... | ...
...Burns Bros.126 127½ | Pac Develo... | ...

21ST CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Herald Sep 10

Wide Range of Program Suggests Varied Moods and Memories

PIECES FROM DUKAS, MOZART AND RAVEL

By PHILIP HALE

The 21st concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, Concertante Symphonie, for violin and viola (Mr. Theodorowicz, violin; Mr. Denayer, viola); Dukas, Overture to "Polyeucte" (first time at these concerts); Ravel, "Ma Mere l'Oye"; Borodin, Polovtskian Dances from "Prince Igor" (first time at these concerts).

Little is known about the origin of Mozart's composition. It is not known when or for whom it was written—when it was first performed. The original manuscript is probably not in existence. There was a performance of the first movement at a Symphony concert in 1892, when Mr. Loeffler played the violin and Mr. Kneisel the viola. The whole work was performed about five years ago, with Messrs. Witek and Ferir violin and viola. The form is conventional, but the movements are of a broader nature, more developed than was customary at the time. The work can hardly be classed among the more important compositions of Mozart, yet it is clearly Mozartian, especially by the peculiar melancholy that characterizes the greater part of the andante. We say peculiar, for several composers were melancholy, each in his individual way; each one differed from the others, as the stars, we are told, differ in glory. The melancholy of Mozart is unlike that of Schubert, but the two never whined, while Brahms and Tschaikowsky in doleful dumps were peculiarly hopeless. Brahms was inclined to whine and his melancholy was pessimistic. Tschaikowsky would now sigh like a furnace, now shriek in his despair. The melancholy of Mozart is more like the melancholy of the painter Watteau. The thought that life is fleeting, that beauty fades, inspired them to deeds of beauty. Mozart was of the 18th century and in that century passion in art, as we understand passion, was not admitted.

As the music was played yesterday by Messrs. Theodorowicz and Denayer, it gave the audience pleasure; yet we should not like to hear this work once a year. The form and the expression are foreign to this generation.

Dukas's overture was played at a concert of the Boston Orchestral Club, Mr. Longy conductor, 10 years ago. It is for Corneille's tragedy, on which operas have been based: Among them Donizetti's "Poliuto" and Gounod's "Polyeucte." The latter failed; the former had more success; a duet of religious fervor in the last act often served in the fifties and sixties as a galop for profane dancers. The overture is hardly as austere as Corneille's tragedy, but it is by no means theatrical, as sometimes happens when a Frenchman writes music for a play by Racine or Corneille: witness Massenet's overture to "Phedre." Dukas's spirit is distinctly modern, there is no suggestion of Gluck; but this music is not feverish, and it is not without dignity. There are impressive pages: Among them the introduction, the music that might justly be associated with Pauline, and the quiet, serene apotheosis. The allegro sections, possibly referring to the conflict of two faiths, and the struggle between love and duty, are not so effective.

It was a pleasure to hear Ravel's "Mother Goose" again; to note the exquisite results derived from economy of means, also from the judicious and unerring employment of the modern full orchestra. There are touches of the humor that runs at full speed in the opera, "The Spanish Hour"; as in the fourth movement, "The Conversations of Beauty and the Beast." Charming, too, is the frequent suggestion of old modes and ancient cadences. In this music, when a wind instrument is at work, it has its own speech; it is not there merely to double another instrument, to fill in, to assist in a din. Ravel is too refined for such misuse; but he is not super-refined, as are some of his young imitators. He is the one composer to write a "unanimous" overture for the orchestra of ivory instruments that Jules Laforgue heard at the court of Herod before Salome bored the ambassadors by her profound essay on metaphysics.

In strong contrast with this delightful music was the splendid savagery of the dances from Borodin's opera. It is said that Rimsky-Korsakoff sandpapered the rough splendor of Moussorgsky's "Boris." The orchestration of Borodin's dances is wholly his; he emphasized the alternate oriental languor and ferocity. Nor does this music lose too much by its transference to the concert stage. In the concert hall, the attention is not distracted; the eye does not insist on the muffling of the ear.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Beethoven, Overture to "Coriolan"—and concert No. 3 for piano [illegible] Cortot, pianist); Debussy, Fantasie for piano (Mr. Cortot)—first time [illegible]; Rimsky-Korsakoff, Introduction and March from "The Golden [illegible]

NOVELTIES ON LIST BY SYMPHONY

Sep 10

Admirable Playing by Soloists From the Ranks

BY OLIN DOWNES

Echoes of the "strike" of certain players having receded in the distance and the Boston Symphony Orchestra assuming more and more nearly its proportions previous to that event, the concert of yesterday afternoon passed without sensations of a kind other than musical. Mr. Monteux was greeted with customary cordiality by the audience, but without the prolonged salute with which his hearers had shown their sympathy on a previous occasion. The orchestra gave performances with very nearly its full quota of players, including a new bass tuba player, so large that his gigantic instrument seemed almost small in his hands. The audience settled itself, forgetting the recent tempest in the teapot, to its wonted enjoyment of orchestral music.

SOLOISTS FROM ORCHESTRA

The programme opened with Mozart's Symphonie Concertante (Kochel No. 364) for violin and viola and orchestra. The violinist was Mr. Theodorowitz, the concertmaster, and the viola player the first violist, Mr. Denayer. This fluent, melodious work is genuinely in the manner of a symphony rather than a display piece for two soloists accompanied by an orchestra. It is more than fluent. It is of inspired craftsmanship. Even when Mozart does a routine job it has seldom the character of something laboriously, perfunctorily ground out. Rather the different themes and their development seem to be dovetailed together with almost miraculous ease; the form has the quality of predestination.

Therefore the first movement of this double concerto in the symphonic manner is beautiful and diverting, and the slow movement melodious, deeper and in every way finer music, while the finale seems somewhat conventional in its jollity. What seems strange is that Mozart, a man of dramatic temperament, of imagination when he wrote for orchestral instruments, should not have given to the viola and the violin more sharply individualized parts. The instruments play in unison or octave, in parallel consonant intervals, or they imitate each other precisely, first the violin playing a figure, then the viola, or vice versa, and sometimes with incongruous effects, for the nature of the two instruments is so very different, one from the other.

Brilliantly Played

This work was played brilliantly and in excellent style by the two soloists, and the orchestra collaborated in a manner equally fortunate. The music itself does not rank among Mozart's most important achievements.

Dukas' overture to Corneille's tragedy, "Polyeucte"; Ravel's orchestral version of his five children's pieces, "Mother Goose," and the Polovskian dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor," completed this programme. Dukas' overture is in dignified and tragic vein, with more than a hint of the classic mood, while, on the other hand, there seems little melodic originality and more than a distant relation to certain orchestral tricks of Richard Wagner.

Ravel's Music Fascinating

Ravel's music becomes more fascinating with each hearing. The atmosphere throughout is that of fairy legend. The instrumental effects are of the most exquisite. In his musical invention Ravel may not be counted, perhaps, among the greatest composers of the modern period, but what modern composer can point to such an extraordinary variety and perfection of output? Consider these "Mother Goose" pieces, the string quartet, the "Spanish Rhapsody" for orchestra, the "Three Poems," after Stephen Mallarme, the one-act opera, "L'Heure Espagnole." Each one is completely different from the other and complete in its kind, yet at the same time each is stamped with the supreme mastery of means, the intellectual personality of its curiously gifted author. But the audience was not analyzing nor comparing one work of Ravel to the other as it listened yesterday. It was enjoying music of a bewitching grace, imagination, tenderness and humor—as in the movement, "The Conversation of Beauty and the Beast," wherein the motive of the Beauty has a sly reference to the opening phrase of Debussy's "L'Apres-midi d'un Faune," and the music of the Beast is an extremely clever take-off of the "Gymnopedies" of Eric Satie, to whom both Debussy and Ravel have confessed indebtedness. Mr. Monteux's performance was most sympathetic which was true of all the rest of the programme.

MONTEUX SHINES IN BORODIN'S BALLET

All-Round Program Given at Symphony Concert

The program for yesterday's Symphony concert managed to cover almost the whole range of orchestral music. It began with the Concertante Symphonie for violin and viola of Mozart, and followed that classic with an unfamiliar overture by Dukas, which represents the routine work of the 1890's. Then came Ravel's "Mother Goose," an average specimen of contemporary composition, and some ballet music from Borodin's "Prince Igor," a stock example of Russian music.

The orchestra, now recruited to nearly its full strength, proved able to cope admirably with each number, as though the recent trouble had never happened. The usual capacity audience seemed appreciative, especially of the admirable solo work of Messrs Theodorowicz and Denayer in the Mozart Symphony.

Mr Monteux excels as a conductor of ballet music. In the dances from "Prince Igor" he chose the tempi best suited to each number and stressed the recurring strong accents with a regularity which avoided mechanical monotony. He made the orchestral tone color, on which half the charm of the music depends, brilliant by his intelligent, almost unerring, feeling for the right moment at which to allow the brass and percussion to dominate.

The virtues which enable him to succeed so well with such numbers, however, are not all that Mozart requires. Much of the Concertante Symphonie, except in the solo passages, sounded dull and colorless because Mr Monteux does not pay sufficient attention to the gradation of accents. There should be comparatively few very strong accents and no unaccented notes in Mozart, but Mr Monteux has only one sort of subtlety, that required for ballet music.

Nor does he seem to realize that the quality of tone, especially from the strings, should never be luscious in Mozart symphonies. Where the type of melody demands a thin golden thread of tone, he insists on warmth at the expense of fineness of quality.

Dukas in the Overture to "Polyeucte" shows a logical mind trained in the principles of musical composition as understood by theorists influenced by Wagner and Berlioz. He is trying to be original and profound, but barely escapes dullness through his fineness of taste rather than through any great imaginative gift.

Ravel is a composer who has made irony and satire his forte. He has great talent and a knack for whimsical orchestration which enable him to make a slender vein of genuine imaginative power go a long way. He disguises the essential triviality and cheapness of most of his melodies by a clever use of ultra modern harmonic and orchestral effects. But "Mother Goose," "L'Heure Espagnole" and the rest of his few works are merely brilliant and entertaining "jeux d'esprit," as he himself is apparently aware. They are not to be compared with the masterpieces of De-

SYMPHONY GIVES FINE PROGRAM

Trav 10

The Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, gave its 21st concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program: Mozart, Concertante Symphonic, for violin and viola (Mr. Theodorowicz, violin; Mr. Denayer, viola); Dukas, Overture to "Polyeucte" (first time at these concerts); Ravel, "Ma Mere l'Oye"; Borodin, Polovtskian Dances from "Prince Igor" (first time at these concerts).

Mozart's Concertante Symphonic, although beautifully played by Mr. Theodorowicz and Mr. Denayar, is rather uninteresting music; at least it seems so today, from the modern point of view. "Polyeucte," overture to Corneille's Tragedy, was an interesting contrast. Here is modern music, in the sense that Puccini's music is modern. Gounod wrote an opera "Polyeucto" based on Corneille's Tragedy which was a failure. He spoke of it to Brieux, the dramatist, as "the great grief of my life. Believe me," he said, "it is my best work for the opera house. When I am dead, this will be seen. I have had a great grief."

The five "Mother Goose" pieces by Ravel, including "Hop o' My Thumb" and the "Beauty and the Beast Converse" are delightful, brimming over with delicious humor, as witness the abrupt change from the delicate music, in which Beauty speaks, to the rumbling bassoon of the Beast. And then Hop o' My Thumb cannot find his path, because the birds have eaten the bread crumbs he had strewn, the cheeping of the little birds is piped out from the orchestra. We have seldom heard music more imaginative.

The dances from "Prince Igor" were, however, the most brilliant part of the performance. Savage, crashing, vivid music; its playing by the orchestra was a triumph.

Borodin's Savage Dances

As a foil to this—the classicism of Mozart, the modernity and refinement of the modern French music—came Borodin's savage, barbaric dances—music to make the blood boil; primitive, eastern music, made of sighing phrases which alternate with whirling, clashing, primitive dance rhythms. And yet, with all its sensuousness and its headlong fury, this series of dances is written with the hand of a master who does not lose sight for an instant of his purpose. There are admirable development, masterly orchestration and the closest relation between all of the dances and the initial song of the instruments.

These dances are, in fact, free variation of the theme, and miracles of force, passion, genius. Of these dances, barring a detail or two, there was a superb performance.

Music in Boston Sep 10

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its twenty-first concert of the present season on April 9 with the following program:

Mozart, Symphonie concertante for Violin and Viola. (Violin solo, J. Theodorowiez, Viol solo, F. Denayer).
Dukas.....Overture, "Polyeucte"
Ravel.....'Ma Mère l'Oye"
Borodin, Polovtskiav, Dances from "Prince Igor"

Dukas' overture was played for the first time at these concerts. It recalls a story, told the writer by a well-known Boston musician, of a friend of his Leipzig student days who had composed an overture to "Hamlet." When it was presented for performance at the annual exhibition of the Conservatory, Reinecke remarked that he had already accepted another "Hamlet" overture, whereupon the resourceful composer promptly erased the title "Hamlet" from his score and substituted therefor "Julius Cæsar," which appears to have answered the purpose equally well. And so with this overture, which might prelude any tragedy. We know that it is intended to be a tragic overture, for do wei not hear muted horns, cries of anguish from the wood-wind and heart-rending phrases from the strings? It may be surmised from the foregoing that there is little of distinction in this overture, which indeed seems to be the case. Massenet's "Phèdre," frankly melodramatic, undoubtedly inferior musically to "Polyeucte," is far more moving and emotionally exciting.

Ravel's suite of five children's pieces is not unknown here but proves to be a fresh and ever grateful work. Its graphic descriptions of Hop-r'-my-Thumb, Beauty and the Beast, the Sleeping Beauty, the Empress of the Pagodas and the Fairy Garden are still has charming and delightful as at the time of their first hearing. The orchestra played them with the greatest delicacy of tone and phrasing. Mozart's Symphonie concertante cannot be said to be one of his most interesting works. It served, however, to display the excellent qualities of the two soloists, who were warmly applauded. Borodin's ballet music brought the concert to a brilliant close.

BALLET MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Globe Apr 11

Monteux Revives "Prince Igor" Dances; Also a Dukas Overture

By E. F. HARKINS.

Two "novelties" marked the latest Symphony program, Dukas' overture to the Corneille tragedy, "Polyeucte," and the Polovtsian dances from the Borodin opera, "Prince Igor."

Thus Mr. Monteux continues to make the best of the present situation in the musical world, which reveals a dearth of novel symphonic pieces worth mentioning, and in lieu of brand-new works has recourse to compositions by no means new, but never before given a place in programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In the case of the "Polyeucte" overture the reason for the previous exclusion is clear. It is said that when Parisians first heard the work in 1892 they found it simmering with obscure musical ideas. Later they treated it more cordially. But they were right the first time. It certainly is obscure, perfunctory, a work without noteworthy inspiration, although well written. Its appeal is to the musician, not to the average concertgoer.

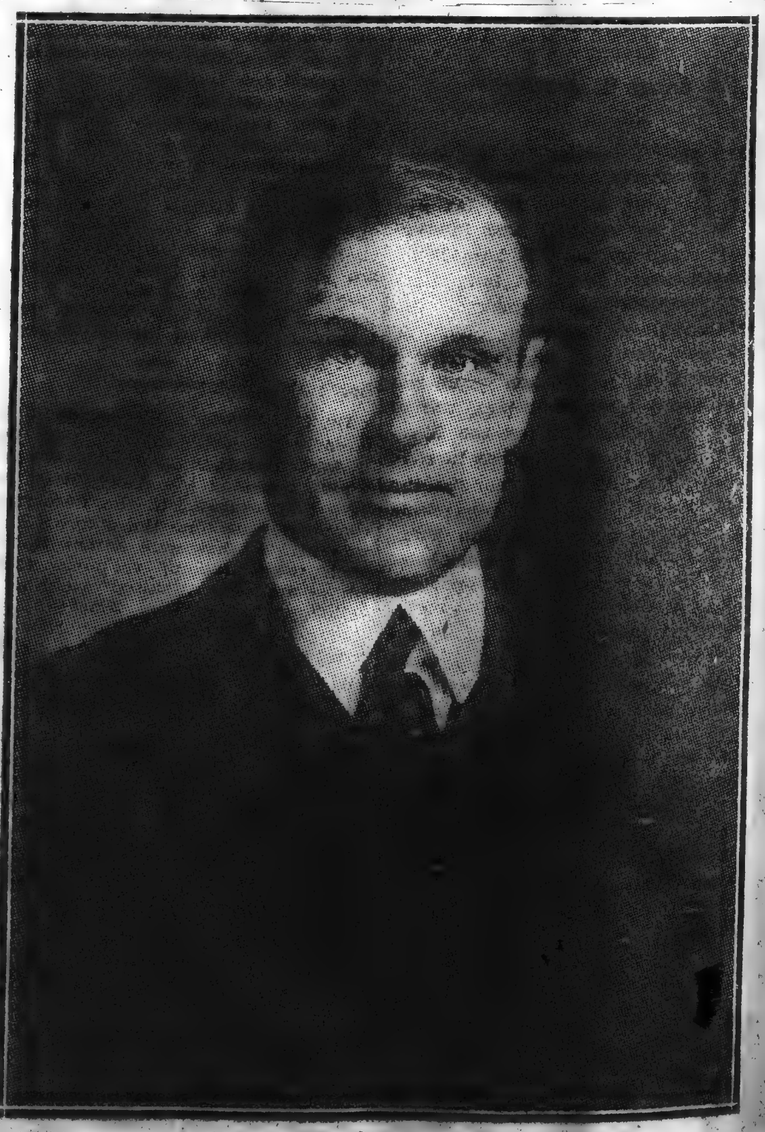
The "Prince Igor" dances are more interesting, but, like most pieces written for ballet, they require theatrical environment to gain the full effect planned by the composer.

Some ballet music is intrinsically delightful, but the "Prince Igor" dances, by themselves, are not particularly impressive. This must have been obvious to Symphony patrons who attended the Ballet Russe performances, when the dances were given with a spectacular effect that had much to do with their success.

Mr. Monteux, by the way, conducted one of those performances and it was his spirited interpretation at these latest Symphony concerts that made the Russian music seem at all worth while. Borodin was right; the opera is pre-eminently for Russian ears, and this Polovtsian interlude, minus the Ballet Russe, proves the force of the statement. But the performance was admirable. Borodin would have clapped Monteux on the back for it.

Ravel's sophisticated "Mother Goose" pieces, delightfully performed, and Mozart's "Concertante Symphonie" for violin and viola, with solos by Mr. Theodorowicz and Mr. Denayer, were also on the none too interesting program.

Trans. Sep 10



Archibald Thompson Davison

21ST CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Herald Ap 10

Wide Range of Program Suggests Varied Moods and Memories

PIECES FROM DUKAS, MOZART AND RAVEL

By PHILIP HALE

The 21st concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, Concertante Symphonie, for violin and viola (Mr. Theodorowicz, violin; Mr. Denayer, viola); Dukas, Overture to "Polyeucte" (first time at these concerts); Ravel, "Ma Mere l'Oye"; Borodin, Polovtskian Dances from "Prince Igor" (first time at these concerts).

Little is known about the origin of Mozart's composition. It is not known when or for whom it was written—when it was first performed. The original manuscript is probably not in existence. There was a performance of the first movement at a Symphony concert in 1892, when Mr. Loeffler played the violin and Mr. Kneisel the viola. The whole work was performed about five years ago, with Messrs. Witek and Ferir violin and viola. The form is conventional, but the movements are of a broader nature, more developed than was customary at the time. The work can hardly be classed among the more important compositions of Mozart, yet it is clearly Mozartian, especially by the peculiar melancholy that characterizes the greater part of the andante. We say peculiar, for several composers were melancholy, each in his individual way; each one differed from the others, as the stars, we are told, differ in glory. The melancholy of Mozart is unlike that of Schubert, but the two never whined, while Brahms and Tschaikowsky in doleful dumps were peculiarly hopeless. Brahms was inclined to whine and his melancholy was pessimistic. Tschaikowsky would now sigh like a furnace, now shriek in his despair. The melancholy of Mozart is more like the melancholy of the painter Watteau. The thought that life is fleeting, that beauty fades, inspired them to deeds of beauty. Mozart was of the 18th century and in that century passion in art, as we understand passion, was not admitted.

As the music was played yesterday by Messrs. Theodorowicz and Denayer, it gave the audience pleasure; yet we should not like to hear this work once a year. The form and the expression are foreign to this generation.

Dukas's overture was played at a concert of the Boston Orchestral Club, Mr. Longy conductor, 10 years ago. It is for Corneille's tragedy, on which operas have been based: Among them Donizetti's "Poliuto" and Gounod's "Polyeucte." The latter failed; the former had more success; a duet of religious fervor in the last act often served in the fifties and sixties as a galop for profane dancers. The overture is hardly as austere as Corneille's tragedy, but it is by no means theatrical, as sometimes happens when a Frenchman writes music for a play by Racine or Corneille: witness Massenet's overture to "Phedre." Dukas's spirit is distinctly modern; there is no suggestion of Gluck; but this music is not feverish, and it is not without dignity. There are impressive pages: Among them the introduction, the music that might justly be associated with Pauline, and the quiet, serene apotheosis. The allegro sections, possibly referring to the conflict of two faiths, and the struggle between love and duty, are not so effective.

It was a pleasure to hear Ravel's "Mother Goose" again; to note the exquisite results derived from economy of means, also from the judicious and unerring employment of the modern full orchestra. There are touches of the humor that runs at full speed in the opera, "The Spanish Hour"; as in the fourth movement, "The Conversations of Beauty and the Beast." Charming, too, is the frequent suggestion of old modes and ancient cadences. In this music, when a wind instrument is at work, it has its own speech; it is not there merely to double another instrument, to fill in, to assist in a din. Ravel is too refined for such misuse; but he is not super-refined, as are some of his young imitators. He is the one composer to write a "unanimous" overture for the orchestra of ivory instruments that Jules Laforgue heard at the court of Herod before Salome bored the ambassadors by her profound essay on metaphysics.

In strong contrast with this delightful music was the splendid savagery of the dances from Borodin's opera. It is said that Rimsky-Korsakoff sandpapered the rough splendor of Moussorgsky's "Boris." The orchestration of Borodin's dances is wholly his; he emphasized the alternate oriental languor and ferocity. Nor does this music lose too much by its transference to the concert stage. In the concert hall, the attention is not distracted; the eye does not insist on the muffling of the ear.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Beethoven, Overture to "Fidelio"—and concert No. 3 for piano (Alfred Cortot, pianist); Debussy, Fantasy for piano (Mr. Cortot)—first time ...a; Rimsky-Korsakoff, Introd March from "The Golden ... time at t...

NOVELTIES ON LIST BY SYMPHONY

Globe Ap 10

Admirable Playing by Soloists From the Ranks

BY OLIN DOWNES

Echoes of the "strike" of certain players having receded in the distance and the Boston Symphony Orchestra assuming more and more nearly its proportions previous to that event, the concert of yesterday afternoon passed without sensations of a kind other than musical. Mr. Monteux was greeted with customary cordiality by the audience, but without the prolonged salute with which his hearers had shown their sympathy on a previous occasion. The orchestra gave performances with very nearly its full quota of players, including a new bass tuba player, so large that his gigantic instrument seemed almost small in his hands. The audience settled itself, forgetting the recent tempest in the teapot, to its wonted enjoyment of orchestral music.

SOLOISTS FROM ORCHESTRA

The programme opened with Mozart's Symphonie Concertante (Kochel No. 364) for violin and viola and orchestra. The violinist was Mr. Theodorowitz, the concertmaster, and the viola player the first violist, Mr. Denayer. This fluent, melodious work is genuinely in the manner of a symphony rather than a display piece for two soloists accompanied by an orchestra. It is more than fluent. It is of inspired craftsmanship. Even when Mozart does a routine job it has seldom the character of something laboriously, perfunctorily ground out. Rather the different themes and their development seem to be dovetailed together with almost miraculous ease; the form has the quality of predestination.

Therefore the first movement of this double concerto in the symphonic manner is beautiful and diverting, and the slow movement melodious, deeper and in every way finer music, while the finale seems somewhat conventional in its jollity. What seems strange is that Mozart, a man of dramatic temperament, of imagination when he wrote for orchestral instruments, should not have given to the viola and the violin more sharply individualized parts. The instruments play in unison or octave, in parallel consonant intervals, or they imitate each other precisely, first the violin playing a figure, then the viola, or vice versa, and sometimes with incongruous effects, for the nature of the two instruments is so very different, one from the other.

Brilliantly Played

This work was played brilliantly and in excellent style by the two soloists, and the orchestra collaborated in a manner equally fortunate. The music itself does not rank among Mozart's most important achievements.

Dukas' overture to Corneille's tragedy, "Polyeucte"; Ravel's orchestral version of his five children's pieces, "Mother Goose," and the Polovskian dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor," completed this programme. Dukas' overture is in dignified and tragic vein, with more than a hint of the classic mood, while, on the other hand, there seems little melodic originality and more than a distant relation to certain orchestral tricks of Richard Wagner.

Ravel's Music Fascinating

Ravel's music becomes more fascinating with each hearing. The atmosphere throughout is that of fairy legend. The instrumental effects are of the most exquisite. In his musical invention Ravel may not be counted, perhaps, among the greatest composers of the modern period, but what modern composer can point to such an extraordinary variety and perfection of output? Consider these "Mother Goose" pieces, the string quartet, the "Spanish Rhapsody" for orchestra, the "Three Poems," after Stephen Mallarme; the one-act opera, "L'Heure Espagnole." Each one is completely different from the other and complete in its kind, yet at the same time each is stamped with the supreme mastery of means, the intellectual personality of its curiously gifted author. But the audience was not analyzing nor comparing one work of Ravel to the other as it listened yesterday. It was enjoying music of a bewitching grace, imagination, tenderness and humor—as in the movement, "The Conversation of Beauty and the Beast," wherein the motive of the Beauty has a sly reference to the opening phrase of Debussy's "L'Apres-midi d'un Faune," and the music of the Beast is an extremely clever take-off of the "Gymnopedies" of Eric Satie, to whom both Debussy and Ravel have confessed indebtedness. Mr. Monteux's performance was most sympathetic, which was true of all the rest of the programme.

MONTEUX SHINES IN BORODIN'S BALLET

All-Round Program Given at Symphony Concert

The program for yesterday's Symphony concert managed to cover almost the whole range of orchestral music. It began with the Concertante Symphonic for violin and viola of Mozart, and followed that classic with an unfamiliar overture by Dukas, which represents the routine work of the 1890's. Then came Ravel's "Mother Goose," an average specimen of contemporary composition, and some ballet music from Borodin's "Prince Igor," a stock example of Russian music.

The orchestra, now recruited to nearly its full strength, proved able to cope admirably with each number, as though the recent trouble had never happened. The usual capacity audience seemed appreciative, especially of the admirable solo work of Messrs Theodorowicz and Denayer in the Mozart Symphony.

Mr Monteux excels as a conductor of ballet music. In the dances from "Prince Igor" he chose the tempi best suited to each number and stressed the recurring strong accents with a regularity which avoided mechanical monotony. He made the orchestral tone color, on which half the charm of the music depends, brilliant by his intelligent, almost unerring, feeling for the right moment at which to allow the brass and percussion to dominate.

The virtues which enable him to succeed so well with such numbers, however, are not all that Mozart requires. Much of the Concertante Symphonie, except in the solo passages, sounded dull and colorless because Mr Monteux does not pay sufficient attention to the gradation of accents. There should be comparatively few very strong accents and no unaccented notes in Mozart, but Mr Monteux has only one sort of subtlety, that required for ballet music.

Nor does he seem to realize that the quality of tone, especially from the strings, should never be luscious in Mozart symphonies. Where the type of melody demands a thin golden thread of tone, he insists on warmth at the expense of fineness of quality.

Dukas in the Overture to "Polyeucte" shows a logical mind trained in the principles of musical composition as understood by theorists influenced by Wagner and Berlioz. He is trying to be original and profound, but barely escapes dullness through his fineness of taste rather than through any great imaginative gift.

Ravel is a composer who has made irony and satire his forte. He has great talent and a knack for whimsical orchestration which enable him to make a slender vein of genuine imaginative power go a long way. He disguises the essential triviality and cheapness of most of his melodies by a clever use of ultra modern harmonic and orchestral effects. But "Mother Goose," "L'Heure Espagnole" and the rest of his few works are merely brilliant and entertaining "jeux d'esprit," as he himself is apparently aware. They are not to be compared with the masterpieces of De-

SYMPHONY GIVES FINE PROGRAM

Trans Ap 10

The Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, gave its 21st concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program: Mozart, Concertante Symphonic, for violin and viola (Mr. Theodorowicz, violin; Mr. Denayer, viola); Dukas, Overture to "Polyeucte" (first time at these concerts); Ravel, "Ma Mere l'Oye"; Borodin, Polovtskian Dances from "Prince Igor" (first time at these concerts).

Mozart's Concertante Symphonic, although beautifully played by Mr. Theodorowicz and Mr. Denayar, is rather uninteresting music; at least it seems so today, from the modern point of view. "Polyeucte," overture to Corneille's Tragedy, was an interesting contrast. Here is modern music, in the sense that Puccini's music is modern. Gounod wrote an opera "Polyeucto" based on Corneille's Tragedy which was a failure. He spoke of it to Brieux, the dramatist, as "the great grief of my life. Believe me," he said, "it is my best work for the opera house. When I am dead, this will be seen. I have had a great grief."

The five "Mother Goose" pieces by Ravel, including "Hop o' My Thumb" and the "Beauty and the Beast Converse" are delightful, brimming over with delicious humor, as witness the abrupt change from the delicate music, in which Beauty speaks, to the rumbling bassoon of the Beast. And then Hop o' My Thumb cannot find his path, because the birds have eaten the bread crumbs he had strewn, the cheeping of the little birds is piped out from the orchestra. We have seldom heard music more imaginative.

The dances from "Prince Igor" were, however, the most brilliant part of the performance. Savage, crashing, vivid music; its playing by the orchestra was a triumph.

Borodin's Savage Dances

As a foil to this—the classicism of Mozart, the modernity and refinement of the modern French music—came Borodin's savage, barbaric dances—music to make the blood boil; primitive, eastern music, made of sighing phrases which alternate with whirling, clashing, primitive dance rhythms. And yet, with all its sensuousness and its headlong fury, this series of dances is written with the hand of a master who does not lose sight for an instant of his purpose. There are admirable development, masterly orchestration and the closest relation between all of the dances and the initial song of the instruments.

These dances are, in fact, free variation of the theme, and miracles of force, passion, genius. Of these dances, barring a detail or two, there was a superb performance.

Monitor Ap 10

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its twenty-first concert of the present season on April 9 with the following program:

Mozart, Symphonie concertante for Violin and Viola. (Violin solo, J. Theodorowiez, Viol solo, F. Denayer).
Dukas.....Overture, "Polyeucte"
Ravel.....'Ma Mère l'Oye"
Borodin, Polovtskiav, Dances from "Prince Igor"

Dukas' overture was played for the first time at these concerts. It recalls a story, told the writer by a well-known Boston musician, of a friend of his Leipzig student days who had composed an overture to "Hamlet." When it was presented for performance at the annual exhibition of the Conservatory, Reinecke remarked that he had already accepted another "Hamlet" overture, whereupon the resourceful composer promptly erased the title "Hamlet" from his score and substituted therefor "Julius Cæsar," which appears to have answered the purpose equally well. And so with this overture, which might prelude any tragedy. We know that it is intended to be a tragic overture, for do we not hear muted horns, cries of anguish from the wood-wind and heart-rending phrases from the strings? It may be surmised from the foregoing that there is little of distinction in this overture, which indeed seems to be the case. Massenet's "Phèdre," frankly melodramatic, undoubtedly inferior musically to "Polyeucte," is far more moving and emotionally exciting.

Ravel's suite of five children's pieces is not unknown here but proves to be a fresh and ever grateful work. Its graphic descriptions of Hop-r'-my-Thumb, Beauty and the Beast, the Sleeping Beauty, the Empress of the Pagodas and the Fairy Garden are still has charming and delightful as at the time of their first hearing. The orchestra played them with the greatest delicacy of tone and phrasing. Mozart's Symphonie concertante cannot be said to be one of his most interesting works. It served, however, to display the excellent qualities of the two soloists, who were warmly applauded. Borodin's ballet music brought the concert to a brilliant close.

BALLET MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Globe Ap 11

Monteux Revives "Prince Igor" Dances; Also a Dukas Overture

By E. F. HARKINS.

Two "novelties" marked the latest Symphony program, Dukas' overture to the Corneille tragedy, "Polyeucte," and the Polovtsian dances from the Borodin opera, "Prince Igor."

Thus Mr. Monteux continues to make the best of the present situation in the musical world, which reveals a dearth of novel symphonic pieces worth mentioning, and in lieu of brand-new works has recourse to compositions by no means new, but never before given a place in programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In the case of the "Polyeucte" overture the reason for the previous exclusion is clear. It is said that when Parisians first heard the work in 1892 they found it simmering with obscure musical ideas. Later they treated it more cordially. But they were right the first time. It certainly is obscure, perfunctory, a work without noteworthy inspiration, although well written. Its appeal is to the musician, not to the average concertgoer.

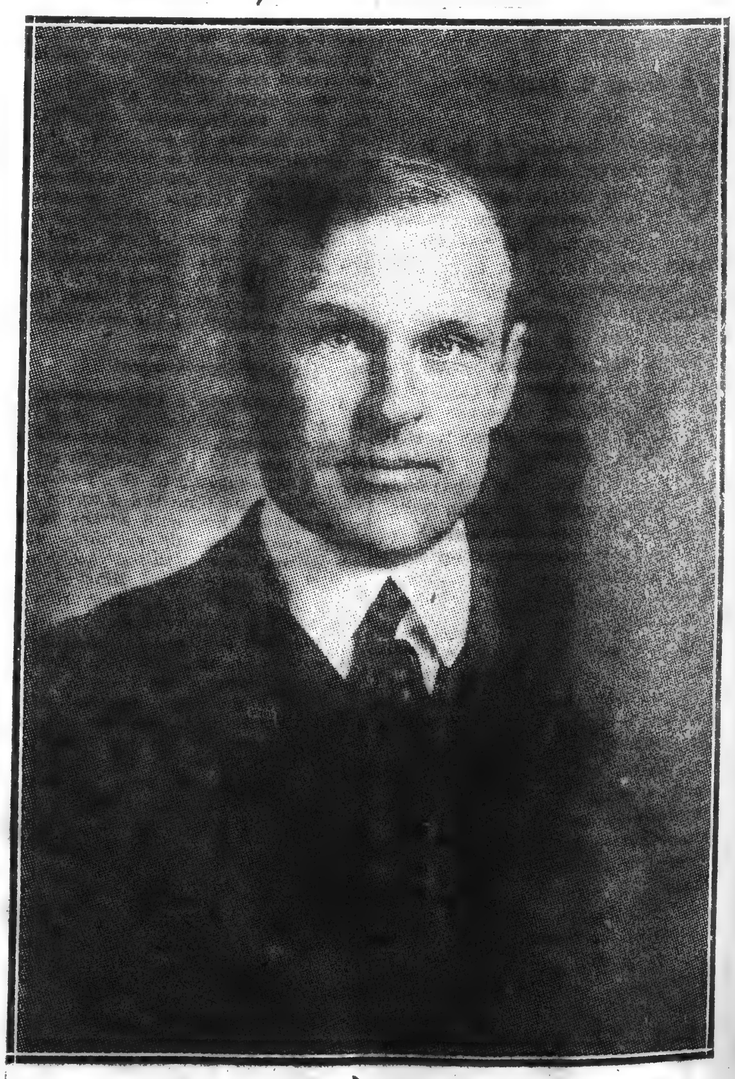
The "Prince Igor" dances are more interesting, but, like most pieces written for ballet, they require theatrical environment to gain the full effect planned by the composer.

Some ballet music is intrinsically delightful, but the "Prince Igor" dances, by themselves, are not particularly impressive. This must have been obvious to Symphony patrons who attended the Ballet Russe performances, when the dances were given with a spectacular effect that had much to do with their success.

Mr. Monteux, by the way, conducted one of those performances and it was his spirited interpretation at these latest Symphony concerts that made the Russian music seem at all worth while. Borodin was right; the opera is pre-eminently for Russian ears, and this Polovtsian interlude, minus the Ballet Russe, proves the force of the statement. But the performance was admirable. Borodin would have clapped Monteux on the back for it.

Ravel's sophisticated "Mother Goose" pieces, delightfully performed, and Mozart's "Concertante Symphonie" for violin and viola, with solos by Mr. Theodorowicz and Mr. Denayer, were also on the none too interesting program.

Trans. Ap 10



Archibald Thompson Davison

INFORMATION OBSCURED

FADED TEXT

SYMPHONY CONCERT

TRANQUIL PLEASURES FILL AN AFTERNOON

Trans Apr 16

Agreeable Sense of Emergency Passed and Conquered—Amiable and Characteristic Mozart—Ravel in Sophisticated Simplicity—Contrasting Pieces from Dukas, Christian and Borodin Pagan—The Orchestra Works Ably

TRANQUILLITY has returned to the Symphony Concerts. For the audiences of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the zest of anxieties over the secession and real or imaginary consequences thereof has nearly vanished. The seceders have descended below the horizon, and there remains only an afterglow of speculation. Who of them wish to return to the orchestra? How many of them will be so reinstated? Where are the banished rest likely to find refuge? Gossip is plentiful, but now it is amused and inquisitive where once it was turbid and apprehensive. On the stage sits a re-filled orchestra, sufficient for any task Mr. Monteux may lay upon it. There are newcomers in it; remembered faces returned; familiar figures in unfamiliar place. The band, partially reorganized for the second time in two seasons, and beneficially cleared by the secession of sundry "deadwood," does its work well. As obviously it will do it better as it becomes more accustomed to its new self; more assimilated in routine; more instinctively responsive to the conductor. Mr. Monteux spares no pains. He is industry, ambition, discretion themselves His choirs answer to him zealously. The emergency is past; the future stretches promisingly; the audience need but fill the usual places, as it did yesterday, and applaud with becoming and remembering warmth. Not even in the programme-book was there an unusual leaflet—not a word, contrary to recent practice, about the endowment fund; only an announcement that the new season of 1920-21 would begin on Oct. 8 and 9 next and that subscriptions are renewable for another series of twenty-four afternoon or evening concerts. Did any one, outside Mr. Fradkin and the editors of certain trade-journals in New York, doubt it?

In fine, there was nothing to do or say but take the pleasures of music and performance and these, again, were relatively tranquil. Especially were they so in the piece with which the concert began—a "Symphonie Concertante" by Mozart, that is to say a "symphonie" with more or less conspicuous solo-parts for violin and viola. Accordingly, Mr. Theodorowicz and Mr Denayer rose from their usual places, stood side by side to the left of the conductor, received at pauses and at end their meed of particular applause. They deserved it, for the violinist accomplished his usual able and sound performance of whatever task falls to him: while the tone of the viola-player seemed less dry, warmer-bodied, more plastic than it did when he under-took the solo-part in Berlioz's symphony about Byron's Harold. The fine undulations of Mozart, an impersonal music, accord better with Mr. Denayer's ways and powers than the robuster periods of a romantic piece. Occasionally, solo violin and solo viola interchange tonal dialogue; occasionally they speak together above the background of the rest; usually they merely blossom in individual measures into which Mozart has made the music bloom. So might the elegant companies of eighteenth-century salons, for which "symphonies concertantes" were destined, single out the virtuosi who particularly pleased them.

Advisedly, Mr. Monteux used a relatively small orchestra for this music—smaller, if memory does not slip, than that which Dr. Muck employed when he also revived it—not all the strings, no more than two horns and proportionate oboes. Furthermore, the conductor's hand was light, supple. Thereby the little symphony flowed pleasantly forward, kept undulating course, eddied into pretty euphonies, sang itself into phrases that human rather than instrumental, voices might be moulding. In music, as in much else, the eighteenth-century loved an elegant staleliness. Even Mozart, not altogether a conformist to the ways of his age, could be deferential to such liking. So the first movement of this "Symphonie Concertante" often runs in broad periods, incisive rhythms, forthright progress. There is even hint here and there of the Mozart who was later to write the measures of the Commander walking in marble across "Don Juan" and of Sarastro, the high priest, in "The Magic Flute." Few styles baffled his fecund many-sidedness; and he could be grave and stately without the hint of pomposity shaking too often out of Händel's full-bottomed wig. A more natural Mozart, however, sings his way through the perfect continuity of the Andante, weaving a silvery thread of song, spraying it with as silvery ornament, as effortless as though felicity were routine, charming with that half smile which is mask to so much of his music. What a pity that there must also be a Finale in which, if the truth is to be told, Mozart is no more than deft, and somewhat repetitious, music-maker! Unfortunately it was not the way of the eighteenth century to leave things incomplete Possibly, too, its little orchestra chades and graces where Mr. Monteux holds straightforward.

The rest was inning for the modern Dukas with an overture to Corneille "Christian tragedy" of "Polyeucte"; Bor din with the contrastingly pagan dance of a tribe of Polovtsi—otherwise Tartars—in his opera of old and legendary Russia "Prince Igor." Usually in the arts the pagans get the better of the Christian and the pages of Borodin, clothed in ornore ... [illegible] ... pose"—were distinctly more interesting than the pages of Dukas. Yet not so interesting, in spite of Mr. Monteux's rhythmic energies as they seemed when the Diaghilev ballet—Bolm en tête—danced and pranced to them. The eye of the imagination would hark back to the deep red tents of Golovin's—or was it Röhrich's?—Tartar camp; to the wan, rolling landscape, the twisting river that stretched behind. As the ear tingled to the music, the more memory hungered for sight of the whirling or languorous dancers, for their tossing or spinning lines, whipping now one and now another into fresh frenzies; for a glimpse of the Polovtsian women snatched and upborne by their masters, the men. A play—it is the custom to say—is not half itself until it is acted. Similarly these dances from "Prince Igor" are not half themselves until they are actually danced. There is no suggestion of out-of-doors in Symphony Hall; there was not too much in the Russian ballet's staging of these dances. Yet somehow they sound as though they belonged under the sky, on a wind-swept day, in a tumultuous camp. Barbaric Borodin is not with the glinting, clanging fantasy of Rimsky in "The Golden Cockerel," or Stravinsky in episodes in "The Fire-Bird"; but more than they he feels the spaciousness, the rudeness that ancient Russian legend may exhale. The very woodenness of some of his measures in these dances from "Prince Igor" resembles it.

Dukas's Christian martyrs in tones, set there in his younger days, are hardly more interesting than Corneille's in verse; and there are those who have sat before his tragedy at the Théatre-Français when not even Mounet-Sully or Albert Lambert or Madeleine Roch herself could persuade them to turn a hair. Not that Dukas seeks to retell the tale, to characterize the personages of the play—Corneille's stiff-jointed, lofty-tongued Romans, beset between religious, conjugal and amorous loyalties. Rather the composer seems to be fashioning a well-made piece of music that shall be atmospheric and illuding prelude to the tragedy. There is grave, even lofty beginning; sombre, struggling measures as of emotional conflict and desolation; measures, finally, of tempered aspiration, serene exaltation. Dukas is apparently cultivating the grand manner—and gaining it but dryly; courting a classic reticence—and saying too little to be impressive. But his motivs are workable; his craftsmanship serves. He is as respectable as a Sunday evening audience before "Polyeucte" at the Comédie—and nearly as commonplace. Better twenty times, the sharp humors of his "Sorcerer's Apprentice," the imaginative fantasy of his "Peri"; the symphonic passion, so to say, of scenes in his "Ariane."

Continued on Page Eight

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Continued from Page Six

Between Dukas and Borodin, a familiar Ravel—the Ravel of the five fairy-tales that he is pleased to call "Pièces Enfantines" and to attribute to a Gallic Mother Goose, shamelessly un-Anglo-Saxon. They are of the miniatures of music, nearly flawless in kind and quality, wrought with adeptly sophisticated means to transparent simplicity of outcome. Twenty measures of the Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty and the hearer knows that she was a stately princess, wistful, remote, under fairy enchantment. A few pages more and "Hop o' My Thumb" is lost in the woods, childishly dazed, pitiful—and a bird dares twitter carelessly Another turn of the leaves and all the Pagodes and Pagodines (as the seventeenth century called little porcelain figures of fairy-tale) are waggling tiny little heads and marching in nodding ranks upon their tiny toes—genre picture in humorous, titillating perfection, albeit somewhat heavily and emphatically played. A space further and Beauty is cajoling in the clarinet and Beast grunting in the double bassoon. "Come, dear Beast, you shall live to be my husband"; and they fade into mist upon Ravel's languorous waltz. And last, as for the lowering of a multi-colored, iridescent curtain, the music of the Fairy Garden. Throughout Ravel is as adroit of means as he is precise of imagination. It is hard to remember more artful and ingenious, more fanciful and pictorial miniatures in music. If only miniatures, there or anywhere else, did not cloy so soon. . . . but Ravel is shrewdly brief.

H. T. PARKER

"THE MAN WHO MADE US"

Trans Apr 10

Dr. Davison Whose Work and Spirit Has Transformed the Harvard Glee Club Into a Remarkable Men's Choir—As His Singers See Him

IF you ask any member of the Harvard Glee Club how it happens that the club has achieved the impossible and become one of the most thoroughly trained and accomplished men's choruses in the country, the answer is simply "Doc." . . .

Dr. Archibald T. Davison—or Assistant Professor Davison, to be exact, for that is his title on the Harvard record books, although the men in the Glee Club all call him "Doc"—has spent most of his thirty-five years at Harvard. He studied there as an undergraduate from 1902 to 1906. He continued there, doing graduate work in music, with one brief intermission when he studied the organ under Widor in Paris, taking first prizes for his playing. He began to teach in 1908. In 1910 he became organist and choirmaster at the college chapel. This position he still holds. Meanwhile, during the last ten years his growing success has carried him steadily up the ladder of promotion to the rung of assistant professor. In 1916 one of his compositions was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Now he is directing the Glee Club. A few years ago one of his Harvard choirs sang with the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck; a week from next Sunday his Glee Club will sing with it under Mr. Monteux.

That is all you find on the college records, and it doesn't look like anything extraordinary. What matters is the story that lies behind those commonplace facts. Davison, as choirmaster, began to attract attention a good many years ago by making the Harvard choir a brilliant musical organization. He taught them, little by little, the best church music of all ages, and he revealed to them the fascination of that music. Many members of the choir were also members of the Glee Club of that day—on ordinary college Glee Club wedded to a banjo club and a mandolin club, and dedicated to the cause of sentimental or jazz music lifted from the musical comedy stage. These particular men, to whom Davison had revealed the fact that first-class music is worth singing, preferred the things he taught them to the stuff which they performed in the Glee Club. They found that the better the music, the more fun it was to sing and the more the audience liked it.

Continued on Page Eight

"THE MAN WHO MADE US"

Continued from Page Six

So, to make a long story short, this year the Glee Club turned over a new leaf, forsook the instrumental clubs, and set out for itself. As now organized, it is new in everything but name. And the members of the club are still marveling at the success of their venture, and wondering whether the critics are really sincere in saying that the club has not only out-distanced all other college glee clubs, but gone far toward surpassing all other choral organizations in the country, of whatever sort, with the possible exception of the Russian Cathedral Choir in New York. The voices of the men in the club are not remarkable. They are not a brilliantly musical group. And yet Davison has made them into the most perfectly sensitive musical instrument, capable of performing the most difficult choral music. How does he do it?

Dr. Davison is a smallish, strongly-built, light-haired man of about 35. No an unusual-looking fellow, except, perhaps, for his keen blue eyes. But watch him as with his quick step he walks upon the concert platform and begins to lead the chorus He is electric with energy and controlled enthusiasm. Listen to him as he talks to the men between pieces. You can see that he has leadership, sympathy, and a friendly attitude toward the men no less than he has an alert sensitiveness to musical values. The men are loyal to him. They follow his every motion, listen to his every word; and the result is that he plays upon them as he might upon an organ. It is the old, old story of the power of personality.

If you ask Dr. Davison how such a state of affairs has been brought about, he tells you about a prominent musician connected with another well-known college, who heard the Harvard Glee Club and went home and asked the leader of his own glee club why they didn't have the same sort of thing.

"I guess we never thought of it," said the leader.

"That's just it," says Dr. Davison. "Most college glee clubs haven't thought of it. Those fellows happened to have the idea. They put it through. It works. And I will venture that other clubs could do the same thing if they woke up to the fact that the better the music you sing, the more you and your audience enjoy it." But the undergraduates in the club prefer their own explanation. They simply point to the fact that Harvard has its Dr. Davison, and not every college possesses such a source of musical enthusiasm and inspiration.

Trans Apr 14

Items and Incidents

With the restored orchestra Mr. Monteux now has at command all the instruments prescribed by Berlioz for his "Fantastic Symphony." If the conductor chooses, as there is some reason to expect, to include the piece in the final pair of Symphony Concerts, he will gratify many of his regular or occasional hearers. He and the Symphony Orchestra played it most eloquently on a Friday afternoon in March then came the secession from the band, and it could not be repeated at the improvised concert of the following Saturday. Only half the subscribers to the Symphony Concerts have thus heard it; the other half is eager to share their pleasure. What Liszt's "Faust" Symphony was to Dr Muck, Berlioz's "Fantastic" promises to become for Mr. Monteux.

Globe Apr 18

Harvard Glee Club Sings at Symphony Concert Today

The Harvard Glee Club will assist the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concert this afternoon in Symphony Hall for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. It is unusual, to say the least, for a college glee club to be asked to sing at a Symphony concert, but those who have heard the remarkable chorus trained and led by Dr A. T. Davison will agree that it deserves this honor.

The opinion of the Glee Club held by those in charge at Symphony Hall is shown by the fact that contrary to a precedent hitherto broken only for Paderewski, which forbids encores at all concerts given by the Boston Symphony, the singers will be allowed to add to the program until the audience is satisfied.

The unusually interesting program follows: Saint-Saens, "Organ" Symphony in C minor No. 3, Op 78; Palestrina, "Adoramus Te"; Lotti, "Crucifixus"; Leisring, "O Filii et Filiae"; Gluck, Minuet from the Opera "Orpheus"; Rubinstein, two pictures from "The Tower of Babel"; Netherlands folk song, "Prayer of Thanksgiving"; Rimsky-Korsakoff, Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op 34.

Concert Programs of the Week

SYMPHONY HALL.—Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra. Twenty-third program. Symphony in C major, No. 7, Schubert; "A Night On Bald Mountain," Musorgski; "La Procession Nocturne," Rabaud; "Carnival in Paris," Svendsen. There is no soloist.

ORCHESTRAL PROSPECTS

N. Y. Tribune Apr 13

By RICHARD ALDRICH.

The Boston papers are optimistic about the present state and the future prospects of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which have so greatly troubled its admirers in this city. Some of the recent strikers have resigned from the Musical Union to return to it. Mr. Monteux, it seems, has restored the band within a month to what Mr. Parker of The Transcript calls "sufficiency and efficiency," though few expected the repairing of the gaps before the beginning of next Autumn. The decimated strings, he says, "now stand only a little short of a full quota." Hardly more than a tuba player and a second harp player are needed. The "new" orchestra, says Mr. Hale in The Herald, contains nearly all the famous players of the past, and "without exaggeration the present section of second violins is the most capable in the history of the orchestra. The young blood in the orchestra today is more than a fair exchange for the phlegm of past seasons."

In the performance of Handel's fifth concerto grosso and of Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride," at a recent concert, there was, according to Mr. Hale, "a triumph of strings. . . . All were severely tested; all acquitted themselves gloriously." Mr. Downs in The Post agrees that "seldom has the string division of this orchestra been heard to better advantage than in the concerto grosso." Mr. Parker qualifies to the extent that Smetana's overture "needed only a little more burnishing of glint and sparkle," but declares that the orchestra is one of "signal quality," and that there is no longer need to make allowances for adverse conditions.

All this leads to the hope that the worst that has been feared may not descend upon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and that it may be preserved in something like the unequaled excellence of its great past. "Now is the time," says Mr. Hale, "for the trustees to make an energetic, unrelaxing 'drive' for the desired endowment. The orchestra today is a superb body of players; it will be even a more magnificent institution at the beginning of next season. The great public," he adds, "not only the audiences, should take pride in this orchestra as a civic institution. It should also forbid insidious German propaganda to work its mole-like way in matters of art."

Herald Apr 18

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

For the last pair but one of regular Boston Symphony concerts this season to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Mr. Monteux has made a program abounding with interest. It will begin with Schubert's famous Symphony in C major. No. 7, the return of which to these concerts will be welcomed by many. Moussorgsky's principal orchestral work, "A Night on Bald Mountain," will have its first performance by the orchestra. A witches' Sabbath on a mountain near Kleff is finally dispelled by village church bells and the coming of dawn. Rabaud's symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," will be repeated. Last season it had a notable success under the leadership of its composer. The closing piece will be Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris."

PENSION FUND

The Boston Symphony pension fund concert to be given in Symphony Hall this afternoon at 3:30 o'clock will afford the last opportunity to non-subscribers to hear the great Symphony orchestra in its most magnificent vein before the season closes (for the two remaining pairs of Symphony concerts the few seats on public sale will soon be gone). Besides the orchestral pieces, which are engrossing in content and exact much of a huge orchestra, the Harvard Glee Club, A. T. Davison's remarkably trained chorus of a hundred men, and the flute solo of Georges Laurent, are unusual attractions. Contrary to custom, encores will be permitted. The program will be as follows:

"Organ" Symphony in C minor, No. 3, op. 78. . . . . Saint-Saens
Organist, Mr. Snow
Chorus (a cappella)
Adoramus Te. . . . . Palestrina
Crucifixus . . . . . Lotti
O Filii et Filiae. . . . . Leisring
Minuet from' "Orpheus" . . . . . Gluck
Flute solo, Georges Laurent
Chorus and Orchestra,
Two "Pictures" from "The Tower of Babel" . . . . . Rubinstein
Prayer of Thanksgiving. Netherlands Folk Song
Caprice on Spanish Themes, op. 34.
Rimsky-Korsakoff

"POPS" ARE COMING

Although the closing "legitimate" musical season is still in full sway at Symphony Hall, with the "Pops" scheduled to begin on May 3, preparations for a record season of this festive institution are already under way. The menu as well as the music may be more attractive than ever, and the general atmosphere even more gay, interior decorators, brewers, crockery men and the like are deep in figures. The cellar is being inventoried, and the store room such accessories as bottle-openers. Agide Jacchia, the noted conductor of Italian opera, who has heaped popularity upon the first and himself during his reign of the summers past, has found new secrets calculated to make Pop audiences sit on the edges of their chairs. The orchestra, drawn entirely from the Symphony players of the winter season will number 80, which is more than sufficient for the most elaborate Pop music. Although the ticket sale will not start until Monday, April 26, reservations may already be made for the opening night.

One wonders if Mr Monteux means to break the precedent which has given two Brahms symphonies and either the "Academic" or the "Tragic" overture to every Symphony season. Unless there is Brahms on the final program, the many who love his music beyond that of most other composers are to be disappointed as they were by Mr Rabaud's last year.

Post Apr 18

PENSION CONCERT TODAY

The Boston Symphony pension fund concert to be given in Symphony Hall this afternoon at 3:30 will afford the last opportunity to non-subscribers to hear the great Symphony Orchestra in its most magnificent vein before the season closes (for the two remaining pairs of Symphony concerts the few seats on public sale will soon be gone). Besides the symphonic numbers, which are engrossing in content and exact much of a huge orchestra, there is exceptional interest in the Harvard Glee Club, Dr. A. T. Davison's remarkably trained chorus of a hundred men (contrary to all custom, encores will be permitted), and in the solo of Georges Laurent, considered the most brilliant flute virtuoso the orchestra has ever had. The programme consists of the "Organ" Symphony by Saint-Saens (Mr. Albert Snow, organist); Minuet from the opera "Orpheus," with a flute solo by Mr. Georges Laurent; and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes." The Harvard Glee Club will sing works by Palestrina, Lotti and Leisring. With the orchestra they will sing "Two Pictures," from "The Tower of Babel," by Rubinstein, and the Netherlands song "Prayer of Thanksgiving."

ROSA RAISA

POPS COMING

Although the closing "legitimate" musical season is still in full sway at Symphony Hall, with the Pops scheduled to begin on May 3, covert preparations for a record season of this festive institution are already under way. The menu as well as the music may be more attractive than ever, and the general atmosphere even more gay, interior decorators, brewers, crockery men and the like are deep in figures. The cellar is being inventoried, and in the store room such accessories as bottle-openers. Not least in importance, Agide Jacchia, the conductor, has found some scores calculated to make Pop audiences sit on the edges of their chairs. The orchestra, drawn entirely from the symphony players of the winter season will number 80, which, of course, is more than sufficient for the most elaborate Pops music.

Globe Apr

HARVARD GLEE CLUB AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony pension fund concert to be given in Symphony Hall this afternoon will afford the last opportunity to non-subscribers to hear the orchestra before the season closes, as for the two remaining pairs of symphony concerts the few seats on public sale will soon be gone. Besides the symphonic numbers there is exceptional interest in the Harvard Glee Club, Dr. A. T. Davison's remarkably trained chorus of a hundred men, and in the solo of Georges Laurent, the brilliant flute virtuoso. Encores will be permitted. The program follows:

Saint-Saens: "Organ" Symphony in C minor, No. 3, Op. 78.
Organist—Mr. Albert W. Snow.
Chorus (a cappella):
Palestrina — Adoramus Te
Lotti — Crucifixus
Leisring — O Filii et Filiae
Gluck: Minuet from the Opera "Orpheus."
Flute solo—Mr. Georges Laurent.
Chorus and orchestra:
Rubinstein: Two Pictures from "The Tower of Babel."
Netherlands Folk Song: Prayer of Thanksgiving.
Rimsky-Korsakoff: Caprice in Spanish Themes, Op. 34.
Alborada: Variations.
Alborada: Scene and Gypsy Song.
Fandango of the Asturias.

POPS BEGIN MAY 3

Although the "legitimate" musical season is still in full sway at Symphony Hall, with the Pops scheduled to begin on May 3, preparations for a record season of this festive institution are already under way. The orchestra, drawn entirely from the Symphony players of the Winter season, will number eighty, with Agide Jacchia as conductor. Reservations may be made for the opening night.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The program for the Symphony concerts next Friday and Saturday will begin with Schubert's famous symphony in C major, No. 7. Moussorgsky's principal symphonic work, "A Night on Bald Mountain," will have its first performance by the orchestra. This fantasy describes a magic orgy dispelled by village church bells. Henri Rabaud's symphonic Poem, "La Procession Nocturne," and Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris" complete the

INFORMATION OBSCURED

FADED TEXT

SYMPHONY CONCERT

TRANQUIL PLEASURES FILL AN AFTERNOON

Trans Apr 16

Agreeable Sense of Emergency Passed and Conquered—Amiable and Characteristic Mozart—Ravel in Sophisticated Simplicity—Contrasting Pieces from Dukas, Christian and Borodin Pagan—The Orchestra Works Ably

TRANQUILLITY has returned to the Symphony Concerts. For the audiences of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the zest of anxieties over the secession and real or imaginary consequences thereof has nearly vanished. The seceders have descended below the horizon, and there remains only an afterglow of speculation. Who of them wish to return to the orchestra? How many of them will be so reinstated? Where are the banished rest likely to find refuge? Gossip is plentiful, but now it is amused and inquisitive where once it was turbid and apprehensive. On the stage sits a re-filled orchestra, sufficient for any task Mr. Monteux may lay upon it. There are newcomers in it; remembered faces returned; familiar figures in unfamiliar place. The band, partially reorganized for the second time in two seasons, and beneficially cleared by the secession of sundry "deadwood," does its work well. As obviously it will do it better as it becomes more accustomed to its new self; more assimilated in routine; more instinctively responsive to the conductor. Mr. Monteux spares no pains. He is industry, ambition, discretion themselves. His choirs answer to him zealously. The emergency is past; the future stretches promisingly; the audience need but fill the usual places, as it did yesterday, and applaud with becoming and remembering warmth. Not even in the programme-book was there an unusual leaflet—not a word, contrary to recent practice, about the endowment fund; only an announcement that the new season of 1920-21 would begin on Oct. 8 and 9 next and that subscriptions are renewable for another series of twenty-four afternoon or evening concerts. Did any one, outside Mr. Fradkin and the editors of certain trade-journals in New York, doubt it?

In fine, there was nothing to do or say but take the pleasures of music and performance and these, again, were relatively tranquil. Especially were they so in the piece with which the concert began—a "Symphonie Concertante" by Mozart, that is to say a "symphonie" with more or less conspicuous solo-parts for violin and viola. Accordingly, Mr. Theodorowicz and Mr. Denayer rose from their usual places, stood side by side to the left of the conductor, received at pauses and at end their meed of particular applause. They deserved it, for the violinist accomplished his usual able and sound performance of whatever task falls to him; while the tone of the viola-player seemed less dry, warmer-bodied, more plastic than it did when he under-took the solo-part in Berlioz's symphony about Byron's Harold. The fine undulations of Mozart, an impersonal music, accord better with Mr. Denayer's ways and powers than the robuster periods of a romantic piece. Occasionally, solo violin and solo viola interchange tonal dialogue; occasionally they speak together above the background of the rest; usually they merely blossom in individual measures into which Mozart has made the music bloom. So might the elegant companies of eighteenth-century salons, for which "symphonies concertantes" were destined, single out the virtuosi who particularly pleased them.

Advisedly, Mr. Monteux used a relatively small orchestra for this music—smaller, if memory does not slip, than that which Dr. Muck employed when he also revived it—not all the strings, no more than two horns and proportionate oboes. Furthermore, the conductor's hand was light, supple. Thereby the little symphony flowed pleasantly forward, kept undulating course, eddied into pretty euphonies, sang itself into phrases that human rather than instrumental, voices might be moulding. In music, as in much else, the eighteenth-century loved an elegant stateliness. Even Mozart, not altogether a conformist to the ways of his age, could be deferential to such liking. So the first movement of this "Symphonie Concertante" often runs in broad periods, incisive rhythms, forthright progress. There is even hint here and there of the Mozart who was later to write the measures of the Commander walking in marble across "Don Juan" and of Sarastro, the high priest, in "The Magic Flute." Few styles baffled his fecund many-sidedness; and he could be grave and stately without the hint of pomposity shaking too often out of Händel's full-bottomed wig. A more natural Mozart, however, sings his way through the perfect continuity of the Andante, weaving a silvery thread of song, spraying it with as silvery ornament, as effortless as though felicity were routine, charming with that half smile which is mask to so much of his music. What a pity that there must also be a Finale in which, if the truth is to be told, Mozart is no more than deft, and somewhat repetitious, music-maker! Unfortunately it was not the way of the eighteenth century to leave things incomplete. Possibly, too, its little orchestra holds straightforward.

The rest was inning for the modern—Dukas with an overture to Corneille's "Christian tragedy" of "Polyeucte"; Borodin with the contrastingly pagan dances of a tribe of Polovtsi—otherwise Tartars—in his opera of old and legendary Russia, "Prince Igor." Usually in the arts the pagans get the better of the Christian, and the pages of Borodin, clothed in or-more [illegible] to [illegible] pose—were distinctly more interesting than the pages of Dukas. Yet not so interesting, in spite of Mr. Monteux's rhythmic energies as they seemed when the Diaghilev ballet—Bolm en tête—danced and pranced to them. The eye of the imagination would hark back to the deep red tents of Golovin's—or was it Röhrich's?—Tartar camp; to the wan, rolling landscape, the twisting river that stretched behind. As the ear tingled to the music, the more memory hungered for sight of the whirling or languorous dancers, for their tossing or spinning lines, whipping now one and now another into fresh frenzies; for a glimpse of the Polovtsian women snatched and upborne by their masters, the men. A play—it is the custom to say—is not half itself until it is acted. Similarly these dances from "Prince Igor" are not half themselves until they are actually danced. There is no suggestion of out-of-doors in Symphony Hall; there was not too much in the Russian ballet's staging of these dances. Yet somehow they sound as though they belonged under the sky, on a wind-swept day, in a tumultuous camp. Barbaric Borodin is not with the glinting, clanging fantasy of Rimsky in "The Golden Cockerel," or Stravinsky in episodes in "The Fire-Bird"; but more than they he feels the spaciousness, the rudeness that ancient Russian legend may exhale. The very woodenness of some of his measures in these dances from "Prince Igor" resembles it.

Dukas's Christian martyrs in tones, set there in his younger days, are hardly more interesting than Corneille's in verse; and there are those who have sat before his tragedy at the Théatre-Français when not even Mounet-Sully or Albert Lambert or Madeleine Roch herself could persuade them to turn a hair. Not that Dukas seeks to retell the tale, to characterize the personages of the play—Corneille's stiff-jointed, lofty-tongued Romans, beset between religious, conjugal and amorous loyalties. Rather the composer seems to be fashioning a well-made piece of music that shall be atmospheric and illuding prelude to the tragedy. There is grave, even lofty beginning; sombre, struggling measures as of emotional conflict and desolation; measures, finally, of tempered aspiration, serene exaltation. Dukas is apparently cultivating the grand manner—and gaining it but dryly; courting a classic reticence—and saying too litttle to be impressive. But his motivs are workable; his craftsmanship serves. He is as respectable as a Sunday evening audience before "Polyeucte" at the Comédie—and nearly as commonplace. Better twenty times, the sharp humors of his "Sorcerer's Apprentice," the imaginative fantasy of his "Peri"; the symphonic passion, so to say, of scenes in his "Ariane."

Continued on Page Eight

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Continued from Page Six

Between Dukas and Borodin, a familiar Ravel—the Ravel of the five fairy-tales that he is pleased to call "Pièces Enfantines" and to attribute to a Gallic Mother Goose, shamelessly un-Anglo-Saxon. They are of the miniatures of music, nearly flawless in kind and quality, wrought with adeptly sophisticated means to transparent simplicity of outcome. Twenty measures of the Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty and the hearer knows that she was a stately princess, wistful, remote, under fairy enchantment. A few pages more and "Hop o' My Thumb" is lost in the woods, childishly dazed, pitiful—and a bird dares twitter carelessly. Another turn of the leaves, and all the Pagodes and Pagodines (as the seventeenth century called little porcelain figures of fairy-tale) are waggling tiny little heads and marching in nodding ranks upon their tiny toes—genre picture in humorous, titillating perfection, albeit somewhat heavily and emphatically played. A space further and Beauty is cajoling in the clarinet and Beast grunting in the double bassoon. "Come, dear Beast, you shall live to be my husband"; and they fade into mist upon Ravel's languorous waltz. And last, as for the lowering of a multi-colored, iridescent curtain, the music of the Fairy Garden. Throughout Ravel is as adroit of means as he is precise of imagination. It is hard to remember more artful and ingenious, more fanciful and pictorial miniatures in music. If only miniatures, there or anywhere else, did not cloy so soon. . . . but Ravel is shrewdly brief.

H. T. PARKER

"THE MAN WHO MADE US"

Trans Apr 10

Dr. Davison Whose Work and Spirit Has Transformed the Harvard Glee Club Into a Remarkable Men's Choir—As His Singers See Him

IF you ask any member of the Harvard Glee Club how it happens that the club has achieved the impossible and become one of the most thoroughly trained and accomplished men's choruses in the country, the answer is simply "Doc." . . .

Dr. Archibald T. Davison—or Assistant Professor Davison, to be exact, for that is his title on the Harvard record books, although the men in the Glee Club all call him "Doc"—has spent most of his thirty-five years at Harvard. He studied there as an undergraduate from 1902 to 1906. He continued there, doing graduate work in music, with one brief intermission when he studied the organ under Widor in Paris, taking first prizes for his playing. He began to teach in 1908. In 1910 he became organist and choirmaster at the college chapel. This position he still holds. Meanwhile, during the last ten years his growing success has carried him steadily up the ladder of promotion to the rung of assistant professor. In 1916 one of his compositions was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Now he is directing the Glee Club. A few years ago one of his Harvard choirs sang with the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck; a week from next Sunday his Glee Club will sing with it under Mr. Monteux.

That is all you find on the college records, and it doesn't look like anything extraordinary. What matters is the story that lies behind those commonplace facts. Davison, as choirmaster, began to attract attention a good many years ago by making the Harvard choir a brilliant musical organization. He taught them, little by little, the best church music of all ages, and he revealed to them the fascination of that music. Many members of the choir were also members of the Glee Club of that day—on ordinary college Glee Club wedded to a banjo club and a mandolin club, and dedicated to the cause of sentimental or jazz music lifted from the musical comedy stage. These particular men, to whom Davison had revealed the fact that first-class music is worth singing, preferred the things he taught them to the stuff which they performed in the Glee Club. They found that the better the music, the more fun it was to sing and the more the audience liked it.

Continued on Page Eight

"THE MAN WHO MADE US"

Continued from Page Six

So, to make a long story short, this year the Glee Club turned over a new leaf, forsook the instrumental clubs, and set out for itself. As now organized, it is new in everything but name. And the members of the club are still marveling at the success of their venture, and wondering whether the critics are really sincere in saying that the club has not only outdistanced all other college glee clubs, but gone far toward surpassing all other choral organizations in the country, of whatever sort, with the possible exception of the Russian Cathedral Choir in New York. The voices of the men in the club are not remarkable. They are not a brilliantly musical group. And yet Davison has made them into the most perfectly sensitive musical instrument, capable of performing the most difficult choral music. How does he do it?

Dr. Davison is a smallish, strongly-built, light-haired man of about 35. No an unusual-looking fellow, except, perhaps, for his keen blue eyes. But watch him as with his quick step he walks upon the concert platform and begins to lead the chorus. He is electric with energy and controlled enthusiasm. Listen to him as he talks to the men between pieces. You can see that he has leadership, sympathy, and a friendly attitude toward the men no less than he has an alert sensitiveness to musical values. The men are loyal to him. They follow his every motion, listen to his every word; and the result is that he plays upon them as he might upon an organ. It is the old, old story of the power of personality.

If you ask Dr. Davison how such a state of affairs has been brought about, he tells you about a prominent musician connected with another well-known college, who heard the Harvard Glee Club and went home and asked the leader of his own glee club why they didn't have the same sort of thing.

"I guess we never thought of it," said the leader.

"That's just it," says Dr. Davison. "Most college glee clubs haven't thought of it. Those fellows happened to have the idea. They put it through. It works. And I will venture that other clubs could do the same thing if they woke up to the fact that the better the music you sing, the more you and your audience enjoy it." But the undergraduates in the club prefer their own explanation. They simply point to the fact that Harvard has its Dr. Davison, and not every college possesses such a source of musical enthusiasm and inspiration.

Trans Apr 14

Items and Incidents

With the restored orchestra Mr. Monteux now has at command all the instruments prescribed by Berlioz for his "Fantastic Symphony." If the conductor chooses, as there is some reason to expect, to include the piece in the final pair of Symphony Concerts, he will gratify many of his regular or occasional hearers. He and the Symphony Orchestra played it most eloquently on a Friday afternoon in March; then came the secession from the band, and it could not be repeated at the improvised concert of the following Saturday. Only half the subscribers to the Symphony Concerts have thus heard it; the other half is eager to share their pleasure. What Liszt's "Faust" Symphony was to Dr. Muck, Berlioz's "Fantastic" promises to become for Mr. Monteux.

Globe Apr 18

Harvard Glee Club Sings at Symphony Concert Today

The Harvard Glee Club will assist the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concert this afternoon in Symphony Hall for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. It is unusual, to say the least, for a college glee club to be asked to sing at a Symphony concert, but those who have heard the remarkable chorus trained and led by Dr A. T. Davison will agree that it deserves this honor.

The opinion of the Glee Club held by those in charge at Symphony Hall is shown by the fact that contrary to a precedent hitherto broken only for Paderewski, which forbids encores at all concerts given by the Boston Symphony, the singers will be allowed to add to the program until the audience is satisfied.

The unusually interesting program follows: Saint-Saens, "Organ" Symphony in C minor No. 3, Op 78; Palestrina, "Adoramus Te"; Lotti, "Crucifixus"; Leisring, "O Filii et Filiae"; Gluck, Minuet from the Opera "Orpheus"; Rubinstein, two pictures from "The Tower of Babel"; Netherlands folk song, "Prayer of Thanksgiving"; Rimsky-Korsakoff, Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op 34.

Concert Programs of the Week

SYMPHONY HALL—Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra. Twenty-third program. Symphony in C major, No. 7, Schubert; "A Night On Bald Mountain," Musorgski; "La Procession Nocturne," Rabaud; "Carnival in Paris," Svendsen. There is no soloist.

ORCHESTRAL PROSPECTS

N. Y. Times Apr 4

By RICHARD ALDRICH.

The Boston papers are optimistic about the present state and the future prospects of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which have so greatly troubled its admirers in this city. Some of the recent strikers have resigned from the Musical Union to return to it. Mr. Monteux, it seems, has restored the band within a month to what Mr. Parker of The Transcript calls "sufficiency and efficiency," though few expected the repairing of the gaps before the beginning of next Autumn. The decimated strings, he says, "now stand only a little short of a full quota." Hardly more than a tuba player and a second harp player are needed. The "new" orchestra, says Mr. Hale in The Herald, contains nearly all the famous players of the past, and "without exaggeration the present section of second violins is the most capable in the history of the orchestra. The young blood in the orchestra today is more than a fair exchange for the phlegm of past seasons."

In the performance of Handel's fifth concerto grosso and of Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride," at a recent concert, there was, according to Mr. Hale, "a triumph of strings. * * * All were severely tested; all acquitted themselves gloriously." Mr. Downs in The Post agrees that "seldom has the string division of this orchestra been heard to better advantage than in the concerto grosso." Mr. Parker qualifies to the extent that Smetana's overture "needed only a little more burnishing of glint and sparkle," but declares that the orchestra is one of "signal quality," and that there is no longer need to make allowances for adverse conditions.

All this leads to the hope that the worst that has been feared may not descend upon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and that it may be preserved in something like the unequaled excellence of its great past. "Now is the time," says Mr. Hale, "for the trustees to make an energetic, unrelaxing 'drive' for the desired endowment. The orchestra today is a superb body of players; it will be even a more magnificent institution at the beginning of next season. The great public," he adds, "not only the audiences, should take pride in this orchestra as a civic institution. It should also forbid insidious German propaganda to work its mole-like way in matters of art."

Post Apr 18

PENSION CONCERT TODAY

The Boston Symphony pension fund concert to be given in Symphony Hall this afternoon at 3:30 will afford the last opportunity to non-subscribers to hear the great Symphony Orchestra in its most magnificent vein before the season closes (for the two remaining pairs of Symphony concerts the few seats on public sale will soon be gone). Besides the symphonic numbers, which are engrossing in content and exact much of a huge orchestra, there is exceptional interest in the Harvard Glee Club, Dr. A. T. Davison's remarkably trained chorus of a hundred men (contrary to all custom, encores will be permitted), and in the solo of Georges Laurent, considered the most brilliant flute virtuoso the orchestra has ever had. The programme consists of the "Organ" Symphony by Saint-Saens (Mr. Albert Snow, organist); Minuet from the opera "Orpheus," with a flute solo by Mr. Georges Laurent; and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes." The Harvard Glee Club will sing works by Palestrina, Lotti and Leisring. With the orchestra they will sing "Two Pictures," from "The Tower of Babel," by Rubinstein, and the Netherlands song, "Prayer of Thanksgiving."

Herald Apr 18

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

For the last pair but one of regular Boston Symphony concerts this season, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux has made a program abounding with interest. It will begin with Schubert's famous Symphony in C major. No. 7, the return of which to these concerts will be welcomed by many. Moussorgsky's principal orchestral work, "A Night on Bald Mountain," will have its first performance by the orchestra. A witches' Sabbath on a mountain near Kieff is finally dispelled by village church bells and the coming of dawn. Rabaud's symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," will be repeated. Last season it had a notable success under the leadership of its composer. The closing piece will be Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris."

PENSION FUND

The Boston Symphony pension fund concert to be given in Symphony Hall this afternoon at 3:30 o'clock will afford the last opportunity to non-subscribers to hear the great Symphony orchestra in its most magnificent vein before the season closes (for the two remaining pairs of Symphony concerts the few seats on public sale will soon be gone). Besides the orchestral pieces, which are engrossing in content and exact much of a huge orchestra, the Harvard Glee Club, A. T. Davison's remarkably trained chorus of a hundred men, and the flute solo of Georges Laurent, are unusual attractions. Contrary to custom, encores will be permitted. The program will be as follows:

"Organ" Symphony in C minor, No. 3, op. 78.....Saint-Saens
Organist, Mr. Snow
Chorus (a cappella)
Adoramus Te.....Palestrina
Crucifixus.....Lotti
O Filii et Filiae.....Leisring
Minuet from "Orpheus".....Gluck
Flute solo, Georges Laurent
Chorus and Orchestra,
Two "Pictures" from "The Tower of Babel".....Rubinstein
Prayer of Thanksgiving, Netherlands Folk Song
Caprice on Spanish Themes, op. 34,
Rimsky-Korsakoff

"POPS" ARE COMING

Although the closing "legitimate" musical season is still in full sway at Symphony Hall, with the "Pops" scheduled to begin on May 3, preparations for a record season of this festive institution are already under way. The menu as well as the music may be more attractive than ever, and the general atmosphere even more gay, interior decorators, brewers, crockery men and the like are deep in figures. The cellar is being inventoried, and the store room such accessories as bottle-openers. Agide Jacchia, noted conductor of Italian opera, who has heaped popularity upon the and himself during his reign of summers past, has found new calculated to make Pop audiences on the edges of their chairs. The chestra, drawn entirely from the phony players of the winter sea will number 80, which is more than sufficient for the most elaborate music. Although the ticket sale will not start until Monday, April 26, reservations may already be made for the opening night.

One wonders if Mr Monteux means break the precedent which has given two Brahms symphonies and either the "Academic" or the "Tragic" overture in every Symphony season. Unless there is Brahms on the final program, the many who love his music beyond that of most other composers are to be disappointed as they were by Mr Rabaud last year.

POPS COMING

Although the closing "legitimate" musical season is still in full sway at Symphony Hall, with the Pops scheduled to begin on May 3, covert preparations for a record season of this festive institution are already under way. The menu as well as the music may be more attractive than ever, and the general atmosphere even more gay, interior decorators, brewers, crockery men and the like are deep in figures. The cellar is being inventoried, and in the store room such accessories as bottle-openers. Not least in importance, Agide Jacchia, the conductor, has found some scores calculated to make Pop audiences sit on the edges of their chairs. The orchestra, drawn entirely from the symphony players of the winter season will number 80, which, of course, is more than sufficient for the most elaborate Pops music.

HARVARD GLEE CLUB AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe Apr 19

The Boston Symphony pension fund concert to be given in Symphony Hall this afternoon will afford the last opportunity to non-subscribers to hear the orchestra before the season closes, as for the two remaining pairs of symphony concerts the few seats on public sale will soon be gone. Besides the symphonic numbers there is exceptional interest in the Harvard Glee Club, Dr. A. T. Davison's remarkably trained chorus of a hundred men, and in the solo of Georges Laurent, the brilliant flute virtuoso. Encores will be permitted. The program follows:

Saint-Saens: "Organ" Symphony in C minor, No. 3, Op. 78
Organist—Mr. Albert W. Snow.
Chorus (a cappella):
Palestrina — Adoramus Te
Lotti — Crucifixus
Leisring — O Filii et Filiae
Gluck: Minuet from the Opera "Orpheus."
Flute solo—Mr. Georges Laurent.
Chorus and orchestra:
Rubinstein: Two Pictures from "The Tower of Babel."
Netherlands Folk Song: Prayer of Thanksgiving.
Rimsky-Korsakoff: Caprice in Spanish Themes, Op. 34.
Alborada: Variations.
Alborada: Scene and Gypsy Song.
Fandango of the Asturias.

POPS BEGIN MAY 3

Although the "legitimate" musical season is still in full sway at Symphony Hall, with the Pops scheduled to begin on May 3, preparations for a record season of this festive institution are already under way. The orchestra, drawn entirely from the Symphony players of the Winter season, will number eighty, with Agide Jacchia as conductor. Reservations may be made for the opening night.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The program for the Symphony concerts next Friday and Saturday will begin with Schubert's famous symphony in C major, No. 7. Moussorgsky's principal symphonic work, "A Night on Bald Mountain," will have its first performance by the orchestra. This fantasy describes a magic orgy dispelled by village church bells. Henri Rabaud's symphonic Poem, "La Procession Nocturne," and Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris" complete the

22D CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Interpretative Power of Orchestra Impresses Audience

MR. CORTOT AT PIANO SHARES APPLAUSE

By PHILIP HALE

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Overture to "Fidelio" and Piano Concerto, C minor, No. 3; Debussy, Fantasy for piano and orchestra (first time in America); Rimsky-Korsakoff, Introduction and march from "Le Coq d'Or" (first time at these concerts). Alfred Cortot was the pianist.

The overture to "Fidelio" is usually played at performances of the opera in Germany, probably because it is the most non-committal of the five that Beethoven wrote. (The one intended for Prague disappeared.) There is nothing in the "Fidelio" overture that can lessen the effect of the opera itself. While the whole drama is in the "Leonore" No. 3 and even in the "Leonore" No. 2, some will agree to Vincent d'Indy's saying that "Leonore" No. 3 is a more dramatic and greater work than the opera that follows. The "Fidelio" overture might be for any opera of a conventional nature without a tragic subject. It might even serve for a light opera of the better class. Did Beethoven purposely write it in this vein, without reference to Florestan, the prison, the jailer digging the grave, the arrival of the governor with Pizzaro thwarted by the heroic wife, so that the one great and only dramatic scene in the opera might not be anticipated?

Strange to say, Beethoven's third concerto had been played at the Symphony concerts only twice. As it was performed yesterday it seemed a more engrossing and romantic composition than the two later concertos, although it was written in 1800. In the first movement the influence of Mozart is felt, but there is a depth of sentiment in the largo, a playful, whimsical spirit in the finale peculiar to Beethoven.

Or was this impression due to the extraordinary merit of the performance by the pianist and the orchestra? It is not easy to speak in measured terms of Mr. Cortot's interpretation. We have heard many pianists beginning with Rubenstein, Buelow, men and women of their period; famous pianists who were said by their audiences to excel in the performance of Beethoven's music. Their interpretations were described as dignified, profound, noble, classic, (as if Beethoven was not in his early maturity a romanticist), noble, sublime. They were admirable, each in its own way, yet having in the course of the years almost come to the conclusion that the piano is not a musical instrument in the highest sense of the word "musical", we are ready to cry "Peccavi" when a pianist like Mr. Cortot revealed the strength and the beauty of a great work and displays the qualities that characterize the great pianist-musician. To dwell on the nature of his interpretation; to analyze; to hunt for the fitting superlatives and purple phrases of praise would not convey to a reader not in the hall the glory of the performance. No wonder, the audience was enthsiastic; no wonder that Mr. Cortot was stormily recalled again and again, while Mr. Monteux, representing the orchestra, was not forgotten.

Debussy's Fantasy was written in 1889-90. It was not performed or published during his lifetime. Would he have been willing to grant a performance, even with Mr. Cortot as the pianist? The Fantasy was put in rehearsal long ago in Paris, but Debussy withdrew it. Surely, many of these early pages are more worthy of him than those in some of his latest compositions. The theme that pervades the Fantasy is ingeniously treated, but this is by no means the sole merit. There is a delightful freshness, exuberance, recklessness, that would have shocked the hidebound conservatives of the Institute if he had sent the Fantasy as his fourth envoi. There are charming bits of instrumentation; everywhere are marks of the originality that startled Paris when his succeeding works were produced. Perhaps the later Debussy thought the Fantasy too formal, too such in accordance with respectable traditions; yet more than once he broke away from them; nor need he have deplored the beauty of the Lento section as obvious, not subtle. The performance by pianist and orchestra was appropriately now sensuous, now dashingly brilliant.

The excerpts from "The Golden Cock" are not so effective in the concert hall as in the opera house. They are entertaining enough, but they are far more amusing in the theatre.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as fololws: Schubert, Symphony in C major; Moussorgsky, "A Night on Bald Mountain" (first time at these concerts); Rabaud, "The Nocturnal Procession"; Svendsen, "Carnival in

CORTOT AT PIANO WITH SYMPHONY

Debussy's Fantasie Heard for First Time in America

BY OLIN DOWNES

Alfred Cortot, pianist, was soloist at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, and the principal part of the programme was his. He played Beethoven's C minor concerto and Debussy's early Fantasie for piano and orchestra which was then performed for the first time in America. In both of these compositions Mr. Cortot again displayed the qualities which make him a commanding figure among his colleagues—his broad and noble conceptions of classic forms, his mastery of rythm and phrase, his pianist authority and brilliancy.

BEETHOVEN VERY HUMAN

Seldom has Beethoven's concerto been played here in so Beethovenish a manner—in the first movement with enormous virility of thought and touch, in the second movement with repose and deep feeling, in the last movement with the jocosity, the reckless merriment, which is one of Beethoven's characteristic moods. When Beethoven is so played he is very noble, at the same time very human and very simple. Yes! But to play him that way is not so simple.

But Mr. Cortot was very much in the right when he insisted on Mr. Monteux acknowledging with him the applause, for Mr. Monteux' reading of the orchestral parts was as virile and as musicianly as Mr. Cortot's playing. Let us add, as an amen, that with all this fine playing the concerto is very old-fashioned, and one's enjoyment of it must be partly historical, rather than wholly emotional.

Debussy's Early Work

Then came Debussy's Fantasie. This early work was one of the pieces the composer sent back from Rome when he won the Grand Prix at the Paris Conservatoire. It excited distrust, and it was not heard until the 19th of last November in London—six years after the composer's death. The performance yesterday was from the proof sheets. When this work was played in London some of the reviewers thought that it would have been best not to exhume it. But that seems rather an extreme judgment. If one can endure the Fidelio overture of Beethoven, with which yesterday's concert commenced, is not a hearing of an early work of a great modern composer wholly justified?

True, there is in this Fantasie but little of the mature Debussy—at least on a first hearing—but throughout there are intervals and an occasional harmonic twist agreeable in themselves and of much interest as specimens of the composer's early attempts at expression. What is also interesting and rather amusing is to perieve Debussy making an attempt, at least, at classic form and symphonic working out of motives. He fails.

A Good Concert Piece

The opening motive of the first movement is infinitely more original and interesting than its working out. Secondly, we find Mr. Debussy, the master of marvellous effects gained by the original and unforseen employment of a few instruments, using heavy, whacking orchestration—sometimes with very brilliant, if coarse effect. In fact, the first movement of the Fantasie, by itself, would not be a bad concert piece to keep in the repertory. It has brilliancy and some good orchestral tricks. It has interesting if immature thematic material, and a great deal of muscularity and what is technically known as "pep."

The slow movement meanders about in a Massenetish manner, sometimes with touches of a fanciful Orientalism, and we hear hints of the "Fetes" movement of the Nocturnes, and of figures which occur in sundry piano pieces of this Debussy. These are first impressions. The work was not only worth hearing, but would be worth hearing again, and he is rather a bold man who says that on account of its immaturity this interesting music of the early Debussy should not be played.

From "The Golden Cock"

So much for the commonplace Beethoven overture, which was excellently played, and Mr. Cortot's performances. The concert came to an end with an introduction and march from Rimsky-Korsakoff's fantastical opera, "The Golden Cock," heard here in 1918. The introduction consists of various motives—that of the wheedling Queen of Shemakha, the Queen who works the old man's ruin in the opera; the motive of the astrologer who is the evil magician of the piece; the crow of the cock; the song of the seductive Queen when she salutes the sun, and finally

MUSIC

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The twenty-second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place on April 16 with the following program:

Beethoven.....Overture to "Fidelio"
Beethoven..Concerto for Pianoforte No. 3
Debussy, Fantasy for Pianoforte and Orchestra
Rimsky-Korsakoff, Excerpts from "Le Coq d' or"
Alfred Cortot was the pianist.

Beethoven's overture, although not among his greatest works, was a fitting introduction. Theatrical, romantic, it was played by Mr. Monteux with due appreciation of these qualities, and with spirit. The concerto, of Beethoven's earlier years, is too seldom heard. Many consider it, together with the first one in C major, to be proper in the class room only. What a sadly mistaken idea! Yet, it is not suited to the ordinary virtuoso, for in spite of its simple construction, and moderate technical demands, it requires a master musician, as well as pianist to play it properly. Unfortunately these qualities are not always united in the same person as is the case with Mr. Cortot. His playing was distinguished for its grace, nobility and feeling, particularly in the adagio and rondo, which were interpreted in the true Beethoven manner. He did not sentimentalize; he was never trivial. Such playing can be equaled by few, surpassed by none.

Debussy's Fantasy was played for the first time in America. The piece is divided into two parts by the composer although there are in reality four distinct movements—part one, introduction and allegro—part two slow movement and finale.

Chronologically the work belongs to the composer's early period—that of the Suite Bergamasque and the suite "Pour le piano"—but it seems to have been retouched by the composer in later years. The effect is not always happy. The opening is well conceived, but the succeeding allegro seems at a first hearing vague and ill-defined. There are characteristic progressions and orchestral effects but the total impression of the first part seems negligible.

Not so, however, that of the second part. The slow movement is poetic and imaginative and is full of beautiful orchestral color. The final allegro which follows without pause is festal in character. After a long crescendo terminating in a brilliant passage for the full orchestra there are reminiscences of the slow movement followed in turn by another crescendo nd resounding climax. In this latter ection, a theme of distinctly oriental haracter occurs. In fact the entire inale suggests some festival in the ar East.

The work as a whole is hardly characteristic of Debussy at his best. It makes but little subjective appeal save n the slow movement of the second part. The piano part, although evidently of great difficulty is far from effective and the delicate tints of Debussy's later style are lacking. It is undoubtedly worthy of many hearings but will scarcely add to the reputation of the composer of "L'après midi d'un Faun" or the "Sea pieces." The performance was wholly admirable. There was much applause, yet we venture to think that it was more in appreciation of the brilliant playing of Mr. Cortot and the orchestra than for the work itself.

The excerpts from "Le Coq d'or" were distinctly out of place in the concert room. This atmospheric music of the theater seemed weak and commonplace when derived of its natural setting, although played with extraordinary skill by the orchestra.

a delicious fragment of Russian folk melody given to the strings. Then modulations, and the grotesque march of King Dodon. At the last, drums pounding, brass blaring, one had almost said, flags waving, a trumpet is shrieking out a caricature of the Queen's motive—that same wheedling arabesque which runs through much of the score in the latter part of the opera, an whispers of bedevilling magic as th motive of Scheherazade in the "Thou sand and One Nights" suite tells the craft and the outrageous yarning of that fair lady.

This music is slight, but very suggestive in its melodic substance, very well made, though with little development of the ideas, and masterfully orchestrated. Then there is the mad humor and the fairy tale quality of all the music. It is inhuman, it is grotesque. It tells of strange land haunted by wizards and sirens, where the sun rises on the wrong side of the horizon, where men are led astray by (1) demon astrologers, (2) by women who do not exist, and (3) golden birds! When the opera was given here the strange scenery was so captivating that one did not get the full value of the music. The scenery is in the music. The music will not stand by itself, but if you know the story of Rimsky's opera and listen you will

RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF ENLIVENS CONCERT

Parts of "Le Coq d'Or" by Symphony Orchestra

Beethoven and Debussy Also Are Brilliantly Rendered

The most interesting number on the program of yesterday's Symphony concert was a spirited performance of excerpts from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera "Le Coq d'Or," which had been previously heard in this city only at a single performance by the Metropolitan Opera Company in April, 1918. Mr Monteux, who has conducted many operatic performances of the music, chose selections which included all of the chief themes on which it is founded. When fragments of the "Hymn to the Sun" were heard, there was a buzz of whispered recognition in the audience, to which Kreisler's transcription for violin has become familiar, through repeated hearings.

Sticklers for tradition may protest that operatic pot-pourris belong at the "Pops" and not on the regular Symphony programs, where they have not appeared in recent years. Yet where the music in question is of remarkable quality and able to stand alone in the concert hall, there seems no valid reason for objecting to the introduction of excerpts, especially from unfamiliar masterpieces, in which the voice parts are either absent or of minor importance.

Russian music is not, in the main, characterized by connected development of motives. Its charm lies in the themes themselves and in the harmonic and orchestral color. There was quite as much continuity in these fragments of "Le Coq d'Or" as there is in "Scheherezade" or in "Thamar," which were written for concert performance.

Alfred Cortot, the soloist, chose distinctly inferior specimens of Beethoven and of Debussy. To the piano part in each he brought a delicate, smooth tone and a considerable feeling for nuance in interpretation. His chief defect is a lack of reserve force behind his fortissimo, which is strained and brittle in quality.

Beethoven was far better represented by the noble Overture to "Fidelio" than by the unfamiliar Third Concerto, an early work. Its slow movement could be made to sound like an aftermath of Mozart, but Mr Monteux, by encouraging the 'cellos to strive for a warm and sticky tone and by eliminating all the secondary accents, made it an anticipation of Weber and of Mendelssohn's "Songs Without Words." The finale had several flashes of the originality and power of the later Beethoven, notably in the coda.

Debussy's Fantasy was performed for the first time in America, because the composer during his lifetime refrained from publishing this and other early works in which the influence of his mellifuous teacher, Massenet, is hidden only by the use of harmonies based on the whole tone scale. The rythmic vitality of the allegro sections is its chief merit, but the subtlety found in such later works as "Jeux" is lacking here. The performance was brilliant.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE AFTERNOON OF A PIANIST, ALFRED CORTOT

"Assisting Artist" or Assisting Orchestra? —Beethoven's Third Concerto Revived, and Debussy's Fantasia for the First Time in America—Notable Distinctions of Performance — A Prelude from "Fidelio," a Postlude from "The Golden Cockerel"

IT is possible to admire warmly Mr. Cortot as pianist and musician, to multiply praise of his share in the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, and yet to regret that so much of it fell to him. It was a pleasure to note the numbers of the audience—filling every seat and likely to be as large this evening—and the applause heaped upon him. Yet these circumstances only accented his relative possession of the occasion. The orchestra indeed had appreciable share in one of his pieces, a Fantasia of Debussy's earlier years, but by itself, it no more than provided prelude and postlude. It began the concert with Beethoven's overture, "Fidelio"—secondary and space-filling Beethoven—and it ended the concert with the introduction to the first act and the march from the third in Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Golden Cockerel"—music of the stage and of no other place. In other words and in the homely dialect of the theatre, the orchestra "played the audience in" and "played the audience out." Furthermore it accompanied Mr. Cortot in the third Concerto (in C minor) of Beethoven, in Debussy's Fantasia already specified. The pianist was the rest.

